This call to women is a welcome one, and the response cannot fail to be large, if not overwhelming. All kinds of societies composed of women are sending in their answer, and the various suffrage societies are rejoicing over this opportunity to make good their contention that "woman's sphere" can only be marked by the measure of each individual woman's capability.

Now, more than ever, it seems to me, is there little excuse for the cry of unemployment among women. Only the mentally or physically unfit ones need go workless. I understand that the Government puts no age-limit and is giving parents and guardians assurances that young women will be adequately protected and treated with all due courtesy and consideration. The Board of Trade shows true diplomacy and tact in the appeal it makes to women to take up work that must be done. The appeal has been made a call to National War Service, and I cannot fancy any woman unable to feel a thrill at this summons.

Yesterday several women were talking over this call. For an instant one of the number put a damper on the enthusiasm of the company by saying:

"What will be done with us when the war is over? Will the men be given back their work—those that return able to fill the old positions? You see, I can't help wondering——"

Then the real nobility of her nature came to the rescue. "I'm ashamed of myself!" she suddenly exclaimed. "It's a question of doing one's job at the moment, and not looking ahead, except for the good of the country."

I think the Government will find that this is the spirit of British women. They are going to attend to their "jobs," realising that this is no time for dwelling on any past injustices to women or any future ones either.

In fact, this war will mean much for women if women do but to themselves be true.

* * *

There is a great National War Service for every woman in the land, whether she responds to this call of the Government or whether she remains at home. Last Sunday Dagonet spoke of the war that Germany would wage on England when this present war had ended—the industrial war, and he advised a preparation now for this war which is sure to come.

Now, this trade war of Germany is going to be a war waged largely against women, as it always has been, or perhaps I should say it is a war to which the defence must be made by women. Women have always been the purchasers of more than two-thirds of the manufactures which Germany has sent to this country, and if Germany is to succeed in her next war it can only be for the reason that the women of Britain will lack the stamina or the inclination to make resistance.

If British women to-day make a resolve that their children shall never again play with toys made in Germany; if they go out into their kitchens, take note of all kitchen utensils, and determine that Germany shall have no part in furnishing those kitchens; if they go through their houses with note-book and pencil, jotting down the goods they already have of German or suspected German manufacture; if they look over their wardrobes with the same intention of learning to what extent they have heretofore patronised German industries, and then make their plans for a campaign against Germany, and stick to those plans—Germany must suffer her second and most important defeat in her contests against Britain.

In the defence against the Industrial War the men of this country will be almost helpless unless they have the co-operation of the women. Women are the buyers of the world. If women ceased to buy, most industries would go to pieces. There are really very few things of which men are the purchasers. Many wives attend even to the buying of all the wearing apparel of their husbands with the exception of suits, boots, and hats, and even in the choice of materials for most men's suits women have a word of advice. So we may say they have practically the clothing of the whole family in their hands, the furnishing of their house, and the decision concerning foodstuffs. Therefore, if British women should band themselves together for defence when Germany again makes war, there can be no question of the victory. I believe that women, if they will only combine, can revive British industries and make another German industrial invasion an impossibility.

[illegible] is a most important form of National Service for [illegible] and I advise every woman to enlist at once. At first [illegible] may have some inconveniences attached to it, but it will be [illegible] most interesting and highly attractive service. One [illegible] [illegible] myself in taking an [illegible] ad not been many eeks old before omen showed not nly their eager- ess and desire, nt their great apacity to help. he opening sen- ence in the official andbook of the ' Women's Defence elief Corps" reads lmost like an in- elligent anticipa- ion of the Govern- ment's idea. It is as follows: "The Women's Defence Relief Corps has been formed to undertake civil or semi-military work, which will enable more men to go to the front." Then there was the "Women's Volun- teer Reserve," which had the en- thusiastic support of Lady Jellicoe, wife of the Admiral in command of the North Sea Fleet. The object of this organisa- tion is practically the same as that of the Relief Corps: "to set every man free for the fighting line."

The "Women's Emergency Corps" is another body that has done splendid work for the nation. This corps was started within two days of the declaration of war with the object of organising women's help, and within two weeks over 10,000 offers of personal service had been received and dealt with.

This does not pretend to be by any means an exhaustive list of the many agencies that owe their origin to the zeal and capacity of women to help in the war. From the moment Germany started on her mad-dog campaign the women of Great Britain have shown a noble spirit, not merely in sorrow and suffering, but in service. A mere list of some of the new occupations they have taken up is sufficient to show that, in organising a war service for women, the Government is knocking at an open door. Here are a few of these new callings:—

Railway clerical work
Carriage cleaning
Grocery
Engineering
Lift attendants
Toy-making Architectural draw- ing
Debt collecting
Motor driving
Banking accountancy
Motor van drivers.

It must not be forgotten, too, that an important development of Vis- count Haldane's Territorial Army scheme — that scheme which has worked so splen- didly in this war— was that the British Red Cross Society took a defi- nite place in the constitution of the Territorials, and its "women's detach- ment" has proved itself to be a valuable supplement to the medical service of the new force. There are, also, the women policemen, to whose good sense and charitableness more than one London police magistrate has paid a deserved compliment. Lady St. Helier, indeed, aptly described the position of women towards the war when she wrote:

> To-day women are working everywhere, not only in their own occupations, but in hundreds of organisations which war has called into being, and doing that quietly, completely, and perfectly. It seems almost ridiculous to ask what women can do in war: the question really is: What is there that women cannot undertake suc- cessfully?

That is a true and a wise saying, and it should be an encouragement to the Government to proceed with their scheme to the utmost of the nation's require- ments. It will be ungracious, in this account of what women are doing, to omit any reference to the fine work done by them in collecting for the various patriotic funds, one of the chief of which is Queen Mary's "Work for Women Fund." That was not, of course, in line of the Government's war. Women have made splendid use of their opportuni- ties up till now, but a greater opportu- nity awaits them, and there is not the slightest doubt that they will avail themselves of it. Here it might be well to quote the opening passage of the official circular:

> The President of the Board of Trade wishes to call at- tention to the fact that, in the present emergency, if the full fighting power of the nation is to be put forth on the field of battle, the full working power of the nation must be made available to carry on its essential trades at home. Already in certain important occupations there are not enough men and women to do the work. This shortage will certainly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting forces.
>
> In order to meet the present and future needs of national industry during the war the Government wish to obtain particu- lars of the women available, with or with- out previous training, for paid employ- ment. Accordingly they invite all women who are prepared, if needed, to take paid employment of any kind—industrial, agri- cultural, clerical, etc.—to enter themselves upon the Register of Women for War Ser- vice, which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges.

That is, in its essence, the Govern- ment scheme. It has been received with general approval, but Miss Mary Macarthur, secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, who has an inti- mate knowledge of all questions affect- ing women's work, raised an important point—the relation to the scheme of 50,000 unemployed women. She has stated:—

> I understand the appeal is made to women not normally wage-earners, and even to women who have not pre- viously been wage- earners. There are now 50,000 unem- ployed women who are normal wage- earners, and I should like an assurance that the absorption of these women has been considered before new and presum- ably economically independent women are introduced.

Miss Macarthur, like every other patriotic woman, wishes to do every- thing possible for the defence of the country, and it can hardly be denied that her comment is a reasonable one, and is inspired by the desire to do her best for a class of deserving women to whose interest she is devoted. Lady Frances Balfour, Miss Marie Corelli (the novelist), the lady principal of the Women's Agri- cultural College at Swanley, Mrs. Falk (secretary of the Women's War Emergency Corps), and other ladies who have a keen concern in the welfare of working women, have ex- pressed their warm approval of the scheme.

In this way, then, the women of Great Britain can do, and will do, what so many thousands of their menfolk have done: place themselves freely at the service of their country and do the work that is given them to do. Their first duty will be to enter their names upon the Register of Women for War Service that is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges. Any woman living in a town where there is a Labour Exchange can register by going there in person. If she is not near a Labour Exchange she can get a form of regis- tration from the local agency of the un- employment fund. Forms will also be sent out through a number of women's societies, and can be obtained by post from the General Manager, Board of Trade Labour Exchanges, Queen Anne's Chambers, Broadway, Westminster.

The leading authority on women's work.

LADY ST. HELIER.

[Beresford.

Who sees infinite possibilities for women's work in war time.

for the cry of unemployment among women. Only the men- tally or physically unfit ones need go workless. I understand that the Government puts no age-limit and is giving parent and guardians assurances that young women will be ade quately protected and treated with all due courtesy and con sideration. The Board of Trade shows true diplomacy and tact in the appeal it makes to women to take up work that must be done. The appeal has been made a call to National War Service, and I cannot fancy any woman unable to feel a thrill at this summons.

Yesterday several women were talking over this call. For an instant one of the number put a damper on the enthusiasm of the company by saying:

"What will be done with us when the war is over? Will the men be given back their work—those that return able to fill the old positions? You see, I can't help wondering——"

Then the real nobility of her nature came to the rescue. "I'm ashamed of myself!" she suddenly exclaimed. "It's a question of doing one's job at the moment, and not looking ahead, except for the good of the country."

I think the Government will find that this is the spirit of British women. They are going to attend to their "jobs," realising that this is no time for dwelling on any past in- justices to women or any future ones either.

In fact, this war will mean much for women if women do but to themselves be true.

* * *

There is a great National War Service for every woman in the land, whether she responds to this call of the Govern- ment or whether she remains at home. Last Sunday DAGONET spoke of the war that Germany would wage on England when this present war had ended—the industrial war, and he advised a preparation now for this war which is sure to come.

Now, this trade war of Germany is going to be a war waged largely against women, as it always has been, or perhaps I should say it is a war to which the defence must be made by women. Women have always been the purchasers of more than two-thirds of the manufactures which Germany has sent to this country, and if Germany is to succeed in her next war it can only be for the reason that the women of Britain will lack the stamina or the inclination to make resistance.

If British women to-day make a resolve that their children shall never again play with toys made in Germany; if they go out into their kitchens, take note of all kitchen utensils, and determine that Germany shall have no part in furnishing those kitchens; if they go through their houses with note-book and pencil, jotting down the goods they already have of German or suspected German manufacture; if they look over their wardrobes with the same intention of learning to what extent they have heretofore patronised German industries, and then make their plans for a campaign against Germany, and stick to those plans—Germany must suffer her second and most important defeat in her contests against Britain.

In the defence against the Industrial War the men of this country will be almost helpless unless they have the co- operation of the women. Women are the buyers of the world. If women ceased to buy, most industries would go to pieces. There are really very few things of which men are the pur- chasers. Many wives attend even to the buying of all the wear- ing apparel of their husbands with the exception of suits, boots, and hats, and even in the choice of materials for most men's suits women have a word of advice. So we may say they have practically the clothing of the whole family in their hands, the furnishing of their homes, and the decision concerning foodstuffs. Therefore, if British women should band them- selves together for defence when Germany again makes war, there can be no question of the victory. I believe that women, if they will only combine, can revive British industries and make another German industrial invasion an impossibility.

This is a most important form of National Service for women, and I advise every woman to enlist at once. At first it may have some inconveniences attached to it, but it will be a most interesting and highly educative service. One day, a few years ago, I interested myself in taking an inventory of every article of clothing I had on at the time, and I dis- covered that I was wearing not a solitary thing of British manufacture—that I was actually foreign-made throughout. I first made the inventory out of mere curiosity, but I soon became something more than curious. That was the begin- ning of my very great interest in British industries, and I did not rest until I proved that British manufacturers could, if they desired, dress their own women.

Up to a very short time ago British children played almost entirely with German toys. Now, thanks to the enterprise and patriotism of the Women's Emergency Corps, we have found out that British children can be perfectly happy without any assistance from Germany in this direction.

So I say to all women, start at once with your inventories, and enlist in the National War Service for home defence.

* * *

The little Princess Marie José of Belgium has sent me a delightful message telling of her pleasure in reading my penny story, "Dik," and saying she feels sure that all British children will enjoy reading this description of a Red Cross dog's life and work on the battlefields of Belgium. The proceeds from the sale of "Dik" will be given to the little Princess for distribution to the needy children of Belgium, and she hopes that many thousand copies will be sold. Perhaps you will buy some of the new "Dik" stamps printed in Belgian colours at the price of threepence a dozen. These as well as the story can be obtained by calling on, or writing to, "Dik" (put his name on your envelope to avoid confusion), care of Canada's Grand Trunk Railway Offices, 19, Cockspur-street, S.W.

About £6 has now been received from Refereaders toward the "'Dik' Easter Gift." I thank you all, and I "solicit a continuance of your esteemed orders"!

ENID.

Edinburgh Evg. News,
March 22nd. 1915.

SCARCITY OF LABOUR.

THE MOBILISATION OF WOMEN.

Few more significant events have occurred during the present war crisis, writes a correspondent, than the issue this week by the Government of an appeal to women to register their names as being willing to undertake national service in industries and occupations where the supply of labour is short or is likely to become so. The announcement was in a sense unexpected, but the whole trend of events during the past few months has led up naturally to the present position. The shortage of men in industrial occupations alone, setting aside the further needs of the Army, is in many instances most acute. Firms engaged in the production of armaments and explosives are clamouring for more men. Labour exchanges have been utilised, trade unions have been consulted, representatives of firms have scoured the country from the Tay to the Bristol Channel, tradesmen have returned from Canada and elsewhere, and yet the shortage continues. In other occupations, such as agriculture, leather work, and even some clerical professions, the scarcity of labour is hardly less marked. The fact is that in most cases men are simply not obtainable for the work, and the truth of that statement is evidently recognised by the Government.

Experimental Work.

Ever since the outbreak of war and the transference of large numbers of men from the industrial ranks to the fighting lines the process of replacing men with women has proceeded steadily and increasingly. The Post Office, mercantile houses, insurance offices, have all been experimenting, and so far as can be gathered have met with considerable success. Latterly, firms engaged in the metal trades have been disposed to try female labour for such processes as machine minding, and ammunition firms are also endeavouring to augment their output by calling in the aid of women. This tendency will undoubtedly increase and the response to the present national appeal will be watched with the keenest interest.

Registration by Middle-Class Women.

The appeal was only issued on Thursday morning, but already, it is understood, considerable numbers of women have applied to the Labour Exchanges for schedules to fill up offering their services. While the immediate intention of registration is to ascertain what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required, it is reasonable to suppose that the Government's object is not merely precautionary. It is thought likely that various training schemes may be started shortly with a view to equipping the applicants for the various types of work for which they are willing to offer their services. So far, the response has come mainly from women in fairly comfortable circumstances, whose main desire is to render some distinctively useful service to their country in its present need That the number of applications from working women is not so numerous may be taken as a good augury that employment amongst women generally has steadied, and that distress is therefore not so prevalent.

A Democratic Scheme.

It is to be noted that the Government do not appeal for workers on voluntary lines, but that all women register for paid work. It follows, of course, that some sort of preference will have to be given to women who are normally of the wage-earning class; on the other hand it would be a pity to exclude women more fortunately placed simply on the ground of their economic position. By reason of education, alertness, and adaptability many women of the so-called leisured class would probably prove of the utmost value in certain occupations, particularly those in which rapid training is necessary. A democratic touch has been given to the scheme, however, by the stipulation that all applicants will be dealt with through the National Labour Exchanges. It is too early yet to judge the success of the scheme, but as to the boldness of its conception there can be no question. To women generally it offers an opportunity which many doubtless will have the wisdom to accept. No matter what restrictions may be agreed to between employers and workers as to the retention of women at the close of war, the economic position of women is bound to be profoundly altered for the better by the fine services they are now rendering to the country.

The unusual course was taken yesterday of intimating in some of the churches in Edinburgh the Board of Trade announcement regarding the employment of women. At the Central Hall, where there were many women in the congregation, the Rev. A. J. G. Seaton stated that the announcement had been sent to all the churches in Edinburgh. He said some of those present might jump to the conclusion that the announcement was serious news, but he assured them there was nothing of a seriously critical nature behind the notice.

The Daily Chronicle,
March 22nd. 1915.

663

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

THOUSANDS EAGER TO REGISTER.

LADY GARDENERS FOR LONDON PARKS.

Thousands of women have already offered themselves for war service, in response to the Government's appeal, to relieve men from civilian employment for sterner duties.

Over 6,000 applications have been received at the Central Labour Exchange, Westminster, alone. Applications have also been pouring in at all the 400 Labour Exchanges of the country.

At the Central Labour Exchange a "Daily Chronicle" representative was informed that the applications were coming from all classes, but mostly well-to-do, officers' wives and widows, and daughters of the clergy.

Return to Vacancies after War.

The response from employers, stating their willingness to encourage their young men to enlist, had been rather disappointing so far. Employers are being asked to say how many fit men they can spare, providing the vacancies can be filled by capable women.

As far as possible, employers should agree to find positions after the war for all their men who enlist.

It is also important that the women shall be properly, though quickly, trained to take the places of the men. Much may be done at once through the polytechnics and the schools of the central and local authorities. Further, it is suggested that employers should employ women as probationers before the men leave, and so help in the practical teaching of the women.

Many school teachers suggest that they can easily take the place of bank clerks. Other young women are ready to act as booking clerks, motor-bus and taxi drivers, tram conductors, shop assistants, and gardeners. Most applicants, however, are willing to make themselves generally useful

WOMEN ON THE LAND.

On the question of releasing male labour from the land by substituting women workers, a "Daily Chronicle" representative saw Miss Helen Colt, who, before the war, was lecturer on gardening, under the L.C.C., to school teachers. Miss Colt, herself a practical gardener, holding the diploma of the Royal Botanic Society, is lecturing and giving practical demonstrations in gardening at the society's gardens every Saturday.

She thinks it is a mistake to suppose that city-bred women, who have perhaps never put in a potato or handled a hoe, will find land work congenial, or do it well. "Also it is a fallacy that hard work, such as ground preparation, is unskilled work. Women taken from town work should perhaps begin with some of the easier and lighter sowing and planting, on ground already prepared by country women if possible.

"If there is intelligent co-operation, in farm and garden work on these lines, it will save such waste of time as I saw lately on ground being planted with fruit trees by factory girls who, through want of practice, found great difficulty in setting the lines out straight.

"As regards the proposals that women gardeners who have had a thoroughly good practical training should take the place of men, satisfactory replacement in private gardens ought to be possible. I don't think serious dislocation need be feared at the end of the war owing to this, as the land cult will have increased, and more skilled labour will be required.

IN PUBLIC PARKS AND GARDENS.

"I think we ought to urge the authorities to take on trained women gardeners in suitable departments of our parks and public gardens, and so set free many fit men for war service. It is due to prejudice that this has not been done already, only there must be no mistake about women's experience and efficiency as practical gardeners before we offer ourselves for such work.

"Very much could be done by the proper organising and training of suitable women of the industrial classes as gardeners and farmers, and they would constitute a valuable national asset and add greatly to the healthful efficiency of the whole country.

"The land problem of the future will look for its solution to a wise national action during the next few years, even to a great extent to that of the next few months. Land work is no blind alley employment. Therein lies its strength. We shall obtain the right response in this direction in proportion to the educational work which the county councils and other bodies are prepared to do for our children during their school life.

"If—to help recruiting—we want not only to send women back to the land but to keep them there, the nation, through its leaders, must see that right conditions of labour, adequate wages, and all that goes to give the worker a decent prospect of individual ownership on co-operative principles are secured.

"As secretary of the Advisory Committee of the Agriculturists' Section of the Lyceum Club, I have sent this week to all persons and bodies concerned, including every Cabinet Minister, a memorial urging that the interests of women shall have adequate representation on any body appointed by the Government to deal with schemes for land work."

SAME PAY AS MEN.

Miss Chrystal Macmillan, hon. sec. of the British committee of the coming International Women's Congress at the Hague, said it was necessary that women should be granted the same pay as the men they replaced, and that the jobs should not be merely stop-gap employment, but permanent positions.

"In the Civil Service women can largely take the place of men, and it is remarkable that the Government has not set other employers an example in this direction."

The National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies welcomes the Government scheme if necessary safeguards are secured, including equal pay for equal work, proper training, good conditions of housing, especially in agriculture.

A preliminary conference of trade union representatives will be held at General Buildings, Aldwych, to-day. A tribunal, with a woman as chairman, to consider in what trades women can be suitably employed, will probably be suggested.

Manchester Courier,
March 22nd. 1915

Women and Work.

It has been ascertained by the Fabian Society that there are seven millions of unemployed women and girls living in the United Kingdom, and as a consequence females have less voice in carrying on the national economic life than in other countries. The war has made this revelation more forcibly felt than at any other time. The Board of Trade has awakened to the crisis through which the country is passing, and in addition to stating certain plain truths on the subject has invited the co-operation of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies in carrying out proposals for the organisation of women's work. I am informed by Mrs. Fawcett, the president, that such organisation would be welcomed, and was, indeed, urged on the Government by the National Union at the beginning of the war. It was stated that such a step would sooner or later be necessary, and now that the Government has realised the need the National Union has expressed its willingness to help, provided that the neces-

The Dundee Advertiser, March 22nd. 1915. 663.

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

In response to the invitation of the President of the Board of Trade, it is no surprise to learn women have been coming forward in large numbers to enrol their names at the Labour Exchanges in the register of those who are prepared to serve in the war, not in the field—there are nurses there facing danger and death already—but in the shop of war, in the factory or the office, or on the farm, wherever, in fact, the need is urgent and the labourers few. The invitation of the Board of Trade is comprehensive; every woman who is anxious to do what she can for the preservation of the State is asked to enlist, leaving the apportionment of her task to be decided for her later; but we would urge that the work of allotment will be incalculably facilitated if those who place their names on the register of women for war service will first think the matter over seriously and practically, and state what kind of work they can already do, or what kind of work they are willing to be prepared for. The appeal is made to women of all classes. It is not primarily an offer of work to the unemployed, but a manifesto to the whole womanhood of the country, urging upon them the necessity of carrying on the essential trades at home with the full working power of the nation, if the full fighting power of the manhood of the nation is to be put forth on the field of battle. What the women are asked to undertake is no dilettantist or amateurish effort in untried occupations, but paid employment that shall be worth its remuneration. This is a wise course in the interest of efficiency and of industrial peace. It is one of the postulates of doctrinaire Trade Unionism that women have a lower standard of comfort than men, that they seldom have to support a family, that they are often partially supported from other sources than their employment, and that all these facts render them as a class the most dangerous enemies of the artisan's standard of life. There is no indication whatever in the official statement of the Board of Trade of an intention to do anything that would violate this postulate. By giving standard pay it is anticipated that standard work will be maintained; and those who may not need the remuneration will be helping their fellow-workers and promoting efficiency by accepting it, and devoting it as they see best to the common cause. What is wanted first and foremost is the maintenance at full pitch of the industry of the nation. The high prices, which are a bone of contention, are due to limited output, to the imperfect use of the means and instruments of production. By employing women the balance may be restored without rendering in the least inequitable the distribution of a legitimate profit.

There are three different directions in which the reserve force of woman's labour can be employed. It may be directed to remove the very serious anxiety that is felt regarding the supply of munitions of war and of clothing for the army; it may be used to fill up gaps in the ranks of labour due to enlistment; it may be brought in to enable men of military age and fit for service to be released from their present occupations. The first is the most urgent use. It is probably not the sort of service that would naturally suggest itself to women of leisure anxious to be of use, casting about for ways in which to make themselves useful, and sometimes lighting upon methods that are pathetically futile. But assuming a wish to be of the greatest possible use in helping to meet a very urgent need, the making of cartridge cases and shell cases is a certain method in which the wish can be gratified. It is stated that in the West of Scotland over a thousand women can be employed in engineering and armament works; that practically all the work in making a shrapnel shell can be done by women; and that women of aptitude can become expert in the work after a fortnight's training. The Trade Unions, we understand, have consented to the admission of the labour of women, provided "it shall not affect adversely the rates customarily paid for the job." With 50,000 women, who are normal wage-earners, unemployed throughout the country, the only difficulty seems to be the reluctance of working girls to take up a new occupation. This diffidence, it would appear, applies not merely to so unusual a calling as the making of shrapnel shells, but to the making of khaki uniforms by dressmakers. A very lively controversy is in progress in the London press on the sudden change of fashion in the width of skirts. Skirts seven yards wide, according to one indignant lady, are both "absurd and unpatriotic;" and with this as a text controversialists are labouring the old point whether the gratification of feminine vanity, which finds violent fluctuations in the fashion lightsome, is a public benefit or the reverse especially in a time of war. We are not disposed to take a puritanical view of fashion or of fashion trades; but before ladies get their seven-yard skirts it is necessary that our soldiers should get their kilts, and their trews, and their tunics. The knight in the age of chivalry had his armour buckled on by his lady; but our modern soldier has to wait for his uniform because women cannot be found to put it together. This is a defect which it should not be difficult to make good. Women who are enthusiastic for the lads in khaki might find a vent for their enthusiasm in making their clothes for them.

There are hundreds of occupations for which women are fit, and which will be properly mentioned in the registration forms, which will be filled up in answer to the Board of Trade's appeal. As from time to time openings for employment occur, notice will be sent to applicants of work for which they are likely to be found suited. With regard to one employment there is likely to be controversy, and possibly opposition, on the part of Labourists. An extreme school of Socialistic thinkers holds that the brains and labour of the country could be employed to greater advantage than in growing cereals and breeding stock; that the occupations of the farm should be made exclusively Poor Law occupations, producing simply healthful occupation for paupers, the infirm, and the aged. To this school agriculture is pre-eminently a parasitic trade; and it is from the point of view that it is parasitic much of the opposition to the employment of women proceeds. It is the view of men who know nothing about agriculture or rural occupations. Doubt has been cast on the statement that there is a shortage of agricultural labour. In some districts, example being contagious, many men have without doubt joined the colours. The place of a ploughman or a cattleman cannot be filled by a woman from the town even after a short course at an Agricultural College. But women from the town might take the place of women in the cottages, who have young families to look after, or of servants at the farmhouse, who might in turn release men for the heavier work of the field and the farmyard. And the town-bred woman might not only aid in the cottage and the farm kitchen, but if she has been accustomed to look after a flower or kitchen garden of her own, she could at a push give assistance in light field work. But the difficulty of farm labour, where it exists, is not an easy one to meet. In dairy districts a woman, if she can milk, or if she can drive and is not afraid of untimely early hours, might fill the place of the dairyman; but such districts are commoner south of the Border than with us. The question raised by the Board of Trade invitation, it will be understood, is not what are suitable occupations for women, but the intensely practical one of what is to be done to meet shortages in specific trades, and future shortages which are sure to arise as more men are called to the field. The return of registration forms ought to be abundant enough to enable the Department to draw up a trustworthy list of women available for essential work.

The Times, 23rd March 1915.

WOMEN'S WORK FOR WAR.

SCOTTISH APPLICANTS.

THE GOVERNMENT OFFICES.

At the offices of the Central Labour Exchange of the Board of Trade on Saturday there were further accessions to the roll of women for war service, about 3,000 letters arriving by the first post and more coming in by later deliveries. Personal callers were also fairly numerous. The first news of the country response came in a telegram from Glasgow stating that 400 applications from the West of Scotland had been registered. From several Scottish pulpits yesterday attention was directed by Presbyterian ministers to the national call to women.

With regard to the statement in The Times on Saturday as to the desirability of early and systematic steps being taken to carry the appeal before employers, this side of the matter has been fully considered, and a public announcement will be made in due course.

As to the suggestion that the Government should set a good example by releasing batches of second division clerks and copyists from numerous departments, there is good ground for stating that steps are likely to be taken in this direction. A number of departments, such as the War Office, the Admiralty, the Local Government Board, and the Board of Trade, have been and are working under great pressure, but there are others in which this is not the case. The higher ranks of the Civil Service have given handsomely to the fighting services, but there are still a number of Civil Service men who are anxious to follow their example, but who, in the opinion of their chiefs, cannot be dispensed with on account of the demands of the public service. It is possible that some of these men may have their wishes gratified.

Another source of supply which might be more freely tapped is the large staff employed in municipal offices by the great local authorities. The Local Government Board, at the request of the Committee of Imperial Defence, have recently addressed a circular letter to local authorities on this subject, inviting them to consider the possibility of releasing members of their staff where the work might be carried on by female clerical labour, and the matter now rests with them.

As the scheme is developed it may have a searching effect in ways that may not be at once obvious. If employers cooperate in making it a success, as they may be expected to do, it may reveal what proportion of eligible men are sheltering under the pretext that they cannot be spared, and are really holding back because they are not willing to join the fighting forces.

While the manhood of the country has responded magnificently to the call to arms, and there are more who would like to come forward but cannot because they are wanted in the office or at the works, there are a good many more who, it is suspected, have not yet realized that the freedom from compulsory military training which they have enjoyed in this country carries with it a corresponding obligation of honour.

TRADE UNION CONFERENCE.

Many of the trade unions are greatly concerned about the proposed introduction of women into the principal industries of the country. A preliminary conference of representatives of trade unions interested will be held at General Buildings, Aldwych, to-day, to consider whether a national conference should be called to discuss the position. It will probably be suggested that a tribunal should be appointed by the Government, with a woman as chairman, to consider in what trade women could be suitably employed.

SUFFRAGE UNION RESOLUTION.

Mrs. Fawcett, president of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, issued the following last night:—

The Board of Trade having invited the cooperation of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies in carrying out the Government proposals for the organisation of women's work at this national crisis, the executive committee states that such organisation would be welcomed and was indeed urged on the Government by the National Union as appeal is made to [illegible] It is not primarily an offer of work to the unemployed, but a manifesto to the whole womanhood of the country, urging upon them the necessity of carrying on the essential trades at home with the full working power of the nation, if the full fighting power of the manhood of the nation is to be put forth on the field of battle. What the women are asked to undertake is no dilettantist or amateurish effort in untried occupations, but paid employment that shall be worth its remuneration. This is a wise course in the interest of efficiency and of industrial peace. It is one of the postulates of doctrinaire Trade Unionism that women have a lower standard of comfort than men, that they seldom have to support a family, that they are often partially supported from other sources than their employment, and that all these facts render them as a class the most dangerous enemies of the artisan's standard of life. There is no indication whatever in the official statement of the Board of Trade of an intention to do anything that would violate this postulate. By giving standard pay it is anticipated that standard work will be maintained; and those who may not need the remuneration will be helping their fellow-workers and promoting efficiency by accepting it, and devoting it as they see best to the common cause. What is wanted first and foremost is the maintenance at full pitch of the industry of the nation. The high prices, which are a bone of contention, are due to limited output, to the imperfect use of the means and instruments of production. By employing women the balance may be restored without rendering in the least inequitable the distribution of a legitimate profit.

There are three different directions in which the reserve force of woman's labour can be employed. It may be directed to remove the very serious anxiety that is felt regarding the supply of munitions of war and of clothing for the army; it may be used to fill up gaps in the ranks of labour due to enlistment; it may be brought in to enable men of military age and fit for service to be released from their present occupations. The first is the most urgent use. It is probably not the sort of service that would naturally suggest itself to women of leisure anxious to be of use, casting about for ways in which to make themselves useful, and sometimes lighting upon methods that are pathetically futile. But assuming a wish to be of the greatest possible use in helping to meet a very urgent need, the making of cartridge cases and shell cases is a certain method in which the wish can be gratified. It is stated that in the West of [illegible] gratification of feminine vanity, which finds violent fluctuations in the fashion lightsome, is a public benefit or the reverse especially in a time of war. We are not disposed to take a puritanical view of fashion or of fashion trades; but before ladies get their seven-yard skirts it is necessary that our soldiers should get their kilts, and their trews, and their tunics. The knight in the age of chivalry had his armour buckled on by his lady; but our modern soldier has to wait for his uniform because women cannot be found to put it together. This is a defect which it should not be difficult to make good. Women who are enthusiastic for the lads in khaki might find a vent for their enthusiasm in making their clothes for them.

There are hundreds of occupations for which women are fit, and which will be properly mentioned in the registration forms, which will be filled up in answer to the Board of Trade's appeal. As from time to time openings for employment occur, notice will be sent to applicants of work for which they are likely to be found suited. With regard to one employment there is likely to be controversy, and possibly opposition, on the part of Labourists. An extreme school of Socialistic thinkers holds that the brains and labour of the country could be employed to greater advantage than in growing cereals and breeding stock; that the occupations of the farm should be made exclusively Poor Law occupations, producing simply healthful occupation for paupers, the infirm, and the aged. To this school agriculture is pre-eminently a parasitic trade; and it is from the point of view that it is parasitic much of the opposition to the employment of women proceeds. It is the view of men who know nothing about agriculture or rural occupations. Doubt has been cast on the statement that there is a shortage of agricultural labour. In some districts, example being contagious, many men have without doubt joined the colours. The place of a ploughman or a cattleman cannot be filled by a woman from the town even after a short course at an Agricultural College. But women from the town might take the place of women in the cottages, who have young families to look after, or of servants at the farmhouse, who might in turn release men for the heavier work of the field and the farmyard. And the town-bred woman might not only aid in the cottage and the farm kitchen, but if she has been accustomed to look after a flower or kitchen garden of her own, she could at a push give assistance in light field work. But the difficulty of farm labour, where it exists, is not an easy one to meet. In dairy districts a woman, if she can milk,

THE GOVERNMENT OFFICES.

At the offices of the Central Labour Exchange of the Board of Trade on Saturday there were further accessions to the roll of women for war service, about 3,000 letters arriving by the first post and more coming in by later deliveries. Personal callers were also fairly numerous. The first news of the country response came in a telegram from Glasgow stating that 400 applications from the West of Scotland had been registered. From several Scottish pulpits yesterday attention was directed by Presbyterian ministers to the national call to women.

With regard to the statement in The Times on Saturday as to the desirability of early and systematic steps being taken to carry the appeal before employers, this side of the matter has been fully considered, and a public announcement will be made in due course.

As to the suggestion that the Government should set a good example by releasing batches of second division clerks and copyists from numerous departments, there is good ground for stating that steps are likely to be taken in this direction. A number of departments, such as the War Office, the Admiralty, the Local Government Board, and the Board of Trade, have been and are working under great pressure, but there are others in which this is not the case. The higher ranks of the Civil Service have given handsomely to the fighting services, but there are still a number of Civil Service men who are anxious to follow their example, but who, in the opinion of their chiefs, cannot be dispensed with on account of the demands of the public service. It is possible that some of these men may have their wishes gratified.

Another source of supply which might be more freely tapped is the large staff employed in municipal offices by the great local authorities. The Local Government Board, at the request of the Committee of Imperial Defence, have recently addressed a circular letter to local authorities on this subject, inviting them to consider the possibility of releasing members of their staff where the work might be carried on by female clerical labour, and the matter now rests with them.

As the scheme is developed it may have a searching effect in ways that may not be at once obvious. If employers cooperate in making it a success, as they may be expected to do, it may reveal what proportion of eligible men are sheltering under the pretext that they cannot be spared, and are really holding back because they are not willing to join the fighting forces.

While the manhood of the country has responded magnificently to the call to arms, and there are more who would like to come forward but cannot because they are wanted in the office or at the works, there are a good many more who, it is suspected, have not yet realized that the freedom from compulsory military training which they have enjoyed in this country carries with it a corresponding obligation of honour.

TRADE UNION CONFERENCE.

Many of the trade unions are greatly concerned about the proposed introduction of women into the principal industries of the country. A preliminary conference of representatives of trade unions interested will be held at General Buildings, Aldwych, to-day, to consider whether a national conference should be called to discuss the position. It will probably be suggested that a tribunal should be appointed by the Government, with a woman as chairman, to consider in what trade women could be suitably employed.

SUFFRAGE UNION RESOLUTION.

Mrs. Fawcett, president of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, issued the following last night:—

The Board of Trade having invited the cooperation of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies in carrying out the Government proposals for the organization of women's work at this national crisis, the executive committee states that such organization would be welcomed and was indeed urged on the Government by the National Union at the beginning of the war. It was foreseen that such organization would sooner or later be necessary, and now that the Government has realized the need the National Union has expressed its willingness to help in the following resolution:—

"The National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies welcome a Government scheme for the organization of women who are willing to take paid employment for war service provided that the necessary safeguards are secured.

"The points which the National Union of W.S.S. particularly wishes to emphasize are:—

"(1) The necessity of equal pay for equal work, thus avoiding the undercutting of men.

"(2) The great importance of training.

"(3) The securing of good conditions as to housing, &c., specially in agriculture."

Manchester Guardian,
March 22nd. 1915.

THE DEMAND FOR WOMEN WORKERS.

To the Editor of the Manchester Guardian.

Sir,—Referring to the letter in your issue of March 19 signed by Mrs. L. E. Smith and Miss Wilkinson, may we say as trade union officials that our experience differs from the newly formed Manchester branch of the Women's Emergency Corps? The following are only a few of the trades in which substantial advances have been given since the beginning of the war: The clothing trade, including tailoresses, blouse makers, corset makers, mantle makers, and so on; box makers, leather workers, women in the printing trade, and several branches of textile workers. We are, of course, only speaking of organised women, and if your correspondents refer to the position of women clerks, our experience, again, is that women clerks are being offered positions at better wages than prior to the war; also that girls with little experience are leaving schools and getting posts at a good commencing wage.—Yours, &c.,

SARAH DICKENSON, Co-Secretary Women's Trades and Labour Council, 5, John Dalton Street, Manchester.

MARY QUAILE, Secretary Joint Committee of Women's Trade Unions, 9, Albert Square.

To the Editor of the Manchester Guardian.

Sir,—Since the Board of Trade has issued a circular calling upon women to register themselves for war service, which says "any woman who by working helps to release a man for fighting does national service," the United Suffragists strongly desire, in the general interest, to express their views on this proposal. As the Government is appealing to women to fill the place of men, and assures them that a man's work can be adequately done by a woman, and that in doing it she is serving her country as effectively as a man, they ought in common justice also to give her the status of a man. The United Suffragists therefore call upon the Government to pass a non-party measure of women's suffrage at the earliest possible opportunity, and they further insist that every woman who responds to this national appeal and performs a man's work shall be paid a man's wages.—Yours, &c.,

BARBARA AYRTON GOULD, Hon. Sec.

March 19.

The Times,
March 22nd. 1915.

REGISTRATION OF EMPLOYERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir,—I have read with great interest of the call for women workers in place of men in The Times of to-day's date. I am one of the army of unemployed women (would-be workers) who would welcome work, and be glad to give my services to help my country—but to whom and where shall I give them? I have registered my name at the local bureau, and was told that in the course of time if anything occurred they would let me know. Instead of taking a census of women workers, why not start with the horse before the cart and call in the registration of employers willing to employ women at a Government wage? Cannot the corporation set an example by employing women tram conductors instead of men, thus freeing men who should be serving their country? The tramway employees have responded nobly to Kitchener's call, but there is room for many more. Women there are in plenty with the average amount of common sense willing to do men's work to the best of their ability, but who will come forward and employ them?

MARGHERITA LAWRENCE.

Volkarust, Tottenhall-road, N., March 19.

The Yorkshire Post,
March 22nd. 1915.

WOMEN'S EMPLOYMENT.

To the Editor of The Yorkshire Post.

Sir,—The Board of Trade having invited the co-operation of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, in carrying out the Government proposals for the organisation of women's work at this national crisis, the Executive Committee states that such organisation would be welcomed, and was, indeed, urged on the Government by the National Union at the beginning of the war. It was foreseen that such organisation would sooner or later be necessary; and now that the Government has realised the need, the National Union has expressed its willingness to help in the following resolution:—

The National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies welcomes a Government scheme for the organisation of women, who are willing to take paid employment for war service, provided that the necessary safeguards are secured. The points which the National Union of W.S.S. particularly wish to emphasise, are:—

(1) The necessity of equal pay for equal work, thus avoiding the under-cutting of men.

(2) The great importance of training.

(3) The securing of good conditions as to housing, etc., specially in agriculture.—Yours, etc.,

MILLICENT GARRETT FAWCETT,
National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies.
14, Great Smith Street, Westminster, March 20, 1915.

Daily Mail,
March 22nd. 1915.

READY WOMEN.

SPLENDID RESPONSE TO THE CALL TO WORK.

9,000 APPLICANTS.

The response to the Government's appeal to women to come to the aid of the nation by volunteering to do the work of men who are of military age has been instant and splendid.

Willing women if unable personally to register their names at Labour Exchanges were invited to apply for forms on which to state their capabilities. Friday was the first day for these applications, and on that day alone over 7,000 were received at the headquarters of the Labour Exchanges at Queen Anne's-chambers, Westminster. The first post on Saturday brought 2,000 more, all these being in addition to inquiries at local Labour Exchanges, where forms can now be obtained, and to the scores of personal applicants at headquarters.

The applicants include all classes of women. Many of them are in comfortable circumstances, and their desire to work is prompted by pure patriotism.

One woman, used to dealing with horses of her own, offers to take out a tradesman's delivery van daily and even to wear uniform if thereby she can release a man for the Army.

Many applicants are daughters of clergymen in rural districts. One such says: "I can do dairy work or am willing for anything that will help us to win in this great fight for right."

Women with small businesses, especially sweet shops, are ready to sacrifice them if their personal service is needed. A ward-maid in a London hospital writes: "I should love to make bullets to hit the Germans with."

All Saturday morning a continuous stream of well-dressed women called at headquarters to register their names. A large number offered to act as omnibus or tramway-car conductors, and there were many proficient motor drivers. Some of these applicants were the wives and in some sad cases the widows of Army officers.

After the applications have been classified employers will be put in touch with suitable applicants, and other women will be selected for training in agriculture and other work

663/43

663.
Manchester Eyg. Chronicle
March. 22nd. 1915.

PATRIOTIC WOMEN.

Rush To Replace Men On Active Service.

READY RESPONSE.

Thousands Of Replies To Recent Circular.

A meeting of the Women's Unemployment Sub-committee of the Manchester Relief Committee was held this morning, in Manchester Town Hall, for the purpose of considering the Board of Trade's circular regarding war service for women.

Discussion took place, and it was pointed out by a representative from the Labour Exchange that the primary object was, as far as possible, to secure women who were free to work to replace male labour.

Special consideration was invited from married women who were not, owing to the position of their husbands, compelled to follow any employment and from single young women, who, owing to the circumstances of their parents, filled positions only in the household. It was to these more than others that the circular applied.

The committee decided to issue to the various workshops copies of the circular, which states that women are wanted for farm work, dairy work, leather stitching, brush-making, clothing machinery, and light machinery for armaments.

"But," it is added, "even if you have no special experience of any of this work, you should register. It may be possible to train you. It is certain that as more men join the forces, more women will be wanted to work while they are away. Even if you can work only half of each day you may be useful."

LONDON'S RESPONSE.

In London the total number of written applications which have been made up to the present time by women is 10,000. The figures for Saturday have not yet been ascertained, but there was no diminution in the numbers.

This morning the first post alone has brought 5,000 letters, and the figures for the whole country must be very much greater. Women of all classes are offering their services for almost every variety of work. Among those who registered themselves on Saturday were women who offered themselves as 'bus conductors, for motor driving, and as lift attendants, while one lady is willing to take the place of a male orchestral conductor, volunteering for military service.

As regards the motive behind the responses, the vast majority are coming forward solely because they desire to be of service to their country. "Another matter," said a London official, "is that we do not want for an instant to suggest that, because this appeal is being made, we want anybody to accept wages which are lower than those of the ordinary industrial standard. That should be made perfectly clear."

A preliminary and private conference of various representatives of trade unions interested in the proposed introduction of women into the principal industries of the country took place in London this afternoon.

Daily Express, March 23rd. 1918.

10,000 WOMEN WAR WORKERS.

LONDON'S RESPONSE TO THE CALL.

About 10,000 women in London alone have already offered their services in response to the Government's appeal—published on Thursday—for workers to release men for the fighting line.

"I have a boy at the front: put me down to make cartridges for him."

That is typical of many of the applications received at labour exchanges all over the country.

"I am a lady orchestra conductor: let me release a man who is conducting orchestras, that he may drop his baton and take up the rifle," was the suggestion of another lady who applied at the Central Office of Labour Exchanges, at Queen Anne's House, Broadway, Westminster.

A highly trained woman wireless operator, taught at the technical college at Glasgow, was among the 3,000 London applicants yesterday. She wants to relieve a male operator so that he may go to the war.

Bevies of young women ready and willing to work as tram conductors have registered. The Glasgow Corporation are considering the question of employing women on their tramways.

University women, women of leisure, wives of lawyers and doctors, as well as large numbers of women who have been weekly wage-earners in times past, were among the applicants yesterday.

ALL CLASSES.

Women in costly furs and fashionable frocks, as well as women in plain straw hats and cheap black jackets and skirts, were in the crowds that invaded the labour exchanges.

Some put themselves down on the registration forms as willing to knit, feed poultry, milk cows, tend sheep, manage bees, or sew. Others are ready to learn to work light machines for the making of leather goods, and to do day work or night work as desired. Some offer full time, others part time.

The most popular occupation of all, however, is the making of ammunition. "Let me stuff cartridges instead of stomachs," remarked a cook at one of the labour exchanges yesterday as she reached for a form to fill up.

The chief task at the moment is to ascertain what number of women are available. Meanwhile ammunition factories and some other works are being enlarged and increased in number, and there will be room for thousands of new workers before long.

The Essex Education Committee yesterday decided to release Dr. F. S. Hawks, a school medical inspector, who wishes to take a commission in the R.A.M.C., and to appoint in his place during the war Mrs. Leitch, whose husband, a doctor, is serving at the front, and who desired herself to help the country.

THE BROOM LADIES.

WOMEN AT WORK AS RAILWAY CARRIAGE CLEANERS.

Sweep, girls, sweep,
We'll make the merry dust fly;
Sweep, girls, sweep,
Leave the train both neat and clean;
While the boys are at the war,
We'll brush the seats and floor,
And the G.C.R. will wonder
That they ne'er tried girls before.

It is a matter of pride to the Great Central Railway Company that more than 10 per cent. of its entire staff has gone to the war.

The number up to the end of January was 3,784. Since then 141 more men have joined the Army, and every week sees a few more

The Daily Telegraph, March 23rd. 1918.

APPEAL TO WOMEN FOR WAR SERVICE.

SPLENDID RESPONSE.

MAKING OF MUNITIONS.

A splendid response is being made by the women of the country to the Government's appeal to them to register for employment in view of the war emergency. How many have already applied for registration forms it is impossible to say. The distributing agencies are so numerous and widespread that it has not been possible yet to receive reports from them all. Constant requests, however, are reaching the Board of Trade for more supplies of registration forms, and it is quite apparent that the patriotic appeal to women will be a huge success.

At the central offices at Queen Anne's-mansions, Westminster, yesterday there was a steady stream of ladies all anxious to secure the forms that have to be filled up, and it was stated that the number issued from that office alone since the inauguration of the scheme was close on 10,000. An interesting feature of the applications, an official remarked, was the great number received from women of the middle class, who have never before done any work for pay. Many of these offer to drive their own motors or do whatever was suggested. One went so far as to say that she would wear a uniform and deliver milk. Numerous applicants of this class are anxious to become taxicab drivers. There are certain difficulties about this at present, but something may come of the suggestion.

Most popular of all forms of employment with the applicants is the making of munitions of war. Many soldiers' wives write: "My husband is fighting at the front, and I should like to make cartridges for him." The same idea prevails through many letters. Others report that they are not strong enough for armament work, but they are willing to undertake clerical duties and release a man for the fighting line. A lady band conductor wants to take the place of a man, and among yesterday's applicants was a trained wireless telegraph operator.

COLONIAL OFFERS.

Numerous offers have also come to hand from Colonial ladies who are in this country.

At the central offices of the Women's Emergency Corps, in Baker-street, where a Labour Exchange has been established by the Government, applicants have been pouring in, the great majority of them inspired with the patriotic desire to "fill cartridges" or do other work directly connected with the war.

"We had anticipated the action of the Government," said a prominent worker at the headquarters of the corps to a representative of The Daily Telegraph yesterday, "and had already made a register of women willing to work. And if women are really wanted, I think those who have been long looking for work ought to be the first to be employed, and they ought to be paid proper wages. I do not think the public have any idea of the number of women—educated women of the middle-classes—who are in want of employment. There are thousands of them. The form which has just been issued by the Government does not guarantee either work or wages. The women who have already done paid work, and done it well, ought to have the first opportunity.

"Then there are hundreds wanting work who have received a good general education, but have not received any special training. Agricultural work would, no doubt, be a splendid thing for them. Since the beginning of the war we have had ninety applications here alone from women who ask for training in agricultural work. We have been able to secure for them offers of training in agricultural and horticultural colleges; but there is the difficulty of the cost of maintenance during training. The pathetic thing is that there are so many women anxious to do agricultural work who have not the means to secure the necessary training."

CIVIL SERVICE RECRUITS.

WOMEN SUBSTITUTES.

not matter whether men or women are employed.

"We were approached by the Board of Trade and the Home Office in connection with the Central Committee for Women's Employment, and we have now succeeded in arriving at a very excellent arrangement for the training of the women. They will not be trained indiscriminately, so as to flood the market, and therefore inquiry is being made of employers to ascertain how many women, when trained, they can employ. Minimum rates have been fixed, and will be paid by the Central Committee for Women's Employment during the training. These are, for women of:

18 years	...	...	...	18s
19 years	...	...	...	20s
20 years	...	...	...	22s
21 years	...	...	...	24s and 25s

according to the capabilities of the women.

"Both Mr. Canfield, of Messrs. Lipton (Ltd.), and Mr. Sainsbury, have intimated that they will be prepared to pay as much as 35s per week for women who prove themselves efficient. The training scheme is, therefore, likely to be started in the right way, and our national treasurer is having interviews with the Central Committee for Women's Employment, arranging details. Messrs. Lipton will employ fifty women as soon as they are trained, and Mr. Sainsbury as many. A preference will be given by the latter to women who are helping to support a family from which a son or brother has gone to the front."

It may be added that in 1911 there were throughout the country 19,163 women employed in the grocery trade, and in London the number is 4,195.

SHOP ASSISTANTS' COMPANY.

The Earl of Derby yesterday made a special appeal to shop assistants to join the colours, pointing out that women could easily take their places behind the counter. He says that the four Comrades' Battalions comprising the City of Liverpool Brigade, which paraded before Lord Kitchener on Sunday, will need an ample reserve, and asks for at least another 1,000 men, adding:

"Might I suggest that shop assistants should band themselves together and form one or more companies? If I get any letters favourable to such a proposal I will call a special meeting of shop assistants to meet me one day early next week. At the same time I would earnestly beg employers to give assistants permission to join, and to reserve their situations for them on their return, and meanwhile make use as far as possible of female labour. If this were done it would give many women the chance they so earnestly desire to show their patriotism."

WORK ON THE LAND.

A PERSISTENT DEMAND.

Mr. Thomas McRow, secretary of the Royal Agricultural Society, when asked his views upon the Government scheme, replied that if women could be induced to take up farm work there would be no difficulty in finding an opening for them. For instance, in thinning turnips they were particularly useful, and in some cases were preferred to men, because they were more careful. Machinery had been largely responsible for driving women from field work, and it was doubtful if ever they could be induced to return.

All who are acquainted with farm labour know that the conditions are hard, but if in the present emergency women could be persuaded as a patriotic duty to take the place of men who have gone to the front, there is plenty of useful employment to be found for them on the farm. They must, however, be prepared for trying conditions, but, given the grit to do their part in the present struggle, there is an ample field for women workers.

Mrs. T. Chamberlain, honorary secretary of the Women's Agricultural and Horticultural International Union, which is affiliated to a number of women's organisations, was very doubtful about the ordinary town-bred woman being of much use on the land without previous training.

There must, however, she said, be a large number of country-bred women in the towns fit for work on farms and nursery gardens, and if their town-bred sisters would relieve them a large body of labour might be made available. There could be no doubt that there was a demand for women's labour on farms, because almost invariably when the men went

That they ne'er tried girls before.

It is a matter of pride to the Great Central Railway Company that more than 10 per cent. of its entire staff has gone to the war.

The number up to the end of January was 3,724. Since then 113 more men have joined the Army, and every week sees a few men leave.

That is why women carriage cleaners are now employed at Marylebone and at two or three other large stations on the Great Central system.

If you go to Marylebone you will see a squad of cheerful women with long-handled brooms and with brushes lying in wait for the trains as they come in.

As soon as the passengers have left the carriages the women cleaners step in, and then doesn't the dust fly! It has no chance against these feminine foes of untidiness and matter in the wrong place.

Men cleaners are still employed for part of the work, for some of the trains have to be cleaned on the sidings outside the station, and it is not considered safe for women to be tripping over the lines in the neighbourhood of passing trains.

Some of the women engaged are soldiers' wives, and they are glad to have the work to do. Others are women who found themselves unemployed owing to the war.

"It's much better than having no work at all," one of the women cleaners told a "Daily Express" representative yesterday, "and when you come to the station in the morning you can fancy you're going for a little trip to beechy Bucks or a week's holiday at the seaside

"But I can't stand here talking. There's the 2.43 just in, Liza. Put your bonnet straight and pass my broom!"

CIVIL SERVICE RECRUITS.

WOMEN SUBSTITUTES.

By Our Civil Service Correspondent.

The compilation by the Board of Trade of a special register of women willing to accept paid employment, in order to release men for the Army or for the production of munitions of war, is of special interest to the Civil Service, in many departments of which, shortly after the war began, further enlistment by members of the staff was forbidden. The ground for refusal was usually that the enlistments which had already taken place had so depleted the staff that any additions to their number would seriously impair efficiency. In departments where the work is of a highly specialised character, there was, no doubt, a good deal to be said for this argument, and in any case the judgment of the head of the department was regarded as final. In the present position of affairs, however, it has to be considered whether a large body of men, who are selected lives, in the insurance sense, should not, on grounds of public policy, furnish further recruits for the armed forces, especially where they are engaged on duties of a routine character, which experience has shown can be readily learned and efficiently performed by women.

Evidence given before the recent Royal Commission showed that there was in the Civil Service very considerable scope for the extension of the employment of women, and the Commissioners recommended that a committee should examine the question. The official witnesses before the Commission urged no arguments in opposition stronger than the lack of present accommodation for women clerks—a mere matter of arrangement.

WOMEN'S EFFICIENCY.

The few departments in which women have hitherto been employed as clerks can testify to their efficiency and devotion to duty. Some misgivings might be felt on the ground that if once women obtain a substantial foothold in the Civil Service they will oust a large number of men who might otherwise have obtained appointments. But it should be borne in mind that not only must there be a large expansion of the service after the war, but that many women are not, like men, lifelong officials, especially if the present regulation as to resignation on marriage be retained. Liberty to join the colours would remove an undeserved slur now resting on our junior Civil servants, as compared, for instance, with bank clerks. It is said that 25 per cent. of the staff of the London banks now consists of women, on account of the large numbers of clerks who have enlisted.

By judicious employment of women in Government offices, hundreds of Civil servants of military age who are eager to enlist could be released for the front, without any impairment of the efficiency of the public services. In launching their new scheme for the utilisation of the services of women the Government should set an example in its own house. Hundreds of male temporary substitutes have already been given employment in the various departments, in defiance of the recognised rules governing recruitment for the Civil Service. Is it only against women in this crisis that these rules are to be maintained?

TRAINING FOR SHOPS.

BEHIND THE GROCERY COUNTER

The attitude of a trades union which has both men and women as members is interesting, now that the attempt is being made to mobilise female workers. Such a society is the National Amalgamated Union of Shop Assistants, Warehousemen, and Clerks, which has a membership of 86,000, of whom 22,000 are women. The general secretary, Mr. John Turner, explained to a Daily Telegraph representative that 9,000 of the male members are enlisted, and the organisation feel that they can have no objection in principle to the places of those who have joined the Colours being taken by women.

"The question of introducing women has come up," Mr. Turner said, "principally in connection with the grocery trade. One non-union organisation of grocers' assistants strongly opposed the introduction of women's labour, without regard to the terms on which it is introduced, but our executive refused to take up this position. It is our duty as trades unionists to protect the conditions of employment, but so long as that is done it does not for work on farms and nursery gardens, and if their town-bred sisters would relieve them a large body of labour might be made available. There could be no doubt that there was a demand for women's labour on farms, because almost invariably, when the union was approached to find employment for someone, it was discovered that the applicant was at once picked up in her own neighbourhood.

WOMAN MOTOR DRIVER.

The first woman professional motor-driver has made her appearance in Leeds. She is a Miss Virtue, of London, and has been engaged to drive a motor delivery van for a firm of grocers in the city, having taken the place of a man who has gone to the front. The firm declined to appoint any man in his stead who was eligible for military service. Miss Virtue presented herself for the post, being anxious to liberate a man for service for his country for the period of the war.

The firm acknowledge the success of their experiment, and the manager declares that there is far less time wasted on errands, possibly because there is no flirting between the domestics and the man at the wheel.

AFTER THE WAR.

To the Editor of "The Daily Telegraph."

Sir—Stipulations that other employment must be found for women volunteers after the war ends appear to me idle, except in the case of those who are not, strictly speaking, volunteers, but workers seeking employment. Surely work that ceases automatically when no longer required is peculiarly fitted to those who have other resources, home, trade, or means, and who will thus not add to the ranks of the destitute.—Yours truly, FLORA ANNIE STEEL.

Court o' Hill, Tenbury, March 20.

CALL TO THE MIDDLE CLASS.

Sir—I venture to intrude upon your space because I believe that there are many women in the same position as myself. I have never done any paid work, nor do I wish to do such work now, if there are sufficient women who actually need the money to meet the demand. If, however, when these wage-earners have been used up there is still a shortage of labour, and the country requires such help as we can give, I am sure that there are many of us—women of the middle-class—who are only too willing to come forward, as our brothers and men friends have already done. We realise that we cannot all be bank clerks, or look for good positions, any more than all our men have obtained commissions, and many of us are prepared to serve in the way which will help our country best at the present time—in the making or packing of actual munitions of war if necessary.

We are untrained, but we think that the normal intelligence which has helped us to learn to do other things with our hands—things requiring deftness and accuracy—would enable us to learn this work within a reasonable time. We would not take any poorer woman's job from her, but we would ask the Government to remember that the men who are serving in such corps as the Artists, the H.A.C., and the Public Schools, have sisters who are ready to stand by their men folk and their country, and who could also be called out for "the duration of the war." If more and more works are opened, and there is still need of women workers, let there be corps for daughters of professional men or of income-tax payers, and let us enlist with our friends.

A MIDDLE-CLASS WOMAN.

MAIL ORDER DEPARTMENT.

Sir—As I was very much struck with the announcement, in your article respecting work for women, that they were now taking up as one of the latest developments "management of the mail order departments," I thought perhaps it would interest you to know that for some years now I have enjoyed the management of this department in one of the largest West of England drapery and furnishing establishments, whose mail order trade, both at home and abroad, represents a valuable and increasing portion of each year's business, I think I may claim with success; in addition to which I am responsible for all correspondence, exclusive of purely financial matters, and it has always been a source of wonder to me that this post, which appears to me to be essentially a woman's, in view of the minute details involved, is usually occupied by a man.

May I take this opportunity of expressing my very great appreciation of your paper (which I have taken for many years), knowing with what success you have pioneered the most difficult undertakings; and, apologising for taking up your valuable space, I remain,

MANAGERESS OF MAIL ORDER DEPARTMENT.

The Daily Sketch, March 23rd. 1915.

663/45 663

WHY WOMEN SHOULD BE MOBILISED.

Germany Denies Women The Right To Speak, Or Even Think, As Independent Human Beings.

By MRS. PANKHURST.

This war has shown that Teutonism holds a special menace for the women of England, as apart from the men. Wherein that menace lies is explained below by Mrs. Pankhurst.

Apart altogether from the pure spirit of patriotism which has always animated the suffragists, we cannot doubt that it is part of the German policy to hold and maintain a low conception of the status of woman. And for that reason we are heart and soul in our devotion to the cause of the Allies.

The German has made it plain by his policy and his conduct in this war that he wishes to go back to the days of the brutal, original Adam. Force is his ideal, and to that ideal he wishes the State to be subordinated. For Germany, the man speaks. The woman is inarticulate.

So you will find that wherever his laws seem to protect the woman, they protect her only as the bearer of strong children. That is her sole service to the State, and for that service she is fostered and kept fit. But directly she seeks to express her individuality in any other sphere the German is her enemy.

The women of England, after many years of hard fighting, had begun to think that there was hope for them. Regarding neither man nor woman as the superior, we held that humanity needed both. Their qualities are complementary and equally important to the human race.

Mrs. Pankhurst.

So we claim, as they claim for women in France and in America, that woman shall have her full place in the development of the nation. But in Germany the Kaiser has already assigned woman's place to the three K's, "Kinder, Kirche, Küche" (children, church and kitchen). This is woman's sphere. The affairs of the nation are no affair of hers.

NO AUTHORITY OR INFLUENCE.

What follows then from this philosophy? Not the benefit to the State that should come from the fullest development of woman, but the ill to the State that comes from a wrong conception of her functions. Being without authority, she is without influence. She cannot bring her counsel and advice to bear upon the vicious man, nor her strength to aid the State with effective help.

Brute power and the destructive instinct go always hand in hand. Nothing is built by them, least of all the human species. We regard the highest duty of woman as the mother to be the constructive duty, the building up of the race physically, mentally and morally. And, since it has been assigned to us by nature to bring children into the world, we hold it to be no less our function to see that the minds, the bodies and the souls of the children we bear are given the full and free exercise that nature designed for them.

The German will not allow this. He is all for the man-State. Nothing else matters. He does not see that his philosophy loses the half of life. His perfect State is one in which there is continuous preparation for war. And the pioneers of this ideal, the feudal and ignorant junkers, have now drawn into their fold poet and philosopher and statesman, until all Germany stands for this ideal.

FIGHT FOR RIGHTS OF HUMANITY.

Had Germany been left to conquer, she, as well as all the rest of the world, would have fallen back behind the line where humanity stood four thousand years ago. When she acknowledges defeat, we shall have gained no more than the safeguarding of the common rights of humanity. Germany will have lost even that brute strength on which she prided herself when she set out to stamp her "kultur" on the rest of the world.

And that will go down to history as the achievement of the State whose rulers, mesmerised by the magic of false history, sought power as the end of all human endeavour and denied their women the right to speak, or even to think, as independent human beings.

Henceforth the world must hold a future for true democracy. And we owe all the ideals of real democracy to France, the "feminine" State that was held to be weak because her philosophy saw brute force in all its naked weakness. The light and glory of France has been her women, from Joan of Arc onwards. And all that France meant to the world was to be crushed and to perish, because brutality feared her! If we had no other reason to fight the Germans, their threat to France should have been enough.

FREE MEN FOR THE FRONT.

And so now we say to the men of England that their first duty is to train themselves for the fighting line, in order that those ideals for which the Allies are at war may be speedily realised, and the German menace, which threatens the whole civilised world, may be crushed once and for all.

And that is why we welcome the Government's call to women to take men's places in office and factory, and free them for the field of battle. Such State service is what we have always demanded and what the Government have always denied us. We are ready, without words, to serve wherever we may be needed in the greatest fight for liberty which the world has yet seen.

Daily Despatch, March 23rd 1915.

MANCHESTER SCENE.

Women's Rush to Help.

LABOUR EXCHANGE

Besieged by Well-dressed Crowd.

OFFICIALS BUSY.

Offer to Work in Varied Occupations.

Women were almost tumbling over each other yesterday in Manchester to be registered for war service.

There was a long queue at the women's department of the Labour Exchange in Queen-street, and the general appearance of those who composed it was much as one sees outside the theatres waiting to get to some of the better-class seats. Such young women have never before been seen lined up outside a Labour Exchange, and they would not have been there yesterday had it not been for the scheme of the Board of Trade to open a special register of women for war service.

It was found impossible to deal with all the applicants unless they were content to wait a considerable time, and as this would have caused much inconvenience to the applicants, it was deemed advisable to distribute the official forms to many of them so that they might fill them up at home. One of the more patriotic young women confessed she had "run away for a few minutes from business," whilst quite a number, t was found, had travelled specially from some of the more outlying suburbs, so eager were they to get on the register and be doing something for the good of the nation.

Several Hundred Registered.

A surprisingly large number of occupations looked upon as outside the province of women are likely to be quickly taken up by them as soon as the supply of men becomes exhausted. Already, we are told, one railway company in the city is employing women as carriage cleaners, and it is said they are "doing their work well." Other women are inquiring after similar work, and there are others who are signifying their willingness to take up work as cleaners of tramcars, and also as conductors.

Young women who have had experience of motor car driving are volunteering for such work, whilst others state they are able to take up dairy work, clothing machining, light machining for armaments, and some declare they will try and make themselves useful in whatever sphere they may be put. A very large number of young women who are comfortably off are anxious to secure clerical work. Numerous married women, too, are being registered. The applicants for registration at the city Labour Exchanges up to last night numbered several hundreds.

Too Old at Thirty.

Some of the women's societies are doing good work in this direction. Several of them were busy all day yesterday.

"We are trying to inspire them," said the official of one of these societies, "to enrol for ammunition work. Amongst employers," she added, "there is a feeling against women of about 30 years of age and over. Many women who came in that category are anxious to be of use, but employers in the main will not take them on except at a ridiculously low wage."

It was mentioned by the official that her society had already sent out a number of lady clerks to fill places that men had occupied.

Distinctly Good Class.

In another quarter it was stated that "a distinctly good class" of women was coming forward for registration. "A large percentage of them," it was remarked, "belong to the upper middle classes, and have had a good education, whilst on the other hand there are those who have had business or industrial experience. One woman wrote from Didsbury saying: 'My man is at the front, as also are two of my sons, and I am anxious to do what I can.'

It was pointed out that a large proportion of the women appeared to be labouring under a wrong impression as to the Nottingham Guardian, March 23rd. 1915.

The Government would appear to have every reason to be gratified with the immediate response to their appeal for women labour volunteers. As far as London is concerned, at any rate, the scheme promises to prove an unqualified success, judging by the number of applications that have been made at the Labour Exchanges. It is understood that already more than 15,000 names have been put down for registration, and in addition there have been many hundreds of personal inquiries. The applicants are representative of all sections of the community, numbers of them being women of the wealthy and leisured class actuated solely by patriotic motives, and all are anxious to do something for the good of the country. Yesterday the crowd of women besieging the headquarters of the exchange at Queen Anne's Chambers, Westminster was denser than ever. Quite a large proportion of them were smartly gowned and shod, and not all of them by any means were attracted solely by the desire to secure "something light" at a substantial salary. No illusions were harboured as to the kind of workers chiefly wanted to facilitate this great work of mobilisation. Many of the women obviously in comfortable circumstances are ready to tackle anything, from working on armaments to light machining in the cloth factories, and quite a number are prepared to take up dairy work, poultry rearing, or other employment on the farms. It will necessarily be some time before the results of the scheme are known and made public, but signs are not wanting already which point to its success.

Daily Chronicle, March 23rd. 1915.

ORGANISING WOMEN'S WORK.

To the Editor Daily Chronicle.

Sir,—The Board of Trade having invited the co-operation of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies in carrying out the Government proposals for the organisation of women's work at this national crisis, the Executive Committee states that such organisation would be welcomed and was, indeed, urged on the Government by the National Union at the beginning of the war. It was foreseen that such organisation would sooner or later be necessary, and now that the Government has realised the need, the National Union has expressed its willingness to help in the following resolution:—

"The National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies welcomes a Government scheme for the organisation of women who are willing to take paid employment for war service provided that the necessary safeguards are secured.

The points which the National Union of W.S.S. particularly wishes to emphasise are:—

(1) The necessity of equal pay for equal work thus avoiding the undercutting of men.
(2) The great importance of training.
(3) The securing of good conditions as to housing, &c., specially in agriculture.

MILLICENT GARRETT FAWCETT.
National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies.

nation. But in Germany the Kaiser has already Mrs. Pankhurst. assigned woman's place to the three K's, "Kinder, Kirche, Küche" (children, church and kitchen). This is woman's sphere. The affairs of the nation are no affair of hers.

NO AUTHORITY OR INFLUENCE.

What follows then from this philosophy? Not the benefit to the State that should come from the fullest development of woman, but the ill to the State that comes from a wrong conception of her functions. Being without authority, she is without influence. She cannot bring her counsel and advice to bear upon the vicious man, nor her strength to aid the State with effective help.

Brute power and the destructive instinct go always hand in hand. Nothing is built by them,

Nottingham Guardian,
March 23rd. 1915.

The Government would appear to have every reason to be gratified with the immediate response to their appeal for women labour volunteers. As far as London is concerned, at any rate, the scheme promises to prove an unqualified success, judging by the number of applications that have been made at the Labour Exchanges. It is understood that already more than 15,000 names have been put down for registration, and in addition there have been many hundreds of personal inquiries. The applicants are representative of all sections of the community, numbers of them being women of the wealthy and leisured class actuated solely by patriotic motives, and all are anxious to do something for the good of the country. Yesterday the crowd of women besieging the headquarters of the exchange at Queen Anne's Chambers, Westminster, was denser than ever. Quite a large proportion of them were smartly gowned and shod, and not all of them by any means were attracted solely by the desire to secure "something light" at a substantial salary. No illusions were harboured as to the kind of workers chiefly wanted to facilitate this great work of mobilisation. Many of the women obviously in comfortable circumstances are ready to tackle anything, from working on armaments to light machining in the cloth factories, and quite a number are prepared to take up dairy work, poultry rearing, or other employment on the farms. It will necessarily be some time before the results of the scheme are known and made public, but signs are not wanting already which point to its success.

world was to be crushed and to perish, because brutality feared her! If we had no other reason to fight the Germans, their threat to France should have been enough.

FREE MEN FOR THE FRONT.

And so now we say to the men of England that their first duty is to train themselves for the fighting line, in order that those ideals for which the Allies are at war may be speedily realised, and the German menace, which threatens the whole civilised world, may be crushed once and for all.

And that is why we welcome the Government's call to women to take men's places in office and factory, and free them for the field of battle. Such State service is what we have always demanded and what the Government have always denied us. We are ready, without words, to serve wherever we may be needed in the greatest fight for liberty which the world has yet seen.

Daily Chronicle,
March 23rd. 1915.

ORGANISING WOMEN'S WORK.

To the Editor Daily Chronicle.

Sir,—The Board of Trade having invited the co-operation of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies in carrying out the Government proposals for the organisation of women's work at this national crisis, the Executive Committee states that such organisation would be welcomed and was, indeed, urged on the Government by the National Union at the beginning of the war. It was foreseen that such organisation would sooner or later be necessary, and now that the Government has realised the need, the National Union has expressed its willingness to help in the following resolution:—

"The National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies welcomes a Government scheme for the organisation of women who are willing to take paid employment for war service provided that the necessary safeguards are secured.

The points which the National Union of W.S.S. particularly wishes to emphasise are:—

(1) The necessity of equal pay for equal work thus avoiding the undercutting of men.
(2) The great importance of training.
(3) The securing of good conditions as to housing, &c., specially in agriculture.

MILLICENT GARRETT FAWCETT.
National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies.

so that they might fill them up at home. One of the more patriotic young women confessed she had "run away for a few minutes from business," whilst quite a number, t was found, had travelled specially from some of the more outlying suburbs, so eager were they to get on the register and be doing something for the good of the nation.

Several Hundred Registered.

A surprisingly large number of occupations looked upon as outside the province of women are likely to be quickly taken up by them as soon as the supply of men becomes exhausted. Already, we are told, one railway company in the city is employing women as carriage cleaners, and it is said they are "doing their work well." Other women are inquiring after similar work, and there are others who are signifying their willingness to take up work as cleaners of tramcars, and also as conductors.

Young women who have had experience of motor car driving are volunteering for such work, whilst others state they are able to take up dairy work, clothing machining, light machining for armaments, and some declare they will try and make themselves useful in whatever sphere they may be put. A very large number of young women who are comfortably off are anxious to secure clerical work. Numerous married women, too, are being registered. The applicants for registration at the city Labour Exchanges up to last night numbered several hundreds.

Too Old at Thirty.

Some of the women's societies are doing good work in this direction. Several of them were busy all day yesterday.

"We are trying to inspire them," said the official of one of these societies, "to enrol for ammunition work. Amongst employers," she added, "there is a feeling against women of about 30 years of age and over. Many women who came in that category are anxious to be of use, but employers in the main will not take them on except at a ridiculously low wage."

It was mentioned by the official that her society had already sent out a number of lady clerks to fill places that men had occupied.

Distinctly Good Class.

In another quarter it was stated that "a distinctly good class" of women was coming forward for registration. "A large percentage of them," it was remarked, "belong to the upper middle classes, and have had a good education, whilst on the other hand there are those who have had business or industrial experience. One woman wrote from Didsbury saying: 'My man is at the front, as also are two of my sons, and I am anxious to do what bit I can.'

It was pointed out that a large proportion of the women appeared to be labouring under a wrong impression in regard to registration. "They have an idea," it was said, "that they are wanted immediately. They do not appreciate for a moment that the register is to be a census of women who would be available if the necessity arose. The necessity has not arisen yet, but there is no telling how soon it may, and it is well to be ready for it. There are those of the women who are prompted to register partly out of patriotism and partly out of a desire to supplement their income, even though it is already above the subsistence level. There is a danger, in that sense, that the register may ultimately give an inflated idea as to the extent of unemployment amongst women."

The Object Explained.

The Board of Trade's circular regarding war service for women was considered at a meeting of the Women's Unemployment Sub-committee of the Manchester Relief Committee, held at the Manchester Town Hall yesterday.

The primary object of the circular is, so far as possible, to secure women who are free to work to replace male labour, and special consideration is invited from married women, who are not, owing to the position of their husbands, compelled to follow any employment, and from single young women, who owing to the circumstances of their parents, filled positions only in the household.

Women are required for farm work, dairy work, leather stitching, brush making, clothing machining, and light machining for armaments, and it is desirable that women should register even if they have no experience of the work, as it is possible for them to be trained.

The Glasgow Record,
March 23rd. 1915.

SUPPLIES FOR THE ARMY.

THE CALL FOR WOMEN WORKERS.

NUMEROUS VOLUNTEERS IN GLASGOW.

OFFERS BY LEISURED WOMEN.

Although the actual figures are not yet available, it was learned, on enquiry at the Labour Exchanges in Glasgow yesterday, that a considerable number of women have already registered themselves in response to the Board of Trade's appeal for women workers to replace men who have enlisted, and that large numbers have also made application for the registration form.

Quite a large number of these women are workers who are out of employment, but a surprisingly large number of applications have been received from women of the middle and leisured classes. Applicants are requested to state what kind of work they are capable of doing, and if they are willing to undergo training for any particular industry, but many have stated their readiness to undertake any useful work.

A considerable number of machinists could be employed in shirt and clothing factories which are engaged on Government orders, and it is believed that fully a thousand women could be started almost immediately in the engineering shops which are turning out shells and other munitions of war.

Many of these establishments are suffering from a shortage of male labour, and already some have experimented with success in the employment of women, who are quite able, after a very brief tuition, to attend to some of the lighter machines. Steps are being taken to approach employers with a view to ascertaining how many women can be employed in this manner.

The only point upon which fears are expressed is the effect this employment of female labour may have upon the labour market generally, and several people, interviewed on the subject yesterday, insisted that it must not be allowed to bring down wages or worsen conditions for those who are obliged to earn their livelihood.

MANY WOMEN UNEMPLOYED.

Mrs. Irwin, secretary of the Scottish Council for Women's Trades, approached on the subject said:—"Of course the scheme has some fine points. The suggestion that women of every class should come forward and help their country in her hour of need naturally makes a strong appeal to women with patriotic ideals and some imagination.

"There are certain economic points, however, which must not be disregarded, or very grave mistakes may be made, involving hardship and injustice to the legitimate working woman. At present there are large numbers of women and girls whose circumstances are very urgent, who are out of employment, and for whom, apparently, no work can be found. Crowds of these women and girls come every day to the office of the Scottish Council for Women's Trades and are passed on by them to the Labour Exchange in the hope that the latter may be able to provide work for them.

"We have at present 165 girls and women in our emergency workrooms, and these we are passing out as rapidly as we can to permanent employment, but it is quite evident that, at the present at least, there are not enough jobs to go round. People are apt to be misled by the cry of a shortage of labour in certain trades. They forget that workers are capable of taking up only their own industry, and that a boom in the shirt-making trade is not of much use to the unemployed golf ball maker or confectionery worker.

"Women's employments have suffered more than any others from the competition of the partially supported or voluntary worker, and while I do not think it right to prevent any woman desirous of working from entering the labour market she must see to it that she does not do so under unfair conditions. The competition of workers of this class has almost invariably a tendency to lower wages, and therefore to make the struggle harder for the woman who has to depend on her own earnings for a livelihood.

THE WEST-END WOMEN.

"I question very much whether employers would regard strongly the com-

The Times,
March 23rd. 1915.

WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE.

NUMEROUS AND VARIED APPLICATIONS.

MOTOR-VEHICLE DRIVING.

Some 5,000 new applications by women for war service were received by the Central Labour Exchange of the Board of Trade yesterday morning. This brings the total up to over 12,000, exclusive of those sent in to the various metropolitan exchanges and the great provincial centres.

The applications made to 20 district exchanges of London up to Saturday make up a total of 1,447. Of these the largest contributors were Camberwell and Woolwich, with 282 and 217 respectively. The only other districts where the number of applications ran into three figures were Holloway (126) and Lewisham (112); the lowest, curiously enough, was Bermondsey, with only 10. The letters received yesterday direct came from all parts of the country, a large proportion of the volunteers being from agricultural districts. Yesterday also the Department was very busy with callers, the stream growing steadily in volume as the day advanced.

The offers of service were very varied, but the majority were remarkable less for precision than for the spirit of willingness. Many were ready to do "anything." A married woman informed the authorities that she had a small baby, but thought it "a pity to be kept at home by a trifle like that." She was willing "to work on a night shift," because, she said, "I could leave the baby with older childen." Quite a number of women between 50 and 60 years of age said they had not done work before, but would be only too glad to be of use.

WOMEN DRIVERS AND CONDUCTORS.

A younger and more numerous class appears to be much attracted by the idea of helping in the manufacture of munitions of war. Several young women stated that they could drive a motor-car and were anxious to be omnibus or taxicab drivers. Hitherto the Home Office and the police have absolutely refused to grant licences to women to drive motor vehicles plying for hire. At the garages of one large firm a qualified woman driver was informed that 300 taxis were lying idle because there were no men to drive them, and that the firm would very willingly employ women-drivers if the police would permit it.

In spite of statements to the contrary, it is well known that many women are competent to do all running repairs, such as a taxicab driver might be called upon to do. It is possible, however, that in the present circumstances they may waive their objection in the case of taxicabs.

Some women, again, have offered to act as tram-car conductors. The question of such employment for women was raised before Christmas by the Women's Social and Political Union, but the men's trade unions opposed it strongly, and the Government officials who were approached thought that public opinion would be hostile. Early in February the attention of the London County Council Tramways Department was directed to the matter, and the reply was given that "if special circumstances should arise the Council might consider it advisable to adopt your suggestion." There is now some prospect that the Council may consider that the special circumstances have arisen, and a representative of The Times was informed yesterday that some action would probably be taken in the course of the next fortnight.

So far the responses from employers have been few. The chairman of one great railway yesterday expressed a decided repugnance to seeing the sexes mingled at clerical work in railway offices and banking establishments, though he admitted that it was not an unusual sight in brokers' and other offices on the other side of the Atlantic.

663/46 663.

The Standard,
March 23rd. 1915.

WOMEN'S WAR WORK.

COUNTRY'S RESPONSE TO OFFICIAL APPEAL.

The response to the appeal to women to take up work which will release men for enlisting has been prompt and extensive. Special forms, which are issued through the various Labour Exchanges, have been prepared, and thousands of women have applied for them.

There was an abnormal run yesterday on the Central Exchange at St. James's Park. Women of all ages, from girls in their teens to mature matrons—some of whom had children in their charge—presented the forms, duly filled in, and left fondly hoping that something might result. The work applied for varied. Several women wanted to handle, make, or pack ammunition. Three wished to become tramway-car conductors, and a very large proportion volunteered for farm or dairy work. One applicant gave the assurance that she had "perfect control over horses," could milk cows, and "look after a litter of pigs." Another offered to act as an orchestral conductor.

The applicants came from every part of the metropolis, including places as far out as Balham, Tooting, Harringay, and Clapton. Some already had husbands or brothers in the Army, and each and all indicated their anxiety to help their country in its hour of need.

"There is no ground for complaint concerning the readiness of women to help," said an official. "The marvel is the versatility they show and their adaptability for all kinds of work." From details of the applications he gave it appears that on Thursday, when the appeal was published, there were 700 applicants in London alone, by Friday morning's post 5000 letters of application arrived from women in all parts of the country, the number of women registered that day was 1270, and the first post yesterday brought 3000 more letters.

SAFEGUARDS DESIRED.

To the Editor of "The Standard."

Sir,—The Board of Trade having invited the co-operation of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies in carrying out the Government proposals for the organisation of women's work at this national crisis, the Executive Committee states that such organisation would be welcomed, and was indeed urged on the Government by the National Union at the beginning of the war. It was foreseen that such organisation would sooner or later be necessary, and now that the Government has realised the need the National Union has expressed its willingness to help in the following resolution:—

"The National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies welcomes a Government scheme for the organisation of women who are willing to take paid employment for war service, provided that the necessary safeguards are secured. The points which the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies particularly wishes to emphasise are:—

"1. The necessity of equal pay for equal work, thus avoiding the undercutting of men.

"2. The great importance of training.

"3. The securing of good conditions, as to housing, etc., specially in agriculture."—I am, Sir, yours truly,

MILLICENT GARRETT FAWCETT.

OFFERS BY LEISURED WOMEN.

Although the actual figures are not yet available, it was learned, on enquiry at the Labour Exchanges in Glasgow yesterday, that a considerable number of women have already registered themselves in response to the Board of Trade's appeal for women workers to replace men who have enlisted, and that large numbers have also made application for the registration form.

Quite a large number of these women are workers who are out of employment, but a surprisingly large number of applications have been received from women of the middle and leisured classes. Applicants are requested to state what kind of work they are capable of doing, and if they are willing to undergo training for any particular industry, but many have stated their readiness to undertake any useful work.

A considerable number of machinists could be employed in shirt and clothing factories which are engaged on Government orders, and it is believed that fully a thousand women could be started almost immediately in the engineering shops which are turning out shells and other munitions of war.

Many of these establishments are suffering from a shortage of male labour, and already some have experimented with success in the employment of women, who are quite able, after a very brief tuition, to attend to some of the lighter machines. Steps are being taken to approach employers with a view to ascertaining how many women can be employed in this manner.

The only point upon which fears are expressed is the effect this employment of female labour may have upon the labour market generally, and several people, interviewed on the subject yesterday, insisted that it must not be allowed to bring down wages or worsen conditions for those who are obliged to earn their livelihood.

MANY WOMEN UNEMPLOYED.

Mrs. Irwin, secretary of the Scottish Council for Women's Trades, approached on the subject said:—"Of course the scheme has some fine points. The suggestion that women of every class should come forward and help their country in her hour of need naturally makes a strong appeal to women with patriotic ideals and some imagination.

"There are certain economic points, however, which must not be disregarded, or very grave mistakes may be made, involving hardship and injustice to the legitimate working woman. At present there are large numbers of women and girls whose circumstances are very urgent, who are out of employment, and for whom, apparently, no work can be found. Crowds of these women and girls come every day to the office of the Scottish Council for Women's Trades and are passed on by them to the Labour Exchange in the hope that the latter may be able to provide work for them.

"We have at present 165 girls and women in our emergency workrooms, and these we are passing out as rapidly as we can to permanent employment, but it is quite evident that, at the present at least, there are not enough jobs to go round. People are apt to be misled by the cry of a shortage of labour in certain trades. They forget that workers are capable of taking up only their own industry, and that a boom in the shirt-making trade is not of much use to the unemployed golf ball maker or confectionery worker.

"Women's employments have suffered more than any others from the competition of the partially supported or voluntary worker, and while I do not think it right to prevent any woman desirous of working from entering the labour market she must see to it that she does not do so under unfair conditions. The competition of workers of this class has almost invariably a tendency to lower wages, and therefore to make the struggle harder for the woman who has to depend on her own earnings for a livelihood.

THE WEST-END WOMEN.

"I question very much whether employers would regard seriously the proposal that West-End women of leisure should devote a few afternoons in the week to machining in an East-End clothing factory. It seems to me that the corollary to this proposal of putting women into their trades is compulsory military service for men."

Similar views were expressed by Mrs. John, hon. secretary of the Council's Emergency Workrooms Sub-Committee. "I, too, feel very strongly," she said, "on the point that women who are obliged to work must be given work before the voluntary workers are considered at all. It will be nothing short of a catastrophe if these leisured women are practically to take the bread out of the mouths of the workers, because we know that there are large numbers of unemployed women in Glasgow at present, and they must be seen to first. We are to take up a very firm stand upon that point.

"One point which appeals very strongly to me is that this is an opportunity to train so many of the young girls who have not hitherto had a chance of getting systematic training in machining and other branches of industry. We hope the leisured women, no matter how patriotic their feelings may be, will have the grace to take a back seat until their poor sisters are provided for."

Inquiry at Swansea Labour Exchange elicited that there was a great demand among women and girls for the preliminary forms for war work. This also applies to other parts of South Wales. The applications cover all classes of workers.

Women and girls are required chiefly for light armament work, clothing machinery, and farm work.

[illegible] applications for war service were received by the Central Labour Exchange of the Board of Trade yesterday morning. This brings the total up to over 12,000, exclusive of those sent in to the various metropolitan exchanges and the great provincial centres.

The applications made to 20 district exchanges of London up to Saturday make up a total of 1,447. Of these the largest contributors were Camberwell and Woolwich, with 282 and 217 respectively. The only other districts where the number of applications ran into three figures were Holloway (126) and Lewisham (112); the lowest, curiously enough, was Bermondsey, with only 10. The letters received yesterday direct came from all parts of the country, a large proportion of the volunteers being from agricultural districts. Yesterday also the Department was very busy with callers, the stream growing steadily in volume as the day advanced.

The offers of service were very varied, but the majority were remarkable less for precision than for the spirit of willingness. Many were ready to do "anything." A married woman informed the authorities that she had a small baby, but thought it "a pity to be kept at home by a trifle like that." She was willing "to work on a night shift," because, she said, "I could leave the baby with older childen." Quite a number of women between 50 and 60 years of age said they had not done work before, but would be only too glad to be of use.

WOMEN DRIVERS AND CONDUCTORS.

A younger and more numerous class appears to be much attracted by the idea of helping in the manufacture of munitions of war. Several young women stated that they could drive a motor-car and were anxious to be omnibus or taxicab drivers. Hitherto the Home Office and the police have absolutely refused to grant licences to women to drive motor vehicles plying for hire. At the garages of one large firm a qualified woman driver was informed that 300 taxis were lying idle because there were no men to drive them, and that the firm would very willingly employ women-drivers if the police would permit it.

In spite of statements to the contrary, it is well known that many women are competent to do all running repairs, such as a taxicab driver might be called upon to do. It is possible, however, that in the present circumstances they may waive their objection in the case of taxicabs.

Some women, again, have offered to act as tram-car conductors. The question of such employment for women was raised before Christmas by the Women's Social and Political Union, but the men's trade unions opposed it strongly, and the Government officials who were approached thought that public opinion would be hostile. Early in February the attention of the London County Council Tramways Department was directed to the matter, and the reply was given that "if special circumstances should arise the Council might consider it advisable to adopt your suggestion." There is now some prospect that the Council may consider that the special circumstances have arisen, and a representative of The Times was informed yesterday that some action would probably be taken in the course of the next fortnight.

So far the responses from employers have been few. The chairman of one great railway yesterday expressed a decided repugnance to seeing the sexes mingled at clerical work in railway offices and banking establishments, though he admitted that it was not an unusual sight in brokers' and other offices on the other side of the Atlantic.

There was an abnormal run yesterday on the Central Exchange at St. James's Park. Women of all ages, from girls in their teens to mature matrons—some of whom had children in their charge—presented the forms, duly filled in, and left fondly hoping that something might result. The work applied for varied. Several women wanted to handle, make, or pack ammunition. Three wished to become tramway-car conductors, and a very large proportion volunteered for farm or dairy work. One applicant gave the assurance that she had "perfect control over horses," could milk cows, and "look after a litter of pigs." Another offered to act as an orchestral conductor.

The applicants came from every part of the metropolis, including places as far out as Balham, Tooting, Harringay, and Clapton. Some already had husbands or brothers in the Army, and each and all indicated their anxiety to help their country in its hour of need.

"There is no ground for complaint concerning the readiness of women to help," said an official. "The marvel is the versatility they show and their adaptability for all kinds of work." From details of the applications he gave it appears that on Thursday, when the appeal was published, there were 700 applicants in London alone, by Friday morning's post 5000 letters of application arrived from women in all parts of the country, the number of women registered that day was 1270, and the first post yesterday brought 3000 more letters.

SAFEGUARDS DESIRED.

To the Editor of "The Standard."

Sir,—The Board of Trade having invited the co-operation of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies in carrying out the Government proposals for the organisation of women's work at this national crisis, the Executive Committee states that such organisation would be welcomed, and was indeed urged on the Government by the National Union at the beginning of the war. It was foreseen that such organisation would sooner or later be necessary, and now that the Government has realised the need the National Union has expressed its willingness to help in the following resolution:—

"The National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies welcomes a Government scheme for the organisation of women who are willing to take paid employment for war service, provided that the necessary safeguards are secured. The points which the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies particularly wishes to emphasise are:—

"1. The necessity of equal pay for equal work, thus avoiding the undercutting of men.

"2. The great importance of training.

"3. The securing of good conditions, as to housing, etc., specially in agriculture."—I am, Sir, yours truly,

MILLICENT GARRETT FAWCETT.

663

Lancashire Daily Post, March 23rd. 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

SINCE the beginning of this world-wide conflict the women of the country have shown themselves quite as anxious as the men to rally to the support of the nation, and it is not surprising, therefore, to find that thousands of them have already registered their names at the various Labour Exchanges in response to the Board of Trade's invitation as willing to undertake any suitable kind of work during the period of the war, thereby relieving men for duties of a sterner character. The applicants are reported to be from well-nigh every section of the community, a goodly number of them being wives or widows of officers and others being the daughters of professional men. Many wealthy women have offered their services, and the middle classes are strongly represented. Probably a proportion will be found unemployable, but there can be no reason to doubt the earnestness and sincerity of their motives, and the fact that there should be such a generous and prompt answer to the appeal is a further indication of the spirit which animates the nation in these strenuous days. Some of the women specify the nature of the work for which they think themselves adapted—gardening, motor and taxi driving, assisting in shops, and clerical work in banks and offices—but others are ready to fill any post for which they may be deemed fitted.

It may be that the applicants will ultimately be more numerous than the available positions. At all events, there has not been as yet on the part of employers any great eagerness to secure these substitutes for male workers. There are, of course, difficulties in the way that may not occur to those who have no intimate acquaintance with industrial and commercial matters. Some of these are connected with the question of wages. Prominent members of the suffrage societies, while cordially welcoming the action of the Government, are insisting that women whose services are accepted should be granted the same remuneration as the men whom they replace, and others are urging that they should be given not merely stopgap employment but permanent positions. Then the lack of training will handicap a great many willing applicants. However, it should be possible to make such arrangements as will overcome these and other obstacles, and if that is done the employment of women on an extended scale should go a long way towards solving the problem of the shortage of labour in certain industries. It should also help recruiting by setting free large numbers of men who can ill be spared under existing conditions, and it should facilitate the temporary transference of workers from occupations that women can fill to factories and engineering works where reinforcements are needed for the turning out of the munitions of war.

Daily News & Leader, March 23rd. 1915.

WOMEN'S OFFERS OF WAR SERVICE.

Applicants Range from 14 to over 60.

There has been a fine response on the part of the women of the country to the Government's appeal for war service which will release more men for the front. At the Central Labour Exchange alone over 10,000 women had sent in their names up to the first post yesterday, and judging by the letters received during the day and the throng of callers the total was probably 11,000 by closing time.

Official returns from over 300 branch exchanges are not yet to hand, but, including the names on the unemployment registers at the time the Government appeal was issued it is estimated that there are available a quarter of a million women for various kinds of employment.

One of the difficulties—that of the maintenance of women during the period of training—is in process of solution. We are now informed that the Board of Trade, in conjunction with the Board of Agriculture, have in hand a scheme to deal with the question, and that within the past week some women have begun work at the Agricultural Colleges.

A striking feature of the applications at the Central Labour Exchange is the large number of patriotic young women wishing to do "real war work" in connection with the manufacture of armaments. Others have specified for work as taxi-drivers, bus and tram conductors, and railway booking-clerks. Many married women, formerly shop assistants, have signified their willingness to return to their old callings if men can be released. Among the more novel applications were those of a lady who certified herself as a fully-trained wireless telegraphist, and of another who wished to take the place of a male orchestral conductor.

Many zealous women have asked for any kind of work that may be useful, but the Labour Exchanges prefer definite requests. The applicants, so far, range from fourteen to over sixty, numerous women of sixty and more having asked for clerical work.

A preliminary conference of trade union representatives was held at General Buildings, Aldwych, yesterday, but no statement was issued for publication.

Glasgow Herald, March 23rd. 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

The number of women applying at the Glasgow Labour Exchanges for registration as "war service" workers has been increasing daily since the appeal of the Board of Trade was issued last week. The number of applications yesterday far exceeded that of any of the previous three days during which the register had been open. This was due in large measure to the reference made to the scheme from the pulpits of nearly all the city churches on Sunday. Information of the proposed mobilisation of women for industrial work, with particulars as to the arrangements which have been made for registration, were given in the "intimations," while in many cases the ministers exhorted the members of their congregations to offer their services if they were free to do so. Many of those who applied yesterday stated that they were church members, while in the correspondence received a large number of the writers began by saying that they had heard of the scheme in church. The correspondence has been growing steadily in volume, and the officials at the exchanges are being kept very busy not only in registering those who are applying for "war service," but in sending out forms at the request of prospective volunteers. The officials intended originally to allow a week to run before they made up the returns of the number of women available, but registration has proceeded so successfully that in order to prepare the way for the next step which must be taken a statement showing the progress made is to be drawn up to-day.

Manchester Guardian, March 23rd. 1915.

Women and Government Labour.

The expectation that women would begin in earnest to-day to register under the new Government scheme has been fulfilled. In all parts of London the labour exchanges report that they have had a very busy day. Some say that the Government proposal has stimulated the ordinary applicants, encouraging a belief that there were plenty of openings in all industries, but by far the greater number of applications were from women who wanted to put themselves at the service of the Government. Scores of women have been of a class who had never before dreamed of becoming wage-earners, much less of seeking employment through a labour bureau. Their usual statement was that they were willing to do whatever the Government required, whether in office or factory. Many of the more leisured women were willing to train for dairy or farm work, and there were far more offers for agricultural work than had been expected in London, where the idea has not usually commended itself to women. Two women at a West End exchange, where there was a heavy rush all day, said they had some knowledge of wireless telegraphy, and would like to specialise in that. Another educated woman, for some unexplained reason, proposed to become assistant to a butcher. There were many applications for clerical or secretarial work, and the preference for employment in an ammunition factory was not so marked as on the first days, though a very large number of women were prepared to undertake it. The West End agencies comment on the number of elderly women who offered their services or applied for forms to be filled in. It was not easy by the end of the day to get details of the applications received, as the forms had not been classified, but one found that even in industrial districts where trade was brisk and there was no lack of employment the women were still anxious to serve the Government, though they had no ordered ideas about the sort of work they should do, and made the customary vague offer of "anything." In one exchange, the centre of a very poor district, 100 of these women had come forward, and one admirable soul, the mother of a family ranging in age from 11 to 17 years, suggested that she should take them all with her to the country when she went to do field or dairy work. Many married women were among the applicants, and a large proportion of them were the wives of soldiers or sailors eager to help the Government too, but a little afraid that if they received Government wages they might lose their husbands' allowances. As far as one can judge, there is not the least reason for this fear.

Morning Post, Mar. 23rd. 1915.

WOMEN'S WORK AND WAGES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING POST.

SIR,—I regretted to see in Mrs. Fawcett's letter about Women's War Service in to-day's paper the revival of a mischievous fallacy which may cause unnecessary heart-burning and discontent. Mrs. Fawcett asks for the "necessity of equal pay for equal work." The worth of a workman is not only the worth of his work. This is specially the case in agricultural work. This makes it a matter not only of public policy but of necessity that men as men should be paid higher for agricultural and for some other classes of work. They are worth more. It is not only for their weekly work the men are paid, but for their reserve of power and for their capability of working extra hours, all night if required. The women who are now doing the work of the men who have gone to the front are not from the point of view as workmen worth as much to the country, because in no emergency could they as a body take the place of the men in the firing line.

Women's work ought to be well and adequately paid; but it is no patriotism to ask that, where they are only filling the places of the absent men, they should expect the same wages when their worth from their physical disability is not the same.—Yours, &c.,

THEODORA PARKER.

92, Campden Hill-road, Kensington, March 22.

Morning Post,
March 23rd, 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

LARGE RESPONSE TO GOVERNMENT APPEAL.

There can be no doubt as to the whole-hearted manner in which the women are responding to the Government's appeal to register themselves for war service. It is early as yet to speak of the ultimate results of the appeal, but an official at the Central Labour Exchange at Westminster stated yesterday that the appeal had fulfilled the most sanguine expectations. "It was only on Thursday morning," he said, "that the appeal was published, and upon that day alone seven hundred women registered themselves throughout London, while Friday morning's post brought no less than 5,000 letters to this office from women in all parts of the country asking for registration forms and expressing their willingness to be of service. On Friday the number of registrations rose to 1,270. This (Monday) morning the first post alone brought 3,000 letters, and the figures for the whole country must be very much greater. There are women of all classes, and they are offering their services for almost every variety of work. Among those who registered on Saturday were women who offered themselves as 'bus conductors, motor drivers, and lift attendants, while one lady is willing to take the place of a male orchestral conductor volunteering for military service.

"We do not want it to be thought that we can find work for all the people who register. The idea is to obtain an index of the available labour so that one can put one's hand on them when they are wanted. As regards the motive behind the responses, it is my impression that the vast majority are coming forward solely because they desire to be of service to their country. There is another matter, however, and that is that we do not want for an instant to suggest that because this appeal is being made we want anybody to accept wages which are lower than those of the ordinary industrial standard. That should be made perfectly clear."

The London Society for Women's Suffrage has had a bureau open at their headquarters at 58, Victoria-street, ever since the beginning of the war, during which time some 2,000 applications—mostly for voluntary work—have been enrolled and posts found for nearly all applicants. The machinery for this department can now be used in furthering the registration for war service demanded by the Board of Trade. The Society considers that by opening its offices for the registration of women workers of the middle-class they may be of service to the Government and further the enrolling of the middle class and educated women, who are less likely than their industrial sisters to seek information and advice at the Labour Exchanges.

The Yorkshire Observer,
March 23rd. 1915.

Women's Work.

It will not be possible for some days to estimate the practical value of the offers made by women to the Labour Exchanges in answer to the Government's recent appeal. In London the offers are numerous enough—they amount to 8,000 so far—and the question is only how far it will be to the public advantage to accept them. It is at once a pleasant circumstance, and yet a doubtful advantage, that in London most of these offers should come from the well-to-do people. Clerical work, shop work, some transport work are asked for by a large proportion of the applicants, and doubtless a certain amount of room could be found for them in these directions. In the case of many kinds of employment, however, the Labour Exchanges hope to bring back to work women who have for one reason or another—marriage is very frequently the cause—given up external employment. This is particularly so in the case of farming, and there are unfortunately difficulties in the way of attracting competent women back to the land. The grant of separation allowances and the possibility of making money by billeting soldiers both diminish the inducement to women to do agricultural work. An even greater difficulty is the slowness of the agricultural community to accept Labour Exchanges, though I understand that it is proposed to use the new county committees to organise women's labour through a more direct and personal appeal than the Labour Exchanges can themselves contrive.

Hull Daily Mail,
March 23rd. 1915.

AN INNOVATION.

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

REGISTERING AT HULL.

"Are you able to work and free to work but not working?" This is the question that is being addressed by the Government to women. Should the answer be in the negative, women are asked to have their names entered at once on the special register of women for war service, which is being prepared by the Government Labour Exchanges. The Board of Trade in their notice just issued state:—"Women are wanted at once to work in the following, among other occupations:—Farm work, brush-making, dairy work, clothing machinery, leather stitching, light machining for armament. But even if you have no special experience of many of this work, you should register. It may be possible to train you. It is certain that as more men join the forces more women will be wanted to work while they are away. Even if you can work only half of each day you may be useful." Women can register either by going to a Labour Exchange, or by filling up a register form which can be posted, in the cas eof Hull, at the Labour Bureau, in Prospect-street.

The "Mail" called at the local bureau to ascertain how Hull women were regarding the scheme, and learned from Miss Burwell, who has had this department added to her other duties, that quite an appreciable number of women were coming forward in Hull. In fact, there were 50 yesterday. The idea of the Government is to compile a census of the women who would be able to work should the necessity arise, said Miss Burwell, "but the signing of the form does not bind an applicant to accept any work."

THE OBJECTS.

The object of the registration is to find out what reserve forces of women labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required. As from time to time employment presents itself notice will be given through the Labour Echanges with full details as to the nature of the work, the conditions,and pay. As far as special training is necessary arrangement will if possible be made for the purpose. The hours for registration at Hull are from 2 to 4 o'clock in the afternoon, except on Saturdays, when the hourse are from 10 to 12 o'clock. If more convenien, forms can be obtained and returned by post. Amongst the particulars women are asked to furnish are:

Are you married, single, or widow?

Have you ever done any paid work, and if so, what?

If so, when? Giving date or nearly as possible, what kind, employer's name or names.

Are you free to work:—Whole time, part time, to leave your home for work if pay is sufficient and housing satisfactory?

Is there any other work which you are willing and able to do?

If you have never done paid work, what kinds of work are you best suited for?

In regard to women labour generally is it difficult to meet the demand.

Manchester Courier
March 23rd. 1915.

Women Answer to the Call

A gratifying response has been made to the Government's appeal for women labour volunteers. So far as London is concerned, at any rate, the scheme promises to prove an unqualified success, judging by the number of applications that have been made at the labour exchanges. It is understood that already more than 15,000 names have been put down for registration, and in addition there have been many hundreds of personal inquiries. The applicants are representative of all sections of the community, numbers of them being women of the wealthy and leisured class, actuated solely by patriotic motives, and all are anxious to do something for the good of the country. To-day the crowd of women besieging the headquarters of the exchange at Queen Anne's Chambers, Westminster, was denser than ever.

Quite a large proportion of them were smartly gowned and shod, and not all of them by any means were attracted solely by the desire to secure "something light" at a substantial salary. No illusions were harboured as to the kind of workers chiefly wanted to facilitate this great work of mobilisation. Many of the women obviously in comfortable circumstances are ready to tackle anything, from working on armaments to light machinery in the cloth factories, and quite a number are prepared to take up dairy work, poultry rearing, or other employment on the farms. It will necessarily be some time before the results of the scheme are known and made public, but signs are not wanting already which point to its success.

663

Yorkshire Observer,
March 23rd. 1915.

WAR SERVICE BY WOMEN.

LARGE NUMBER OF APPLICANTS FOR REGISTRATION.

There can be no doubt as to the whole-hearted manner in which the women are responding to the Government's appeal to register themselves for war service. It is early as yet to speak of the ultimate result, but an official at the Central Labour Exchange in London stated yesterday that on Thursday last, on the morning of which the appeal was published, 700 women registered themselves throughout London, while Friday morning's post brought no fewer than 5,000 letters from women in all parts of the country asking for registration forms and expressing their willingness to be of service. Yesterday morning the first post brought 3,000 letters.

"There are," said the official, "women of all classes, and they are offering their services for almost every variety of work Among those who registered themselves on Saturday were several who offered themselves as 'bus conductors, for motor driving, and as lift attendants, while one lady is willing to take the place of a male orchestral conductor volunteering for military service. We do not want it to be thought that we can find work for all the people who register. The idea is to obtain an index of the available labour so that one can put one's hand on them when they are wanted. As regards the motive behind the responses, it is my impression that the vast majority are coming forward solely because they desire to be of service to their country. There is another matter, however, and that is that we do not want for an instant to suggest that because this appeal is being made we want anybody to accept wages which are lower than those of the ordinary industrial standard. That should be made perfectly clear."

Inquiry at the Swansea Labour Exchange yesterday afternoon elicited that there was a great demand amongst women and girls for preliminary forms for war work. This also applies to other parts of South Wales.

A meeting of some of the leaders of the women's political and industrial organisations was held yesterday at the offices of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trades Union Congress in London for the purpose of discussing the Government's proposals for employing women in the manufacture of war munitions, &c. Among those present were Miss Mary Macarthur, Miss Sylvia Pankhurst, Miss Susan Lawrence, Mr. George Lansbury, and Mr. John Scurr. The meeting was informal, and at the close Mr. Lansbury stated that there was nothing whatever to report.

Nottingham Express,
March 23rd 1915.

WORK FOR WOMEN.

How Nottingham's Gentle Sex Can Play Their Part in War.

AN AID TO ENLISTMENT.

The Nottingham Labour Exchange has received instructions from the Board of Trade to take steps to obtain particulars of women in the city who are prepared, if needs be, to take employment—industrial, agricultural, or clerical—in order to fill the positions made vacant by men enlisting.

In certain important occupations (the Board of Trade circular points out), there are already too few men and women to do the work, and this shortage, it is stated, will certainly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting forces. Women prepared to undertake work may register their names at the Labour Exchange, the object being to find out what reserve force of female labour, trained or untrained, can be made available, if required. As from time to time, actual openings for employment present themselves, notice will be given through the Labour Exchanges, with full details as to the nature of work, conditions and pay, and, so far as special training is necessary, arrangements will, if possible, be made for the purpose. Any woman who, by working, helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service. Every woman, therefore, should register, who is able and willing to take employment.

Except in the lace trade, there is no considerable unemployment in Nottingham. There is still a shortage of workers in the engineering trades, and in the building trade work is much more plentiful than was anticipated. House painters, especially, have plenty to do, which seems to indicate that people are making no great economies in this direction.

Manchester Guardian, March 24th. 1915.

663/4

663

MANCHESTER AND THE WAR.

WOMEN'S WORK: THE NEW REGISTER.

EARLIER CLOSING: NO MOVE FROM THE TRADE.

Between 600 and 700 women in the district of Manchester have signified to the Labour Exchange their willingness to accept work during the war in accordance with the scheme which is designed to set men free to enlist. The majority of the applicants are said to be drawn from the middle class, and comparatively few desire to engage in manual labour, the greater number, apparently, having clerical work in view. There are some, however, who are willing to drive motor-cars and do the more masculine kinds of work.

The statement that an agreement has been virtually arrived at among licensed traders in Manchester and Salford to take voluntary steps to shorten the hours of sale in public-houses is not accurate. At a meeting of the Central Board of Licensed Retailers, held yesterday, it was said that there is no likelihood of the trade's making such a proposal.

Well over 100 men were enlisted in Manchester yesterday, 60 more being taken to the "City" Battalions. At a meeting of the Cheshire Congregational Union it was said that 1,200 men from Congregational churches of Cheshire have joined the colours.

Operatives in the clothing trade are complaining of the great variations in piece rates paid by contractors for the making of khaki tunics and trousers. The variations are said to be as great as from 1s. 10d. to 1s. 3d., and from 6s. to 4s. for the same work. The manufacturers, on the other hand, are said to be paying at a flat rate for their material, and to be receiving flat rates from the Government. Most of the makers-up concerned are women.

THE BELGIAN SOLDIERS' COMFORTS FUND.

We have received the following further contributions to the Belgian Soldiers' Comforts Fund, whose headquarters is at Cambridge, and whose object is to provide Belgian women in this country with the means to make the comforts their army needs. To this end it ha established workrooms up and down th country, several in the Manchester distric It is still urgently in need of funds, and w shall be pleased to acknowledge and forwa contributions, which should be addressed the fund, care of "Manchester Guardia Office, 3, Cross Street, Manchester:—

	£	s.	d.
Already acknowledged	609
A Portion of the British Staff, Fabrica da Boa Vista, Oporto	5	1	9
Edward Whitehead, Failsworth	3
"Lancashire Woman"	1
	£617

THE WOMEN'S REGIST

EARLY VISITORS AT LABOUR EXCHANGES

600 OR 700 APPLICANTS.

Since the announcement was made that a women's register for war service was to be opened some hundreds of women have come forward in the Manchester district, and the officials of the Labour Exchanges have found their work very much increased during the past two days.

On Tuesday the crush was so great at the exchange for women in Queen Street that forms had to be distributed to about two hund plicants from whom there was not t obtain verbally the details necessary fo tration. Yesterday the pressure was l but no doubt the clerical work will be in arrears in a day or two when the filled i are returned. It is not possible to obt some figures officially, but judging fro

WOMEN READY TO TAKE THE PLACES OF MEN.

At the Lancaster Labour Bureau women are showing a remarkable willingness in offering their services in order to liberate men for the forces. "The patriotic spirit has been fine," said the woman manager of the Bureau. "Women occupying good positions have signified their willingness to do any sort of duty that will relieve a man for the service of his country. The response of the women of Lancaster really makes one proud of Lancaster."

Nottingham Guardian, March 24th. 1915.

There has not been much response in Nottingham, as yet to the appeal made some days ago by the Board of Trade for women to take the place of men in civil employment, in order that the men may fight. In London and some other places the response has been large, but in this city the number of volunteers has thus far been small. We believe, however, that a public meeting will be called to discuss the subject shortly, and that the assistance of representative organisations will be enlisted if possible to push the movement forward. The idea here is not merely to find employment for women who are out of work, of whom there are plenty, but to find women who by giving their services can release men. Plenty of work is now being done by men which could easily be done by women, but the movement only applies to men of military age who are willing to enlist, so that there is nothing of a very extensive character to be done at present. In Germany, where practically the entire male population is being forced into the army, women are employed instead of men in all directions. In this country we have not reached this pass as yet. There will, however, be a very large demand for labour on the land as the summer advances, and much of the work could easily be done by women. In France women gathered in nearly the whole of last year's harvest, and they have planted the seed for the harvest that is coming. And in due course they will again gather in the corn and other produce. French agriculture would have been temporarily ruined had it not been for the women, and what French women have done British women may do if they like."

The Irish Times, March 24th. 1915.

663

Women and the War.

The appeal of the Government for women who are prepared to do paid work during the war has already met with an excellent response. Official figures for the whole country have not been issued, but it is known that more than twelve thousand applications have been received at the Central Labour Exchange in London alone. The offers of service are coming from all sorts of sources. Many of the applicants have no particular training and no definite idea of what they want to do, but others have volunteered for special work for which they consider themselves fitted. A large number, for instance, wish to drive motor cars, and there is no doubt that some of them are perfectly well qualified to take charge of delivery vans or taxi-cabs. With regard to the latter, there are at present difficulties about obtaining licences for women, but these may be overcome. Other applicants, many of them the wives of soldiers, wish to work in ammunition factories, where they can feel that they are directly helping the men at the front. The main point is, however, that there is a large number of women of both the middle and the lower classes who are willing to help to carry on the business of the country in every way of which they are capable. We hope that their services may be utilised. Up to the present, comparatively few applications have been received from employers, partly, no doubt, because vacancies which must be filled only occur one by one. In some quarters a repugnance is felt to the idea of men and women working together, but we are convinced that this feeling, whether it be justified or not in ordinary times, should not be allowed to interfere with the conduct of business during the war. There is no doubt that many opportunities for women exist. A large number might, for instance, be employed on the land; although this kind of work is arduous, we see no reason why women should not do the lighter forms of agricultural work at a time when men must endure the hardships of the trenches. In a higher rank of life there must be many vacancies for women of the middle classes as clerks, where the younger men in any office have volunteered for the front. In this connection one point has arisen to which we think that serious attention should be given. In many departments of the Civil Service young men are employed who are willing, often even eager, to join the Army, but are forbidden on the ground that further depletion of the staffs would seriously impair the efficiency of the departments in question. Could not the places of many of these men be taken by women? Sometimes the work is of a highly specialised kind, but in other cases, we believe, it could be done with reasonable efficiency by any educated and intelligent person of either sex. The appointment of women would, of course, be purely temporary. This appears to be a matter in which the Government should set a good example to private employers. The exigencies of warfare also call for the services of another special class of women workers. There is at present a demand for more qualified nurses for Army service both at home and abroad. It is, indeed, only too clear that they will be needed in greatly increased numbers when, with the advent of spring, we are fighting fiercely with far larger numbers of men than ever before. The call is chiefly for fully trained nurses, but it is probable that there will also be openings for two or three thousand carefully selected women who have been trained in home nursing and first aid. We have no doubt at all that there will be more applicants than are required to fill these posts.

forward in the Manchester district, and the officials of the Labour Exchanges have found their work very much increased during the past two days.

On Tuesday the crush was so great at the exchange for women in Queen Street that forms had to be distributed to about two hundr[ed] plicants from whom there was not t[ime] obtain verbally the details necessary fo[r] tration. Yesterday the pressure was r[elieved] but no doubt the clerical work will be in[tense] again in a day or two when the filled-in [forms] are returned. It is not possible to obt[ain] finite figures officially, but judging fro[m the] number who have applied personally [at the] Exchange, and allowing for the forms [which] have been sent out, it is probable that so [many] or seven hundred women in the Mancheste[r] trict have manifested a keen desire to he[lp] any way they can.

A considerable number of letters have b[een] received from women living in towns n[ear] Manchester, and some have written from pla[ces] as far away as Macclesfield. They have re[ad] about the scheme in the Manchester papers, a[nd] appear to think that registration is taking pla[ce] at the Manchester labour exchanges only, an[d] it is well therefore to point out that applican[ts] should register at the exchange which is mos[t] convenient for them. In the majority of case[s] this will be in their own town.

Few Manual Workers.

A full analysis of the registrations cannot be expected for some time yet, but it was evident from the appearance of the women who visited Queen Street on Monday and yesterday that the majority are drawn from the middle class. A certain number of women who were in industrial employment before marriage have offered their services, but they form a small proportion. This explains the fact that comparatively few of the applicants express a desire to engage in manual labour. The greater number have in view the possibility of taking the places of men who are doing clerical work.

Some of the middle-class applicants, however, are not afraid of the prospect of hard physical labour. One woman graduate who has had experience as a teacher has also learned to drive a motor-car, and she is willing to take charge of a car and do small repairing work. If this aspiration is not realised she intimates that she will accept agricultural or horticultural work with equal pleasure. Others have offered their services as chauffeurs, and machining in clothing factories is also a favoured employment, while some of the women suggest that they would be useful as railway carriage cleaners—in which capacity, it is stated, a few have already been engaged privately by the Great Central Company—and cleaners as well as conductors of tramcars. But a far greater number of applications is desired from women who are willing to undertake or to train for leather work, light machining for armaments, clothing machining, brush work, and farm work.

Many of the women who have registered were disappointed to find that under the scheme employment cannot be found for them immediately. They have failed to understand that the registration is, in the first place, a means of ascertaining the total amount of the reserve of women workers available, and that the utilisation of the supply will have to be organised later on. In some of these cases the desire to earn money to supplement moderately good incomes seemed to be stronger than the patriotic motive.

The Appeal to Leisured Women.

In the week or ten days from now it will be known what the response to the Board of Trade appeal is likely to be in Manchester. Although it has been big enough already to overwhelm of men than ever before. The call is chiefly for fully trained nurses, but it is probable that there will also be openings for two or three thousand carefully selected women who have been trained in home nursing and first aid. We have no doubt at all that there will be more applicants than are required to fill these posts.

The Times,
March 24th. 1915.

WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE.

WORK IN ARMAMENT FACTORIES.

ENGINEERING EMPLOYMENT.

Already there has been a gratifying response from Scotland to the appeal of the Board of Trade for women workers to take the place of men released for active service. Although the figures are not yet available, the officials of the Labour Exchanges in Glasgow report that a large number of women have already registered, and that a considerable number of applications for registration forms has also been received.

When the Parliamentary recruiting circular was distributed in the north thousands of women householders offered their services to the nation in any capacity, and the present appeal gives them the opportunity they then asked for. Many of the applicants are working women who are out of employment, but a large proportion belong to the leisured and middle classes.

It is anticipated that work can be found almost immediately for fully a thousand women in the engineering and armament factories in the Clyde district. Already one or two firms have experimented with female labour, principally in the manufacture of shells and other explosives, and the women have shown remarkable aptitude for picking up the work.

Several other armament and engineering firms have informed Labour Exchanges that they are prepared to engage a considerable number of women, and steps are being taken to ascertain the views of other employers. The work which the women volunteers will be asked to undertake will be the operating of turning lathes or other light machines which require little or no technical knowledge.

The question of the employment of women tramway-car conductors has again arisen in Glasgow. When a similar proposal was made in Edinburgh a few weeks ago it was dropped because of the opposition of the male employees. The problem of filling the places of men who have enlisted has become so acute with the Glasgow Corporation Tramways, however, that the proposal has been revived, and in order to avoid trouble with the men it is suggested that the women should be engaged on the same terms and conditions as the men. So far no decision has been arrived at, but the matter is now under the consideration of the Tramways Committee.

OFFERS OF TRAINING.

EMPLOYERS AND WOMEN'S WAR WORK.

Since it has become clear that a new industrial army of women is coming forward to enrol for war service the Central Labour Exchange are beginning to receive offers to train them. An offer to place a large training farm at their disposal was received yesterday in London, and there were similar proposals from various institutions and organizations, as well as inquiries from individual employers.

Applications for registration continue to pour in steadily. Returns have not yet been received from the Exchanges throughout the country, although many women residing in the country have written to the central office direct, but it is hoped that this information showing how the movement has spread will be available shortly. The women's societies generally have shown a disposition to cooperate in the most patriotic spirit.

The work of enlisting the help of employers is gradually taking definite shape. The recruiting department of the War Office have been impressed with the growing magnitude of the women's movement and the spirit which is being shown by them, and will use it as a means of showing employers that they need have no serious misgivings about labour if they release numbers of their young men.

Daily Chronicle,
March 24th. 1915.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

WHERE THEY MIGHT REPLACE MEN.

LADY ABERCONWAY BLAMES TRADE UNION RULES.

"There are many ways in which women could set men free for active service," said Lady Aberconway to a "Daily Chronicle" representative. "All the higher branches of employment have been reserved for men, and women have been relegated to lower grades, or kept out altogether by trade union rules."

Lady Aberconway believes that if these rules were relaxed women could be of the greatest possible use to the Government.

"There are many machines," she declared, "that are worked by men only which women could use with very little instruction. I have been round many factories—earthenware, hosiery, lace, and others—where I was greatly distressed to hear of the low wages paid to women in comparison with the wages paid to men.

"In one factory the manager pointed out a little girl who was busy picking up stitches. 'There is no an in my establishment who can do the work so well,' he said. I asked what she was earning. 'Five shillings a week,' he replied.

"In another factory I saw a woman fetching and carrying for a man who was working at a small machine. He was earning £3 per week; she was earning 10s. 'Could she not learn to work the machine as well as the man?' I inquired. 'Of course she could,' he answered, 'but she is not allowed to do so—it's against trade union rules.'

"This spirit," Lady Aberconway said emphatically, "runs through all our manufacture, and if only they were free, women could greatly increase their output of useful work. I suggest that the Government should give living wages to women while they are learning new industries. There are hundreds of women used to iron and brass work, who would soon be able to assist in producing war material.

"Then women ought to replace men in shops. Business in retail shops is by no means as flourishing as it was; yet there are still hundreds of young men behind counters doing little or nothing. If men in the lighter trades were replaced by women the number of available soldiers would be greatly increased.

"The same applies to lift attendants, ticket collectors, omnibus conductors, booking clerks and in a certain measure to motor drivers. The Women's Emergency Corps had many skilled women motor drivers at their disposal who have been refused licenses. Waiters in restaurants ought to be chiefly women.

"Thousands of women having independent incomes would gladly undertake such services in order to set men free, and they would be able (unlike the self-supporting workers), to relinquish these posts when men came back from the war. If the Government will only trust women with responsible positions, and allow them to engage in the higher branches of skilled work, I believe they could render great service to the country in its hour of trial."

663/50 663

Yorkshire Post,
March 24th. 1915.

THE WOMEN'S WAR-SERVICE REGISTER IN LEEDS.

A POPULAR MOVEMENT.

In Leeds the women's war-service register is being compiled at the bureau in Great George Street, near the Town Hall. Little knots of women stand outside all hours of the day discussing the new movement with applicants who come and go, and the constant stream of these applicants is a further proof that the idea has already "caught on" immensely. Inside, the staff of women clerks has almost more than it can do at times to cope with the rush, inclined as it is to come in waves. Up to the present about 500 women have registered, and the number is still piling up.

The most striking thing about the movement is the eagerness of the women themselves. Of course, they expect some return for their services, but with the majority money is not the main consideration. It is a sense of patriotism that animates them—the feeling that, be it in ever so small a way, they can perhaps help. Many of them are soldiers' wives, the younger ones who have no family to look after, and who, having sent their men to the front, now bravely determine to fit themselves with a reorganised system, if only as a foil to their own loneliness. Others again are middle-aged women whose families have grown up, and who may now be spared from home. In their younger days many of them were clerks or secretaries, and are now, with a little instruction, quite capable of doing book-keeping and clerical work. For the most part, however, these belong to the pre-typewriting days, and would, therefore, be at a disadvantage if this were an ordinary employment agency. Some of the applicants, again, are ex-teachers. Charwomen have been badly hit by the war, and amongst the applicants are many who think they could be of use, say, in cleaning railway carriages.

Farm-work, dairy-work, leather stitching, brush making, clothing machining and light machining for armament are amongst the occupations for which women are asked to offer themselves. It is hardly to be expected that in a city like Leeds there would be many applications for field work. Much more inviting is the prospect of taking a hand in dairy work, and about a dozen have registered for this branch of service. It is necessary that they should be young—the age limit is from 18 to 25—and active work will be preceded by a short course of instruction at the Garforth Farm. Quite a number have applied to do machining in the clothing factories, and some have an idea of being tram-conductors and motor drivers. Where instruction is necessary, it will be provided in due course, and if the idea works out on the scale that is promised it should free many men for military service, besides temporarily filling the gaps left by those who have already gone. "Any woman," says the Board of Trade, "who by working helps to release a man or equip a man for fighting does national war service. Every woman who can work, and is free to work, should come forward." It is remarkable that 75 per cent. of the women applying in Leeds have volunteered for whole-time work. Of course, the movement is still very young, and the energies of the organisers are being directed to getting the register complete to start with. Then it will be possible to gauge the proportions of the problem that has to be dealt with, and to take steps for distributing the labour, and providing instruction. Up to the present, the applicants are mostly working women. Motor-driving is an occupation that should appeal to the more leisured who have time on their hands, and who want to be useful.

663/51 663.

The Glasgow Record
March 26th 1918.

WOMEN AS WAR WORKERS.

GLASGOW RESPONSE TO APPEAL.

ALL CLASSES REGISTER.

At the Glasgow Labour Exchanges applications are still pouring in from women who are anxious to register themselves as willing to undertake work which will release men for active service or to fill up gaps caused by those men who have already enlisted.

If the experience of Glasgow holds good throughout the country, a very large number of women workers should soon be mobilised, and the result should be seen in the accession to the ranks of the army of men who were ready to enlist, but who were prevented from doing so because they were engaged at home upon work which was essential to the successful prosecution of the war.

The women who are applying for registration belong not only to the working classes, but also to the middle and well-to-do classes. They are volunteering in no frivolous mood. It has been made clear to them that they may be required to engage in hard and monotonous work, and the fact that they are coming forward in such large numbers is a tribute to the patriotism of the women of the West of Scotland.

Many of them have never before been engaged in any work other than the supervision of domestic affairs, but they declare their readiness to undergo training for any branch of service that may be of advantage to the country.

TAKING PRACTICAL STEPS.

The classification of the applicants and their allocation to the various establishments in which they will ultimately be engaged will involve a considerable amount of work, but it will be undertaken without any unnecessary delay. The co-operation of employers, of course, is absolutely necessary for the success of the scheme, and steps are being taken to ascertain how many women they will be able to employ.

As was indicated in yesterday's "Daily Record," several engineering employers and armament firms have indicated their willingness to engage female employees, and it is believed that in this branch of industry alone fully 1000 women could be employed almost immediately. These establishments require additional labour, not only to make good the losses caused by the large numbers of their employees enlisting, but also to ensure as far as possible the production of munitions of war, which are so urgently required.

Women can undertake with perfect safety almost all the processes involved in the manufacture of shrapnel shells, as well as the heavier shells fired by the howitzers, and with staffs increased by the introduction of female labour the supply of these very necessary war supplies should be materially increased.

In addition large numbers of women could be employed in chemical work, as machinists in clothing and shirt factories engaged on Government contracts, and in other branches of industry. Women can be employed either as part time or full time workers, so that their scope of service is almost unlimited.

Nottingham Guardian,
March 26th. 1918.

WOMEN WAR WORKERS.

NOTTINGHAM COMING INTO LINE.

Reference was made in yesterday's Guardian to the very large response which has been forthcoming in London to the Government's appeal to women to register themselves for war service.

The appeal is contained in a Board of Trade circular, which is being circulated throughout the country by means of the Labour Exchanges and other channels. So far, it has become more widely known in the Metropolis than in the provincial centres generally, and in Nottingham itself, the women who have registered, up to the present, number barely 100. Nor have those who have intimated their willingness to be called upon given any indication—as some have done in London—of any special form of employment for which they may chance to be qualified, or which they would prefer.

There are hopes, however, that when the need and nature of the call are more universally recognised, Nottingham, and the other towns and townships and villages in this district will be found to contain large numbers of women willing to answer, for, as the circular itself observes, "Any woman, who, by working, helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting, does national war service."

The object of the movement is best explained, perhaps, by quotations from the Board of Trade circular, wherein the President points out that "if the full fighting power of the nation is to be put forth on the field of battle, the full working power of the nation must be made available to carry on its essential trades at home."

Already, in certain important occupations, there are not enough men and women to do the work, and the Government are desirous of obtaining particulars of the women available, with or without previous training, for paid employment. All, therefore, who are prepared, if needed, to take employment—industrial, agricultural, clerical, &c.—are invited to enter themselves upon the Register of Women for War Service, which is being prepared by the Labour Exchanges.

"The object of registration is to find out what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available. As, from time to time, actual openings for employment present themselves, notice will be given through the Labour Exchanges, with full details, as to the nature of work, conditions, and pay, and, so far as special training is necessary, arrangements will, if possible, be made for the purpose."

An effort is to be made locally to secure the co-operation and advice of the civic authorities, and of representative men and women concerned with all branches and all grades of industry.

The Labour Leader,
March 25th. 1918.

Mobilising Women Workers. The Board of Trade has invited women who are prepared to fill the places of men who have enlisted, or may enlist, to register at the Labour Exchanges. For our part we do not share the objections of certain old-fashioned Trade Unionists to the employment of women. Wherever the work is suitable for women (and in deciding what work is suitable they should have some voice) we claim for them equal opportunity with men. But there are very grave dangers involved in the sudden flooding of the labour market with women. What wages are the women to be paid? Is the usual custom of paying them only 50 or 75 per cent. of what is paid to men to be practised? If so, the whole standard of wages will be lowered, and against that we must carefully guard. And what precautions are to be taken against overwork and bad conditions? If the Government invites women to enter the industrial world, it ought to guarantee a minimum living wage, at least, and healthy employment. In dealing with the position of workers engaged in the armaments' industry, Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Runciman consulted the men's Trade Union officials. We suggest that in this case the Government should confer with the officials of the Women's [illegible] be, or should seem to be, a large organisation, large organisations, as often as not, are slow, proud and lethargic, their energy smothered

Glasgow Herald,
March 26th. 1918.

OVER 2000 WOMEN WORKERS.

WAR SERVICE REGISTRATION IN GLASGOW.

The returns of the number of women who have registered at the labour exchanges in Glasgow for industrial work under the "war service" scheme promoted by the Board of Trade show that up till Monday night the total was over 2000. That represents, it may be said, only three days' enrolments, because practically all the applicants accounted for in the returns were registered on Thursday and Friday of last week and Monday of this week.

The registration is still proceeding briskly, and a large number of the forms which have been distributed among prospective applicants have yet to come in. There should be, it is estimated, at least another 2000 applications before the local register is completed. The problem of placing the women in employments is one which will be considered in the first instance by the Board of Trade, but it is expected that the local labour exchanges will be authorised to approach the employers in their respective districts with a view to ascertaining how far the local supply may be absorbed by local industries. Already a number of employers in the Glasgow area have intimated that they will take female labour, and as the demand for increased war munitions has to be met it is believed that many more inquiries for women workers will be received. A large armament firm in the city have applied for 300 women, and this number will be but the nucleus of a much larger staff, if the experiment is successful.

A few complaints have been received that the Board of Trade's scheme is having a somewhat disturbing effect on certain works in which women are already employed. The workers in these factories, it is said, have been tempted to offer themselves for employment under the new scheme. This is regarded as an unfortunate development, and the labour exchange officials emphasise that only women who are not engaged in industrial work at present are asked to register. Women who leave employment in the hope of finding another situation through the new register will be in danger of being disappointed, as strict investigation will be made regarding their previous service. While this is the case, those women who have had previous experience of industrial work and who are now out of employment will receive the first chance of work offered by employers under the Board of Trade scheme. They will be selected in preference to applicants who have not been at work hitherto and whose circumstances make it unnecessary for them to enter paid employment for the livelihood it will afford.

KIRKCALDY APPLICATIONS.

Kirkcaldy Labour Exchange has made a most encouraging commencement in connection with the enrolment of women willing to render war service. The first appeal was made from local pulpits on Sunday, and about 50 women have put in applications. A feature of the response has been the number of women of the leisured class who have offered their services.

Daily Dispatch.
March 28th. 1918.

Government and Women Workers.

The appeal of the Government for women to register their readiness to perform the work of men of military age and eligibility has been so successful that a new problem has been occupying the attention of the Cabinet. It is that of absorbing the new force of labour into the industrial life of the country without unnecessary delay. The army of women workers is already many thousands strong, and additional numbers are registering each day at the Labour Exchanges. In fact, the Board of Trade has never before had such a vast supply of women's labour to offer through its exchanges.

The next step in the Government campaign, I understand, is to be an appeal to employers to avail themselves immediately of the new labour and thus release men for active service in the least possible space of time. Employers are to be encouraged by the Government in every way to avail themselves of women's labour.

663/52 663

The New Witness,
March 25th. 1915.

THE WOMEN'S "MOBILISATION"

LAST week, following the announcement that women were to be "mobilised" for "War work," there appeared in the Press two remarkable statements, not directly connected, but which, read together, are, as I think, of a strangely disquieting character. The first of these was an amazing pronouncement by Miss Courtney, who, speaking on behalf of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, urged that women, not men, should act as shop assistants and waiters. There was no reason, she argued, why they should not make these occupations their own. There is in point of fact (as I shall presently show) the very gravest reason why they should do nothing of the sort. But let us note that Miss Courtney urges this step, not as a contribution on the part of her sex to the exigencies of the situation, but as something eminently desirable per se. Obviously, the employment of ten thousand, or a hundred thousand young women in selling ribbons, or distributing chops and cups of tea, is not in the least likely to add one single shell, or one single cartridge to our store of ammunition; nor, for the matter of that, to send one single man to the firing-line. It is because Miss Courtney thinks it a good thing for women that they should be waitresses and shop-assistants that she advocates the change—a change that cannot possibly contribute to our national efficiency, nor help us in the present crisis. So much for statement No. 1. Now let us consider the other item. It relates that there was an enthusiastic rush of women to the Labour Exchanges in a town "up North." Some few days ago about one hundred—note the stupendous total—were actually engaged by a firm employing several thousands of hands, some of whom are working day and night; a firm that is among the largest in the United Kingdom. Of that hundred we may say with certitude that at least 20 per cent. will find the strain—the intense nervous strain of working under trying conditions, and at a pressure that taxes to the uttermost the endurance and resilience of the strongest man—quite beyond their resources; and even if they are reinforced by other willing recruits we may rely upon it that, when all is said and done, the number of women "mobilised" for the actual production of the munitions of war will be fractional, however many may become waitresses, shop-assistants, typists, messengers, and the like.

Now I have taken these two statements, because they seem to me to point clearly and unmistakeably to the very grave danger that there lies in this latest spectacular attempt of the Government to impress on the people the immensity of the struggle in which we are engaged. Personally, I doubt if even the Government—who, in reality, know very little about the details of production—have persuaded themselves that this call to women-workers is going to count for much in "speeding up" the arsenals and engineering works. Members of the Cabinet have at least visited such places, and they know that to expect their already enormous output to be increased appreciably by women, who, necessarily unskilled and untrained, lack the physical endurance of strong men accustomed to the working that they know, is futile. The manifesto was probably intended to wake us up to the gravity of the situation, whose real significance the Press Bureau has been hiding from the nation for the last six months. But whether it was or not, of this I am certain: that while it will do little to add to the munitions of war, it may well have disastrous social results. For it may enormously increase one of the gravest social evils of our time—that fruitful source of sweating and unemployment—women's labour.

Let us return to Miss Courtney's statement. There is no reason, she says, why women should not make the selling of ribbons and waiting at restaurants, peculiarly their own. There is not, indeed, if that is to be the main business of their lives. But if they are going to becomes wives and mothers, then there is a very good reason indeed why they should turn their backs upon the opulent opportunities of life under Messrs. Lyons, and cease to do the Howell and James, or the Selfridge young man out of his job. Miss Courtney will find the reasons set out with great clearness by those who are entitled to speak with authority on the matter. These were stated with such force that Parliament passed a special Act insisting on the proprietors of West-End shops providing seats so that their women assistants might sit down. It is true that the measure was futile, as nearly all such measures are. The seats were never occupied—the shop-walkers saw to that. But they still remain. And the arguments that led to their provisions—they remain also. They have been urged time and again, and they have never been answered. Briefly, they amount to this: if women are going to have children, if we are to consider them as mothers and not as wage-earners, then any occupation that keeps them standing for many hours is distinctly bad for them, for the race, and for the coming generation. It may put a few extra shillings into their pockets, and allow them to buy cheap jewellery and see silly cinema shows, and may appear to achieve that economic independence which is always open to the female "blackleg," who will take a man's job at a cut price; but its ultimate results are to be seen in stunted, weakly, neurotic children; in miserably unhealthy women; in wretched homes from which sickness is never absent; in all the miasmas that have made wives shrink from motherhood, so that the procuring of abortion is a profitable industry; in a falling birth and an increased infantile mortality; in the displacement of men's labour, and the emergence of a new and curious type of female monstrosity called "the flapper"; in the general loosening of morals and the general cheapening of women.

Of course, if these new recruits to the army of industry were going to "quit" at the end of the war, there would not be very much in all this. But who believes that these women will surrender their work so easily; and if so, what is to become of them? The fact is that this mobilisation commits the nation to a dilemma from which there is no escape. Miss Mary MacArthur, the secretary of the Women's Trade Union, states the position with great clearness when she says:—

"What guarantee is to be given to men that, when they return to civil life, their situations will be open for them, and that the standard of conditions in their trades will remain unimpaired?

"And if the men receive satisfactory guarantees, what is to happen to women who have taken their places when they return, if in the meantime the women have become self-dependent."

There is no getting away from that difficulty. On the one hand, the women who have liberated shop-assistants and the like, and enabled them to serve their country at the front, will be sent packing, to starve or go on the streets. On the other, as seems more probable, Tommy will return to find that a woman has got his job, that he must begin life over again, and that the position he won by years of dogged hard work is to go to a woman new to the trade.

The woman's mobilisation will add, as I believe, nothing to the Army, and little to the equipment of the forces in the field. Granted that there was a shortage of labour at the docks, in the ship yards, and in the engineering shops, such shortage could have been made good by the simple expedient of paying for it. Increased wages have a wonderfully quickening effect upon the mobility of labour; and increased wages the employers would have had to pay if the Government had not entered the field against the Trade Unions. In this world you can nearly always get good service by remunerating it adequately. But cheap substitutes are frequently dangerous, and in the long run the most expensive.

C. SHERIDAN JONES.

The Christian World,
March 28th 1918.

663/53

663

The Lady,
March 28th 1918.

ENGLISH WOMEN AND THE WAR.

Industrial Work They Might Do.

An Official View.

About seven million women in the United Kingdom are engaged in some occupation whereby they earn their own living. More than half the female population, between the ages of fifteen and twenty-five, is industrially employed. Therefore, the outbreak of war has caused an upheaval in women's employment and has induced many women to adapt themselves to those trades now busy manufacturing war materials, food, clothing, and equipment for the Army.

Comparing the British women with those in France, Germany and Austria, they have not as yet been drafted into men's work to any appreciable extent. True, there is an increase of twenty-five per cent. in the employment of women in banks since last August; a few women are employed in some of the male departments of the post office; there are a few isolated cases of girls managing lifts and acting as shop assistants in provision shops; but beyond these few instances female labour has not been substituted for male labour as much as was anticipated.

Women could be easily adapted for much useful work. In some cases only a little training would be required; in other instances thorough training would leave the woman just as expert as the man under similar conditions. Women could thus release men of military age to join the Army, or men to perform the work done by those already fighting which is not suitable for female labour. Production must proceed at all costs. The loss of men in factory, warehouse and workshop, on farm and land, in any branch of industry of an extractive or manufacturing nature must not be felt or allowed to curtail production. However great the dislocation of industry, those men left behind, together with women, must be prepared to be dovetailed into any available work that needs doing, enduring any hardships this may entail for the sake of the Empire.

Women could efficiently perform much more of the administrative and clerical work in the various Government departments than has been previously allocated to them, for women are methodical and accurate and possess that enthusiasm that lifts them triumphant over the monotony of close detail work. Local and municipal authorities too, could engage more women as clerks, assistants and inspectors. The public libraries could be conducted almost entirely by female librarians, assistants, with young girls in place of the boys who now sort and shelve the books. If Frenchwomen are successfully conducting the trams and omnibuses, it is time British women were installed upon these vehicles, too, thereby releasing a further thousand or so men of military age. Women might also be utilised as guards upon the underground tube railways. In railway transit work girls and women could undertake booking-office work and the clerical work in the numerous offices—parcels, clearing, managers' and head offices—even acting as ticket collectors, too, if real emergency arose. Among the city and dock warehouses there is much clerical work booking goods in and out that could be done by women. The conditions, however, are very rough along the riverside.

Women excel in the art of selling, and thousands of men might be drawn from the work of shop assistant and female labour substituted, in many cases with advantage even. In some shops the women could take entire control; in others, where heavy lifting or going to market must be undertaken, women might replace about two-thirds of the men in each business. In the large stores and drapery establishments, hairdressing, jewellery, tobacconists' and newsagents' businesses there is work quite suitable for women, and to some extent in poulterers' and fishmongers' and green-grocery, women could manage the salesmanship.

The work of insurance agent is another occupation providing thousands of young, brisk men with a livelihood. These men should either join the Army or take on other work unsuitable for women and let women do the collecting work—for the time being, anyway. One large assurance company did employ over 20,000 agents in the provinces alone, before the war. For many years a West-end dairy company has employed women to deliver milk. Therefore, if one dairy company can make a success of such a venture, other milk vendors should follow suit. Even in those trades in which women already take their part, there are many more branches that they could execute, but they are often kept out through prejudice. An instance of this occurs in the printing trade in London, where the objection to the employment of female compositors is almost prohibitive; yet in Scotland this has been lived down, and women are admitted to this branch. Under the present state of affairs, women should be offered every facility for making themselves proficient in any branch of any trade that will release men for more important work, such as the manufacture of armaments. Women should be allowed to learn to set up type, the operating of the Linotype and Monotype machines, and certain branches of the book-binding trade not done by females at present. In the boot and shoe trade, too, there is a dearth of male and female workers, so that in this branch of industry, too, women might do more of the actual manufacture than they have been in the habit of doing; and unskilled women might be taught the branches already done by women. It would be possible to mention other trades into which women might be temporarily or permanently drafted. There are trades of a very highly skilled nature where there is already every pressure being brought to bear upon the men, and where a dearth of production will be serious, in which long and careful training is essential. Girls should be apprenticed to this work immediately, for they would require at least two years' close application to learn it. Surgical instrument making is one of these trades; watch and clock making is another. Girls would need very careful selection, but the right girl should prove as adaptable as a boy.

Special attention should be paid to boy labour at the present time, and girls should be substituted for all messenger work whether under Government or for private employers. The boys should be induced to enter those trades where a dearth of men is sure to occur. This applies to all branches of engineering, the construction of railways, bridges, canals and roads, shipbuilding, railway work and every branch of farming and agricultural labour. Indiscriminate street hawking of newspapers should be abolished. Girls could preside at station bookstalls, and in the street certain stands or positions should be allotted for the sale of newspapers, to be in charge of elderly men or women only.

To thus reorganise industry and to deal with the problems that will arise during such dislocation, and afterwards, when the disbanding of the Army commences and when women must vacate much of the temporary work into which they have been dovetailed, men and women specially qualified should be appointed. Women should be well represented on such a committee, as it is largely a question of female labour and its flexibility. Leading political economists, trade experts, business men and women, and officials on the Labour Exchanges should all be appointed to serve on this "Committee for the Reorganisation of Industry During the War."

A step of far-reaching importance has been taken by the Government in calling upon women to register themselves for paid employment in the nation's service to fill up ranks which are at present without sufficient labour, and also to release men for the fighting line. The step will be welcomed by the women themselves, who have ever since the war began desired opportunities for serving their country, and have in some quarters already organised themselves for such service. To what will this mobilisation of women for industrial service lead when the war is over? It is only too clear that many men will return from the war unfit to resume their occupations, and unable for a time to support themselves. So the danger of women ousting men from the labour market is thus far remote. But it is earnestly to be hoped that the women will be paid at the same rate as the men whom they are replacing, or a very grave situation will be created. Such an excellent judge as Miss Mary Macarthur appears to think that the difficulties of the question have not been fully considered. Be that as it may, this is the most important development in the position of women in this country which this century has seen.

The Glasgow News,
March 28th 1918.

WHERE ARE THE GIRLS?

WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE.

("NEWS" SPECIAL.)

England has been quicker to respond to the demand for women for war service than Scotland, where the habit is to think things well over and to rush nothing—but it must not be supposed that Glasgow and the West are not doing well. Not only are Glasgow women coming forward in considerable numbers (between 2,000 and 3,000 have already enrolled), but many letters are reaching the Labour Exchange from outlying districts, and all the local Exchanges are busy with the war registration.

It has been stated that there are at present a thousand women out of work, and that these should have a prior claim to war openings, but it may be pointed out that this is misleading. Ordinarily this may be the number of unemployed women in the city to-day, as it was yesterday, and as it will be to-morrow. But this is the fluctuation of the labour market, its constant ebb and flow, and the women who are the outs to-day will be the ins to-morrow according to the hazards of life. Allowance must be made also for the element which is to be found in women's labour as well as in men's, the ever incompetent who drift into and out of jobs in peace and war time alike.

Obviously it is the intention of the nation to call up its fresh reserves of women. Public women and many employers of labour are willing now to admit the capacity of the woman worker. The women who are registering now belong chiefly to the middle classes or to the superior working class, and while all ages are represented, about three-fourths of the women are over thirty, and many are middle-aged. Generally speaking, they do not express a preference for any kind of work, and are willing to serve in any capacity, though a considerable number decline agricultural labour. Nearly half have had some previous business experience, and these are mostly married women or widows. They do not speak about wages, but in many cases better class working women are seeking no doubt to supplement the very meagre allowance which the Government is making while husbands or brothers are at the front. In very many cases, however, patriotism alone is the reason which has induced the women to offer their services.

Possibly war service may be required not only from women of leisure, but from other women who might be asked to leave the luxurious, inessential trades in order to work where the need for their services is more imperative. To take a possible instance—though such a thing is not at present likely—dressmakers might be asked to take up military contract work.

What we should like to know, however, is what has become now of the young lady who once was so keen on recruiting—who went about handing over white feathers? Her sweetheart, her brothers, her young husband is at the front, and what is she doing? Girls from twenty to thirty overflowing with energy, health, and spirit are surely wanted; they were eager enough to urge their men folk on. Let them come forward now.

The Dundee Advertiser, March 25th. 1915.

663/54 663.

WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE

Registration at Dundee Labour Exchange.

When the history of the great war comes to be written it will contain no brighter or more inspiring page than that which will record the part taken and the services rendered by the women of our country. In the noble and difficult task of nursing the sick and wounded their services deserve to be written in letters of gold, and in other less known fields of activity their work has been hardly less valuable, if much less conspicuous.

Their latest phase of usefulness is what is known as "War Service for Women." This is an appeal to the women to come forward, and take up men's work, to release the latter for fighting.

Women are wanted at once to work in the following occupations—Farm work, dairy work, leather stitching, brush-making, clothing machining, and light machining for armament. It must not be imagined, however, that these are all the occupations for which women workers are required. The six detailed above are urgently in need of their services, but it is open to women to volunteer for any other work. It is certain that as more men join the forces, more women will be wanted to work while they are away. Any woman who by working helps to release or equip a man for the fighting line does national war service. A special register is being prepared by the Government Labour Exchanges, and no fees are charged.

Up to the present Scotland has not done so well in this new movement as has England, the probable reason being that the women of Scotland have not yet fully grasped its meaning. It is felt to be only necessary to bring the matter under their notice, and to appeal to their patriotism in order that the disparity between the response in England and that in Scotland may be wiped out.

Within the past week numerous forms have been sent out from the Dundee Labour Exchange, and on Sunday the matter was referred to from the pulpits of the city. As a consequence there has already been a very good response in actual registration, and as inquiries for further information are pouring in, it is expected that the numbers will rapidly increase.

Two Reasons.

Two reasons, however, may militate against a very large number of Dundee women being able to register—(1) Because the majority of the educated women of the city are busily engaged in voluntary Red Cross work; and (2) because, owing to trade being so good in Dundee, there is plenty of work for industrial workers, and consequently there is no surplus whose services would be available under this new movement.

The response, nevertheless, has up to the present been very creditable and encouraging. A number of women, either already employed in some sort of work or who have not done any work, have offered to give part of their time to any work for which they might be found useful, and a good many are even willing to leave their homes to work if pay and housing conditions are satisfactory. Some who have had no special experience of any work are very enthusiastic about being trained for new employment.

Married women, with an hour or two to spare in the afternoons or evenings, have said in effect—"Anything we can do we are most willing to do." Indeed the offers of service are very varied, but the majority are less remarkable for precision than for the spirit of willingness. Many, as stated, are willing to do "anything." One or two girls have offered their services as chauffeurs. One young lady, who has practically managed a hotel, said she would like to do outside work, and suggested a tram conductor's or a chauffeur's place. Quite a number have registered for clerical work, and, of course, a good many for cooking and nursing. More than one have offered to take a chef's place. One girl, who was in a telephone office in London, offered to go into the telephone department "as a mechanic and maker-up." Several appear to be attracted by the idea of helping in the manufacture of munitions of war, and have offered to do light machining and armament work.

Light farm work seems to attract a good many, especially those who have been brought up in the country, and several young women have offered to take care of live stock, and to do light farm work. One has a fancy for poultry. Gardening seems to fascinate some, and one wants to do market gardening. A school teacher has offered to "go in for milking, dairy work, poultry farming, and gardening," and is "quite willing to be trained for any other kind of work."

The above are samples of the applications received at the Dundee Labour Exchange, and it is expected that the stream of those who are registering will grow steadily in volume as the days advance.

The Glasgow News, March 25th. 1915.

WORK FOR WOMEN.

The appeal which has been made to women by the Government, in order to increase the effectiveness of the demand for more recruits, has had an instantaneous and remarkable result. It is impossible to suggest how many women have put their names on the register for employment, as the registration forms are pouring in daily to the various Labour Exchanges throughout the country. Already, however, some ten or twelve thousand applications have been made at the central offices in Westminster, and the tota number of the names placed on the register is promising to be enormous. Whether the applicants are likely to prove immediately useful in the majority of cases is still a matter of doubt, for a very large number belong to the middle classes, and they have not been trained specially to do any work. It is fully evident, therefore, that teachers to instruct and supervise the novices must form an important part of the scheme. Yet when all the applicants are registered and classified there still remains the essential element of success—to find the work for the eager workers. So far, in town or country, there has been no demonstration of anxiety on the part of the employers to tap this new reservoir of labour. It is suggested, consequently, and the suggestion is quite reasonable, that the Government themselves ought to set the example. There are many young men still employed in the Civil Service who would be more usefully employed in the Army, and experience has proved that many posts in that Service can be adequately filled by women.

Evening Standard & St. James Gazette, March 25th. 1915.

To the Editor of "The Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette."

WOMEN AND MEN'S WORK.

Sir,—It is surely not right that women who take the place of workmen going to the front should be paid those workmen's wages.

The ordinary soldiers' pay should be quite sufficient. We shall then be able to see if women workers are really animated by patriotic feelings, instead of a desire to benefit themselves at the expense of those who are risking their lives in the trenches.

In very few spheres is a woman's work worth as much a man's, and it will be unbusinesslike and wasteful to attempt to pay them men's wages, and very unfair to the firms who had to employ this female labour.

"WATCHMAN."

North Heels Mail, March 25th. 1915.

WHAT ABOUT SAFEGUARDS?

It would, of course, be easy to raise objections to a large increase of female labour in ordinary times; but the times are not ordinary. It is a case of national emergency, in the face of which many of the objections which might otherwise be urged have to be swept aside. This is willingly acknowledged by Labour leaders, who, however, will undoubtedly ask for certain safeguards. There are also points upon which they desire further information. Miss Mary Macarthur, who is secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, asks: "On what conditions are these women to be substituted for men? Are they to receive the same wages for the same work? What guarantee is to be given to men that, when they return to civil life, their situations will be open for them, and that the standard of conditions in their trades remain unimpaired? And if the men receive satisfactory guarantees, what is to happen to women who have taken their places, when they return, if in the meantime the women have become self-dependent?" Miss Macarthur declares that a national representative committee, including a strong representation of industrial interests, to lay down conditions of transference, is one of the first safeguards which must be insisted upon. Mrs. Fawcett, who is president of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, says that the one thing they are anxious to avoid is to supply a cheap form of labour and undercut men. They want to provide really efficient women, worthy of good wages. She trusts that the new demand for female labour will have the effect of raising the standard for women in regard to both work and wages.

The Nottingham Guardian, March 25th. 1915.

VOTE DEMANDED BEFORE WORK.

A meeting called to discuss the situation raised by the Government's appeal to women was held yesterday in London.

Miss Eunice Murray, of the Women's Freedom League, who presided, said that it was rather wonderful that at last the Government had found that women could be useful. When the Freedom League at the beginning of the war had offered its help, the offer was indignantly refused.

Now the Government were in despair, having discovered their mistake, and again the women were willing to help; but they did so under certain conditions. The first of these was equal wages with men, where training was necessary, proper maintenance during that period, some recognition by the Government after the war, and, since the Government called on them as citizens, they claimed their full rights as citizens, and they demanded an emergency Bill for enfranchising women before they renounced office. They did not trust the Government, and they required the vote to ensure that the women workers were properly treated.

The Government was about to become the largest employer of female labour in the country, and it was not enough that the Government should merely promise equal wages with men. There must be safeguards.

Miss Mary MacArthur had reckoned that there were 50,000 women in the country receiving relief from the rates. The Board of Trade assessed the figure still higher, putting it at 60,000, but it appeared that these women were incapable of performing the work required.

663/54

The New Statesman
27.3.15.

The compilers of the Board of Trade report on the state of employment seem to be torn between an optimistic desire to prove that all is well, and the need for making out a case for some further steps in "industrial mobilisation." As compared with July last, notwithstanding the hectic rush of Government orders, industrial employment has shrunk, in the aggregate, by about one-twelfth, which means that production is as low, and trade as "bad," as in most years of severe "slump." But as the number of men taken into military and naval pay exceeds the number turned off from industry, it is estimated that a quarter of a million additional males have been actually brought into employment since July (men then out of work or on strike, superannuated men recalled, or boys brought prematurely into industry). In addition, so hot has been the press that women have been put to men's work. In engineering, leather, woollens and hosiery, some 20,000 more women are engaged than in July last. Notwithstanding these and other transfers, however, the aggregate of women and girls in employment is less than in July by something like 30,000; and the Labour Exchanges have the names of just about that number of unemployed women and girls for whom they are unable to find any wage-earning situations whatsoever.

* * *

It is not easy to understand why, in these circumstances, the Board of Trade issued its dramatic appeal to the unoccupied women of the middle classes to enrol themselves for industrial work. The note of alarm appears in the report only in the apprehension of a serious shortage in the extra hands required by agriculture in the summer season. Already it is reported that in some counties farmers are laying down land to grass, that in Kent hops are being grubbed up and that elsewhere land is actually going out of cultivation—all owing to an actual or prospective shortage of labour. If we are to get in our harvest, from hay and wheat to hops and fruit, at least 90,000 temporary hands will be required; and these, it is feared, will not be forthcoming. Is this the "war service" for which the unoccupied women and girls are presently to be enlisted? Haymaking and hop-picking by bands of women volunteers may prove an agreeable change from amateur nursing and knitting.

The Manchester Guardian
25.3.15.

THE WOMEN'S REGISTER.

163

A DISAPPOINTMENT.

Between 600 and 700 women in Manchester have so far registered themselves at the Labour Exchange as being prepared to undertake men's work in order that possible recruits for the army may be released. The number fell considerably yesterday.

Such a response cannot be considered satisfactory for Manchester, especially as some of those who have enrolled are not resident in the city. The scheme provides training in specific occupations, so that lack of particular knowledge need be no detriment to those willing to register themselves.

The Evening News 6.6.3

CALL TO WOMEN WORKERS.

Immediate Response to State Scheme.

HOW TO HELP.

The Government appeal to women willing to work and so release men for the war to register their names with the Labour Exchanges has had an immediate response.

At the Central Labour Exchange at Queen Anne's Gate nearly fifty women registered themselves in the first part of to-day. They included all classes and were ready to do any kind of useful work.

Many were willing to work in armament factories, some wanted to do nursing, and others offered to serve as drivers of vehicles, either horse or motor.

The Evening News understands that the Board of Trade is conferring with leaders of the trade unions in connection with this great scheme, registration for which is expected to begin formally next Monday. Notices of vacancies for women will be made known through the Labour Exchanges.

The official notice adds that the object of registration is to find out what reserve of women's labour, trained and untrained, can be made available if required.

MISS MACARTHUR'S VIEWS.

Miss Mary MacArthur, the secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, expressed surprise to-day at the haste with which the Government were acting in a matter of such great social complexity.

"In the banks at the present time women at £2 a week are doing the work of men who were paid £250 a year, and I can name restaurants where women at about 12s. weekly have filled the places of men who earned £2. Unless there is a guarantee that the men shall return to their places men who have families to keep will, after the war, be faced with a serious outlook, should that tendency be widely encouraged.

"The Government talks about women being paid ordinary industrial rates and speaks of pay ranging from 32s. a week, including overtime, in some of the munitions of war factories. I know of a war factory where the girls are working twelve hours a day with a break of only one and a half hours for meals, and the scale of pay is as follows:—

Girls of 17, 8s. a week.
Girls of 18, 9s.
Girls of 19, 10s.
Girls of 20, 11s.

"There is a bonus, which girls lose if they take Sundays off. In another factory making khaki thread girls are working very long hours for under 10s. a week, and their health is suffering from the continual strain.

"As I understand the appeal it is made to women who are not normally wage earners, and knowing as I do that 40,000 women normally wage earners are out of employment I should like some assurance that the possibility of training and using these women has been fully tried before the introduction of new and presumably economically independent women is contemplated.

"The appointment of a representative committee, including a strong proportion of representatives of the working classes, to lay down the conditions of the transference of women from one industry to another or the substitution of women for men must be insisted upon as an essential feature of the plan."

The Common Cause,
March 26th. 1915.

663/56 663

Women and War Service.

We are on the eve of an important experiment—important even at this time of crisis and almost daily experiment. The need for men at the front has created the inevitable need for workers at home, and the Government has turned to women to meet the national crisis. We regret that the warning uttered by the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies months ago, at the beginning of the war, was not acted upon, and their offer of help in organising and training women accepted. It is true that war on the present scale is an experience so new and so overwhelming that much dislocation and unpreparedness must be looked for and forgiven; but this was a need for which the example of France should surely have prepared us, even in a country where all the men are not taken. And now that the pinch has come, it will be a gigantic task to organise and supply the labour required. It is certain that the various women's societies, all of them willing and anxious to help, could by this time have done half this work, had they been allowed. Even without Governmental encouragement, much has been done, and well done. But the sudden demand for women's labour on an enormous scale and at the shortest possible notice, means that the supply must necessarily be less efficiently trained and organised than it might have been, had we been set to work on it eight months ago.

The problem of training and organisation must be taken in hand without any further delay. Women are being urged to train as physicians and surgeons, in view of the threatened shortage of doctors, but the expense of such training must deter many who are admirably fitted for such work, and it would be worth while to give help out of public funds to enable suitable women to qualify. Help is also needed to ensure an adequate supply of nurses. Probationers are wanted; but the number of women who can afford to train is limited, and a maintenance grant might well be offered to those who have no private means, as it has been provided out of the Queen's Work for Women Fund to girls training for clerical work and various branches of manual labour. So far women of good education have been unfairly neglected by the different Relief Committees, and it will be a shameful waste of good material if their services are lost to the State through want of the means to train for a profession.

Again, in the Civil Service, there must be many positions in which men could be replaced by women. The Report of the Royal Commission on the Civil Service recommended that greater use should be made of women's work, but since its publication, very few fresh posts have been thrown open to them. As was pointed out in The Times of March 19th, a number of posts in Government Departments are given to young men from Oxford and Cambridge, who have no special experience or qualifications beyond a good general education, and their work could be done quite as well by college women. There is, indeed, an increasing need for women in all Government offices, above all, at the Local Government Board and the Board of Education. When it is remembered that the former largely controls the housing question, and the latter is concerned with the training and education of children, it seems sufficiently grotesque that we should still be pleading for the co-operation of women in such matters. What we are concerned here to urge is that now is the time to put women not only in executive posts, but at the heads of departments, on equal terms with men, to frame and administer policy as well as carry out work. The admirable work done by Miss Mona Wilson as an Insurance Commissioner should embolden a timid male Government to fresh advance; and it is clear that only when women are among those at headquarters will other women work their best and under the best conditions. Constant reports of sweating, overtime, and underpay remind us that there are still (after twenty years!) only twenty women factory-inspectors. They also are being "sweated." Why not double, treble, or quadruple their numbers? The demand for women in the factories increases, and with it the work of the factory-inspector. Already large numbers of women are being employed in ammunition factories, where they have proved particularly expert in making shrapnel shells, and there is room for many more. In making uniforms, women are also doing excellent service—though it is to be feared that they are in many cases being paid a very inadequate wage—and they are now beginning to enter branches of the boot trade hitherto closed to them, in which their work is urgently needed. In agriculture, as motor drivers, omnibus conductors (of whom a shortage is now reported), lift attendants, and in hundreds of other capacities, women can quite well set men free, though in some a period of training will first be needed.

It is necessary, therefore, for women to take the matter up. The need of their country is paramount, and women themselves have much to gain, even if patriotism did not demand—as it does—the best response that they can make. There is little that men can do that women cannot, if they have equal training, wage, and opportunity. That little merely demands a certain amount of reorganization of the work, in order that work for which the muscular strength of men is necessary may be reserved for them, and the other parts of the industry in question given to the women. Here, however, a warning should be entered. There is a danger in all such reorganization, that the "plums" of the work may be taken out, given to the women, and paid at a lower rate. We are told that exactly this danger exists already in the shortage of agricultural labour. Dairy work is among the best-paid of such work, and already it is suggested that this should be done by women, not at the rate for dairy work, but at the rate for women—a very different matter!

If women allow themselves to be used as a means of lowering the rate of pay against men, their coming into the industries now clamouring for them will be worse than useless. It will be disastrous. Nor can we think that either the Government or other employers of labour seriously contemplate using the patriotic impulse which has taken men to the front to serve their country, as a means to lower their rates of pay when the war is over, and they return to enter the labour market again. Yet, unless it is absolutely insisted on that women must receive the same rates, this is what will inevitably happen. We cannot too strongly urge upon all concerned the principle that equal pay for equal work must be demanded and enforced.

If, however, women are to receive proper pay, they ought to be trained and efficient workers. The training which Suffragists have been demanding for women for years has too often and too generally been denied to them. Now we must all throw ourselves into the organization of such training as quickly as possible. It cannot be what it might have been; but what is possible must be done at once.

The women should also, as far as possible, be organized. We trust that, in view of the fact that their labour is being demanded, and will certainly be used, the men's unions will, in every case in which they are at present closed to women, at once make women eligible for membership. It will not otherwise be possible to prevent the lowering of rates by women, who are unorganized, unenfranchised, and therefore unable to protect themselves. The example of the weavers in Lancashire should be followed, and equal pay for equal work may be secured.

Finally, we press upon the Government the duty of enfranchising the women, whose ability and whose duty to serve their country no less than men, is now being so publicly recognised. If it is a fact that the Government intends to take over workshops in which the production of war-munitions can, if necessary, be carried on, it becomes grotesque to deny any longer the need of women for political protection. And that they have a right to it, based upon service, can no longer be denied by the most obstinate of Anti-suffragists. We commend this cause to the consideration of the Government, and we expect that, as a result of this great demand for the labour and services of women, a resolution urging their political enfranchisement will be laid before the Congress meeting to decide the settlement after the war.

NATIONAL UNION AND ORGANISATION OF WOMEN WORKERS.

The National Union having been approached by the Home Office with regard to the Government scheme as to the employment of women in the place of men, expressed its willingness to co-operate on the following terms:—

The N.U.W.S.S. welcomes a Government scheme for the organisation of women who are willing to take paid employment for war services, provided that the necessary safeguards are secured.

The points which the N.U.W.S.S. particularly wishes to emphasise are:—

(1) The necessity of equal pay for equal work, thus avoiding the undercutting of men.

(2) The great importance of training.

(3) The securing of good conditions as to housing, &c., especially in agriculture.

The Committee further decided to distribute the registration forms among the Societies, and to urge those which have offices to undertake the registration of women, and give help and advice to those who wish to offer their services. Many of the Societies, including the London Society, have already begun to do this, and the shop at 58 Parliament Street is crowded all day with women who come to register. The experience already gained in this kind of work since the beginning of the war is proving of great value.

The Common Cause, March 26th. 1915

The Government's Appeal and the Women's Response.

Both the patriotism and the need of the women of this country are being shown in their instant response to the appeal made to them for help, last week. Every kind of work is offered and asked for. It will be an anxious business organising and training the workers, but we hope it will be thoroughly done. Above all, we trust that all men's unions will act in line with (e.g.) the National Amalgamated Union of Shop Assistants, Warehousemen, and Clerks, whose General Secretary explains in The Daily Telegraph of March 23rd, that "it is their duty, as trade unionists, to protect the conditions of employment, but, so long as that is done, it does not matter whether men or women are employed." It is of the first importance that the women should receive equal pay with the men for equal work; and all who have studied this particular economic problem know how easy it is to juggle with the question of "equal work." It is constantly interpreted to mean "the same work," and with the least possible ingenuity the work can be arranged so that it is not exactly "the same." Then the excuse for lowering the rate is at once seized and acted upon.

The Consequence of Under-Payment.

If women are persistently paid less than the standard rate for men, they damage themselves, the men, and the whole standard of public efficiency. For the worker tends to be worth what she is paid; if it is little, she loses in status, she decreases in vitality and energy, she becomes less and less efficient. Her employer, disgusted with the result of his own injustice, loudly proclaims it, and proves to his own satisfaction that if he pays women very little, it is because they are worth very little. The rate for men, on the other hand, can always be kept down by the fear that if they ask for more, they will be displaced by women. So the vicious circle is complete. It can only be broken when men realise that, whatever complications are put in the way by slight differences of work, the principle of equal pay for equal work must be maintained.

Stimulating Production.

The question of stimulating production, which at this moment is so closely occupying the attention of the Government, is bound to affect women in a variety of ways. Last week Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Runciman conferred at the Treasury with the representatives of nearly thirty Trade Unions, and in outlining the problems to be faced, Mr. Lloyd George mentioned the relaxation of Trade Union rules respecting overtime and the employment of semi-skilled labour. "The employment of women's labour," he said, "might be of great help in some cases." That the conditions under which such labour is employed will need the closest vigilance is emphasised by the statement made by Mr. Anderson in regard to sweated labour in army contracts, in the House of Commons, on March 15th.

Sweating in Army Contracts.

The girls employed at Messrs. Armstrong & Whitworth's, at Newcastle, stated Mr. Anderson, "work twelve hours per day, with one and a-half hours' break for meals, Sundays as well. They are working two shifts at present, and girls are working all night. They have been working three shifts, but the girls were half dead, and they found they had to stop it. Girls of 17 get 7s. a week; girls of 18, 9s. a week; and girls of 20, 11s. a week; and in addition to this there is a bonus, which seems largely to be used for speeding up the girls. . . . Some of the girls say they have worked twenty hours at a stretch since the war broke out. Many times they have worked ninety-five hours a week since the war broke out. If the girls take a Sunday rest, there is deducted all the bonus which the girls earn during the week."

663/57 663.

The Times, March 26th. 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR WORK.

NECESSARY SAFEGUARDS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir,—The women of England will certainly not lag behind the men as regards any appeal to their services and patriotism. In this supreme hour of our history as a free people no effort can be too great to meet the emergencies with which we are confronted. If it is within the power of women to assist the industrial needs of the nation, that assistance will be given wholeheartedly without the encouragement of medals or rewards.

I should like, however, to comment on certain obvious dangers to which the Board of Trade's appeal may lead, unless care and discrimination are shown in recruiting this new labour. The problem of the moment consists in providing for abnormal requirements without prejudice to those permanent industrial interests which sooner or later will have to resume their normal place. Common prudence bids us look ahead to some of the vast economic questions which must wait upon the peace; aggravated as they well may be by a period of severe industrial depression—one of the common economic sequelæ of great wars. The readjustments of labour at the close of hostilities will be formidable. The return of a million men—more or less—to ordinary industry after such an upheaval will prove no easy task. We should ill repay the services of the gallant men who stand between us and destruction if by any careless or shortsighted complication we prejudice their future position as wage earners.

The whole field of woman's employment is normally tangled, unsatisfactory, and badly paid. Owing to a variety of economic reasons, especially her frequent position as a supplementary wage earner, the unorganized woman worker is apt to fall an easy victim to sweating and extortion. But the more underpaid inefficient women in the labour market the more depressing the effect on wages as a whole. In recruiting these special women workers therefore to meet emergency national needs, it is essential that their entry into industry should be carefully safeguarded and organized on the basis of war service. Otherwise we may create a new body of semi-skilled supplementary wage earners presenting dangerous opportunities for exploitation at the hands of the less worthy type of employer. The brunt of such exploitation would fall not only on the regular women workers, but also react unfavourably on the men workers whose places the new volunteers may have been called upon temporarily to fill. An extension of cheap labour sapping the foundations of the industrial position so laboriously built up by the wage earning classes would be a deplorable consequence of the war. I feel sure it is one the promoters of the new industrial movement would desire at all costs to prevent. The whole question is largely one of organization. For this reason I regret that at the Treasury Conference no woman representative of organized women workers was invited to attend.

I venture to hope therefore that in any Government scheme the following points may be fully safeguarded:—

1. In no case should work be offered or accepted below a living wage, nor should the substitution of female for male labour be allowed to depress existing standards. The proposed limitation of war profits will do much to minimize these dangers and has the further advantage of securing greater cooperation on the part of the workers.

2. At least 50,000 women in normal industry are at present out of employment. Efforts should be made at once to see what proportion of these women can be absorbed before volunteer workers are brought in.

3. Training will often be necessary in the new processes. When this is the case an unemployed woman who has lost her work owing to the war should, when equally suitable, be preferred to a volunteer worker.

4. A national committee should be appointed to lay down the principles and examine the conditions of any transference of labour under this scheme. Women workers should receive adequate representation on this body.

Let me say, in conclusion, that I fully recognize that when the nation's very existence is at stake the first and only law is that of national necessity. In the course of this grim struggle we may be forced to suspend principle after principle to which we attach importance in normal times. Should this necessity arise the nation would shrink from no sacrifice which ensured the safety of the State. But in suspending principles let us at least be clear to what end they are normally directed. For to the wholesale destruction wrought by war, it would be lamentable to add further breaches in our social structure as a consequence of shortsighted policy, rather than of national necessity.

Your obedient servant,

VIOLET R. MARKHAM.

5, Gower-street, Bloomsbury, March 24.

663/58 663

The Clarion, March 26th. 1915.

Organisation for War.

By R. B. SUTHERS.

THE GOVERNMENT seem to be beginning to realise at last that this war is on rather a different plane from previous wars in our history, and that it is necessary to conduct it on new principles.

Perhaps never before has it been precisely true to say that the nation is at war. The nation has carried on wars, and business has been much as usual, but this time the nation is at war, and business cannot be as usual. The nation must be organised for war.

It is true that the Government have done things which made many people gasp with astonishment and sometimes alarm, such as taking over the railways, buying up sugar, and undertaking shipping insurance; but these "heroic" measures were of a very obvious nature, and the old idea that the Government could "carry on" the war and that business could be run much as usual seems to have resumed its sway in the very early stages of the operations. This idea was fostered by the steadiness of employment caused by the enormous demand for war equipment. Nearly everyone was busy, many were working overtime, and if prices had not risen so tremendously the war might have been really "popular."

But prices rose—tremendously. Business was indeed too much "as usual," and the sharks have had a merry time. But the masses to-day are not "as usual." They are not as they were in 1814, nor even as they were in 1870, and they kicked against being bled "as usual." Agitations against high prices and strikes for higher wages expressed their views of the situation, and the Government has been compelled to recognise the seriousness of the position in the department of the production of guns and ammunition at any rate. The workshops were commandeered, and the terms of a truce have been arranged between the Government and the trade union representatives, and by this time no doubt the employers will have signified their acceptance of the agreement.

What precisely have the workers and the employers agreed to do? I have heard it said that the employers are giving up a good deal and that the workers are giving nothing. Is this true?

First, as to the employers. Their works have been commandeered by the Government, and are to be used entirely at the Government's discretion. Instead of competition or overlapping there will be co-operation of manufacture. Orders will be plentiful and profits will be high. If the Government allow the 10 per cent. suggested the employers will be doing handsomely. To make 10 per cent. out of your patriotism is surely not bad business.

As to the workers, they have agreed to give up the right to strike during the war, and to submit all disputes to arbitration. To many people this will seem a little thing, a duty rather than a concession. But it all depends on circumstances. Striking is "wicked" at any time, still wickeder when the nation is at war; but the workers have not hitherto realised that the nation is at war, any more than the profiteers have. Now that Lord Kitchener has told them the truth and that the Government has taken control of the profiteering side the workers will fall into line contentedly.

Further, in order to accelerate the production of munitions of war the workers have agreed to relax their trade rules where necessary, on condition that such relaxations shall cease at the end of the war, and that their wages rates and employment shall not be jeopardised by these concessions.

Here, again, the uninstructed public we are asked to think of the men in the trenches and to try to imagine them "reducing output."

Such a comparison is not only unfair, it is absurd. If we told the men in the trenches that as they managed to exist in the terrible conditions obtaining in the war area, and to fight well under the conditions, we should cease to provide barracks or homes for them when they returned, perhaps even they might begin to think of "restricting output."

The concessions of the trade restrictions by the workers are very real concessions, and notwithstanding the guarantees of the Government that the relaxations shall not extend beyond the period of the war, they are concessions which may have grave results on their standards of life. The introduction of women workers and the undertaking to allow semi-skilled men to perform work hitherto done by skilled men would certainly be used by employers to depress wages after the war, if they were left free to do so. So that the workers are taking great risks in making these concessions, because, after all, even the Government cannot guarantee that things shall be the same after the war as before. The only way they could do so would be to undertake the organisation of the nation for production in peace, and it is in this direction the workers ought to push them, rather than to agitate for "business as usual" after the war.

Another important step has been taken by the Government in calling upon women willing to work in occupations depleted by recruitment to register their qualifications. If the nation is at war, as it is, the whole of the resources of the nation must be made available. Women have already done splendid work in war services, but if the drain of men continues there will certainly be many opportunities for still further assistance from them. No wonder the Suffragettes are jubilant at this official recognition of their worth to the nation and that a demand for the immediate grant of the vote has gone forth. No wonder, too, that there have been signs of alarm at this new departure in the ranks of women who are already engaged in industry, when they can get work, and in the ranks of male industry which may be threatened by the influx of women.

The subject bristles with problems and difficulties, but they are difficulties which could be surmounted if the two halves of the nation could be induced to trust each other a little more, and to exercise in the affairs of industry a little of that courage which is so plentiful on the field of battle.

Miss Mary Macarthur tells us that at the present time there are, at least, 50,000 unemployed women in the country. Why, then, should the Government ask for women not usually employed in industry to register? It does seem a strange thing to do, but perhaps for once the Government have been gifted with a remarkable accession of foresight. There may be work in view for the 50,000 unemployed women and for all the others who may volunteer. On this and other points the Government ought to enlighten us.

It is to be hoped that the scheme of the Government is not one of those blunders which set the workers by the ears. It is to be hoped that it is not a scheme for getting cheap labour by appealing to the patriotism of the women volunteers, while workers dependent on wages remain unemployed. It is to be hoped the scheme will not be used to depress the wages of male workers after the war is over.

If the drain of men for the Front should continue long, women will take their places. They will learn how to from the war? Is the Government going to guarantee that things shall be the same for them as before the war? And if they do, for how long after the war?

All these questions would not arise if we were really a united nation organised for production in peace times. It would simply be a matter of readjustment of occupation. But we are not organised for production in peace times, and we have now to organise for war as quickly and effectively as we can. The task is difficult, but it will have to be overcome, and it can be overcome so soon as the Government and the profiteers fully realise that the nation is at war, and act accordingly.

The women volunteers will not have to be used as instruments to depress wages, they will have to be paid the usual rates. Nor will they have to be used to oust men from their occupations when war is over. If the women want work after the war, let the Government find them work. It would be an easy task. If work can be found in destroying and wasting wealth, work can be found for the purpose of saving wealth. If the Government can organise the resources of the nation for war, it can organise them for peace.

We have yet to see what the Government can do in this matter. They seem to be waking up, but they don't get a move on until the last minute. They have tackled the ammunition problem at last, but they ought to have acted months ago. They have tinkered with the question of food and fuel prices, and nothing has been done. Prices are still rising. Bread is up again, and before the winter is through the poor may be suffering still more terribly than they have done.

It will be useless to talk about truces if profiteers are to be allowed to repeat their old tricks. The Government cannot make the masses believe that our very existence depends on them putting forth every ounce of energy if at the same time the food and fuel and rent sharks are permitted to rob them of that energy. If our case is so desperate as Mr. Lloyd George asserts let the Government make strikes and industrial disputes impossible. Let them commandeer all the industries connected with the necessaries of life. If labour is to be mobilised for the use of the nation, all the products of labour should be mobilised for the use of the nation.

[illegible] by the steadiness of employment caused by the enormous demand for war equipment. Nearly everyone was busy, many were working overtime, and if prices had not risen so tremendously the war might have been really "popular."

But prices rose—tremendously. Business was indeed too much "as usual," and the sharks have had a merry time. But the masses to-day are not "as usual." They are not as they were in 1814, nor even as they were in 1870, and they kicked against being bled "as usual." Agitations against high prices and strikes for higher wages expressed their views of the situation, and the Government has been compelled to recognise the seriousness of the position in the department of the production of guns and ammunition at any rate. The workshops were commandeered, and the terms of a truce have been arranged between the Government and the trade union representatives, and by this time no doubt the employers will have signified their acceptance of the agreement.

What precisely have the workers and the employers agreed to do? I have heard it said that the employers are giving up a good deal and that the workers are giving nothing. Is this true?

First, as to the employers. Their works have been commandeered by the Government, and are to be used entirely at the Government's discretion. Instead of competition or overlapping there will be co-operation of manufacture. Orders will be plentiful and profits will be high. If the Government allow the 10 per cent. suggested the employers will be doing handsomely. To make 10 per cent. out of your patriotism is surely not bad business.

As to the workers, they have agreed to give up the right to strike during the war, and to submit all disputes to arbitration. To many people this will seem a little thing, a duty rather than a concession. But it all depends on circumstances. Striking is "wicked" at any time, still wickeder when the nation is at war; but the workers have not hitherto realised that the nation is at war, any more than the profiteers have. Now that Lord Kitchener has told them the truth and that the Government has taken control of the profiteering side the workers will fall into line contentedly.

Further, in order to accelerate the production of munitions of war the workers have agreed to relax their trade rules where necessary, on condition that such relaxations shall cease at the end of the war, and that their wages rates and employment shall not be jeopardised by these concessions.

Here, again, the uninstructed public is apt to make wrong inferences. Why, it is asked, should there be restrictions which reduce output at any time? And employers to depress wages after the war, if they were left free to do so. So that the workers are taking great risks in making these concessions, because, after all, even the Government cannot guarantee that things shall be the same after the war as before. The only way they could do so would be to undertake the organisation of the nation for production in peace, and it is in this direction the workers ought to push them, rather than to agitate for "business as usual" after the war.

Another important step has been taken by the Government in calling upon women willing to work in occupations depleted by recruitment to register their qualifications. If the nation is at war, as it is, the whole of the resources of the nation must be made available. Women have already done splendid work in war services, but if the drain of men continues there will certainly be many opportunities for still further assistance from them. No wonder the Suffragettes are jubilant at this official recognition of their worth to the nation and that a demand for the immediate grant of the vote has gone forth. No wonder, too, that there have been signs of alarm at this new departure in the ranks of women who are already engaged in industry, when they can get work, and in the ranks of male industry which may be threatened by the influx of women.

The subject bristles with problems and difficulties, but they are difficulties which could be surmounted if the two halves of the nation could be induced to trust each other a little more, and to exercise in the affairs of industry a little of that courage which is so plentiful on the field of battle.

Miss Mary Macarthur tells us that at the present time there are, at least, 50,000 unemployed women in the country. Why, then, should the Government ask for women not usually employed in industry to register? It does seem a strange thing to do, but perhaps for once the Government have been gifted with a remarkable accession of foresight. There may be work in view for the 50,000 unemployed women and for all the others who may volunteer. On this and other points the Government ought to enlighten us.

It is to be hoped that the scheme of the Government is not one of those blunders which set the workers by the ears. It is to be hoped that it is not a scheme for getting cheap labour by appealing to the patriotism of the women volunteers, while workers dependent on wages remain unemployed. It is to be hoped the scheme will not be used to depress the wages of male workers after the war is over.

If the drain of men for the Front should continue long, women will take their places. They will learn how to perform the men's tasks. They will be willing, many of them, to stay in their places, after the war is over. At what salary? And what about the men back Government find them work. It would be an easy task. If work can be found in destroying and wasting wealth, work can be found for the purpose of saving wealth. If the Government can organise the resources of the nation for war, it can organise them for peace.

We have yet to see what the Government can do in this matter. They seem to be waking up, but they don't get a move on until the last minute. They have tackled the ammunition problem at last, but they ought to have acted months ago. They have tinkered with the question of food and fuel prices, and nothing has been done. Prices are still rising. Bread is up again, and before the winter is through the poor may be suffering still more terribly than they have done.

It will be useless to talk about truces if profiteers are to be allowed to repeat their old tricks. The Government cannot make the masses believe that our very existence depends on them putting forth every ounce of energy if at the same time the food and fuel and rent sharks are permitted to rob them of that energy. If our case is so desperate as Mr. Lloyd George asserts let the Government make strikes and industrial disputes impossible. Let them commandeer all the industries connected with the necessaries of life. If labour is to be mobilised for the use of the nation, all the products of labour should be mobilised for the use of the nation.

The Daily Citizen,
March 26th. 1915.

MOBILISATION OF WOMEN.

ACTION BY WORKERS' COMMITTEE.

It was decided at yesterday's meeting of the Workers' National War Emergency Committee to convene a special conference of women's organisations—trade union, Socialist, Labour, and Suffragist, together with those unions catering for women membership or specially affected—to discuss the scheme recently put forth by the Board of Trade and the Board of Agriculture for bringing women into the ranks of agriculture in place of men called to the colours.

The Government scheme is chiefly designed for getting women into agriculture and such occupations as brushmaking, leather-stitching, clothing machining, and light machining for armaments.

The conference will meet in London in about three weeks' time, and will be presided over by Miss Mary Macarthur.

PENSIONERS HARD HIT.

The committee received reports of cases of distress of old age pensioners who, while able to sustain themselves prior to the war, are now unable to do so owing to the increase in food prices. It was stated that in some cases relief had been refused by local representative committees administering the Prince of Wales Fund.

A resolution was passed calling the attention of the Government to the serious hardship caused to old age pensioners owing to the rise in prices, and pointing out that the reported refusals of relief from the National Relief Fund were on the plea that although the pensioners were in distress owing to the war they were not unemployed owing to the war.

The resolution also pointed out that according to the model scale settled by the Cabinet Committee, with the recent amendments, the income of a single person might be made up to 11s. 9d. or 13s. 9d. per week, and of two people to 17s. 6d. or 19s. 6d. per week, as compared with the old age pension of 5s. It urged that in view of the fact that the National Relief Fund was intended to prevent distress during the war the Cabinet Committee and the Executive Committee of the Prince of Wales Fund be requested to issue instructions to local representative committees that old age pensioners were not ineligible for relief from the fund.

CASE OF MR. PETER LARKIN.

In connection with the administration of the Aliens' Restriction Act it was reported that Mr. Peter Larkin, brother of Mr. James Larkin, had been sentenced to a month's imprisonment for shipping under an assumed name and not giving the aliens officer his proper name. . . . Larkin, it was stated, had assumed the name to avoid victimisation a considerable period before the outbreak of the war, and the practice was a common one among seamen. The committee felt that in the circumstances the sentence was extremely heavy and decided to make representations to the Home Secretary.

ON WATCH.

A sub-committee consisting of Messrs. Sidney Webb, H. H. Slesser, H. M. Hyndman, and W. S. Sanders was appointed to report on the various enactments under the Defence of the Realm Act and similar emergency legislation.

Glasgow Evg. Citizen,
March 26th. 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR.

REGISTERING FOR WAR SERVICE.

GLASGOW'S LOYAL RESPONSE.

A gratifying response is being made in Glasgow and the West of Scotland to the Board of Trade's appeal to women to register for war service. In Scotland since Friday last over 3500 women have registered their names for service. The majority of these are in Glasgow and the West.

Mr .J Crammond, manager of the Glasgow Labour Exchange, interviewed to-day, said that women were wanted meantime in the following occupations:—Farm work, dairy work. leather stitching, brushmaking, clothing machining, and light machining for armament. All classes of women were registering. There were some of the leisured and middle classes who had no need to work, but offered to do anything in their power. Others with clerical experience, willing to give part time. All were very much in earnest. Quite a number, of course, were working women out of employment, and these had been transferred to the ordinary register for women.

"I wish to make it clear," said Mr Cramond, "that in supplying women for war service we will first exhaust our ordinary register; that is, women out of employment will be given work before we do anything in the way of utilising the services of those on the special register."

Armament Work.

Inquiries in the city showed that employers were fully alive to the possibilities of utilising the services of women where there was a shortage of male labour. One engineering firm was stated to have in contemplation the providing of a special shop for the employment of women on the making of shells. Such a project if carried out would give work to several hundred women.

Trade-unions had, of course, to be considered in taking such a step, and a "Citizen" reporter interviewed one of the men's officials as to the attitude of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers on the question. This official stated that one firm in Dumbartonshire had already in their employment about forty women working the automatic machines that were used in the making of shells, and the question had been raised by the A.S.E. in their conferences with the Government.

"We are likely to stretch as far as any other trade union," he said, "provided we have a guarantee that the employers will not gain more than 10 per cent. profit on the alteration. Anything over 10 per cent. would go to the State. We will require also the assurance that immediately the war is over we will return to the usual state of affairs."

As Car Conductors.

The men of the Tramway Department have loyally responded to the country's call, and although several hundred others have been engaged to fill the vacant places, Mr Dalrymple is still between 300 and 400 men short, which means that a large proportion are working seven days per week. Some motormen were making as much as 43s per week, and were naturally making no complaint, but the committee do not think such a state of matters is desirable if it can be avoided.

Inquiries made to-day showed that the Tramways Committee had still before them the question of the employment of women conductors, and Mr Dalrymple is making a report on the subject. In order to avoid trouble with the men, it has been suggested that the women should be engaged on the same terms and conditions as the men.

There are changes in the appearance of many large city offices, rows of desks which had hitherto been filled by men being now occupied by women. The public counters of our post-offices are now fully "manned" by women. From the Glasgow Post Office close on 900 men have gone on war service. About 100 extra women have been taken on, and about a third of the number were formerly in the service and have come back owing to the emergency. The work of these experienced women was highly praised by one of the officials who was seen to-day by a "Citizen" reporter. A skilled telegraphist was not to be got, he said, and in that department and at the counters the women's services have been invaluable.

663/59 663

The Challenge,
March 26th. 1915.

Industrial Notes.

THE Board of Trade Circular on "War Service for Women" has been well responded to in the quarter needed; and already some 6,000 to 7,000 women volunteers have offered their services. Criticism has taken shape in practical suggestions. The War Emergency Committee has, for instance, pointed out that there are still 60,000 men and boys and 4,000 women on the live register of the Labour Exchanges, and very many are working short time. Where possible their labour should be used before calling for volunteers. The employment of women in agricultural work is preferable to that of children of eleven and twelve years old—but the Board of Trade should see to it that a living wage is given. Mr. J. J. Mallon, Secretary of the Anti-Sweating League, has pointed out the necessity of training women before employing them, and Miss Courtney has suggested that the Prince of Wales's Fund and the Queen's Work for Women Fund should be used for this useful purpose. On the whole, the circular has been well received; but the general opinion is that the Board of Trade has underestimated the difficulties of transference; and the labour is not so mobile as it imagines. In London women are now acting as lift attendants, motor drivers, waiters, and as clerks at bookstalls and in banks.

* * *

The head-lines of the evening papers last week on "Labour Troubles" rivalled the war placards. The reason is not far to seek. Ever since last January well-informed people have known the seriousness of the position. It came to a point with the public utterance of Lord Kitchener, the Government Control of the Workshops, and the conference arranged by Mr. Lloyd George. Summed up as briefly as possible the position is this.

We are in the middle of the most desperate conflict of our national existence. The decision of that conflict on land (other things being equal) depends on the preponderance of men and of material the Allies can put into the field. In the western theatre the material becomes of absolutely first-rate importance. All the general staffs in Europe (except the German) underestimated the amount needed. Now, in such a crisis we find ourselves in danger of a shortage owing to a strike—a strike of which the employers have had three months' notice. Lord Lansdowne has said that the War Secretary's words were the most serious since the outbreak of the war.

In taking over the workshops full compensation was arranged for the masters—but no attention was paid to the men's demand. In consequence a working engineer protested last week in the Times that the men should not be treated "as fools or children or as mere muscular machines." These words represent the feeling of the engineers. It is said that the conferences have ended all further trouble. We hope so, but it is as well to remember the present temper of the men, and the fact that for the last five years or more the men do not always take their cue from their leaders.

This is evident from Lord Kitchener's letter to Mr. Sexton, the Secretary of the Liverpool Dockers. Mr. Sexton has said quite plainly that the men's action is damaging the nation, and their own union, and that the Government would soon interfere if the trouble continues.

The Daily Telegraph, March 26th. 1915.

WOMEN'S REGISTER.

FIRST RETURNS.

CHOICE OF CALLINGS.

By Our Civil Service Correspondent.

We are now able to give exact figures of the number of women who had, up to Tuesday last, registered for war service in each of the divisions into which the country is divided for Labour Exchange purposes, which correspond closely to well-marked geographical areas. For the London South-Eastern Division the numbers are 7,395, in addition to 1,871 enrolled at the Central Office, the latter total including some who have applied by post from districts outside the metropolis.

Coming to the provinces, the figures are:

South-Western Division	669
West Midlands	573
Yorkshire and East Midlands ...	1,618
North-Western Division (Lancashire and Cheshire)	715
Scotland and Northern England ...	2,689
Wales	339
Ireland	151

The grand total is 16,020, confirming the accuracy of the returns given by The Daily Telegraph yesterday.

This may suggest a very meagre response on the part of the women of the country, but it is explained that it is by no means indicative of the final answer which will be given to the nation's call. Under the circumstances, the Board of Trade take quite an optimistic view of the situation, and are sanguine that, given a little more time, the present numbers will be added to enormously.

WOMEN'S SOCIETIES.

It is pointed out that the scheme would not have become generally known in the provincial districts before Monday, and the returns received are regarded as practically representing only two days Nor as yet has there been time to obtain results from the work of the various women's societies, to which over 100,000 application forms have been forwarded. One society alone has taken over 25,000 forms, and another 12,000. All associations concerned with women's work have been appealed to by the Board of Trade, and one and all are eager to help, offering to arrange meetings to make displays in shop windows, and to do everything possible to further th project.

The pressing needs of agriculture are recognised. Already a scheme is in hand, in conjunction with the Board of Agriculture, for training women in the technical colleges. The number being so trained at present is small, but is expected to develop largely in the near future. Every effort will be made to give assistance to the farmers, but the difficulty in getting them to notify vacancies is complained of. In this connection it is interesting to note that the supply of women for milking is receiving particular attention. Hundreds of women have expressed a choice for agricultural and dairy work.

Many women have been already drafted to ammunition factories, where they are being trained; and, perhaps influenced by patriotic feelings, work of this kind seems to possess a decided attraction, judging by the preferences which they have expressed in applications for enrolment. Clerical work is expected to afford another wide field in which women's services can be utilised, especially where the applicants are without previous experience in any occupation and are unfitted for manual labour.

CURIOUS OCCUPATIONS.

Some of the occupations sought after denote the extraordinary range of activity and ambition of modern women. Not only have they applied to be employed as butchers' assistants and lady grooms, but some have even asked to be allowed to take charge of the wild beasts at the Zoo! More than one woman expressed a preference for wireless telegraphy—a branch of work for which they seem eminently suitable.

The question of the proper remuneration raises a very difficult problem. The Labour Exchanges, as a department, are, of course, neutral, but it is expected that the various associations devoted to women's interests will be able to bring sufficient influence to bear to secure fair treatment as between employer and employé. It is not a case of women undercutting or ousting men. It is a temporary expedient to meet an unexpected emergency

It was wise policy on the part of the Board of Trade, the first Government department to adopt the principle of equal pay for equal work, irrespective of sex, to entrust the prin-

Yorkshire Observer, March 26th. 1915.

663/60 663

THE OPPORTUNITY OF WOMEN FOR SERVICE.

GOVERNMENT SCHEME EXPLAINED IN LEEDS.

The Government scheme of war service for women was expounded by Miss Hartopp, the head of the Women's Labour Exchange in Leeds, at a meeting of the Leeds branch of the National Union of Women Workers, in the Masonic Hall, yesterday, Mrs. S. Bickersteth presiding. The women of England, said Miss Hartopp, had to-day a chance to show the stuff they were made of. She thought the appeal of the President of the Board of Trade to the women of the country had been somewhat misunderstood, and it had been thought that the registration was to obtain women for immediate employment. The object was to find out what reserve of women's labour, trained or untrained, could be made use of if required. If they were to keep the national services going, in a great many cases the women would have to take the place of the men who had gone to the war, and would have to carry on, so far as they were able, the men's work. The demand for women workers now was very largely for factory work and on farms, but if they were going to spare many more men from the national and municipal services more women would be required. There were numbers of young men engaged in those services, and men in the railway service who might have to go and fight their country's battle. Women of education could certainly take on that work if the need arose, and there might be an opportunity for women of every class to show in some real, practical way what they could do.

Leeds women, said the speaker, were responding splendidly to the call, but the response was coming almost overwhelmingly from the working-classes—the soldier's wife who wanted to do her little bit, and the woman, very often over 60, whose children had grown up and were away from home. She wanted to see that spirit matched by the great middle classes of the country. There were numbers of young women of from 18 years of age to 25 or 26 who were doing nothing in all the big cities of the country. Physically they were splendid, and they were capable of training. She believed that once the possibility of the need was put before them they would register. Big political associations, women's co-operative guilds, the British Women's Temperance Association, and the churches were being circularised and appealed to, and she believed there would be a pulpit appeal made on Sunday or the Sunday after. It was not necessary, added Miss Hartopp, that women who registered should be able to give the whole of their time. They could volunteer for part-time work.

Lady Dorothy Wood said that the Lady Mayoress was proposing to hold a meeting of women in the Town Hall on Tuesday evening next at 8 o'clock in order that the position might be explained.

THE RIGHTS OF SMALL STATES.

Mr. C. E. Vaughan (Emeritus Professor in Leeds University) delivered a lecture entitled "Our Duties and Responsibilities in the New Time." Hitherto in our social and political life, he said, we had lost to an untold extent because men had kept to men and women to women too much. Nothing but good could come from throwing our minds into the common stock, for women could do very much to win and steady the judgment of men, and vice versa. The first thing that they must clearly set their minds to in making peace was not to make a peace that should leave the seeds of war behind.

Reverting to the international situation, the lecturer said it was perfectly obvious that it was a mere accident which led Germany to turn upon Belgium, and that if it had suited her convenience at the moment she would have turned upon Holland or Switzerland. The chain of smaller communities on the western frontier of Germany was in constant danger of being trampled upon by a nation which knew no such thing as international right. It must be our endeavour to make such a peace that in the future these small nations should be free from the danger and from the brutal atrocities which Belgium had suffered during the last eight months. If they looked at the eastern part of Europe they saw the same thing repeated in regard to the small nations that were clamped up to Austria. These nations could, if they battered long enough, break the Austrian Empire in pieces, and it was their duty to do so. The Allies would come to these States not as the representatives of brute force, but as liberators. It would be the duty of the Allies to start these States in a position in which they could live their own lives and work out the international qualities which had been given them.

Enrolling Women Workers.

Women volunteers for industrial war service continue to enrol themselves in large numbers at the labour exchanges, and so late as to-day at the central office in Westminster there was an unceasing stream of applicants. It was evident some days ago that most of the women likely to present themselves at the Central Exchange would be of the middle classes. From the point of view of the promoters of this war service project it would, of course, be more satisfactory if a larger number of working-class women were able to offer themselves. It is impossible to make any analysis of the class origin of applicants throughout the country, since only the gross figures are at present available, but by the end of the week there will be full returns. There was some hope that the appeal would bring in a great many of the women who have experience of farm labour although they no longer do such work. It seems likely, however, that the returns from the purely agricultural districts will be less satisfactory in the number of applicants. That was to be expected. As it is not a transference of workers which is going on, but a tapping of sources of quite fresh labour, the offers which are of real value among the great number received will be so much definite gain to the industrial strength of the country, and this will be far from negligible. In the case of London some of the most valuable offers come from women who have worked at some skilled occupation and who are quite ready in this emergency to do some job for which their old work indirectly fitted them. On the whole the reservoir of available women's labour will be an industrial asset of considerable importance.

Aberdeen Free Press, March 26th. 1915.

WOMEN'S WORK IN WARTIME.

VOLUNTEERS FOR GOVERNMENT SCHEME.

The officials of the Aberdeen Labour Exchange, in common with those of similar Government departments throughout the country, are busily engaged compiling a list of women who are willing to undertake employment in various occupations so that men may be freed to take their place in the fighting line. Women are wanted to work in the following occupations, amongst others:—

Farm work, dairy work, leather stitching, brushmaking, clothing machinery, and light machinery for armament. Circulars have been sent to all the ministers in Aberdeen asking them to make the matter known to their congregations, and the various friendly societies in the city have also been communicated with.

Up to the present over 100 women, mostly of the well-to-do classes, have signified their willingness to undertake such employment. One lady, who thoroughly understands the handling of horses, is prepared to drive any description of lorry, with the exception of one used for the transportation of coal, and states that she is quite capable of doing her own harnessing. Another lady, who possesses her own motor-car is willing to undertake the duties of a chauffeur, and another would make herself useful in an ammunition factory. Many of them are desirous of taking up agriculture in its various branches, including dairying and market gardening, while others would be willing to fill secretarial positions.

There are, however, several hundreds of women on the ordinary register of the Labour Exchange who are in need of immediate employment as a means of subsistence, and these, naturally, will receive the preference should any large demand be made for female workers. Any woman who desires to register can do so by personal application at the nearest Exchange, or by filling up a form and posting it.

Aberdeen Free Press, March 26th 1915.

of the situation, and are sanguine that, given a little more time, the present numbers will be added to enormously.

WOMEN'S SOCIETIES.

It is pointed out that the scheme would not have become generally known in the provincial districts before Monday, and the returns received are regarded as practically representing only two days Nor as yet has there been time to obtain results from the work of the various women's societies, to which over 100,000 application forms have been forwarded. One society alone has taken over 25,000 forms, and another 12,000. All associations concerned with women's work have been appealed to by the Board of Trade, and one and all are eager to help, offering to arrange meetings to make displays in shop windows, and to do everything possible to further th· project.

The pressing needs of agriculture are recognised. Already a scheme is in hand, in conjunction with the Board of Agriculture, for training women in the technical colleges. The number being so trained at present is small, but is expected to develop largely in the near future. Every effort will be made to give assistance to the farmers, but the difficulty in getting them to notify vacancies is complained of. In this connection it is interesting to note that the supply of women for milking is receiving particular attention. Hundreds of women have expressed a choice for agricultural and dairy work.

Many women have been already drafted to ammunition factories, where they are being trained; and, perhaps influenced by patriotic feelings, work of this kind seems to possess a decided attraction, judging by the preferences which they have expressed in applications for enrolment. Clerical work is expected to afford another wide field in which women's services can be utilised, especially where the applicants are without previous experience in any occupation and are unfitted for manual labour.

CURIOUS OCCUPATIONS.

Some of the occupations sought after denote the extraordinary range of activity and ambition of modern women. Not only have they applied to be employed as butchers' assistants and lady grooms, but some have even asked to be allowed to take charge of the wild beasts at the Zoo! More than one woman expressed a preference for wireless telegraphy—a branch of work for which they seem eminently suitable.

The question of the proper remuneration raises a very difficult problem. The Labour Exchanges, as a department, are, of course, neutral, but it is expected that the various associations devoted to women's interests will be able to bring sufficient influence to bear to secure fair treatment as between employer and employé. It is not a case of women undercutting or ousting men. It is a temporary expedient to meet an unexpected emergency.

It was wise policy on the part of the Board of Trade, the first Government department to adopt the principle of equal pay for equal work, irrespective of sex, to entrust the practical administration of this new scheme to their women officials, who are sparing neither time nor energy to prove that they, too, are prepared to do a man's part in this supreme crisis. No doubt can exist of the ultimate response to the Government's appeal if the spirit of these hard-worked, enthusiastic, and able women officials represents in any degree the feelings of the women of this country.

WOMEN WORKERS.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE CONVENED.

The War Emergency Workers' National Committee yesterday again considered the Government's proposal to introduce women's labour into various forms of industry, so as to release men for military service. Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., presided.

At the conclusion of the sitting it was announced that it had been decided to convene a conference representative of women's organisations, including women's trade unions, Labour, Suffragist, and other societies affected by the Government proposals. Miss Mary Macarthur will preside, and it is expected that the conference will take place in about three weeks' time.

A sub-committee, consisting of Mr. Sidney Webb, Mr. H. H. Slesser, Mr. H. M. Hyndman, and Mr. W. G. Sanders, was appointed to draw up and present a report upon the various enactments under the Defence of the Realm Act and similar emergency legislation. Attention was drawn to cases of distress amongst old-age pensioners who are unable to provide for themselves as they were before the war owing to the enhanced prices. It was decided to ask the Government Committee and the Executive Committee of the Prince of Wales's Fund to issue instructions to local representative committees that old-age pensioners are not ineligible for relief from the Fund wanted to see that spirit matched by the great middle classes of the country. There were numbers of young women of from 18 years of age to 25 or 26 who were doing nothing in all the big cities of the country. Physically they were splendid, and they were capable of training. She believed that once the possibility of the need was put before them they would register. Big political associations, women's co-operative guilds, the British Women's Temperance Association, and the churches were being circularised and appealed to, and she believed there would be a pulpit appeal made on Sunday or the Sunday after. It was not necessary, added Miss Hartopp, that women who registered should be able to give the whole of their time. They could volunteer for part-time work.

Lady Dorothy Wood said that the Lady Mayoress was proposing to hold a meeting of women in the Town Hall on Tuesday evening next at 8 o'clock in order that the position might be explained.

THE RIGHTS OF SMALL STATES.

Mr. C. E. Vaughan (Emeritus Professor in Leeds University) delivered a lecture entitled "Our Duties and Responsibilities in the New Time." Hitherto in our social and political life, he said, we had lost to an untold extent because men had kept to men and women to women too much. Nothing but good could come from throwing our minds into the common stock, for women could do very much to win and steady the judgment of men, and vice versa. The first thing that they must clearly set their minds to in making peace was not to make a peace that should leave the seeds of war behind.

Reverting to the international situation, the lecturer said it was perfectly obvious that it was a mere accident which led Germany to turn upon Belgium, and that if it had suited her convenience at the moment she would have turned upon Holland or Switzerland. The chain of smaller communities on the western frontier of Germany was in constant danger of being trampled upon by a nation which knew no such thing as international right. It must be our endeavour to make such a peace that in the future these small nations should be free from the danger and from the brutal atrocities which Belgium had suffered during the last eight months. If they looked at the eastern part of Europe they saw the same thing repeated in regard to the small nations that were clamped up to Austria. Those nations could, if they battered long enough, break the Austrian Empire in pieces, and it was their duty to do so. The Allies would come to these States not as the representatives of brute force, but as liberators. It would be the duty of the Allies to start these States in a position in which they could live their own lives and work out the international qualities which had been given them.

WOMEN'S WORK IN WARTIME.

VOLUNTEERS FOR GOVERNMENT SCHEME.

The officials of the Aberdeen Labour Exchange, in common with those of similar Government departments throughout the country, are busily engaged compiling a list of women who are willing to undertake employment in various occupations so that men may be freed to take their place in the fighting line. Women are wanted to work in the following occupations, amongst others:—

Farm work, dairy work, leather stitching, brushmaking, clothing machinery, and light machinery for armament. Circulars have been sent to all the ministers in Aberdeen asking them to make the matter known to their congregations, and the various friendly societies in the city have also been communicated with.

Up to the present over 100 women, mostly of the well-to-do classes, have signified their willingness to undertake such employment. One lady, who thoroughly understands the handling of horses, is prepared to drive any description of lorry, with the exception of one used for the transportation of coal, and states that she is quite capable of doing her own harnessing. Another lady, who possesses her own motor-car is willing to undertake the duties of a chauffeur, and another would make herself useful in an ammunition factory. Many of them are desirous of taking up agriculture in its various branches, including dairying and market gardening, while others would be willing to fill secretarial positions.

There are, however, several hundreds of women on the ordinary registrar of the Labour Exchange who are in need of immediate employment as a means of subsistence, and these, naturally, will receive the preference should any large demand be made for female workers. Any woman who desires to register can do so by personal application at the nearest Exchange, or by filling up a form and posting it.

Morning Post,
March 26th. 1915.

WAR WORK FOR WOMEN.

ORGANISATION OF THE SCHEME.

The army of women anxious to work in industries where there is a shortage of labour and to take the places of men who are wanted at the front is being organised quietly, but none the less effectively. The returns of registrations received by the Board of Trade are very satisfactory. Women are registering at the rate of several thousand a day, and by the end of the week indications suggest that the number of registrations may be well over 20,000. Up till Tuesday night telegrams received from the Labour Exchanges throughout the country showed that 16,000 women had filled in application forms. It is expected that the first classified return will be available at the beginning of next week. It is being prepared by experts in employment, and it can be stated now that in the ammunition industry alone thousands of women will be required for the work of filling shells. The Board of Trade has standing orders to supply women for this work, and many have been placed in certain firms and have done shell-filling in ordinary times. But the need of shells is great, and consequently a very large number of women who have had no particular training will be required. Women engaged in industries which are slack—certain branches of the cycle trade, for example—have been transferred to ammunition work in the West Midlands. Firms are willing to employ them in shell-filling, to which work they soon get accustomed.

Opportunities in Agriculture.

Agriculture is another industry in which women may, to a large extent, take the places of men. It has been found that farmers cannot release men who desire to join the Army, for the reason that they are unable to replace them. The Board of Trade, in conjunction with the Board of Agriculture, is paying attention to the question of finding substitutes so that many men who are eager to enlist can be released. A scheme has been started for training women for agricultural work. The women's agricultural colleges throughout the country were approached, and at the present moment girls are undergoing a course of what is called "intensive training." It is an experiment. About one hundred girls are now hard at work, and in a few weeks it is expected that the experiment will be developed on a large scale. The Board of Trade is working in close co-operation with the Farmers' Unions throughout the country. Agricultural experts will advise the Board and indicate the needs of farmers as to the labour required through the officials of the local Labour Exchanges.

It is hoped, too, that many women will ultimately find their way into shops, thus setting free for military service a large number of shop assistants. It is understood that negotiations are going on with the Amalgamated Union of Shop Assistants to this end. In this case the women will have to undergo training, though it should be pointed out that in France the substitution of women for men in shops has presented no difficulties. Through the London County Council and the Grocers' Institute it is hope to start grocery classes for the training of women. It is suggested that the Central Committee of Women's Employment will assist women who are learning the grocery business. Many women and girls will be required for clerical work, and the Government will set the example to other employers by making temporary appointments in the various State Departments.

Engineering,
March 26th. 1915.

The Board of Trade issued last week the following statement dealing with the Government scheme for the employment of female labour in industrial concerns during the war :—

The President of the Board of Trade wishes to call attention to the fact that in the present emergency, if the full fighting power of the nation is to be put forth on the field of battle, the full working power of the nation must be made available to carry on its essential trades at home. Already, in certain important occupations there are not enough men and women to do the work. This shortage will certainly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting forces.

In order to meet both the present and the future needs of national industry during the war, the Government wish to obtain particulars of the women available, with or without previous training, for paid employment. Accordingly, they invite all women who are prepared, if needed, to take paid employment of any kind—industrial, agricultural, clerical, &c.—to enter themselves upon the Register of Women for War Service which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges.

Any woman living in a town where there is a Labour Exchange can register by going there in person. If she is not near a Labour Exchange, she can get a form of registration from the local agency of the Unemployment Fund. Forms will also be sent out through a number of women's societies.

The object of registration is to find out what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required. As from time to time actual openings for employment present themselves, notice will be given through the Labour Exchanges, with full details as to the nature of work, conditions, and pay, and, so far as special training is necessary, arrangements will, if possible, be made for the purpose.

Any woman who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service. Every woman should register who is able and willing to take employment.

By setting up this "Register of Women for War Service," the Board of Trade hope, in the first place, to obtain a census of all the available female labour supply, and then, from this reserve, to make good in some measure both the existing shortage in specific trades and any future shortages in the labour market that may be created by new demands on the manhood of the country. They will endeavour to ascertain as exhaustively as possible the occupations in which women have previously been engaged, and in which they could and would be ready to engage again, as well as those in which fresh volunteers could do very well with a little training. Having ascertained what the supply is, and classified it, they will be in a position to give reasonable assurances to employers in various trades and occupations that if patriotically they allow their men to go, women can be supplied to take their place. The 400 Labour Exchanges throughout the country have received instructions and registration forms. The total number of applications sent by females has reached a high figure.

663/61

663

The Langport Herald,
March 27th. 1915

What About Safeguards?

It would, of course, be easy to raise objections to a large increase of female labour in ordinary times; but the times are not ordinary. It is a case of national emergency, in the face of which many of the objections which might otherwise be urged have to be swept aside. This is willingly acknowledged by Labour leaders, who, however, will undoubtedly ask for certain safeguards. There are also points upon which they desire further information. Miss Mary Macarthur, who is secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, asks: "On what conditions are these women to be substituted for men? Are they to receive the same wages for the same work? What guarantee is to be given to men that, when they return to civil life, their situations will be open for them, and that the standard of conditions in their trades remain unimpaired? And if the men receive satisfactory guarantees, what is to happen to women who have taken their places, when they return, if in the meantime the women have become self-dependent?" Miss Macarthur declares that a national representative committee, including a strong representation of industrial interests, to lay down conditions of transference, is one of the first safeguards which must be insisted upon. Mrs. Fawcett, who is president of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, says that the one thing they are anxious to avoid is to supply a cheap form of labour and undercut men. They want to provide really efficient women, worthy of good wages. She trusts that the new demand for female labour will have the effect of raising the standard for women in regard to both work and wages.

The Cork Weekly News
March 29th. 1915.

WOMEN LABOUR VOLUNTEERS

The response to the Government's appeal for women labour volunteers has been sufficiently good to justify the hope that the scheme is destined to prove an unqualified success. Many thousands of applications were received at the Labour Exchanges in London alone within a few days after the announcement was made, and it is understood that the principal provincial centres can show first results proportionately as good. No doubt some of those who are offering their services are doing so in the hope of getting a "soft job" at a good salary, but this is emphatically not the case with the majority of the women who apply. It is generally realised that the volunteers wanted are those who are willing to undertake hard work of a kind usually performed by men, and most of the women who register their names harbour no illusions on this point. The scheme is an appeal to British women's spirit of self-sacrifice, and when the results are made known there is no doubt that it will be found that the best and most capable of the sex come forward in the hour of the country's need. It is probable that this mobilisation of woman labour will effect the release of hundreds of thousands of men of military age for war service, and there are not wanting those who are convinced that this latest Government move foreshadows the coming of conscription. Whether or no this is the case, it is certain that recruiting will benefit immensely by it. Men are wanted for the new armies, and there will be no excuse for those whose places can be taken by women to remain behind.

The Co-operative News, March 27th. 1915. 663/62 663

WOMEN'S CORNER.

ALL communications intended for this Page should be addressed to the Editor of the "Women's Corner," "Co-operative News" Office, Long Millgate, Manchester.

WOMEN'S OPPORTUNITIES IN WAR TIME.

Services Under Government Mobilisation.

It will be remembered by our readers that at the outbreak of the war we commented on the opportunities that might come to women of service for the country. We had in mind at that time services which could be given voluntarily, in such ways as the various committees for relief of distress, preserving the children from exploitation, nursing the sick, and all the other ways in which women have so freely and so bravely tried to meet the calls of the country.

But it seems now that other calls are to be made upon us for definite war services under government mobilisation, into which it seems possible there will enter something of the nature of military rule.

It was obvious quite early to all thinking women that if all the young men of the country were to be made available for defence, women would have to take their places in performing the necessary work at home. This time has come, and fortunately has not found women unprepared to respond.

Very shortly forms will be available at all Labour Exchanges upon which women and girls can offer their services, in general or particular trades, and from which lists workers will no doubt be drawn as occasion requires. Fortunately, the great women's organisations of the country have been preparing themselves for this crisis, and we are glad to learn that the Board of Trade has invited the co-operation of the National Union of Suffrage Societies in carrying out the Government's proposals for the organisation of women's work. The N.U.S.S. on its part is prepared to welcome the Government's scheme, provided that the necessary safeguards can be secured. In this sentence lies an all-important principle which, firmly carried out, will bring women workers at once into line with the great organised industries of the country.

The broad safeguards which the National Union sets out as being necessary are :—

(1) The necessity of equal pay for equal work, thus avoiding the undercutting of men.

(2) The great importance of training.

(3) The securing of good conditions as to housing, &c., especially in agriculture.

Just as the Government has found it necessary that the volunteer soldier shall be well fed, well clothed, and well trained before he can be sent to the field, just so it should be brought to understand that an army of women must be efficiently equipped before it can do effective service in the industrial field.

It is greatly to be feared that for a time the country will suffer from the bad practices of the past, which have allowed girls to escape effective training in practical adaptability and the use of tools. Not one girl typist or dressmaker in a hundred, we venture to say, is ever taught as part of her business the mechanism and care of her sewing machine or her typewriter. She uses it, or abuses it, but she does not understand it. Much of this kind of ignorance must be overcome by training before women will be able to render full service in some of the work which will have to be done by them.

The question of equal pay for equal work will need close watching in the interests of the workers. This point was interestingly illustrated at the recent quarterly meetings of the Co-operative Wholesale Society. At the London meeting, for instance, several pertinent questions were asked as to the employment of women in the offices of the society—a new departure for the C.W.S. It was asked whether the women engaged to fill the vacant places of men who had enlisted would do the same work and receive the same pay.

The answer given was to the effect that in no case was the woman doing precisely the same work, and in no case was she receiving the same rate of pay, but that work was given to women which was suitable to them. For instance, typing was illustrated as work hardly suitable for men, but suitable for women. The inference being that when men did the typing some other more suitable work was added, and that readjustments were now made to enable women to do the typing—at women's rates of wages. With this explanation the delegates appeared to be satisfied, and when an additional assurance was given that if at any time it was found necessary to employ a woman on the same work as a man, she would be paid at the same rate as the man, there was sufficient applause to show that this principle would have the support of the delegates.

But even in the co-operative movement, where we have the minimum scale to begin on (a scale that is out of date now, alas ! owing to the rise in prices), the question will need watching.

The whole problem is new, and opens out possibilities for fresh exploitation of women's labour on the one hand, and fresh advances towards better conditions on the other. Co-operation must always be on the side of the better conditions, and we would like to know that if, as seems quite possible, any of our co-operative factories should be required for the purpose of doing Government work with the aid of women's labour, the conditions under which they were employed should rank as a model to the employers of the country.

This is a gigantic task which Lord Kitchener has set before us, but it is one which has already brought to the front powers of organisation, gifts of initiative, and strength of endurance which have the force of true statesmanship in women as well as in men, and he did well to appeal to " the whole nation."

Let us hope that one golden gain will rise from the testing time through which we are now passing, in the fuller realisation of the knowledge that in all things women are worthy to stand shoulder to shoulder with their brothers in the preservation of national life and the safeguarding of national honour.

The Western Press,
March 27th. 1918.

WOMEN'S WORK AND THE WAR.

It was yesterday announced that a conference will be held with the view to discuss the Government's proposals for the utilisation of women's work during the war. These proposals have already been submitted to the country, and the first results of the appeal for women applicants may be considered to be satisfactory. Up to the present it is estimated that about twenty thousand women have signified their readiness to engage in some occupation likely to have the effect of releasing men for military service. Some critics are inclined to believe that the total is a small one. So it may be; but it is necessary to recollect that the appeal has only been a few days before the country, and that it has not yet become known to many important communities. The propaganda is to be continued with vigour; and when the National Conference is held a fresh and strong impulse will be imparted to the movement. The Government, moreover, has just issued a strong appeal for more nurses from the civilian hospitals, and for the training of as many probationers as possible in these institutions. To this appeal a generous response is almost certain, for nursing is pre-eminently woman's work. But there are many other important fields open to the women who are anxious to render assistance at these critical times. Hard manual labour is not for women as a rule, though there are women who would not hesitate to undertake even that in an emergency. Numerous posts are now held by men eligible for military service that could be filled by women, and duties that could be as well discharged by women as by men. The Government proposal is that all women willing to serve at the present crisis should register themselves at the four hundred Labour Bureaux throughout the country. By this means it will be possible to find out the reserve of female employment, and to utilise that reserve as the necessity arises. All this is in natural pursuance of the scheme of national industrial mobilisation which has been lucidly explained and commented upon throughout the whole country. The "Register of Women for War Service" is rather a misleading description of the scheme. It is not exactly for "war service" that the women are required, but for service which will, directly or indirectly, as the case may be, lead to the augmentation of the British Army. When the war is over the services of these women will be dispensed with; and that may appear a rather serious difficulty which will have to be faced in due course. Therefore, it would appear to be desirable that the majority of women to be mobilised during the war should be drawn from classes not already in employment, and who would be in a position to return to their present status when the war is finished. A special appeal is thus made to the well-to-do classes of women, and more especially to married women, who have no need to seek employment now for the mere sake of the wages that they may earn. Applicants are invited to state what kind of work they would prefer to be engaged upon during the progress of the war. No hard and fast lines will be observed in the allocation of posts, and it will be the duty of those who have charge of the Board of Trade Department for the mobilisation of the working women to find as congenial employment as possible for each applicant. Advice on this special point will be taken from the executives of the many women's societies which now exist — the trade unions, the political associations, the labour societies, and all the other branches of what is really one vast organisation for the promotion of the welfare of women. Women of all grades of society have already realised, or are beginning to realise, how much can be done on their part to facilitate the augmentation of the British Expeditionary and Defence Forces to the necessary point; and in the near future we shall witness

Daily Telegraph,
March 27th. 1918.

663/63

663

WOMEN AND WAR WORK.

RESPONSE TO THE APPEAL.

When the Government last week made its appeal to women to come forward and assist where labour was short, as in the making of items of armament, in leather work, and on the land, there were those who found points to criticise in detail. No doubt, with the machinery of the Labour Exchanges ready to hand, it was tempting to use them as the agents for registration. But the fact that was overlooked in selecting them was that they have never been particularly popular among women. The factory worker to some extent has availed herself of them, but the dressmaker had to be coaxed towards them, while other classes entirely avoided them.

In the 10,000 or so who have registered their names there has been not a small proportion of educated women, who have come forward from motives of devoted patriotism, and who would give their services and go anywhere if they thought it would help to end the war a day sooner. The "young lady," however, whose idea of work is something "light and genteel," as being a typist or a bookkeeper, would not only feel she had gone down woefully in the social scale if she were called upon to work in a factory, even though it brought her much higher pay, but her prejudices would be entirely against anything connected with a Labour Exchange. An appeal that came through such agencies would not move her.

Then must be taken into account the fact that in many of the less skilled trades there is abundance of work. During the present month the competitions of the various organisations of working girls' clubs have been taking place, but never has there been so much difficulty in getting the girls together for practice and drill. In South London, for instance, the packing of many different commodities in tins to go to the troops at the front demanded continual overtime work, and all who could possibly be secured for this kind of labour were able to find situations.

DOMESTIC CONSIDERATIONS.

Not to be forgotten, too, are the exigencies of domestic life, which far more often in the case of women than men prevent the entry upon new spheres of work. The Fabian Women's Group has recently brought out a pamphlet dealing with some of the economic problems that the war has emphasised in regard to employment, and a section of that is devoted to the question of the dependents of wage-earning women. Inquiries were instituted covering many thousands of cases, and in all spheres of occupation, and it was found that about half of the women were supporting wholly or in greater part children, parents, sisters, and even brothers. Among laundresses it appeared that 75 per cent. had dependents, while of cotton spinners the proportion was 66 per cent., of domestic servants 53 per cent., and nurses 52 per cent.

In the Post Office it was shown that 42 per cent. of the women of more than ten years' service had to help towards the maintenance of some relative. At the humbler end of the scale, working girls under 20 years of age were either helping the family budget with their earnings, or where their wages were very low, were contriving to keep themselves. With women of the professional classes a surprisingly large number had to help in the support of some one else.

In many such cases, experience shows that perhaps the dependent relative has brought something into the common stock, as perhaps the furniture. But the outstanding fact is that by keeping together, the home, such as it is, is maintained. To transfer a tailoress, say, from London, where she and her mother have it may be their two rooms, and are able to exist in tolerable comfort, to Leeds, where she would have to go into some sort of lodgings, would mean on a humble scale the upkeep of two homes. For that reason alone, women have much more limited scope as to how and where they can dispose of their labour.

OF GOOD SIGNIFICANCE.

Taking these and many more influences into consideration, the 10,000 already registered means a better response than appears on the surface. Miss Macarthur, with full knowledge of the female labour market, points out that there are some 50,000 women out of employment at the present time. But a very appreciable number of these are connected with what have been designated the "luxury trades." Such women have not perhaps much imagination, and they might fear the possibility of being sent, on registration, to do farm work, their minds conjuring up visions of ploughing or pitching hurdles for sheep folds.

The response is not yet adequate to the nation's requirements. That may be admitted. But in many directions it has shown that there is plenty of sound [illegible] among those who are offering their services, as in the case of the two or three who possess exceptional knowledge in regard to applied electricity. There are those again who are capable of

Yorkshire Observer,
March 27th. 1918.

WORK FOR WOMEN DURING THE WAR.

FREE FARM AND DAIRY TRAINING.

The response of Bradford women to the request of the Board of Trade for information as to the willingness of women to undertake work of various kinds, if called upon, has been moderately but not overwhelmingly good. Perhaps the request has not been clearly understood, and it is possible, if not probable, that the place for registration (the Labour Exchange in Bridge Street) has not been generally known. Nevertheless over 100 Bradford women have declared their readiness to undertake, as a special and urgent need, work in a variety of callings.

The terms of the question asked by the Board of Trade lack nothing in comprehensiveness. "Are you able to work and free to work, but not working?" Such a query should strike a responsive chord in the hearts of all earnest women whom it affects. All that is required at present is that the names and addresses of those willing to work should be registered at the labour exchanges, together with the character of the labour they are able to undertake, or for which they are ready to be trained. Farm and dairy work, leather stitching, brushmaking, machine stitching of clothing, and a variety of light machining for armament purposes, are classes of work which, it is considered, a great many girls and women could undertake, and a great deal is needed to be done in such forms of occupation in order that the military services may be kept up to concert pitch.

Some of the offers made in Bradford display a fine courage on the part of those who make them. More than one woman has declared a willingness to relieve a taxi-cab driver, and at least one is ready even to assume the rôle of a despatch rider. A number would willingly become tramway conductors and many are eager to turn to farm work of almost all kinds. Some of those who have expressed a preference for farming occupations have already had experience or training in such work. It will be an encouragement to others to know that the Board of Trade are offering free training for a fortnight, with board and lodging, at the Garforth Experimental Farm for those who are prepared to undertake work at farms and dairies after such training. It is understood that in the South of England ladies with large residences are offering portions of their houses as hostels for women farm workers.

A number of married women who formerly worked in factories have offered to go back temporarily to their old employment, and others are prepared to return to their former positions as shop assistants. Many offer, of course, to take up clerical work, and some are ready to become carriage cleaners on the railways, letter sorters, or temporary postmen. Some mistresses of households are offering to give up their maids and undertaking to reinstate them after the war. It is intended to arrange a public meeting in the course of the next few weeks and to obtain, if possible, the presence of some very prominent social worker in order to stir up greater enthusiasm.

In Leeds a good deal of interest has been aroused in the scheme, and no fewer than 500 names have already been entered on the register.

military services that could be filled by women, and duties that could be as well discharged by women as by men. The Government proposal is that all women willing to serve at the present crisis should register themselves at the four hundred Labour Bureaux throughout the country. By this means it will be possible to find out the reserve of female employment, and to utilise that reserve as the necessity arises. All this is in natural pursuance of the scheme of national industrial mobilisation which has been lucidly explained and commented upon throughout the whole country. The "Register of Women for War Service" is rather a misleading description of the scheme. It is not exactly for "war service" that the women are required, but for service which will directly or indirectly, as the case may be, lead to the augmentation of the British Army. When the war is over the services of these women will be dispensed with; and that may appear a rather serious difficulty which will have to be faced in due course. Therefore, it would appear to be desirable that the majority of women to be mobilised during the war should be drawn from classes not already in employment, and who would be in a position to return to their present status when the war is finished. A special appeal is thus made to the well-to-do classes of women, and more especially to married women, who have no need to seek employment now for the mere sake of the wages that they may earn. Applicants are invited to state what kind of work they would prefer to be engaged upon during the progress of the war. No hard and fast lines will be observed in the allocation of posts, and it will be the duty of those who have charge of the Board of Trade Department for the mobilisation of the working women to find as congenial employment as possible for each applicant. Advice on this special point will be taken from the executives of the many women's societies which now exist — the trade unions, the political associations, the labour societies, and all the other branches of what is really one vast organisation for the promotion of the welfare of women. Women of all grades of society have already realised, or are beginning to realise, how much can be done on their part to facilitate the augmentation of the British Expeditionary and Defence Forces to the necessary point; and in the near future we shall witness some remarkable changes in the industrial world. The anticipation is that large numbers of women will be drafted into agriculture and gardening, occupations which afford many important opportunities, and that more women than ever will be absorbed in the ammunition factories. Clerical work, already largely done by women, will depend on their services still more; telegraphy, both wireless and line, will more than ever become a department of feminine effort: the clothing factories will be very largely staffed by women. The female tramcar driver and conductor are already with us; and the female chauffeur has come to stay. Indeed, all round there are fields for feminine labour which will liberate the men for military service, and should ever compulsory service be enforced in this country, the reserve forces of the women in the industrial and other fields will be found to be an asset of the highest national value. Some economists may object to this wholesale displacement of men's labour. It is, no doubt, a drastic scheme: but it is necessary always to bear in mind that we are passing through a crisis unparalleled in the history of the British Empire.

much difficulty in getting the girls together for practice and drill. In South London, for instance, the packing of many different commodities in tins to go to the troops at the front demanded continual overtime work, and all who could possibly be secured for this kind of labour were able to find situations.

DOMESTIC CONSIDERATIONS.

Not to be forgotten, too, are the exigencies of domestic life, which far more often in the case of women than men prevent the entry upon new spheres of work. The Fabian Women's Group has recently brought out a pamphlet dealing with some of the economic problems that the war has emphasised in regard to employment, and a section of that is devoted to the question of the dependents of wage-earning women. Inquiries were instituted covering many thousands of cases, and in all spheres of occupation, and it was found that about half of the women were supporting wholly or in greater part children, parents, sisters, and even brothers. Among laundresses it appeared that 75 per cent. had dependents, while of cotton spinners the proportion was 66 per cent., of domestic servants 53 per cent., and nurses 52 per cent.

In the Post Office it was shown that 42 per cent. of the women of more than ten years' service had to help towards the maintenance of some relative. At the humbler end of the scale, working girls under 20 years of age were either helping the family budget with their earnings, or where their wages were very low, were contriving to keep themselves. With women of the professional classes a surprisingly large number had to help in the support of some one else.

In many such cases, experience shows that perhaps the dependent relative has brought something into the common stock, as perhaps the furniture. But the outstanding fact is that by keeping together, the home, such as it is, is maintained. To transfer a tailoress, say, from London, where she and her mother have it may be their two rooms, and are able to exist in tolerable comfort, to Leeds, where she would have to go into some sort of lodgings, would mean on a humble scale the upkeep of two homes. For that reason alone, women have much more limited scope as to how and where they can dispose of their labour.

OF GOOD SIGNIFICANCE.

Taking these and many more influences into consideration, the 10,000 already registered means a better response than appears on the surface. Miss Macarthur, with full knowledge of the female labour market, points out that there are some 50,000 women out of employment at the present time. But a very appreciable number of these are connected with what have been designated the "luxury trades." Such women have not perhaps much imagination, and they might fear the possibility of being sent, on registration, to do farm work, their minds conjuring up visions of ploughing or pitching hurdles for sheep folds.

The response is not yet adequate to the nation's requirements. That may be admitted. But in many directions it has shown that there is plenty of sound commonsense among those who are offering their services, as in the case of the two or three who possess exceptional knowledge in regard to applied electricity. There are those again who are capable of driving a horse-van or managing a motor delivery car, or who would act as checkers or timekeepers. The more educated woman moreover is not shirking the idea of working on the land as in gardening or the lighter branches of agriculture, a fact to which the rush for some elementary teaching at the horticultural colleges for the training of girls testifies abundantly. And the spirit that underlies English womanhood at this crisis is perhaps most forcibly shown in the 70,000 who are enrolled in the Voluntary Aid Detachments, ready to fulfil the hardest and most subordinate tasks at the Red Cross Hospitals.

WANTED A LEADER.

What is perhaps really wanted to start a great movement enthusiastically is a powerful and commanding woman leader. Is there no woman whose name carries real weight who could come forward and organise a force of women prepared to work in any capacity? There has been no difficulty in doing this for local movements, as in the providing of comforts for wounded men returning, or of opening recreation rooms in the vicinity of camps, or in starting clubs for girls as a counter attraction to running about aimlessly in the streets. What women can do when they throw their whole energies into an undertaking has been told this week by Lady Lugard, who in forty-eight hours called up the whole organisation which has dealt so humanely and admirably with over 100,000 Belgian refugees.

The Board of Trade to the average feminine mind is a mere abstraction. What is wanted to rouse latent goodwill and energy is a more personal note. It is all very well to say that more brushmakers are required and registration forms may be had at the nearest Labour Exchange. But it would go home much more directly if some well-known woman went to a factory turning out small arms, assumed a general sort of supervision, and publicly announced that she wanted 200 girls to fill cartridges or burnish bayonets demanded for the needs of the men at the front. Let some factory concerned with the supply of war munitions try the experiment. It would not be costly and it would probably bring in all the extra assistance required.

of the offers made in Bradford display a fine courage on the part of those who make them. More than one woman has declared a willingness to relieve a taxi-cab driver, and at least one is ready even to assume the rôle of a despatch rider. A number would willingly become tramway conductors and many are eager to turn to farm work of almost all kinds. Some of those who have expressed a preference for farming occupations have already had experience or training in such work. It will be an encouragement to others to know that the Board of Trade are offering free training for a fortnight, with board and lodging, at the Garforth Experimental Farm for those who are prepared to undertake work at farms and dairies after such training. It is understood that in the South of England ladies with large residences are offering portions of their houses as hostels for women farm workers.

A number of married women who formerly worked in factories have offered to go back temporarily to their old employment, and others are prepared to return to their former positions as shop assistants. Many offer, of course, to take up clerical work, and some are ready to become carriage cleaners on the railways, letter sorters, or temporary postmen. Some mistresses of households are offering to give up their maids and undertaking to reinstate them after the war. It is intended to arrange a public meeting in the course of the next few weeks and to obtain, if possible, the presence of some very prominent social worker in order to stir up greater enthusiasm.

In Leeds a good deal of interest has been aroused in the scheme, and no fewer than 500 names have already been entered on the register.

663/64 668.

The Peoples Journal,
March 27th. 1915.

Mobilising the British Women.

What will Happen After the War.

By A. MacCallum Scott, M.P.

WE of this generation, and, indeed, of this century, stand too close to the European war to be able to judge of the full magnitude of the great upheaval which is changing the current of world history. The war has broken up the whole political, social, and industrial structure of Western civilisation. Everything is in the melting pot. It will be a new world which will come out of it, but what the political, social, and industrial framework of that world will be is as yet incalculable.

Among those many processes of change, not the least important are those which affect women as a sex. The women of Europe are by no means mere passive onlookers amidst these tragic events. Their share in the war is not merely the anguish of the bereaved wife, or mother, or sister, or sweetheart. Nor is the problem merely that of the huge surplus of women over men, which, owing to the slaughter of so many men in the flower of their youth, will be one of the features of the first generation after the war. It is a serious enough problem in itself what is to become of all that generation of noble womanhood which is to be denied that full development and joy of life which only come with motherhood. But apart from grief and, apart from the problem of the "surplus" women, there are even now processes at work which are profoundly affecting the position of women as a whole in our society. For them the war means a new outlook, a wider mental horizon, the breaking down of closed doors, and emancipation from the bonds of inveterate social conventions and prejudices.

The Government's Appeal.

The first and most conspicuous factor in that change in this country is the Government's appeal to the women of the nation for industrial volunteers in order either to increase the supply of munitions of war or to release men to join the fighting line. In order to prevail in this war we must maintain a relentless and increasing pressure both of men and of metal on the German front. Already we have approaching 3,000,000 men in the field or in training, and we are spending one and three-quarter millions sterling a day on prosecuting the war.

The withdrawal of 3,000,000 of our best industrial producers, and the diversion of the labour of millions of others to keep them supplied with munitions of war, has dangerously reduced the producing capacity of this country in regard to the necessaries of life or other products which we can exchange abroad for necessaries of life. There are still approximately as many mouths to fill and bodies to clothe, but there is less to go round. We are spending more and producing less. That is the chief cause of the alarming rise in prices, with its inevitable concomitant of labour unrest. There is but one effective way of relaxing this pressure. Somehow or other we must increase our producing capacity. We must tap new sources of labour. Hence the appeal for women volunteers for men's work.

The most important feature of this appeal is that it is primarily addressed not to the women wage-earners who are already enrolled in the industrial army, but to the domesticated women, those who have hitherto had no call to go out into the world to work for their livings, the housekeepers and home-makers, or the idle and leisured. More is wanted than to divert women who are already industrial producers from one sphere of employment to another. We must increase the total number of producers. It is to the wife or widow in her comfortable home, to the fine, athletic girls and young women of our day whose energy is devoted to sport or hobbies or social pleasures and routine that the call has come. It is the "womanly woman" in the old conventional sense who is wanted to help the nation in this hour of peril.

A Splendid Response.

The response to the appeal was not a moment in doubt. The stream of women volunteers to register their names at the Labour Exchanges has been in its way as remarkable as the stream of men to the recruiting offices to join "Kitchener's Army." In the first two days over 6000 women registered themselves at the London Labour Exchanges alone, and there are 400 other Exchanges scattered throughout the country. And the movement is only beginning. There are hundreds of thousands of eligible women whom the appeal has not yet directly reached.

It is impossible to foresee all the results of this mobilisation of women from the homes of Britain. Who could have foretold that so simple a thing as the safety bicycle coming into vogue 30 years ago would have been the powerful lever it has been for the emancipation of the women of the middle class? It ended the age of prunes and prisms, and ushered in the age of athletic girlhood. It brought woman out of the cloistered home into the open world, and made her the companion in the sports and pleasures of man.

If the use of the bicycle could accomplish so much, how much greater are the changes which may be brought about by this war-work of women? It is not merely a matter of the sweeping away of lingering anachronisms like the refusal of degrees at Oxford and Cambridge, or their exclusion from the professions of barrister and solicitor; it means a new conception of the mutual dependence of men and women upon each other's work, and of a vast extension of women's interests beyond the home circle.

Three Important Questions.

Three interesting questions present themselves—What wages are to be paid to these women volunteers who have replaced men in the industrial army? What is to happen to them when the men return after the war? What will be the effect of this development upon the demand for woman suffrage?

It would be outside the scope of this article to labour the arguments for and against the familiar and delusive cry of "equal pay for equal work." It is sufficient to say that, while society is organised on the family system, and while the average male wage-earner supports a family, and the average female wage-earner does not, the leading economists of both sexes are agreed that it is to the interest of men and women alike that a different standard of wages should prevail in respect of their labour. It would, moreover, be inexpedient that these new women recruits to the industrial ranks should be paid on a scale much higher than the women already employed there.

After the War.

Some of the Trade Unions have very naturally been asking what is to happen after the war. Is there to be any guarantee that men returning to civil life will not find their jobs taken from them by women employed under this scheme, who will be retained because their labour is cheaper? There will be no more danger of that than there is at present. In tasks which require physical strength, sustained endurance, a long apprenticeship, or regularity of out-put men need never fear the industrial competition of women. It would, moreover, be selfish ingratitude if women as a class were excluded by law from any sphere of employment for which they had proved their aptitude.

Another safeguard for men returning to their jobs lies in the fact that the Government's appeal is chiefly addressed to those women who are not at present wage-earners, and do not require to be wage-earners. There are some women who go out to work from personal preference. They do not care for household duties. But these are the minority. The vast majority of women wage-earners go out to work from necessity, not from preference. They are either occupying the few years preparatory to marriage, or the opportunity of marriage is denied to them.

The new industrial army of women would be a temporary one, as much as Kitchener's Army. "For the war only!"

Finally, there is the question of the effect of this new development upon the demand for woman suffrage. For my own part I have opposed woman suffrage in the past, and I have not seen any occasion to alter my view. This is not the time for argument on so controversial a subject. Our first concern is to defeat Germany, and if we fail to do so votes will be of very little avail either to men or to women.

This has been fully recognised by the Woman Suffrage Societies generally. In particular the most militant of all the Societies has espoused for the time being the national cause. Miss Christabel Pankhurst has delivered a series of remarkable orations in America, which have had a powerful effect on neutral opinion there.

When the war is over we will all have clearer and larger views, and will have jettisoned much lumber of ancient conventions and formulæ.

663/65 663.

The Queen,
March 27th. 1915.

We comment elsewhere on the response made to the Government's scheme for registering women willing to take up during the war work usually done by men. We have remarked before now in these notes upon the fact that there has never been a great war in which the women of this country have had so active a part to play as they have in this war. There has never been a war in which women were less condemned to sit and wait with idle hands. There are so many organisations at work for supplying the troops in the field or in camp with comforts and necessaries that if one of them has for the moment enough in store, there is always another to which garments and presents of all kinds may be sent. And not the least interesting part of the whole business is that on the whole these activities have been so well directed. Every now and then there may have been cases in which the zeal was greater than the capacity, and a good many committees have had to endure the presence of members who had joined only because they felt they must be "in the movement," and brought neither energy nor wisdom to their task. But for the most part the impression given has certainly been one of sound sense and capable management, whether the work in hand has been the collection of socks and belts and shirts, or the supplementing of the hospital system, or the often complicated and difficult matter of dealing with refugees. Terrible as the war is, there are many aspects of it which may well lead to such a reflection as that to which the Bishop of London gave utterance at Harrow the other day, when he said that he hoped that the end of the war would not be the end of the new spirit aroused in England—a spirit the like of which the country had not known for five hundred years. One of these aspects is certainly the revelation of the change in the character of women. We may surely say to ourselves that one reason (and perhaps the most satisfactory reason) why women have had so little of the merely idle waiting at home in war-time is that they are now so much more capable of taking their share, so much more experienced in working together, so much better at the management and direction of affairs.

But at the moment when this capacity and experience has just been recognised by the new scheme of the Government, we should like to say a word for a certain sphere of work which might possibly be falling into the background. It is work which may, perhaps, suffer from being a little too like the work of the old days of peace. There never was a time when there was such a good chance for improving the conditions of life in the homes of the working people. Speaking generally, those homes are not at the moment as poor as they used to be. In very many cases where the man has gone into the Army the allowances for wife and family are actually higher than the man's wage used to be. Even where this is not the case there is the difference made by not having to keep the man, or to allow for his pocket-money out of the household funds. In other cases, where the man is still at home, the diminution of unemployment has made things better over the country as a whole. All this gives an opportunity which ought not to be lost. We hope that with all the special work which the war has given to women, some will nevertheless be paying attention to such comparatively peaceful occupations as trying to make the better conditions in cottage homes produce real good. There is so great a chance now of seeing that the young generation in those homes gets a better start in life, with better food and clothes, and of seeing that when the men do return at last they shall find their homes better and not worse than when they left them. A great deal is being done, we know; the war clubs for women are excellent institutions. But we hope that the homes are being helped, too, with advice and with the friendly watchfulness that can do so much.

The Yorkshire Post.
March 27th. 1915.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

PUBLIC MEETING TO BE HELD IN LEEDS.

The scope of that service which is at once the privilege and the dignity of the day has been strikingly extended by the appeal of the Board of Trade to the women of England. "War Service for Women," as an historic and comprehensive proposal is shortly entitled, represents a well-intentioned, and, in the opinion of the Government, an imperative endeavour to discover how much and what kind of women's labour can in an emergency be utilised to maintain or accelerate certain productive works hitherto supported mainly by men. The huge numbers of men who have spiritedly withdrawn themselves from the ranks of peaceful industry and the professions to assume the stern and courageous work of fighting the enemies of civilisation and the Empire, have left gaps which it is difficult to fill, because in these cases men cannot come forward in the same number as the men who have gone. Nobly as women have renounced the hour of ease to immerse themselves in useful and deeply appreciated voluntary work for the comfort and consolation of their men folk, the new opportunity for war service suggests no lower conception of duty and patriotism. In its details, the project may seem a work-a-day and prosaic thing, but it demands in full measure those fine qualities of patient self-sacrifice and unswerving devotion which are especially associated with the sex to whom the appeal is directed.

The decision of the Board of Trade to open at its Labour Exchanges a register of women for war service has been announced, with the further information that women are wanted at once for such occupations as farm work, dairy work, leather stitching, brushmaking, clothing machining, and light machining for armament, but no special knowledge is needed to realise that nursing and certain clerical duties will shortly make their claims for female helpers. This is the proposition for the women of all classes who would no longer be passive patriots. It may be that these occupations denoted would not fall within the physical compass of some who are willing to give what service they can. All questions of ability, amount of time available, payment for services, will, however, be expertly dealt with by administrative officers. The use of the Labour Exchanges is doubtless convenient from the Government point of view, but is unfortunate otherwise; for the class of women now appealed to quite naturally do not care to apply at the Labour Exchanges, and a fresh scheme has to be devised for them. Leeds women may find it preferable to make their applications and inquiries at the offices of the Lady Mayoress's Committee in Basinghall Street. This Committee, which has possessed during months of valuable work a smoothly working organisation, is in complete harmony with the Board of Trade's proposal, and as an earnest of its endeavours to accomplish the desired end, a public meeting has been arranged to take place in the Leeds Town Hall on Tuesday night at eight o'clock, when all matters relating to war service for women will be discussed and explained. The Lady Mayoress (Mrs. J. E. Bedford) will preside. The Lord Mayor will also be present, along with, among others, Lady Harewood and Lady Dorothy Wood. Miss Thornton, one of the Board of Trade's chief organisers of women's work, will attend and deal with the whole subject. The present appeal is somewhat different from that which was made for voluntary helpers in August last, but as then there were 3,000 volunteers in Leeds, many of whom were given useful work to do, it is anticipated with confidence that the city has among its women residents a great number who will temporarily accept paid service, if suitable work can be found for them. Already 600 women have registered at the local Labour Exchange for war service. These are mostly young married women who were skilled clothing operatives.

The Times,
March 27th. 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR WORK.

A BIRMINGHAM CASE FOR SIR GEORGE ASKWITH.

(FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.)

BIRMINGHAM, MARCH 26.

The letter from Miss Violet Markham in The Times of to-day on the subject of women and war work attracted a great deal of sympathetic attention in Birmingham, where there are a very large number of women engaged in factories and workshops. In normal times the numerous light trades carried on in the city find employment for thousands of women and girls, but during the last few weeks many more have been taken on to fill the places of men who have enlisted.

Mr. W. J. Davis, President of the Trade Union Congress, and secretary of the National Society of Brassworkers and Metal Mechanics, informs me of several instances where women are being exploited by some of the worst of the employers. He has successfully interfered in a case where women had been put to shell work, which was too laborious for them. In another case he has asked Sir George Askwith to interfere to prevent the employment of women on moulding machines.

In his letter Mr. Davis points out that this is the first time in the history of the casting trade that women have been asked to do brass moulding; that the work is altogether unfitted for them: that moulds made by women are no good unless molten metal is poured into them by men, and that their employment may bring about a national strike of brass-moulders.

Mr. Davis brought before my attention another and possibly more serious case of the exploitation of women. He showed me a letter he had received from a poor woman worker. I give it as written:—

Dear Sir,—Just a few lines begging you to look into the matter. Could you kindly see into Mr. ——. He will not pay more than 2s. 1d. for a hundred gross for drawing through soldiers' buttons and the cutting out is only 1s. 6d. I have worked there myself, but all that I can earn from Monday to Saturday was 7s. 6d., and out of that had to pay for a baby to be minded. That was 3s. 6d., so you may guess how much is left. We have to work by candle light and slave hard. It is very mean. Begging you to look into this. They stop 3d. insurance, and we do not get 2s. a week sometimes. Do look into this.

The original with the name of the firm will be submitted by Mr. Davis to the Secretary for War and to the Health Insurance Commissioners.

Yorkshire Post,
March 29th. 1915.

WOMEN'S SERVICE AND LABOUR EXCHANGES.

To the Editor of The Yorkshire Post.

Sir,—I feel I cannot allow one statement in your article on War Service for Women to pass unchallenged. Here in Hull, at any rate, there are no class distinctions amongst women who apply to the Labour Exchange. Miss Burwell, the able secretary, is personally known to the whole town, and women of all classes go to her for advice and assistance. I have made it a practice since the beginning of the war to personally register any vacancies on my staff. Miss Burwell has set aside the hours of 2—4 p.m. specially for the purpose of interviewing and giving advice to women wishing to offer their services to their country and enrol their names on the War Register, and, for the information of those who have not already paid a visit to the Labour Exchange, I might add that the Women's Department in Story Street is totally apart from the men's side, and is entirely staffed by lady clerks. Surely, when men of all classes are enrolling themselves at the same recruiting station for the defence of their country, women will be equally patriotic, and apply without hesitation to the Government Labour Bureau.—Yours, etc.,

MARJORIE NUNBURNHOLME, President
Voluntary Aid Committee.

Voluntary Aid Committee, Headquarters, 130, Spring Bank, Hull, March 27, 1915.

* We have no doubt of the strict accuracy of the statement in question. We made no sort of reflection on the officials.—Ed Y.P.

Sunday Times,
March 28th. 1915.

WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE.

This war is providing both the inspiration and the occasion for the solution of many of our most anxious problems, social, political, and international, and it is just possible that its influence will be successful in yet another notable direction. Now that we are compelled to take stock of all our national resources we have realised that there is available an immense reserve which we have hitherto never employed to the full and never really organised. The adaptability of woman to a more extensive share in our national economy is in question to-day ostensibly as an emergency measure, but in fact, as none can doubt, as a permanent arrangement. It is curious to reflect that during the last century the tendency of legislature has been to discourage the employment of women, and rightly so; for the development of our industrial system brought about the application of women's labour to many tasks for which women were clearly in the interests of the race, quite unfitted. But the tendency, checked when it turned in the wrong direction, has still to be diverted to the right direction, for it is clear that the non-domestic employment of women in some way has become a social necessity. This war, with the enormous withdrawal of male labour which it has involved, has simply made the problem acute, and the solution of it urgent. Again, the need which is now felt will be just as real and pressing when the war is over as it is to-day. Yet with all the demand that exists for new recruits to the labour market we have the apparently incompatible fact that the Labour Exchanges are at present choked with lists of unemployed women. They are the women displaced by the dislocation of a number of industries in which women and girls are almost exclusively employed; and the first problem before those who desire to mobilise women for war service is how to absorb these disbanded battalions. It would clearly be a very poor achievement to call in a host of new and untrained workers while those who are dependent for their livelihood on the work of their hands are still condemned to idleness. A system of training in the processes of those industries which now languish for an insufficiency of skilled labour is probably the first and most effective step for arriving at satisfactory results. The cost of it would be negligible in comparison with the advantages obtained, and the inevitable delay would really represent a saving of time and effort in the long run. But with regard to the immense numbers of women who have hitherto not been in employment but who are very ready to respond to the call that has been made, the problem is of another kind. It is to find where and how their services can be best utilised without injury to the men who some day will return to their normal activities. It is of no use turning women to farming, for instance. Experience proves that their labour is costly and inefficient; and in all the heavier processes of industry they would be used up in a manner which humanity would never sanction. But in every department of clerical labour they excel; and could be made available to release a large number of men for other tasks. That is the sort of readjustment that is needed, and that, once effected, is certain to become permanent, for in the long run it will be as advantageous for the men as for the women by diverting them to professions in which woman's competition will no longer have to be feared. In providing for the present emergency, the counsel of prudence is to look beyond it and to build for the future. We have to deal not only with a temporary shortage of labour, but with the surplus woman.

663/66 663

Daily Telegraph,
March 29th. 1915.

WOMEN AS WORKERS.

PATRIOTIC SPIRIT.

QUESTIONS FOR GOVERNMENT.

By Our Civil Service Correspondent.

A Scarborough woman, whose place of business was destroyed by the German bombardment, gives an instance of how the national spirit of the country is affected by the German policy of "frightfulness." Answering the Government's appeal to women, she has volunteered for war service, but only on the express condition that she is put at once to the making of shells. Nothing would induce her to think of any other form of employment, and before many days are over her ambition will be gratified. She will make shells, and shells alone, and perhaps, in the popular phrase, "get a little of her own back."

Instances like this could be multiplied showing the patriotic spirit with which women are actuated. The Board of Trade has received from a firm near London a glowing tribute to their work. This firm has engaged a large number of women in the making of surgical bandages and other appliances, and speaks of their "feverish energy" and the patriotic spirit which obviously underlies their efforts, inducing them to agree to work any hours and to submit to any sacrifice in order to comply with the demands of the War Office.

One interesting feature of the situation is that for the first time all women's societies, Suffragists and anti-Suffragists, have found a common platform and have thrown themselves heart and soul into the work of furthering the Government's scheme. If there is any rivalry existing amongst them, it is as to which will enlist the greatest number of battalions of women workers for war service. Of course, several of these societies, ever since the war began, have been helping on their own account to fill up the gaps arising out of the war, but the results of their efforts in the future will be co-ordinated by the Labour Exchanges.

WORK OF THE ASSOCIATIONS.

It would appear that the great majority of the 16,000 registered up to Tuesday last are drawn from the general mass of women, for, the time being too short, very few of the members of the various associations have yet come forward. An official of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies said on Saturday, "We are only now sending out the first 1,000 forms to our Edinburgh branch. Birmingham has asked for 600, and hasn't got them yet. The response of women does seem disappointing, but how many realise the extent to which women are employed already in consequence of the war? The services of over 150 of our paid organisers are being used. One, Miss Thurstan, went to Belgium as a Red Cross nurse, and organised the hospital service at Brussels and Charleroi. She was taken prisoner by the Germans, and after her release went to Russia and performed similar services at Lodz. She was wounded at Warsaw, and pleurisy supervened. She is now recruiting in this country, and is very soon going out again. Directly war broke out there was not a single woman on our books who was not doing something at maternity centres, schools for mothers, girls' clubs, or in some other way. Then you must also consider that many women will not go to Labour Exchanges, and this applies especially to professional women."

REASONS FOR A CONFERENCE.

Asked as to the reasons for desiring a conference with the Government, she said: "We must insist upon equal pay for equal work, and not have our women exploited. Secondly, there comes in the question of training. We are not going to allow a lot of untrained women to take up occupations for which they are absolutely unfitted. We expect Mr. Lloyd George to provide the money to enable them to obtain their training. Many trades are quite simple. One can learn milking, for instance, in a fortnight. Another point is, we want the Government to set the example. Here am I a university woman, highly trained, and with certainly more experience of life than the youth from Oxford or Cambridge, and yet I am shut out from the Government offices which house [illegible]

3s. 6d., so you may guess how much is left. We have to work by candle light and slave hard. It is very mean. Begging you to look into this. They stop 3d. insurance, and we do not get 2s. a week sometimes. Do look into this.

The original with the name of the firm will be submitted by Mr. Davis to the Secretary for War and to the Health Insurance Commissioners.

Yorkshire Post,
March 29th. 1915.

WOMEN'S SERVICE AND LABOUR EXCHANGES.

To the Editor of The Yorkshire Post.

Sir,—I feel I cannot allow one statement in your article on War Service for Women to pass unchallenged. Here in Hull, at any rate, there are no class distinctions amongst women who apply to the Labour Exchange. Miss Burwell, the able secretary, is personally known to the whole town, and women of all classes go to her for advice and assistance. I have made it a practice since the beginning of the war to personally register any vacancies on my staff. Miss Burwell has set aside the hours of 2—4 p.m. specially for the purpose of interviewing and giving advice to women wishing to offer their services to their country and enrol their names on the War Register, and, for the information of those who have not already paid a visit to the Labour Exchange, I might add that the Women's Department in Story Street is totally apart from the men's side, and is entirely staffed by lady clerks. Surely, when men of all classes are enrolling themselves at the same recruiting station for the defence of their country, women will be equally patriotic, and apply without hesitation to the Government Labour Bureau.—Yours, etc.,

MARJORIE NUNBURNHOLME, President
Voluntary Aid Committee.

Voluntary Aid Committee, Headquarters, 150, Spring Bank, Hull, March 27, 1915.

* We have no doubt of the strict accuracy of the statement in question. We made no sort of reflection on the officials.—Ed Y.P.

with lists of unemployed women. They are the women displaced by the dislocation of a number of industries in which women and girls are almost exclusively employed; and the first problem before those who desire to mobilise women for war service is how to absorb these disbanded battalions. It would clearly be a very poor achievement to call in a host of new and untrained workers while those who are dependent for their livelihood on the work of their hands are still condemned to idleness. A system of training in the processes of those industries which now languish for an insufficiency of skilled labour is probably the first and most effective step for arriving at satisfactory results. The cost of it would be negligible in comparison with the advantages obtained, and the inevitable delay would really represent a saving of time and effort in the long run. But with regard to the immense numbers of women who have hitherto not been in employment but who are very ready to respond to the call that has been made, the problem is of another kind. It is to find where and how their services can be best utilised without injury to the men who some day will return to their normal activities. It is of no use turning women to farming, for instance. Experience proves that their labour is costly and inefficient; and in all the heavier processes of industry they would be used up in a manner which humanity would never sanction. But in every department of clerical labour they excel; and could be made available to release a large number of men for other tasks. That is the sort of readjustment that is needed, and that, once effected, is certain to become permanent, for in the long run it will be as advantageous for the men as for the women by diverting them to professions in which woman's competition will no longer have to be feared. In providing for the present emergency, the counsel of prudence is to look beyond it and to build for the future. We have to deal not only with a temporary shortage of labour, but with the surplus woman.

...suffragists and anti-Suffragists, have found a common platform and have thrown themselves heart and soul into the work of furthering the Government's scheme. If there is any rivalry existing amongst them, it is as to which will enlist the greatest number of battalions of women workers for war service. Of course, several of these societies, ever since the war began, have been helping on their own account to fill up the gaps arising out of the war, but the results of their efforts in the future will be co-ordinated by the Labour Exchanges.

WORK OF THE ASSOCIATIONS.

It would appear that the great majority of the 16,000 registered up to Tuesday last are drawn from the general mass of women, for, the time being too short, very few of the members of the various associations have yet come forward. An official of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies said on Saturday, "We are only now sending out the first 1,000 forms to our Edinburgh branch. Birmingham has asked for 600, and hasn't got them yet. The response of women does seem disappointing, but how many realise the extent to which women are employed already in consequence of the war? The services of over 150 of our paid organisers are being used. One, Miss Thurstan, went to Belgium as a Red Cross nurse, and organised the hospital service at Brussels and Charleroi. She was taken prisoner by the Germans, and after her release went to Russia and performed similar services at Lodz. She was wounded at Warsaw, and pleurisy supervened. She is now recruiting in this country, and is very soon going out again. Directly war broke out there was not a single woman on our books who was not doing something at maternity centres, schools for mothers, girls' clubs, or in some other way. Then you must also consider that many women will not go to Labour Exchanges, and this applies especially to professional women."

REASONS FOR A CONFERENCE.

Asked as to the reasons for desiring a conference with the Government, she said: "We must insist upon equal pay for equal work, and not have our women exploited. Secondly, there comes in the question of training. We are not going to allow a lot of untrained women to take up occupations for which they are absolutely unfitted. We expect Mr. Lloyd George to provide the money to enable them to obtain their training. Many trades are quite simple. One can learn milking, for instance, in a fortnight. Another point is, we want the Government to set the example. Here am I, a university woman, highly trained, and with certainly more experience of life than the youth from Oxford or Cambridge, and yet I am shut out from the Government offices simply because of sex. Then, again, we must insist upon proper factory and, in the case of farm work, domestic conditions, such as sleeping accommodation, &c."

It is satisfactory to note that the number of personal applicants at the central office keeps up a steady average of about 100 a day. Since the official figures were published in The Daily Telegraph, the total number of women registered at the central office, from Tuesday to Friday inclusive, amounted to nearly 4,000.

WORK-ROOM PAY INCREASED.

A circular has been sent to local representative committees for the relief of distress by the Central Committee on Women's Employment, intimating that, in view of the increase in the cost of living which has recently taken place, it has been decided to vary the limits imposed so that the remuneration of women employed in women's work rooms may be raised by an increase not exceeding 15 per cent. Accordingly the maximum number of hours to be worked by any woman in any week is increased from forty to forty-six, and the maximum amount of 10s payable in any one week is now altered to 11s 6d.

Where it is not practicable to effect the increase in remuneration by an increase in the hours worked, it is open to the local committee to supply meals at a small charge and pay the cost, which should not exceed 4d per head per day, out of the grant. The difference between the value of the meal and the charge made should be equivalent to the increase in the remuneration which it is intended to allow. Where it is impossible for the local committee to undertake the catering an allowance in lieu of meals (also equal to the increase in the remuneration which it is intended to allow) may be made to the worker at the discretion of the local committee. Should neither of these alternatives be practicable, either the hourly rate of pay may be increased or a combination of any of the above methods may be adopted.

It is added that any increase in remuneration made under these regulations should have regard to the increase in the cost of living in the locality concerned, and also to the risk of diverting workers from their ordinary occupations. It should be clearly understood that any alteration made is of a temporary character, and subject to revision should there be a material variation from the present cost of living.

663/67

663

Morning Post,
March 29th. 1915.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

DEMAND FOR AMMUNITION WORK.

It is now known that over 20,000 women have filled in the registration forms in connection with the war service scheme, and it is confidently expected that when the returns are classified and the various kinds of work which women desire are made known, as they will be during the present week, applicants will come forward in greater numbers. Many women who would like to assist the Board of Trade scheme are not certain as to the nature of the employment for which they would be fitted. There is, for example, a difficulty with dressmakers, of whom, it is said, about 30,000 have been thrown out of employment through the war. It is recognised that dressmakers could not easily adapt themselves to some trades in which there is a shortage of labour. The war has also affected the employment of about 10,000 women in the textile trades, and a large number of workers in the laundry industry. Altogether it is computed that there are 60,000 women workers unemployed as a direct result of the war. The idea is to find employment for these women by drafting them into other trades, thus releasing men who up till now have not been free to join the Army.

IN ARMAMENT WORKS.

The Government is anxious that the full output of munitions of war shall be ensured, and it is interesting to note that a large number of women who have applied for work have stipulated that it shall be directly associated with the war. They think that they will be able to help the country if they are engaged in ammunition work. The work is not skilled, and women can become proficient at it in a few weeks. Employers are so confident that the work can be done satisfactorily by women that they are willing to engage them. At the present moment women are employed at large armament works in Sheffield, and more applications are being registered at the local Labour Exchanges.

Many women with motoring licences have offered to take war service, and have made suggestions to the Board of Trade that women should be employed as chauffeurs and taxi-cab drivers. The experiment has been tried in several towns in France, but it is understood that it has not been successful. Glasgow has under consideration the possibility of women serving as conductors of tramcars. Women are so employed in Germany. The Government see no reason why a large number of women and girls who have never previously done work performed by men should not find employment in offices and grocery and drapery establishments. It is admitted that a certain amount of training would be necessary, and the difficulty of the moment is as to how it can be obtained. This matter is at present under consideration.

EMPLOYERS' DIFFICULTIES.

Certain employers whose staffs have already been depleted considerably through men joining the Colours contend that it is with difficulty that they are able to carry on their business, and they are unwilling to part with more men. They do not, however, oppose the idea of substituted labour if it can be obtained. It will be the business of those who are organising the war service for women to provide this substituted labour with the co-operation of employers. When women have been trained for certain occupations in which training is necessary it is understood that openings will be found for them on the understanding that when the men replaced are discharged from military service they shall return to their old positions.

The North Mail, March 30th. 1915.

MOBILISING THE WOMEN.

BUT WHAT AWAITS THEM AFTER WAR?

By JOHN G. BAMBOROUGH.

"Why do not the Government tell us exactly what they want us to do?" Thus, apropos the mobilisation of women, a woman who is in the closest possible touch with the many manifestations of recent years. The question gave me cause to wonder.

Have the Government made it as clear as they might what is in and behind the amazing industrial and economic revolution which has been initiated without warning? When you come to think of it, the volume of knowledge on the subject possessed by the great body of the public is not remarkably great. We know one or two things. We do not know very many things. And a wise Government would have taken care that we should know all that they know. They have not done that. They have refrained so completely from doing it that one is sometimes driven to believe the Government have not thoroughly thought the matter out.

Consider what the proposal means. The Government are appealing to all women who are willing to work to come forward with a free offer of their labour, register themselves, and pledge themselves to obey the call when the call comes. It is the intention to utilise these volunteers—just as it is now proposed to utilise the members of the many volunteer training corps that have sprung up all over the country—for the purpose of releasing men of fighting age who would otherwise be debarred from playing a man's part. They are to take the place of men in shop and office and factory.

Industrial Upheaval.

Very well. But what is to be done with these women when war is over? When the war ends there will be an industrial upheaval such as the world has never witnessed. Somewhere in the neighbourhood of a million and a half of men will be—or may be—thrown into the market place to compete for work with those who have stayed behind. What will become of the women?

I say that these men "may" be launched into the market. The qualification is necessary. There has been, for some weeks, talk of a comprehensive scheme, the object of which would be to prevent, so far as preorganisation can do it, the frightful dislocation of the labour world that would be caused if all the men who have enlisted for the duration of the war only were to be simultaneously tumbled back into civil life. This scheme put briefly, is based on the idea that industrial Britain should be divided up into districts, that the labour needs of each district should be ascertained, and that when the time comes for the warriors to relinquish the firing of death-dealing shells in favour of the building of life-carrying ships the surplus labour is to be allocated to the districts in which it can be readily and profitably absorbed.

Such a plan is so obviously sensible that one is inspired to hope not only that it has been perfected, but that it is, in its preliminary stages, now being applied. It would involve, of course, the retention with the colours for a more or less prolonged period of a large number of men, for whom the community would have to provide. But the cost to the State of making provision for these supernumerary soldiers would be very much less than the cost of a sudden swamping of the labour market, with all its attendant evils and miseries.

Here again, of course, one is inclined to find fault with the Government. Has this scheme been adopted? Is it already in operation? To revert to the question asked by the woman whose wisdom gave me the text for this article, "Why do not the Government tell us?"

These volunteer women are to be set to work in occupations which have hitherto been monopolised by males. They will need some training. At the outset, however willing they may be, they will not be equal in wage value to the men whose places they are filling. They cannot, therefore, expect to be paid the same as their male predecessors were—it is sheer idealism to pretend that they should be so paid.

There is always a difficulty in the employment of women in work usually done by men. The wages of a male are roughly calculated on the assumption that he is, or will be, married—that he has to provide for a certain number of dependants. The wage of the woman worker is not so calculated. It is tacitly assumed that she will be a wage-earner only until she can marry, and enter into what a good many of us are still old-fashioned enough to regard as woman's true sphere. Her wages are lower because, being but a bird of passage, and not regarding her occupation as her life's work, she is not worth the higher rate of pay.

These women will need training, as I have said. They will get it. The employer, for his own sake, will take care that his new servants are given every facility for acquiring efficiency equal to that of the servants they have displaced. And if the war lasts, say, twelve months more, these women will have become able adequately to fill the places of the men, and will be worth equal wages.

They will not, however, be receiving them. When the men come back, what will be done with them? The employer, human nature being what it is, will want to hold on to his cheaper and equally efficient servant. One of two things will happen. Either the cheaper woman servant will be retained and the man squeezed out, or the man will be taken back and the woman thrown out of work. Has this inevitable consequence been provided for?

"Why do not the Government tell us exactly what they want us to do?" Why have not the Government made their appeal in the first instance to women of the comfortable classes?

These women are willing. They are dowered with the average modicum of brains at any rate. They have the leisure. And, above all, when the war is over, they could be discharged from the woman-workers' army not only without any dislocation or hardship, but actually with the knowledge that, though they had helped the nation, the nation had helped them in return by making them more useful and efficient than ever they could have been in ordinary circumstances. Why have the Government not mobilised these women?

We have not been told why the services of these idle hands have not been enlisted. We have, in fact, not been told anything that really matters. All that we know is that if the State scheme is fully carried out there will be an enormous shifting of the industrial burden and a change in the economic relations of the sexes so vast and far-reaching that it is impossible to predict its outcome.

Who Will Respond?

For it has to be remembered that the women workers who will be taken into the service of the State will not be merely women who have always worked. It does not mean that the unemployed dressmaker, for example, will simply become the employed shell-filler. It means that thousands of women who have not hitherto gone out into the dusty market-place of competition will now, for the first time in their lives, become direct wage-earners. And having become wage-earners—having been for months in the receipt of an earned living income, are they likely to tamely acquiesce in an arrangement which sends them back to unremunerative idleness? Will they be willing to return to economic dependence?

I hardly think so. The role of the parasite is becoming increasingly unpopular among women, and its unpopularity will grow. The State call to the army of women will increase the distastefulness of it immensely. The sensible thing would have been to mobilise, first of all, the forces of women who are not parasites—who are already, because of their birth and social status, in positions of economic independence.

The Government have not done that, and thereby, as it seems to many of us, have committed a grave blunder. But graver still is the blunder which keeps the women in ignorance of what it is that is expected of them, and what it is that is to be done with them when they have fulfilled their part of the programme.

The Morning Post, March 30th 1915 663/68 663.

WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE.

SOME CRITICISMS OF THE SCHEME.

(BY A WOMAN WORKER.)

The Government scheme for the mobilisation of women to take the places of men who have gone to the front, or those who still desire to go is, in theory, no doubt an excellent one. To help our Army and Navy and release men for military service is the most urgent need of the moment, but it is also most necessary that the Government should look ahead so as to prevent the difficulties that are bound to accrue unless certain provisions are made. Speaking from the point of view of the working women I should like to indicate some of them. Firstly, the danger of substituting women for men in any particular industry is, as has already been pointed out, that there is no guarantee that the men will find their situations open for them when they return. Unless the Government can guarantee that the women will receive the same wages as the men the chances are that the men will not find those situations open. It is sometimes argued that women's output is not so great as men's, and that therefore their wages should be less, but the majority of factories are working on piece rates, and if the piece rates are not tampered with the matter adjusts itself. The woman will receive a wage proportionate to her output, and the man, when he comes back, will be able to resume work upon the same conditions.

Woman's Competition.

Those who are familiar with modern industrial problems will know that the increasing number of women who have been flocking into industry during the last few years to do the work formerly done by men, and thus cutting out men, is a serious one. Machinery is becoming more and more perfect, and the work of the operative consequently simpler and more mechanical so that employers find that women's labour, which is so much cheaper, is the most profitable. In many districts it has been found that the women are going out to work, while the men are idle. Certain kinds of work may be suitable for women, but much is being done by women to-day which would be more suitable for general labourers and navvies. Women are not fitted for work at the pit brow, for brick-making and chain-making. Surely it is for the general good of the nation that men's work should be assured first, and that women's work should only be supplementary where suitable and necessary, both in the present crisis and in the future.

It would appear on the face of it that the new Government scheme is going to increase this undesirable modern tendency unless some definite safeguards are instituted. The following case is an example of the kind of safeguards necessary. A dispute arose at a silk-weaving factory the other day. The women had always been employed on two looms. To increase the output the employer ordered the women to work on four looms, offering them more wages. The women protested that for the majority of them it was physically impossible. The younger women would be capable of the work for a short time, but the strain would be so great that they would shortly have to drop out and be replaced again by younger women. Is the Government prepared to insure that the women are not only put on to suitable work, but are not speeded up to a point beyond their strength?

It has been asked whether we are to understand that the Government appeal has been made chiefly to women who are not normally wage-earners. The Board of Trade has stated that they want women for industrial, agricultural, and clerical employment, so that one can but conclude that they want preferably women who have experience of the respective industries, and at any rate women who can easily adapt themselves to them. That certainly is not the woman who has never been a wage-earner. If we may take for granted then that the majority of the women will be clerks and factory workers who are temporarily out of employment the task of transferring them from one district to another is going to prove another difficulty apart from the question of housing, which is a serious one. At what time may they expect their new employment to cease? And when it does cease what chance will they stand of getting back into their old trades? The probability is that as industry changes almost from day to day they will fall between two stools, and find when they return that other women who have been on the spot all the time have filled the vacancies in their old trades.

Training Wanted.

In concluding I should like to point out that the Labour Exchanges for the last few months have been besieged by women out of employment. Those women are prepared to turn their hand to any kind of work, but they are constantly refused on the grounds that they are unskilled, and that employers in the busy trades have neither the time nor the space to train them. The only alternative is to turn them to farm work. The experiment of taking unemployed women from the towns and putting them on the land has already been proved a failure. The Salvation Army has made several attempts and assures us that such women are quite valueless. They have neither the build nor the constitution necessary for the work. Training, therefore, in the industries which have an insufficient labour supply seems to be the keynote to the situation, and if the Government undertakes this training surely it can make some provisions as to the conditions on which employment shall be undertaken

This preliminary training, which would be so invaluable, would only occupy a few weeks; and the cost of it to the State would be more than compensated by the consequential saving on the relief of unemployed workers. If the enlistment of women in war-service is worth doing at all, it is worth doing under the only conditions that promise real success—conditions that will be as beneficial in their influence for the future as in the present emergency.

Finally, it should not be forgotten that there is the danger, by enlisting women of independent means, of keeping out of employment women who depend on their work for their livelihood. It is not merely cheaper labour, but more abundant labour that is the Government's aim; and at the present time very many women wage-earners are workless.

The whole problem of mobilising women's services has been in agitation for several months past among those who are most concerned with it; and though the Government are to be commended for taking up the question, their cognisance of fairly obvious facts would be more impressive if it were not so much belated.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING POST.

SIR,—The battle of Neuve Chapelle and the speeches and exhortations of our Ministers have brought one fact very clearly home to us all—and that is the paramount necessity of a practically unlimited supply of guns and ammunition. Not only do we need them for our own Army, but it is of vital importance that we should be able to supply our Allies with these sinews of war. Russia has an inexhaustible reservoir of men, but lacks the industrial organisation to equip them. This tremendous task therefore lies with us, and can only be speedily and triumphantly carried through if we rise to it as a nation, which means not only every man, but that every woman, of every class, upper and lower, must come forward and contribute her quota to the common cause.

During the long winter months the pent up energies of thousands of women found an outlet in the knitting and making of millions of woollen comforts for our men in the trenches. For these there will now be little or no demand, but, as this titanic struggle grows closer and yet more terrible, other and greater fields of labour are opening out. The urgent call is for skilled labour, which is practically confined—so far as women are concerned—to the industrial classes, and therefore the vast majority of the women of the upper classes who are anxious to help have no talent to offer. But if they are not afraid of work, hard work, drudgery even if need be, there is, I take it, a place for each to fill. Mr. Lloyd George tells us that in France many women are now employed in the manufacture of ammunition, and if England is to become the world's greatest arsenal—as she must if she is to win—it will be necessary for Government to draw largely on all available supplies of female labour.

Now, therefore, is the time for the women of England to come forward, putting aside all class distinctions, prejudices, and luxuries, to dedicate themselves—I use the word advisedly—to the service of their loved country so long as she has need of them. Though because of our sex we are denied the glory of dying for her, we can yet truly serve her if we rise nobly to the spirit of self-sacrifice.

I am the wife of an officer now at the front, and I appeal especially to the women of the well-to-do and upper classes to put their country's welfare before their own, and to join together to place our services while the war lasts at the disposal of Government—asking neither wage nor reward—to be employed in any field of labour in which they have need of us, whether it be in our arsenals, or behind the counter, or in the office, if by so doing we can release more men to fight, or semi-skilled female labour which could be utilised for more important work. As we would give our services free, for love of our country and during the war only, this would in some measure simplify the problem of unemployment after the war.—Yours, &c.,

March 29. AN ENGLISHWOMAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING POST.

SIR,—Your correspondent, "Theodora Parker," writes from a high dogmatic pedestal, but scarcely in accordance with commonsense.

If, as she states, male workers, especially farm hands, are paid not only in proportion to the value of their work, but with regard to their potential value in the firing line, does she not suggest inferentially that men over fifty or men who from physical disability are ineligible for the Army, should be paid less than the younger men who enlisted and whose places they are now filling? By the same argument the wages of lame shoemakers or tailors should now be reduced, and shortsighted bakers be put on lower pay, because the former could not march, and the latter could not shoot without glasses.

It is absurd to say that workers are paid upon a scale depending upon what they could do in some other calling not their own.

The actual scale is regulated partly by supply and demand, and partly by what the workers, whether male or female, agree to accept as sufficient for the support of themselves and their dependents; and at the present crisis, my advice to all women offering their services to employers of labour is: Insist upon the usual amount of payment for work actually done effectually, and if you don't need your earnings yourselves, give them to those who do, but in no case raise the enmity of male workers by offering more work than they do for a given price.

This applies especially to middle-class girls, to whom an extra sixpence or shilling may be unimportant.

Work gratis, if you like, to grow food to be given to those who cannot pay for it; but do not on any account work for employers of labour at a lower rate of pay than men would accept for work of the same quality, as, if you do so, you will injure all workers, male and female, including the men who will eventually return from the war.—Yours, &c.,

ALICE M. CHAMBERS.

Church Norton, Selsey, Sussex, March 27.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING POST.

SIR,—The Women Writers' Suffrage League, whilst welcoming the Government's call to women for war service (to which our members, in common with all women, are giving loyal response), recognises certain dangers which may result unless steps are taken to safeguard the interests of both men and women and prevent the latter from becoming involuntary blacklegs.

The best way to avoid this is, in our opinion, for men's Trade Unions to admit women as members; this would ensure them receiving the same rate of pay for equal work, and would also safeguard them from the exploitation of unscrupulous employers.

In unorganised and unskilled work the women volunteers should receive the same pay as men for equal work.

Whilst fully recognising the difficulties of such a disorganisation of the industrial world, we ask that the best consideration of economic experts should be given to the labour problems which will arise at the expiration of the war.—Yours, &c.,

C. ROMANNE-JAMES (Hon. Secretary).
M. W. NEVINSON (Hon. Treasurer).

12, Henrietta-street, March 29.

Birmingham Post,
March 30th. 1915.

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

SCHEME TO LIBERATE AND REPLACE MALE LABOUR.

BIRMINGHAM'S RESPONSE.

As was almost inevitable, the response of Birmingham women to the Government's call to register themselves as willing to assist the liberation of more men for fighting purposes by offering to take their places as far as possible in the ranks of trade and industry has been limited. The scheme formulated by the Government and worked by the Board of Trade through the various Labour Bureaux has been in existence for ten days, and the result has been that at the Birmingham Exchange the number of women who have come forward is within a couple of hundred. This figure, it should be explained, applies only to the area controlled by the Birmingham Labour Exchange. To it should be added the numbers registered at Aston and elsewhere if the exact number for the municipal area of Birmingham is to be had. Though unable to give those outside returns, it may be said that the grand total is still on the small side. Indeed, considering the special conditions of industrial Birmingham, where the percentage of females employed has never been higher than in the last six months, it was scarcely expected the number of registrations for war service by women would have been higher. Still, it must be borne in mind that the appeal is addressed to those who are able and free, but not at present working, the object, of course, being to get at a hitherto untapped source of labour so as to liberate more men for the front. The appeal, therefore, is made primarily to patriotism, and in view of the preponderance of females over males there were hopes in some quarters of a better response. If explanations are needed they are probably to be found in the fact that a very large number of women are giving their services voluntarily in various relief and charitable causes, and that others with husbands in the Army and Navy are not in such straitened circumstances financially as to make outside employment urgent or absolutely necessary.

Birmingham Registrations.

But when every allowance has been made, it is impossible to believe that Birmingham women have come forward in the numbers they should have done. Probably when the scheme is better known it will meet with greater success. Women must appreciate four things if they are really anxious to do more for their country.

(1) That the appeal to them is one of urgency; (2) that whole or part time is acceptable, and if engaged will be paid for; (3) that provision will be made for training willing women without experience; and (4) that every woman who thus helps to release a man for fighting purposes is rendering a national service.

Of these points insistence should be put on the patriotic character of the appeal to women and of the acceptability of even untrained labour. The great demand is for women to do farm work, dairy work, leather-stitching, brush-making, cloth machining, and light machining for armament, but whatever they can do—anything or nothing—they are still asked to register as willing either to help or be taught to do so.

Of the 200 women who have filled in the forms and sent them to the Birmingham Labour Exchange a rough analysis shows that the majority are those of women who hitherto have followed no occupation—educated women in whom burns the pure flame of patriotism, and who are anxious to be of some real use in these anxious hours of the country's history. Probably 40% of the registrations are by women of this character. Next come women who are available for clerical work, and the remainder are labelled as "various."

Female Labour at a Premium.

So far as the general labour market for women in Birmingham is concerned it may be said such labour is at a premium. More women and girls are employed on war munitions and equipment than in any other town in the country. For six months the Labour Bureau has been turned to by employers in various trades, while females seeking work have naturally been very few. At the present time there is a demand for far more female labour than Birmingham seems able to supply. Employment is offered to:—

Printing trade hands,	Power-press girls,
Paper-box makers,	Hand-press girls,
Leather workers,	Metal polishers,
Leather preparers,	Dyers,
Leather stitchers,	Packers,

Glasgow Herald,
March 30th. 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

ARMAMENT WORK PREFERRED.

The number of women in the Scottish district who had registered for "war service" up till yesterday morning was over 6000. The large proportion of the enrolments were made at the Labour Exchanges in Glasgow and Edinburgh, the number at Glasgow being over 3000. The total for the United Kingdom had come to about 40,000 on Saturday night. Registration is still proceeding at the local Exchanges, and yesterday a considerable addition was made to the ranks of the volunteers. The majority of the women who have enrolled at Glasgow have indicated in their application forms a preference for work in armament factories. Office work comes next in popularity, to judge from the offers received, and a considerable number of women have applied for employment on farms.

Dundee Courier,
March 30th. 1915.

CARNOUSTIE MINISTER AND WOMEN'S LABOUR.

HOW TO PROMOTE RECRUITING.

The Rev. A. R. Gibson, Carnoustie, makes the following proposals on the war crisis:—

The President of the Board of Trade has sent all us ministers a request to appeal to able-bodied women to offer themselves for war service. He invites all available women with or without previous training to enter themselves upon the register of women for war service for payment. The German women are showing us a good example in this respect. They are doing the work of men, and thus releasing hundreds of thousands of men from civil occupations in order that they may join the colours. They are driving milk carts, butchers' carts, tramcars, bakers' vans, &c. They and the French and Russian women are busy as bees doing laborious work on farms and in gardens that used to be done by men, so that the men may shoulder arms and fight the battles of their country. Many thousands of them are also doing clerical work that pale, delicate-handed clerks may exchange the pen for the sword. Hosts of them also are engaged at the Krupp Works and similar places where arms and ammunition are being produced.

Many middle-class and upper-class women are releasing their domestic servants, and themselves are rolling up their sleeves and buckling to the work of washing, sweeping, cooking, and all other branches of domestic work.

Let us take this leaf out of their book. This is not a time for amusing ourselves with pianos and gramophones and afternoon teas and calls. There should be no conventional ladies at such a time, as all are ladies who do some necessary work for the State.

Rights and Duties.

In this country of late we have been hearing far too much about people's rights and far too little about people's duties. The question for us now is not what are we to get as remuneration, but what can we give, what can we do, for our country in its hour of dire necessity?

The appeal for the moment is to women to do work of any kind which they are able to do—industrial, agricultural, clerical—in order to swell the number of men at the front, where all we can send will be needed to achieve victory. Women who do this will be really fighting the battles of the country without shouldering a gun or firing a shot.

The need for this appeal is urgent. It means that we now see the chink in our armour. This chink was seen by Germany before it was realised by us. It is the industrial strife raging at the heart of Britain. Germany was mistaken in all her other prognostications. She phophesied that in the event of war there would be civil war in Ireland. There is no civil war there. She said our Empire would fall in pieces. It has not. She predicted a holy war in Egypt and India. No such war has occurred. But she was right when she pointed out that our labour unrest and all it means were the Achilles heel of Britain.

What is Before Us.

If we go under it will be because we have millions of apathetic, if not unpatriotic people in our workshops, people who wrangle about a farthing while their relations or comrades are suffering, bleeding, or dying for them at the front.

In the meantime let women volunteer to fill the places of men who are willing to join the colours, but cannot in the meantime because they are needed for war work.

The coming summer will be a terrible and trying one for us. If 3,000,000 men are fighting in a few months we shall probably lose a million by death, wounds, and disease. Their places must be filled by volunteers or conscripts if we are to be victorious. Women can indirectly help to fill these blanks.

663/69 663

The Glasgow News,
March 30th. 1915.

GOVERNMENT WORK FOR WOMEN.

("NEWS" SPECIAL.)

Crowds of women are daily thronging the Labour Exchanges offering themselves for war, and the number seems rather to grow than to diminish.

As a matter of fact thousands of women will probably be wanted for the making of shrapnel shells alone. One of the most important firms engaged in armament work has already appointed women overseers, who are learning the business, which is not a difficult one, with a view to superintending as soon as women workers are drafted in. Competent, sensible women will get these jobs; they need not previously have been manual workers, one appointment at least being filled by an ex-typist.

One firm is already asking for three hundred shrapnel shell workers, whom they are taking in and teaching in batches of from twenty to forty. Some fear is expressed that amateur workers may come in and be given a preference over the workers of normal times. Another possibility that has been suggested is that the promise of a man's wage being paid for a man's work will attract women from underpaid normal trades.

In connection with tramway work, for instance, it has been found that women of a highly superior class are offering themselves for war work. The officials book their names, but other things being equal, preference will in the first place be given to women who are actually unemployed and in need of wages. As to the other case, that of leaving one trade for another that is better paid, the attempt is already being made by women in factories at which contract work of an essential kind is being done, the attraction being the higher rates of pay, but work will not be given to women already employed especially if they are doing Government work. The hardship that this involves may lead to increased rates of payment for women all round, and these may even be continued after the war. In this respect the war may prove to be woman's opportunity.

Aberdeen Free Press,
March 30th. 1915.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

THE ABERDEEN RESPONSE.

As was intimated in these columns last week, the officials of the Aberdeen Labour Exchange have sent out a large number of circulars asking women to register themselves as being willing to undertake various descriptions of employment, so that men may be freed to join the Army or to engage in other occupations connected with the war. So far, the response has been anything but satisfactory.

Mr Duncan, of the Aberdeen Labour Exchange, has just returned to the city after a fortnight's tour through the South of Scotland. To a "Free Press" representative yesterday he expressed surprise that the response in Aberdeen had been so poor. In Glasgow, he said, over 3000 women had already registered, including the wives of many ministers. Ladies who have servants of their own were coming forward in large numbers and expressing their willingness to undertake any employment for which they might be suited. The Caledonian and North British Railways had substituted women booking clerks at the stations controlled by these companies, and so had permitted a considerable number of young men to join the colours. In Aberdeen, continued Mr Duncan, there are many tasks which women could perform every bit as well as men. They could undertake the duties of shop assistants, or for that matter, even tram conductors. The women were not, of course, required to commence work immediately, but were to be held in reserve in case a large demand was made on the manhood of the country, which might occur at any day, when they would step into the vacant positions and so obviate any serious disarrangement in the industry and commerce of the country. Mr Duncan, however, was hopeful that the women of Aberdeen would recognise their duty and come forward in satisfactory numbers. He wishes it to be understood that women are not required to fill the positions of nurses and similar female occupations, but are wanted to fill the positions that have hitherto been mostly reserved for men.

employed on war munitions and equipment than in any other town in the country. For six months the Labour Bureau has been turned to by employers in various trades, while females seeking work have naturally been very few. At the present time there is a demand for far more female labour than Birmingham seems able to supply. Employment is offered to:—

Printing trade hands,	Power-press girls,
Paper-box makers,	Hand-press girls,
Leather workers,	Metal polishers,
Leather preparers,	Drillers,
Leather stitchers,	Solderers,
Attaché-case closers,	Dressmakers' assistants,
Capstan-lathe hands,	Bodice hands,
Stampers,	Cutting hands,
Tailoresses,	Vest hands.

These demands are quite apart from others more directly concerned with the production of ammunition, military clothing and ornaments, &c.

The Government's Object.

Reverting to the war service for women, the scope of this article, it should be pointed out that the object of the Government is to obtain particulars of the amount of female labour, trained or untrained, that is available if required in the country. If the full fighting power of the nation is to be put forward the full working capacity to carry on essential trades at home must be ascertained and organised. There is already a great shortage of male labour owing to enlistment, and, as this is bound to increase, the only way of making good the deficiency is by using what skilled female labour is available and training the unskilled until it becomes useful. All that the Government ask at present is that women who are able and willing to work should register themselves. As actual openings present themselves notice will be given through the Labour Exchanges with full details as to the nature of the work, conditions, and pay. The form such women are asked to fill up is as follows:—

Surname, other names; full address; age; married, single, or widow.

Have you ever done any paid work, and if so what, when, what kind? Employer's name or names.

Are you free to work: (a) Whole time, (b) part time, (c) to leave your home for work if pay is sufficient and housing satisfactory?

Is there any other work which you are willing and able to do?

If you have never done paid work, what kinds of work are you best suited for?

Are you prepared to be trained for work which you have not previously done?

Special questions for persons willing to do agricultural work:—Have you ever worked at any of the following branches of work: (a) Milking, (b) dairy work, (c) care of live stock; (d) light farm work, (e) market gardening, (f) poultry farming, (g) ordinary gardening?

If you have not, state what branch you think you would be suited for.

The demand for agricultural labour is not likely to appeal to Birmingham women, but it may be mentioned that the directors of the Harper-Adams Agricultural College in Salop have offered to take two parties of 30 women each for a short course of training.

The Daily Telegraph,
March 30th. 1918.

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

REGISTER OF WORKERS.

AID BY GREAT SOCIETIES.

"The mass of women are not yet reached," said the experienced secretary of a vast organisation dealing with the activities of the sex, speaking yesterday on the subject of the appeal to them to take a larger part in the labours demanded by war conditions. Among all, however, who are in touch with the general aspects of the feminine labour market there is a strong feeling that the right classes of womanhood will not be induced to come forward through the labour exchanges These have never had wide popularity among women. They have lacked that personal note that a woman wants in seeking a situation, and which the more comprehending managereses of registry offices and employment agencies have found it to their advantage to manifest. They have failed to attract more than a very restricted section of workers, and many would not resort to them under any circumstances.

But any failure on the part of the Board of Trade to reach the widest possible range of workers is being made good by the great societies concerned with women's political or social interests. The strongest body of that class is, of course, the National Union of Women Workers, which is the central organisation of every phase of women's educational, philanthropic, and progressive movements, whose representatives on its council number many hundreds of ladies. This union, at official Government request, is calling the attention of all its affiliated societies to the great importance of a ready response to the appeal, and is arranging a conference to take place about the middle of April, at which a representative of the Board of Trade will be present to give more detailed particulars as to the Government's needs and the conditions of employment.

No one, it may be said, is more keenly alive to the great social possibilities implied in such an appeal than its president, Mrs. Creighton. She is particularly anxious that the younger women of education should come forward, and is impressing especially upon the members of such societies as the "Time and Talents" the exceptional character of the opportunity now before them. Such girls, if they would come forward by groups of six or ten or twelve, could be drafted into a factory to work together. They would displace no poor woman; at the end of the war they would go back to their ordinary routine of life. Meantime they would have gained an insight into actual daily bread-winning that would widen all their sympathies, and might well have the most useful and valuable influences on the national life in the near future.

CONSERVATIVE AND LIBERAL.

To-day, when the Primrose League sends out its official communication to all its local habitations, it will draw special attention to the appeal to women for war service. The terms of the letter were considered last week at a special meeting of the General Purposes Committee, over which the Earl of Crawford presided, and the chief officers of the league will be asked to explain the requirements and urge the need for the patriotic collaboration of women.

At the Women's Liberal Federation a similar course is being pursued. Here those responsible felt strongly that the information of the circular was not sufficiently definite and that much fuller details on many points were desirable. The forms have been sent out for distribution through Women's Liberal Societies up and down the land, but to each one has been affixed the following notice:

The object of the proposed registration, as stated in the notice, is to discover what reserve force of women's labour can be made available if required. It does not necessarily follow that women who are registered can, or will, be offered employment. Nor by registering will a woman in any way pledge herself to take employment if offered, and will be perfectly free to refuse any offer if the nature of the work, the pay, and other considerations are not satisfactory.

It appears, moreover, that women themselves are very uncertain as to what the appeal really means. In one instance some ladies applied to

The Times,
March 30th. 1918.

663/70

WOMEN'S WAR WORK.

SHELL-MAKING AND FARMING.

POSITION OF EMPLOYERS.

An analysis of the applications for war work shows that out of a total of between 23,000 and 25,000 sent in about 3,600 women wish to be employed on armament work. One of the applicants, who is most eager to make shells, is a Scarborough laundress whose place was destroyed by the German cruisers in the East Coast raid.

Next to shell-making the occupation most in favour appears to be agricultural work, for which 2,400 have volunteered, or about 10 per cent. of the whole. What proportion will prove suitable remains to be seen, but a considerable number claim to have had experience in dairying, gardening, and the lighter kinds of country labour. The Board of Education and the Board of Agriculture are cooperating with the Central Labour Exchange with view to the organization of training.

There is reason to believe that the War Office are likely to make a new recruiting appeal to certain employers based on the idea of large number of women being available, and inviting them to consider the duty of releasing more of their male employees and allowing women to take their place temporarily. It is not admitted that this is a kind of "veiled and sectional compulsion." As it is put, the men will not be coerced at all; all that is intended is that employers will be in a position, if they please, to go to employees and say it is "up to them" to consider what they ought to do. The employer, on his part, will be expected to undertake to reinstate the employee who enlists at the end of the war.

Government Departments, whatever may have been their attitude hitherto, will, it is said, set an example in this direction on a large scale. The proposed appeal will only be made to those classes of labour in which female labour can be temporarily substituted.

Nottingham Guardian,
March 31st. 1918.

The movement for the employment of women to take the place of the men who are needed with the forces is gaining force. According to the secretary of a large organisation concerned with female activities, the mass of women are not yet reached, but steady progress is being made. A new recruiting appeal is expected from the War Office, inviting employers to consider the duty of releasing more of their male workers and allowing women to occupy their places temporarily, while both political parties are showing zeal in the matter. The Primrose League yesterday sent out its official communication drawing special attention to the appeal to women for war service, and the Women's Liberal Federation is adopting a similar course. In the case of the National Union of Women Workers, a conference is being arranged for the middle of April, at which a representative of the Board of Trade will be present to give detailed information as to the Government's needs and the conditions of employment. Among those who have so far made applications praiseworthy enterprise is shown. A large number wish to be employed on shell-making or other armament work, and agriculture also meets with favour. At Glasgow, moreover, an experiment is being tried in the employment of women as tramway conductors. If the experience this week is satisfactory, it will, no doubt, be extended, and it is to be noted that the hours of work and the pay are the same as in the case of men. There is no doubt that women will continue to do everything within their work to help in the crisis. From the start of the war they have, as voluntary workers, rendered splendid assistance in reducing the hardships of campaign life, while at least five military hospitals have been equipped, organised, and staffed entirely by them.

Dundee Advertiser, 663
March 30th. 1918.
The Yorkshire Observer,
March 31st. 1918.

THE NATIONAL NEED FOR WOMEN.

AN APPEAL FOR WORKERS IN LEEDS.

The Leeds Town Hall was filled to its utmost capacity last night with women who met together to pledge themselves to forward to the best of their ability the Government scheme for utilising the energies of the women of the Empire during the present crisis. The Lady Mayoress (Mrs. J. E. Bedford) presided, and she was supported by the Lord Mayor, Lady Harewood, Lady Dorothy Wood, Miss I. O. Ford, Mrs. Charles Ratcliffe, Colonel E. A. Brotherton, Professor A. J. Grant, Miss Holmes (Amalgamated Union of Clothiers' Operatives), Mr. J. S. R. Phillips, and Miss Harton.

The following letter relative to the Naval Marriages Act, 1915, has been received by the Chaplain tate as Italy does."—Reuter.

THE NAVAL MARRIAGES ACT.

liberate. It is not permitted to Greece to hesi-million inhabitants, has four million Greeks to nationals unredeemed, while Greece, with five thirty millions, has only about a million co-

Greece, and added: "Italy, with more than tion of Italy could not be compared with that of ing Italy, M. Venizelos declared that the situa-

Great Powers." Replying to a question regard-would have secured the friendship of three only one division in our army and our fleet we

In conclusion, M. Venizelos said: "With thirty thousand square kilometres.

tory when she (Bulgaria) would acquire only some aggrandised as to aid Greece in doubling her terri-abandon her neutrality, but would Bulgaria be so of Greece before acting is waiting for Bulgaria to ern what she now possesses. The present Cabinet of the Triple Entente she would have risked losing decided to move, because in the event of the victory to attack Greece had Greece penation in exchange for her neutrality. Bulgaria from both sides she was offered considerable com-neutrality of not, she is certain to realise benefits.

Without some sacrifice States cannot aggrandise themselves. Whether Bulgaria abandons her

Continuing, M. Venizelos said:—

cession of a portion of Servian Macedonia.

territorial increase according to Bulgaria by the tions would largely compensate her for the tion which Greece would receive in other direcconcessions to Bulgaria, inasmuch as compensa-

Greece not to insist that Servia should refuse contrary, the entente Powers had requested whatever had been asked of Greece. On the relinquishing office no territorial concession tions, and declared that at the moment of his

M. Venizelos returned to Athens to-day from Cpessia. He landed at Phalerum in order to avoid a public demonstration which had been planned at the Piraeus, where, however, the authorities had taken measures to prevent the assembling of a crowd. Nevertheless, considerable numbers gathered at Phalerum and extended to the ex-Premier an enthusiastic reception. Cries were heard of "long live the Saviour of Greece!" The crush at the landing-stage of people eager to obtain a glimpse of M. Venizelos was so great that several persons fell into the sea, but they were rescued.

At a private meeting of Deputies and political friends held last evening M. Venizelos announced that he would make a statement in two or three days. The ex-Premier strongly protested against the terms of Saturday's official communique, which implied that M. Venizelos, in order to protect Greece from danger on the Bulgarian side, had agreed to pay ransom in the shape of the surrender of Kavalla. M. Venizelos denied these insinuations, and declared that at the moment of his relinquishing office no territorial concession official Government request, is calling the attention of all its affiliated societies to the great importance of a ready response to the appeal and is arranging a conference to take place about the middle of April, at which a representative of the Board of Trade will be present to give more detailed particulars as to the Government's needs and the conditions of employment.

No one, it may be said, is more keenly alive to the great social possibilities implied in such an appeal than its president, Mrs. Creighton. She is particularly anxious that the younger women of education should come forward, and is impressing especially upon the members of such societies as the "Time and Talents" the exceptional character of the opportunity now before them. Such girls, if they would come forward by groups of six or ten or twelve, could be drafted into a factory to work together. They would displace no poor woman; at the end of the war they would go back to their ordinary routine of life. Meantime they would have gained an insight into actual daily bread-winning that would widen all their sympathies, and might well have the most useful and valuable influences on the national life in the near future.

CONSERVATIVE AND LIBERAL.

To-day, when the Primrose League sends out its official communication to all its local habitations, it will draw special attention to the appeal to women for war service. The terms of the letter were considered last week at a special meeting of the General Purposes Committee, over which the Earl of Crawford presided, and the chief officers of the league will be asked to explain the requirements and urge the need for the patriotic collaboration of women.

At the Women's Liberal Federation a similar course is being pursued. Here those responsible felt strongly that the information of the circular was not sufficiently definite and that much fuller details on many points were desirable. The forms have been sent out for distribution through Women's Liberal Societies up and down the land, but to each one has been affixed the following notice:

The object of the proposed registration, as stated in the notice, is to discover what reserve force of women's labour can be made available if required. It does not necessarily follow that women who are registered can, or will, be offered employment. Nor by registering will a woman in any way pledge herself to take employment if offered, and will be perfectly free to refuse any offer if the nature of the work, the pay, and other considerations are not satisfactory.

It appears, moreover, that women themselves are very uncertain as to what the appeal really means. In one instance some ladies applied to a society, thinking that they could be given work to do at home!

SUFFRAGISTS' SUPPORT.

Outside the offices in Victoria-street of the London Union of Suffrage Societies is a large placard announcing that the names of women wishing to register for war service will be received within. The response, it appears, on inquiry, has been encouraging, but here, again, the want of more specific information, especially as to payment, is felt to be a deterrent. It is most important, say those concerned, that there shall be no under-cutting of men's wages, when women are put into the places of men, not only because that would be an injustice now, but from the temptation it might create at the close of the war to retain the women at the cheaper scale, which would obviously be undesirable from any point of view.

Taken collectively, the view is that the appeal must be made more directly to the individual woman. This can be done through such organisations as these cited, as in all cases the local or special bodies belonging to them have women on their branch committees whose words and example carry weight. But a little time must be allowed, as the central controlling body has had to decide on its course of action, and then the circulars and letters have to be sent out. The meetings of members may not take place more than once a fortnight, and thus there is further delay before the individual is reached. After Easter it is hoped and believed that the nature of the appeal will be better understood, and that the response will then be enormously greater.

---

will not be coerced at all; all that is intended is that employers will be in a position, if they please, to go to employees and say it is "up to them" to consider what they ought to do. The employer, on his part, will be expected to undertake to reinstate the employee who enlists at the end of the war.

Government Departments, whatever may have been their attitude hitherto, will, it is said, set an example in this direction on a large scale. The proposed appeal will only be made to those classes of labour in which female labour can be temporarily substituted.

Nottingham Guardian,
March 31st. 1916.

The movement for the employment of women to take the place of the men who are needed with the forces is gaining force. According to the secretary of a large organisation concerned with female activities, the mass of women are not yet reached, but steady progress is being made. A new recruiting appeal is expected from the War Office, inviting employers to consider the duty of releasing more of their male workers and allowing women to occupy their places temporarily, while both political parties are showing zeal in the matter. The Primrose League yesterday sent out its official communication drawing special attention to the appeal to women for war service, and the Women's Liberal Federation is adopting a similar course. In the case of the National Union of Women Workers, a conference is being arranged for the middle of April, at which a representative of the Board of Trade will be present to give detailed information as to the Government's needs and the conditions of employment. Among those who have so far made applications praiseworthy enterprise is shown. A large number wish to be employed on shell-making or other armament work, and agriculture also meets with favour. At Glasgow, moreover, an experiment is being tried in the employment of women as tramway conductors. If the experience this week is satisfactory, it will, no doubt, be extended, and it is to be noted that the hours of work and the pay are the same as in the case of men. There is no doubt that women will continue to do everything within their work to help in the crisis. From the start of the war they have, as voluntary workers, rendered splendid assistance in reducing the hardships of campaign life, while at least five military hospitals have been equipped, organised, and staffed entirely by them.

had joined the colours, but one could guess that at least one and a-half million had been withdrawn from the ranks of labour. As the last census showed that there were 8,000,000 adult workers, anyone could see that the withdrawal of 1,500,000, or roughly speaking 19 per cent., meant great dislocation in the industries of the country.

YORKSHIRE WOMEN PORTERS.

There was no reason, she thought, why women should not take up light machine work, as some were already engaged in the making of fuses. There was no reason either why they should not become shop assistants, bank clerks and insurance clerks, or issue and collect railway tickets. They could also do carriage cleaning or act as porters. Already at one Yorkshire station there were three women porters—(applause)—and one woman she had seen at work had taken luggage from the van as competently as a man.

Then again women could become taxi drivers, seeing that already many were expert chauffeurs and mechanics. There were still some men employed in textile mills and she felt certain that women could do their work satisfactorily. Those who would serve their country best were those who were willing to go anywhere and do anything. (Applause.) The Government were asking women to do work in exactly the same way as they were asking men to enlist. The appeal was not to women who were already working, but to the educated woman to do her share. Such women had already done much by knitting but they were now wanted to show their capacity in a wider sphere. They were wanted to undertake men's work.

THE EDUCATED WOMAN.

"We want you women to realise," she said, "that the work will be arduous and the hours long, and not to undertake the work lightly but to go forward with it, and if health permits not go back and give it up in despair." She did not see why women could not undertake certain forms of agricultural work. The lodging difficulty might be acute in this and other spheres, as women had not needed much in the past and therefore no provision had been made for them. In Coventry and the Midlands, however, where large numbers would likely be required, local committees of ladies had taken the matter in hand and were forming hostels and looking out for lodgings in clean, respectable homes. Her experience during the past few days, she added, had shown a certain amount of misapprehension, as a large number of women who had come forward to register had families to look after. "I don't want to damp their ardour," she said, "but I am sure that they would be better at home looking after the children. They would be doing equally as good work for their country as though they were working on armaments." (Hear, hear.)

Another class of women who ought not to come forward was that now engaged on good work. Those so employed ought to stick to their present tasks. The appeal was meant for educated women who had not hitherto done any work, and for those who were only engaged perhaps for one or two days a week. The appeal was reasonable, and it was for the women of Leeds to see to it that there was no failure in the city. The only place for registering, she pointed out, was at the Labour Exchange for Women, 12, Great George Street.

Mrs. Kitson Clark moved:—

That this meeting welcomes the Government plan for utilising the energies of the women of the Empire, and urges every Leeds woman to forward the scheme to the utmost of her power.

It was the duty of women, she said, to see that they lived in a manner that would prove that the blood shed on the Continent had not been shed in vain,, so as to show that the first soldier who lost his life on the soil of Belgium had won just as much as the general who joined in the "Te Deum" at St. Paul's. It was no longer possible for women to take merely the part of the chorus in Greek tragedy; the question was "Has the Government a use for my time better than that to which I am putting it?". She herself had put her name on the register at the Labour Exchange—a very humiliating task, as she felt conscious of her shortcomings. She warned her hearers that it was no use looking for "careers" in this form of Government service anymore than a university professor helped his career by going to fight in the trenches.

LOYALTY TO THE MEN.

Miss I. O. Ford exhorted women to think of their virtues, courage, strength, and power of doing work in facing this problem. Let them forget their conventions and prejudices, which were far more trying than creeds, and rally to the aid of the country. The Government were now recognising that women were quite as important in their citizenship as men, and were appreciative of the faht that women had already made immense sacrifices in the factories in order to sustain the soldiers at the front. Women had done this with that spirit which English women always showed at a time of crisis. In no circumstances, she advised, should women accept less pay than a man would get. She wanted them to remember that for two reasons—first, that it would be absolutely disloyal to those men whose places were being taken; and, second, because the action would add to the women's self-respect. (Applause.)

Professor Grant supported the resolution. He read a telegram which had just been received from the Board of Trade:—

If women register who are at present occupied in important unpaid work they will not be called up unless urgent need arises.

He emphasised the fact that woman's cause in all its different aspects, social, economic, and political, was bound up with the idea of liberty, and in the future he thought the power which the different classes exercised would to a very large extent be dependent upon the part which they had played during this unparalleled crisis. He thought the energy, sobriety, self-sacrifice, and sound sense of political penetration which had been displayed by women were splendid.

Miss Holmes and Miss Hartop also supported the resolution, which was heartily carried.

On the motion of Mr. Phillips, seconded by Mrs. Ratcliffe, the Lady Mayoress was thanked for presiding. Mrs. Ratcliffe, who was Lady Mayoress of the city last year, said that she intended registering her name to-day. In considering her qualifications, she said, she recalled that she had milked cows over a period of two months, and in that she was able to give a satisfactory account of herself, being that she had driven two cows [illegible] and [illegible]

The Daily Graphic, March 31st. 1915.

WOMEN AND TAXI DRIVING.

SCOTLAND YARD OPPOSES A NEW PROFESSION.

"The War Service march of the women is by no means going to be a triumphal pageant, even though it is under the leadership of the Government," writes a correspondent. "Barriers have already arisen in the various employments to which the sex would gladly help, and the discord anticipated by feminist leaders has started to mature. The revolt among the engineers this week against what they term female labour is not the only expression of male antagonism. Numerous other callings hitherto regarded as impregnable male fortresses remain so, even though the Government has opened up the doors to women. They are still to be made impossible or barred entirely against the invasion of the sex.

"Although the principal motor-cab companies, for instance, have taken the Government at its word and opened up their schools and garages to women in order that more men could be released for the front, every obstacle, it appears, has already been placed against their patriotic resolves. The three factions united to bar the progress of the feminine taxi driver are Scotland Yard, the trades unions, and some of the male drivers. Whether the trio will win in the face of the Government is a subject of considerable interest at the moment among the parties concerned."

A Mandate and Blessing.

When the Government sent its mandate to the women of the country to register for war service it gave its blessing on their behalf to all the professions held by men, and in the opinion of women taxi-driving is an industry which might be practised admirably by the sex. Fifty women, after the call to war service, immediately applied at one garage, asking for the teaching facilities given to men, and here and at various other motoring schools the request was favourably considered. Scotland Yard, however, declines to license the women, and these facilities are of no account. Within the next few weeks pressure, it is said, will be brought to bear on the motor licensing authorities from the floor of the House of Commons itself.

At Scotland Yard, meanwhile, a DAILY GRAPHIC representative was informed that the Commissioner of Police would not grant the necessary licences to enable women to drive taxis in the Metropolis. Deputations on the subject had met with no success, the Commissioner, though not actually stating his reasons for refusing permission, giving the women to understand definitely that there was so much against the proposal that he was not likely to change his mind. Besides, added the official, there is no shortage of taximen. The latter statement is disproved by one important motor cab company, which states that, owing to the shortage of taximen, it has lying idle in its garages some 1,600 motor cabs.

Idle Taxis.

"It has been said by Scotland Yard that the number of qualified licensed taxi drivers in London to-day is in excess of the number of licensed vehicles," explained one of the managers recently, "but this can be explained into quite a different position. The number of 'licensable' cabs very greatly exceeds the number of drivers. When the police plate is removed from the vehicle it ceases to be licensed, and our cabs lying idle (1,600 all told) through so many of our men having joined the colours, could be licensed tomorrow if we had drivers to take them out. The police plate costs 3s. 4d. a month, and it is to save this sum that we have removed the plates from our idle taxis. Thus the vehicles are not licensed, and so do not appear in the official figures.

"In addition, to say that there is no shortage of taximen in London is to cast a reflection on our motor-men who have so nobly responded to the call of King and Country. They went in hundreds with the transports or as fighters. Many of them will never come back."

Success of the Women

According to one company which is already employing half a dozen women as motor-van delivery drivers the management will take as many licensed taxi women as it can get, so successful has been the experiment with the six now employed. "They will be treated like the men," said the manager. "They will have the same regulations and the same pay. We are feeling the male shortage keenly, and where, prior to the war, we only employed men who had had two years' experience on the road, we have to be content now with a much lower standard of male efficiency. We are out to get the best. Male or female, we will pay for it, and it is up to the Government to supply the labour the country needs if it is to be run successfully."

Manchester Guardian, March 31st. 1915.

Women and the War.

Two thousand four hundred women, of whom a considerable number claim to be to some extent experienced, have applied to be employed in agriculture. There must be in truth a large number of women in the country who have some knowledge of farm work, for of recent years nothing has been more ominous than the steady drift of women from the country to the towns. Nor is the reason far to seek. The conditions of farm work have been repulsive, and the work, especially for women, has been hard, the hours have been long, and the wages ridiculously low. The French Government have been able to rely to a very large extent on women in agriculture largely because of a more extensive system of small holdings, which besides being an attraction to continue on the land is also an invaluable training ground for male and female farm workers. We are now paying the price of years of neglect. Our system of small holdings is very limited, and we have been criminally negligent of the conditions of agricultural workers. If there were some guarantee that conditions generally would be improved and that higher wages would be paid, there is no doubt that there would be a still greater number of women volunteering for farm work. There is plenty of room for them. The dairymaid is a tradition that has unfortunately been fast dying. In Scotland, however, in the East Lothians, it has been stated that some 40 per cent of the workers are women. In Fife there is also a high percentage. But if women are to be employed in agriculture their conditions must be made much more attractive. The Council of the Central and Associated Chamber of Agriculture yesterday passed a resolution approving of the Government attempt to "induce women to come to the aid of the agriculturist." The farmers, at any rate, recognise the value of women's labour; they must also realise their own responsibility. They may complain of lack of labour, but they cannot now complain of low prices. If a woman is employed to do a man's work, she ought to get a man's pay.

Daily Call, April 1st. 1915.

WOMEN'S WAR WORK PAY

MISS PANKHURST WANTS INFORMATION.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE'S REPLY.

Mr. Lloyd George has sent the following letter to Miss Sylvia Pankhurst in reply to her inquiry as to whether the Treasury agreement between the Board of Trade and the Labour representatives would secure that women shall receive equal pay for equal work with the men whom they may replace:—

SAME PAY IF——

Dear Miss Pankhurst,—The words which you quote would guarantee that women undertaking the work of men would get the same piece rates as men were receiving before the date of this agreement.

That, of course, means that if the women turn out the same quantity of work as men employed on the same job they will receive exactly the same pay.—Yours sincerely,

(Signed) D. LLOYD GEORGE.

Miss Pankhurst has now replied to the Chancellor as follows:—

DEFINITE ANSWER WANTED.

Dear Mr. Lloyd George,—Many thanks for your letter with its valuable explanation that women are to receive the "same piece-work rates as men were receiving before the date of this agreement."

I conclude that the women will also receive any war bonus and increase of wages as a result of the war which would have been paid had men been employed.

It is important to know also whether the same time rates are to apply in the case of women as those which were paid to men, because if this were not the case employers might merely engage women to work on time

Manchester Guardian, March 31st. 1915.

The Appeal to Women.

It seems to be the general view that information of a more definite nature will have to be given before the appeal to the women workers can have its full effect. I suppose it is not to be expected that there can be any central scheme for placing women. That is a matter which must be left for each industry if any organisation is to be undertaken on a big scale, and every use ought to be made of the services of the women's representative societies. The Labour Exchanges have not proved very popular with women, and there is a large section willing to respond to the appeal who would be reluctant to register themselves at the Exchanges. This difficulty is being met by the societies, such as the National Union of Women Workers, which is calling together a conference where representatives of the Board of Trade will give more information in detail upon the Government's requirements. The wages question is one of the most important matters to engage the attention of the women's leaders, and it involves many complexities which will need careful handling. It is stated that the applications for war work from women number about 24,000 at present, and the biggest proportion express a desire to be employed on armament works. Next to them come those—2,400 in number—who claim some knowledge of the lighter sort of agriculture. It is not easy to see where women can take a part in making munitions of war, but the experiences of Russia and France show what an important and indispensable share they can have in agriculture. The Russian harvest was virtually brought in by the women, and it has been much the same in France. The trouble in this country is a lack of trained women, and the Board of Education and the Board of Agriculture are to co-operate with the Central Labour Exchange for the organisation of training.

The Schoolmistress 1.4.15.

WAR SERVICE REGISTER.

An important step has been taken by the Government in calling upon women to register themselves for paid employment in the nation's service in order to fill up ranks which are at present without sufficient labour and also to release men for the fighting line. The most pressing demand is for industrial workers to help in the production of armaments, for dairy women and farm labourers, and for women who would be willing to undertake duty in shops where men of fighting age are now detained. Clerks, leather stitchers, brush-makers, clothing-machinists, gardeners and others are also needed, and the appeal of the Government is to all women who are able and free to work, but who are not at present doing paid work, to register at once at the nearest Labour Exchange or local agency of the Unemployment Fund, in order that they may know as soon as possible what women are still available as paid workers for whole or part time work and those who are willing to undergo training.

In Birmingham women are already employed to look after automatic machines and turn out the lighter parts of machine-guns, rifles, and the firing gear of big guns. They are quite capable of manufacturing shrapnel shells of all kinds, and for many parts of this work they are peculiarly well-fitted owing to their small fingers and quick sense of touch. Their hours are from eight to five with an hour off for meals. At the Royal Arsenal at Woolwich it is recognised that many of the operations in the manufacture of ammunition now being performed by men and boys could be equally well done by women and girls.

In Paris the wives of soldiers are acting as tram drivers and conductors. Women are engaged as tellers in the branch offices of the banks. They are also driving taxi-cabs and performing many public duties formerly done by men.

The Principal of Swanley College has arranged special courses under the Board of Agriculture for the training of women for farm work, and special courses are also arranged there for training in bee and poultry keeping and fruit preserving.

Miss Mary Macarthur, of the Central Committee on Women's Employment, points out that there are 50,000 unemployed women representing many branches of industry at present in want of work. She thinks that the Government would have been well-advised to have consulted with the leaders of the women's industrial movement with a view to the employment of these workers before launching their appeal. As the situation now stands the War Emergency Workers' National Committee has decided to convene a conference representative of women's organisations, including women's trade unions, labour, suffragist, and other societies affected by the Government proposals. Miss Macarthur will preside, and it is expected that the conference will take place in about a fortnight.

other motoring schools the request was favourably considered. Scotland Yard, however, declines to license the women, and these facilities are of no account. Within the next few weeks pressure, it is said, will be brought to bear on the motor licensing authorities from the floor of the House of Commons itself.

At Scotland Yard, meanwhile, a DAILY GRAPHIC representative was informed that the Commissioner of Police would not grant the necessary licences to enable women to drive taxis in the Metropolis. Deputations on the subject had met with no success, the Commissioner, though not actually stating his reasons for refusing permission, giving the women to understand definitely that there was so much against the proposal that he was not likely to change his mind. Besides, added the official, there is no shortage of taximen. The latter statement is disproved by one important motor cab company, which states that, owing to the shortage of taximen, it has lying idle in its garages some 1,600 motor cabs.

Idle Taxis.

"It has been said by Scotland Yard that the number of qualified licensed taxi drivers in London to-day is in excess of the number of licensed vehicles," explained one of the managers recently, "but this can be explained into quite a different position. The number of 'licensable' cabs very greatly exceeds the number of drivers. When the police plate is removed from the vehicle it ceases to be licensed, and our cabs lying idle (1,600 all told) through so many of our men having joined the colours, could be licensed tomorrow if we had drivers to take them out. The police plate costs 3s. 4d. a month, and it is to save this sum that we have removed the plates from our idle taxis. Thus the vehicles are not licensed, and so do not appear in the official figures.

"In addition, to say that there is no shortage of taximen in London is to cast a reflection on our motor-men who have so nobly responded to the call of King and Country. They went in hundreds with the transports or as fighters. Many of them will never come back."

Success of the Women

According to one company which is already employing half a dozen women as motor-van delivery drivers the management will take as many licensed taxi women as it can get, so successful has been the experiment with the six now employed. "They will be treated like the men," said the manager. "They will have the same regulations and the same pay. We are feeling the male shortage keenly, and where, prior to the war, we only employed men who had had two years' experience on the road, we have to be content now with a much lower standard of male efficiency. We are out to get the best. Male or female, we will pay for it, and it is up to the Government to supply the labour the country needs if it is to be run successfully."

In Scotland, however, in the East Lothians, it has been stated that some 40 per cent of the workers are women. In Fife there is also a high percentage. But if women are to be employed in agriculture their conditions must be made much more attractive. The Council of the Central and Associated Chamber of Agriculture yesterday passed a resolution approving of the Government attempt to "induce women to come to the aid of the agriculturist." The farmers, at any rate, recognise the value of women's labour; they must also realise their own responsibility. They may complain of lack of labour, but they cannot now complain of low prices. If a woman is employed to do a man's work, she ought to get a man's pay.

Daily Call, April 1st. 1916.

WOMEN'S WAR WORK PAY

MISS PANKHURST WANTS INFORMATION.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE'S REPLY.

Mr. Lloyd George has sent the following letter to Miss Sylvia Pankhurst in reply to her inquiry as to whether the Treasury agreement between the Board of Trade and the Labour representatives would secure that women shall receive equal pay for equal work with the men whom they may replace:—

SAME PAY IF——

Dear Miss Pankhurst,—The words which you quote would guarantee that women undertaking the work of men would get the same piece rates as men were receiving before the date of this agreement.

That, of course, means that if the women turn out the same quantity of work as men employed on the same job they will receive exactly the same pay.—Yours sincerely,

(Signed) D. LLOYD GEORGE.

Miss Pankhurst has now replied to the Chancellor as follows:—

DEFINITE ANSWER WANTED.

Dear Mr. Lloyd George,—Many thanks for your letter with its valuable explanation that women are to receive the "same piecework rates as men were receiving before the date of this agreement."

I conclude that the women will also receive any war bonus and increase of wages as a result of the war which would have been paid had men been employed.

It is important to know also whether the same time rates are to apply in the case of women as those which were paid to men, because if this were not the case employers might merely engage women to work on time rates to avoid paying the standard rate to men.

I hope that you will be able to give me a definite answer on this point, as you will understand how anxious women are in regard to the matter.—Faithfully yours,

(Signed) E. SYLVIA PANKHURST.

The Russian harvest was virtually brought in by the women, and it has been much the same in France. The trouble in this country is a lack of trained women, and the Board of Education and the Board of Agriculture are to co-operate with the Central Labour Exchange for the organisation of training.

The Schoolmistress 1.4.16.

WAR SERVICE REGISTER.

An important step has been taken by the Government in calling upon women to register themselves for paid employment in the nation's service in order to fill up ranks which are at present without sufficient labour and also to release men for the fighting line. The most pressing demand is for industrial workers to help in the production of armaments, for dairy women and farm labourers, and for women who would be willing to undertake duty in shops where men of fighting age are now detained. Clerks, leather stitchers, brush makers, clothing machinists, gardeners and others are also needed, and the appeal of the Government is to all women who are able and free to work, but who are not at present doing paid work, to register at once at the nearest Labour Exchange or local agency of the Unemployment Fund, in order that they may know as soon as possible what women are still available as paid workers for whole or part time work and those who are willing to undergo training.

In Birmingham women are already employed to look after automatic machines and turn out the lighter parts of machine-guns, rifles, and the firing gear of big guns. They are quite capable of manufacturing shrapnel shells of all kinds, and for many parts of this work they are peculiarly well-fitted owing to their small fingers and quick sense of touch. Their hours are from eight to five with an hour off for meals. At the Royal Arsenal at Woolwich it is recognised that many of the operations in the manufacture of ammunition now being performed by men and boys could be equally well done by women and girls.

In Paris the wives of soldiers are acting as tram drivers and conductors. Women are engaged as tellers in the branch offices of the banks. They are also driving taxi-cabs and performing many public duties formerly done by men.

The Principal of Swanley College has arranged special courses under the Board of Agriculture for the training of women for farm work, and special courses are also arranged there for training in bee and poultry keeping and fruit preserving.

Miss Mary Macarthur, of the Central Committee on Women's Employment, points out that there are 50,000 unemployed women representing many branches of industry at present in want of work. She thinks that the Government would have been well-advised to have consulted with the leaders of the women's industrial movement with a view to the employment of these workers before launching their appeal. As the situation now stands the War Emergency Workers' National Committee has decided to convene a conference representative of women's organisations, including women's trade unions, labour, suffragist, and other societies affected by the Government proposals. Miss Macarthur will preside, and it is expected that the conference will take place in about a fortnight.

Morning Post. 24. 12. 13.

WAR REGISTER FOR WOMEN WORKERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING POST.

SIR,—The Association of Head Mistresses has had under consideration the report of the Committee appointed by the Home Secretary to advise as to the employment of women in replacing men withdrawn for service in the military forces. The Association is anxious to assist as far as possible in finding suitable women to meet the present need, and has taken steps to ensure that this need shall be made known to former pupils of girls' public secondary schools throughout the country. In order to make the services of such women available, the Association has opened a War Register, on which will be placed the names of women who are able to undertake clerical and other work for the duration of the war. Each person registered will be recommended by the head mistress signing her application for registration as fitted by character, education, and, where such is the case, by special training, for the work she offers to do. The Registration Committee advise that, where possible, intending applicants should follow one of the short intensive courses of business training which have been set on foot by the London County Council and other Local Authorities and by certain Public Schools for Girls.

The Committee will not register any girl under eighteen; on the other hand, it will not hesitate to recommend suitable women of middle age who have had University or other good educational advantages for particular posts involving responsibility where experience of life is especially valuable. Those who are registered will not be advised to undertake any work for which adequate remuneration is not offered, unless where part of the salary is paid to some man who has enlisted, and in that case the woman's part in the arrangement should be fully recognised.

The Hon. Registrar is Miss Steele, The Grey Coat Hospital, Westminster, from whom further information can be obtained.—Yours, &c.,

A. E. ESCOTT, President, Sheffield High School.
BETA OLDHAM, Chairman, War Register Committee, Streatham Hill High School.
SOPHIE BRYANT, North London Collegiate School.
F. GADESDEN, Blackheath High School.
F. R. GRAY, St. Paul's Girls' School.
A. T. STEELE, Grey Coat Hospital.

Association of Head Mistresses, Dec. 23.

Aberdeen Free Press. 14. IV. 1915.

Over 33,000 women have had their names placed on the special register for war service. Of those, 6000 have registered for armament work, 4000 for clothing trades, 4200 for dairy, gardening, and agricultural labour, and 5000 for commercial and clerical duties, but—strange to say—only 1100 as shop assistants. These figures were given by the President of the Board of Trade at a conference to-day with representatives of women's organisations, which included suffragist and anti-suffragist societies, among the ladies being Miss Sylvia Pankhurst, who represented the East London Federation of Suffragettes, and Mrs Archibald Colquhoun, who represented the National League for Opposing Women's Suffrage. Mrs Humphry Ward appeared for the Local Government Advancement Committee, and Mrs Sarah Tooley for the Women Writers' Suffrage League. Miss Norah L. Smythe represented the "Woman's Dreadnought." Mr Runciman stated that steps were being taken, in consultation with the Home Office, to increase recruiting and the temporary substitution of women for the men leaving in a number of trades. The Labour Exchanges could not take direct responsibility as to wages and conditions beyond giving in each case such information as was in their possession, but, in regard to Government contractors, it had been laid down that the piece rates for women should be the same as for men.

Leicester Post. 17. 4. 15. 663/72 663

LEICESTER WOMEN AND THE WAR.

To Assist the Public Services.

MUNICIPAL EMPLOYES RELEASED FOR WAR OFFICE WORK.

An important movement for the organisation of women in Leicester to assist in carrying on the public services of the town during the absence of men in the field of battle, or in giving assistance in the manufacture of munitions of war, was held at the Town Hall on Thursday night.

The Mayor, who was accompanied by the Misses Jones, briefly explained the object of the meeting. The Government were most desirous, he said, that every available man should be released from the public services, factories and workshops and other employment in order that the full fighting power of the nation might be secured to prosecute the war. In Birmingham 1,100 Corporation employes had been released for enlistment, or to help in the work of providing munitions of war. In Leicester a similar appeal had been made to the men engaged in the public services, and already 400 had sent in their names. When these men were finally accepted it would probably be necessary to utilise the services of women in order to keep the public services going as well as could be reasonably expected during the absence of the men. Women would probably be wanted as tramway conductors, postmen, hospital workers, street cleaners, etc., and it was important that a register containing the names of women who were willing to do this work should be built up as quickly as possible. With the view of making the movement widely known, he moved that posters be exhibited throughout the town, that cards be exhibited in the tramcars, and that the clergy and ministers and heads of social organisations be written to and asked to describe the movement.

The resolution was seconded and carried unanimously, and Mr. Handley and Miss Storey, of the Labour Exchange, will take immediate steps to put it into operation.

The object of registration is to find out what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required. As from time to time actual openings for employment present themselves notice will be given through the Labour Exchange, with full details as to the nature of work, conditions of pay, and, so far as special training is necessary, arrangements will, if possible, be made for the purpose. A number of women have already been registered, and it is hoped others will do so at the earliest possible moment.

Edinburgh Evening News
8 6 15

663

663/73

WOMEN AND PEACE.

MRS PETHICK LAWRENCE IN EDINBURGH.

In the Freemason's Hall, George Street, Edinburgh, last night, Mrs. Pethick Lawrence addressed a meeting on the Woman's Movement in relation to the present crisis. Mr Andrew Young, who presided, said that they were fighting for freedom against oppression and tyranny, freedom to the weak to exist whether the strong liked it or not. He instanced the directions in which the world had advanced, and declared that in the greatest department of all, the department of ethics, of morality, they had made no progress during the last two thousand years, or comparatively little. He believed that his country was right—(hear, hear)—but he hoped that his country would keep the flag of toleration and justice and liberty flying. In honour we could not have escaped this war. Had he been a young man he would not have been there, and as an old man he had gone out to urge the young men to do what he considered their duty. But he was a believer in peace. (Applause.)

SANCTITY OF LIFE.

Mrs Lawrence, who was cordially received, said that the spiritual significance of the Woman's Movement was that women recognised the sanctity of human life. The Woman's Movement had accepted the principle that the human body was the temple of the Holy Spirit, and that the human soul was worth any accumulation whatever of a material character. That was not a new principle, but was there any truth more blasphemed to-day, both in peace and war? The speaker pictured the horrors of the battlefield, and declared that women must act collectively to win power to defend the sons they brought into the world. Internationally, they must organise, so that women should be admitted into the human commonwealth and have their say in all these questions of war and peace.

WOMEN'S RIGHT AND DUTY.

Referring to the Women's International Congress at The Hague, Mrs Lawrence said that some of them might doubt as to whether such a Congress at the present time was a wise or patriotic thing. To such doubters she pointed out that the resolutions passed by the Congress had been taken to every Government in Europe, except Spain and Portugal, and no word of criticism had been directed against these resolutions. On the other hand, these resolutions had been commended and accepted by all. The womanhood of the world had a separate and individual contribution as women to make to the collective thought of humanity. They had a special right and duty to contribute their opinion, owing to the fact that modern warfare affected the non-combatant even more directly than the combatant. They had the right to speak as the builders of the human race. Women had never been brought under the tradition of war. War was an anachronism. It was the destruction of the human race. War and the human race could not go on together. If scientific warfare developed at the same rate in the future, in a few hundred years the human race would be wiped off the planet.

THE CONGRESS MEETINGS.

Mrs Lawrence proceeded to describe the meetings of the Congress at The Hague. The 1500 women included representatives of nations actually at war, and the whole atmosphere, especially on the first day, was intensely electrical, but never had the chairman any difficulty in maintaining order. Everything went with the utmost harmony and peace. No one was allowed to discuss the causes of the war. These did not concern the Congress. They were there to discuss as women how causes of war could be removed in future, and arrangements made so that that great world-tragedy might never happen again. There was no idea of peace at any price. Mrs Lawrence went over the main resolutions passed by the Congress, and explained their nature and scope. The Congress appointed its personal envoys to carry its message to the Chancellors and Foreign Ministers of Europe. The embassy of the Congress was received by the authorities in England, Holland, Germany, Austria, Hungary, Italy, France, Russia, Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. The Pope had informed Miss Addams that so deeply was he moved by the terrible tragedy of the war that he would be prepared to co-operate with any neutral Powers who would submit negotiations even if there were but the smallest chance of success. Women looked for a new era based on the foundation of a constructive peace settled not by a few diplomatists but by the people, who never wanted any war. They wanted a peace heroic, passionate, thrilled with energy that would put all the devotion, which war had put into the destruction of human life, into the preservation and the culture of human life. (Applause.)

The meeting, with only two dissentients, adopted a resolution associating itself with the embassy of Miss Jane Addams to all the Governments of Europe, in which on behalf of the Women's International Hague Congress she had pleaded that they should take the necessary steps towards negotiations for a peace settlement based upon national independence, public justice, and human liberty rather than that matters should be allowed to drift into a condition which would involve the exhaustion of the peoples and the bankruptcy of the nations.

Subsequently Mrs Lawrence answered several questions. She said that the Belgian delegation at the Congress had agreed that it would be better to win back their country by means of a negotiated peace rather than by driving the Germans out at the point of the sword. The latter method would leave Belgium in ruins. In reply to another question she said that it was absolutely untrue to say that the Congress had broken up in disorder.

War Service for Women.

In the "Englishwoman" for July there are two interesting articles on war service for women. The war will change many things, and will leave a deep impression on industry. Many thousands of women have placed their names on the War Service Register, but the number utilised has, so far, not been large. Many women, however, have been engaged on war work, without being obtained from the registers of Labour Exchanges. Women have been much more generally employed in metal trades than is generally supposed. One factor which is said to have assisted to this employment is the increase of machinery and the decline of hand training. For instance, for many years women have manipulated lathes in engineering shops, and this has given them the necessary training for "turning" light shells. Mr James Haslam, one of the writers in the "Englishwoman," says that there would appear to be no regularity in the way that women are being treated in the munitions works. The cry for equal wages with men is being responded to in some instances, but in other cases the earnings of women fall much below those of men. Indeed, there seems in some directions a tendency to exploit women—to persuade them to pay no heed whatever to pay or hours of labour, but to think only of serving the country during a grave national crisis. Many women workers, it would appear, are being overworked for war purposes, and the somewhat senseless position that women are not maintaining their usual capacity and quality of production is being realised. The invasion of general industry by women has been remarkable, and Mr Haslam is himself positive that their outlook will be very much widened. Another contributor to the magazine, Mrs Rackham, doubts whether many of the women who came on the War Register are really fit for the service intended, many wanting training and physique. This writer is, however, of opinion that as a result of the considerable amount of displacement of men's labour by women—in banks, offices, railways, shops, and factories of many kinds—some of the changes in industry will be permanent. Women will prove their value in certain occupations, in which they have previously had no opportunity of testing their powers, and they will not altogether lose their footing at the close of the war. It must be remembered, Mrs Rackham points out, that the terrible loss of men now going on must increase the disproportion between the sexes in the future, and an even larger number of women than in the past must rely upon their own resources for a livelihood.

G. R.

663/74

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

The President of the Board of Trade wishes to call attention to the fact that in the present emergency, if the full fighting power of the Nation is to be put forth on the field of battle, the full working power of the Nation must be made available to carry on its essential trades at home. Already, in certain important occupations there are not enough men and women to do the work. This shortage will certainly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting forces.

In order to meet both the present and the future needs of national industry during the war, the Government wish to obtain particulars of the women available, with or without previous training, for paid employment. Accordingly, they invite all women who are prepared, if needed, to take paid employment of any kind — industrial, agricultural, clerical, &c. — to enter themselves upon the Register of Women for War Service which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges.

Any woman living in a town where there is a Labour Exchange can register by going there in person. If she is not near a Labour Exchange she can get a form of registration from the Local Agency of the Unemployment Fund. Forms will also be sent out through a number of women's societies, and can be obtained by post from the General Manager, Board of Trade Labour Exchanges, at the address below.

The object of registration is to find out what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required. As from time to time actual openings for employment present themselves, notice will be given through the Labour Exchanges, with full details as to the nature of work, conditions and pay, and, so far as special training is necessary, arrangements will, if possible, be made for the purpose.

Any woman who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service. Every woman should register who is able and willing to take employment.

BOARD OF TRADE,
Queen Anne's Chambers,
Broadway,
Westminster, S.W.

March, 1915.

W 1.

(x) (74827) Wt. (3) 46 3000 3.15 W.B.& L.

663/75

G. R.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

Are your able to work and free to work but not working?

You should have your name entered at once on the Special Register of Women for War Service which is being prepared by the Government Labour Exchanges.

Women are wanted at once to work in the following (among other) occupations :—

Farm Work.	Brush Making.
Dairy Work.	Clothing Machining.
Leather Stitching.	Light Machining for Armament.

But even if you have no special experience of any of this wo.. you should register. It may be possible to train you. It is certain that as more men join the forces, more women will be wanted to work while they are away. Even if you can work only half of each day, you may be useful.

You can register either by going to a Labour Exchange, or by filling up the form on the back of this, and posting it to the nearest Labour Exchange. If you do not know where the Exchange is you can post the form to the Central Office for Labour Exchanges and Unemployment Insurance, Queen Anne's Chambers, Broadway, S.W. No fees are charged.

Any woman who by working helps to release a man or equip a man for fighting does national War Service. Every woman who can work and is free to work should come forward.

BOARD OF TRADE,

March, 1915. W 2 & 3.

(7412) W[illegible] 3,[illegible] W R & L

PTO

663/76

Register of Women for War Service.

(1) Surname ... ... Other Names
(2) Full Address
(3) Age
(4) Married, Single or Widow
(5) Have you ever done any paid work, and if so, what ?
(6) If so, when ? Giving date as nearly as possible ... ... What kind ... ... Employer's Name or Names ...
(7) Are you free to work :— (a) Whole time ... ... (b) Part time ... ... (c) To leave your home for work if pay is sufficient and housing satisfactory ?	 (a) (b) (c)
(8) Is there any other work which you are willing and able to do ?
(9) If you have never done paid work, what kinds of work are you best suited for ?
(10) Are you prepared to be trained for work which you have not previously done ?
*Special Questions for persons willing to do Agricultural Work :— Have you ever worked at any of the following branches of work :— (a) Milking ... ... (b) Dairy Work ... ... (c) Care of Live Stock ... ... (d) Light Farm work ... ... (e) Market gardening ... ... (f) Poultry farming ... ... (g) Ordinary gardening	 (a) (b) (c) (d) (e) (f) (g)
If you have not, state which branch you think you would be suited for ..

*Persons answering these questions should, if desiring agricultural work only, fill up Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 7 and 10. Persons willing to take agricultural and other work should fill in all numbers.

PTO

663/77

WAR EMERGENCY:

WORKERS' NATIONAL COMMITTEE.

CHAIRMAN:
RT. HON. ARTHUR HENDERSON, M.P.

VICE-CHAIRMAN:
JAS. A. SEDDON.

TREASURER:
W. A. APPLETON,
HAMILTON HOUSE, BIDBOROUGH ST.,
LONDON, W.C.

SECRETARY:
J. S. MIDDLETON.

TELEGRAPHIC ADDRESS:
"LABREPCOM, VIC, LONDON."

TELEPHONE: 1213 VICTORIA.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE:

JAS. A. SEDDON.
H. GOSLING, L.C.C.
C. W. BOWERMAN, M.P.
(Trades Union Congress).
J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, M.P.
JOHN HODGE, M.P.
W. C. ANDERSON, M.P.
ARTHUR HENDERSON, M.P.
(The Labour Party).
BEN COOPER.
BEN TILLETT.
W. A. APPLETON
(General Federation of Trade Unions).
ROBERT SMILLIE.
W. BRACE, M.P.
HERBERT SMITH
(Miners' Federation of Great Britain).
JOS. CROSS
(United Textile Factory Workers).
ALBERT BELLAMY
(National Union of Railwaymen).
ROBERT WILLIAMS
(National Federation of Transport Workers).
W. B. STEER
(National Union of Teachers).
F. W. JOWETT, M.P.
H. DUBERY
(Independent Labour Party).
Mrs. M. A. GASSON.
B. WILLIAMS
(The Co-operative Union).
H. J. MAY
(Co-operative Congress Parliamentary Committee).
W. H. BROWN
(Stratford Co-operative Society).
Miss MARY MACARTHUR
(Women's Trade Union League).
Miss MARGARET BONDFIELD
(Women's Co-operative Guild).
Dr. MARION PHILLIPS
(Women's Labour League).
Miss SUSAN LAWRENCE, L.C.C.
SIDNEY WEBB.
W. STEPHEN SANDERS
(The Fabian Society).
H. M. HYNDMAN
(British Socialist Party).
JOHN STOKES
(London Trades Council).

28, VICTORIA STREET,
LONDON, S.W.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

Dear Madam (or Sir),

The Workers' National Committee invite your organisation to appoint not more than three delegates to a Conference of Women's Trade Unionist, Labour, Socialist, Co-operative, Suffrage and kindred Societies, to be held in the Caxton Hall, Westminster, London, S.W., on Friday, April 16th, 1915, at 10.30 a.m.

Trade Unions which include both men and women in their memberships, in addition to the Unions more closely concerned with the trades in which it is proposed women should enter, are also specially invited to appoint representatives. These industries, as announced by the Board of Trade, are :—

Farm and Dairy Work,
Leather-stitching,
Brush-making,
Clothing Machining,
Light Machining for Armaments.

Other occupations are also under consideration.

The Committee propose to submit the Resolutions on page 2 herewith for discussion, and Societies are invited to forward amendments to the above address by Tuesday, April 13th.

A fee of 2/6 per delegate will be charged to cover necessary expenditure, and it is requested that particulars of delegations should be forwarded on the attached credential form.

Yours faithfully,

ARTHUR HENDERSON,
Chairman.

J. S. MIDDLETON,
Secretary.

663/78

National Conference on War Service for Women.

CAXTON HALL, WESTMINSTER, S.W.

ON FRIDAY, APRIL 16th, 1915.

10.30 a.m. to 12.30 p.m. 2 p.m. to 4.30 p.m.

President: Miss MARY R. MACARTHUR.

RESOLUTIONS:

I.—To be moved by Miss MARY R. MACARTHUR:

That this Conference representing the Women's Trade Union, Labour, Socialist, Co-operative, Suffrage and kindred organisations declares that as it is imperative in the interests of the highest patriotism no emergency action should be allowed unnecessarily to depress the standard of living of the workers or the standard of working conditions, adequate safeguards must be laid down for any necessary transference or substitution of labour, and it therefore urges:—

(a) That all women who register for War Service should immediately join the appropriate Trade Union in the trade for which she is volunteering service; and that membership of such organisation should be the condition of her employment for War Service;

(b) That where a woman is doing the same work as a man she should receive the same rate of pay, and that the principle of equal pay for equal work should be rigidly maintained;

(c) That in no case should any woman be drafted from the War Register to employment at less than an adequate living wage, and that the stereotyping of sweated conditions must at all costs be avoided;

(d) That adequate training with maintenance should be provided for suitable women whom it is proposed to place in employment under the foregoing conditions, and that in choosing candidates for such training, preference should be given, where suitability is equal, to the normal woman wage-earner now employed;

(e) That in any readjustment of staffs which may have to be effected after the War priority of employment shall be given to workmen whose places have been filled by women.

II.—To be moved by Miss MARGARET BONDFIELD:

That this Conference demands that the Advisory Committee of Workers appointed by the Government for facilitating the carrying out of the proposals for the acceleration of output on Government work should include representatives of organised women workers; this Committee should advise the Board of Trade as to detailed terms and conditions upon which arrangements can be made for the transference of women from one trade or district to another for work formerly done by men, and that before giving such advice the Advisory Committee shall consult the organised representatives of the trade or section of trade concerned, so that any action may be taken in the closest co-operation with the Trade Union interested.

III.—To be moved by Dr. MARION PHILLIPS:

That this Conference representative of the Women's Trade Union, Labour, Socialist, Co-operative, Suffrage and kindred organisations, whilst desiring to co-operate with the Government to the fullest possible extent in taking what steps may be necessary for the protection and defence of the country, and whilst welcoming the frankness with which the Government has publicly announced the co-operation of women to be essential, expresses the conviction that it would be illogical, inconsistent, and most unjust to delay unnecessarily the full rights of citizenship to women upon whom it has now been demonstrated beyond doubt, duties so heavy and responsible must fall in times of war, and calls upon the Government for a definite assurance that at the earliest possible moment the long overdue reform of universal suffrage will be dealt with.

Amendments must be forwarded to the Secretary by Tuesday, April 13th, 1915.

663/79

To

J. S. MIDDLETON, Secretary, Workers' National Committee, 28, Victoria Street, London, S.W.

DEAR SIR,—

I beg to enclose herewith being Delegation fees for delegates to the Conference on "War Service for Women."

Yours faithfully,

Secretary .....

Organisation .....

Address .....

.....

NAMES.	ADDRESSES.

The Church Family newspaper 663 II/1 663.
26-3-15.

Church Family newspaper
26-3-15.

OPENINGS FOR WOMEN.

GOVERNMENT ACTION.

(Specially Contributed.)

In order to meet both the present and future needs of national industry during the war, the Government have invited all women, with or without previous training, who are prepared to take paid employment of any kind, to enter themselves upon the Register of Women for War Service, which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchange. Already thousands of women of all classes have offered themselves in response to the appeal, and the Board of Trade has invited the co-operation of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies. The Union welcomes the scheme, provided that the necessary safeguards are secured, and they feel that the Government itself is the body to take the lead in employing women, for if they did so other employers would very soon follow their example.

The particular point the Union would press is the absolute necessity for training the women to do the work. The whole scheme would be wrecked if women undertook new work for which they had not been properly trained. They also point out that if women are underpaid it would be most unfair to the men who are going out to fight, and therefore they should receive equal pay for equal work. Another point the Union particularly wish to emphasize is the securing of good conditions as to housing, etc., especially in agriculture.

There are many highly qualified and skilled women willing and perfectly capable of taking high positions in Government offices, and already the Union has received offers from University graduates with much experience of social, educational, and secretarial work, to fill the positions of men in higher-grade Civil Service.

The Union have applied for 25,000 copies of the form of register for distribution amongst their members, and are at the same time warning the Board of Trade of the safeguards they considered it necessary to take, especially with regard to payment and proper training. Applications for work have come from women who are willing to drive motors, act as postmen, those who wish to be trained for dairy work, market gardening and poultry farming, but up to the present very few have offered themselves for lower-grade work. The scheme is one in which the clergy and social workers might well take an active interest.

RURAL PROBLEMS IN THE WAR.

CAN THE CHURCH HELP TO SOLVE THEM?

BY THE REV. M. R. ALLNUTT, Rector of West Lynn.

In rural matters the effects of the war have been perhaps more marked than in any other departments of our national life. Problems are presented which involve very serious issues, and if some of them are not altogether new, these have become more complex and difficult in consequence of the war. The recent cry "Back to the land" voiced the feeling of alarm at the rapid process of depopulation of many a country side, and was made the more insistent by the political agitation which accompanied it. How far the remedies already applied, such as the Small Holdings Acts and the like, have the elements of success in them that were promised it is as yet too early to say with confidence. Some of us living in the country were hopeful of good results, and were inclined to believe that with a scheme to secure an organised system of co-operation amongst small holders, with perhaps some amount of State aid to encourage it, those results would prove substantial.

The Position of Small Holders.

But it is difficult to see how any wide-reaching scheme, involving large economic measures, can be contemplated for some time to come, certainly not during the progress of the war. The small farmers, including the tenants of small holdings, must, it is to be feared, struggle on as best they can. They are hit by the war to a greater extent than the large farmers, who when faced by shortage of labour can make more use of machinery and pay the higher wages that are being demanded. The difficulties of the smaller cultivators were great before the war, but they are seriously increased now. The question is a grave one: Can small farms pay under existing conditions? In normal times the solution would seem to be that offered by intensive cultivation, by which the number of crops for the season is considerably increased and perhaps new species of produce obtained for the market. But this involves more capital, not to speak of the training required in scientific methods. The present moment seems hardly opportune for such enterprise. All the same, efforts of statesmanship should be applied to encourage as far as possible improved methods of farming.

Women Workers on Farms.

Sir H. Rider Haggard speaks with an authority which commands more consideration than any opinion that I can offer, but my experience in this part of Norfolk differs from his with respect to women's work on the land. Women are extensively employed in the potato fields and on the fruit farms, and I have reason to know that the farms and especially the harvest fields will attract large numbers of them this year. The increased cost of living will have much weight in overcoming the reluctance of husbands to allow their wives to go into the fields—a reluctance we must respect. Often have I heard the remark, "I married my wife to keep my home, not to do farm work."

Help of the Clergy.

There are attendant evils in regard to women's and girls' employment in the fields; are we in the habit of doing all we might to help those who have their homes and their little ones? Frequent visits to the fields in which they work

A Suggestion to Meet a Difficulty.

A saving of labour might be found by stacking the corn as much as possible on the spot, and where it can be managed threshing it there. The danger of fire in stack-yards, especially where these are near farmhouses, is an additional reason for this arrangement. A way of helping our small farmers might be found in the Government buying direct from them for Army requirements, using their motor transports for the purpose. An immense saving of unnecessary labour in collecting and distributing might be saved in this manner, at the same time affording relief to our over-pressed farmers.

We must win through! That is the determination at which we must arrive in a great and threatening emergency. Ordinary methods will not suffice, and many a makeshift must be accepted as inevitable. Among these we must contemplate the temporary employment of boy labour. I believe our lads are quite keen and capable. And here, I think, the clergy might find ample opportunities of helping, among other ways, by organising their Boy Scouts and Lads' Brigades for the purpose. I am also strongly in favour of extending the summer holiday, and of allowing liberty to permit half-timers. If a lad attends school during the summer months from 9 to 12 he won't lose very much by spending the rest of the day in the fields. Those of us who know the Swiss method have seen that education need not be seriously impaired by a judicious relaxation of school demands. I remember when I was on my way to the Panossière hut I had a talk with a lad of twelve who told me that he had charge of 160 sheep. He was remarkably intelligent, and gave me the impression that he was most capable, and I wondered how many British lads could change places with him, working all day in the lonely mountains and sleeping at night in a tiny shelter! We do not want to make such demands as these on our boys, but the incident serves to show what use may be made of them in an emergency. Cannot the Church assist in organising suitable means of employment for them without injury to their future prospects?

After the War.

It is certain that after the war new conditions will prevail in our rural life. The people will not settle down into their old grooves, and a considerable amount of restlessness will be met with, not to say discontent with many things that are now accepted without complaint. We shall surely be gainers and not losers if this new impulse be rightly guided. Here, again, is the Church's opportunity. She must prepare for the time when thousands of the best of her sons will return to their village homes with new experiences of life and many new ideals. Much will depend on the way they are given scope for their ambitions, and on the sympathetic and generous manner in which their aspirations are met. Otherwise, we shall not keep them with us in our country parishes, to our own grievous loss!

for equal work. Another point the Union particularly wish to emphasize is the securing of good conditions as to housing, etc., especially in agriculture.

There are many highly qualified and skilled women willing and perfectly capable of taking high positions in Government offices, and already the Union has received offers from University graduates with much experience of social, educational, and secretarial work, to fill the positions of men in higher-grade Civil Service.

The Union have applied for 25,000 copies of the form of register for distribution amongst their members, and are at the same time warning the Board of Trade of the safeguards they considered it necessary to take, especially with regard to payment and proper training. Applications for work have come from women who are willing to drive motors, act as postmen, those who wish to be trained for dairy work, market gardening and poultry farming, but up to the present very few have offered themselves for lower-grade work. The scheme is one in which the clergy and social workers might well take an active interest.

The Position of Small Holders.

But it is difficult to see how any wide-reaching scheme, involving large economic measures, can be contemplated for some time to come, certainly not during the progress of the war. The small farmers, including the tenants of small holdings, must, it is to be feared, struggle on as best they can. They are hit by the war to a greater extent than the large farmers, who when faced by shortage of labour can make more use of machinery and pay the higher wages that are being demanded. The difficulties of the smaller cultivators were great before the war, but they are seriously increased now. The question is a grave one: Can small farms pay under existing conditions? In normal times the solution would seem to be that offered by intensive cultivation, by which the number of crops for the season is considerably increased and perhaps new species of produce obtained for the market. But this involves more capital, not to speak of the training required in scientific methods. The present moment seems hardly opportune for such enterprise. All the same, efforts of statesmanship should be applied to encourage as far as possible improved methods of farming.

Women Workers on Farms.

Sir H. Rider Haggard speaks with an authority which commands more consideration than any opinion that I can offer, but my experience in this part of Norfolk differs from his with respect to women's work on the land. Women are extensively employed in the potato fields and on the fruit farms, and I have reason to know that the farms and especially the harvest fields will attract large numbers of them this year. The increased cost of living will have much weight in overcoming the reluctance of husbands to allow their wives to go into the fields—a reluctance we must respect. Often have I heard the remark, "I married my wife to keep my home, not to do farm work."

Help of the Clergy.

There are attendant evils in regard to women's and girls' employment in the fields; are we in the habit of doing all we might to help those who leave their homes and their little ones? Frequent visits to the fields in which they work and friendly intercourse with the workers would help to counteract some of the mischievous influences which attend the association of a mixed crowd of people, many of whom are often imported from the low parts of the towns. It is also possible that occasions will present themselves for instituting crèches for the little ones. In this way the families of many of the clergy will find opportunity of helping in the coming summer and autumn. I have not the least doubt that our country clergy will find means of co-operating with their farmers and of discussing with them the best way of caring for those employed in the arduous work that awaits them. They can secure greater efficiency by so doing. And it must be realised that we have not yet reached the time when the shortage of labour must call for all possible energy and sacrifice. Many villages are becoming depleted of their best workers, and perhaps the most serious loss will be found in the absence of carters and waggoners, many of whom have been pressed into the transport and veterinary departments of the Army.

ties of helping, among other ways, by organising their Boy Scouts and Lads' Brigades for the purpose. I am also strongly in favour of extending the summer holiday, and of allowing liberty to permit half-timers. If a lad attends school during the summer months from 9 to 12 he won't lose very much by spending the rest of the day in the fields. Those of us who know the Swiss method have seen that education need not be seriously impaired by a judicious relaxation of school demands. I remember when I was on my way to the Panossière hut I had a talk with a lad of twelve who told me that he had charge of 160 sheep. He was remarkably intelligent, and gave me the impression that he was most capable, and I wondered how many British lads could change places with him, working all day in the lonely mountains and sleeping at night in a tiny shelter! We do not want to make such demands as these on our boys, but the incident serves to show what use may be made of them in an emergency. Cannot the Church assist in organising suitable means of employment for them without injury to their future prospects?

After the War.

It is certain that after the war new conditions will prevail in our rural life. The people will not settle down into their old grooves, and a considerable amount of restlessness will be met with, not to say discontent with many things that are now accepted without complaint. We shall surely be gainers and not losers if this new impulse be rightly guided. Here, again, is the Church's opportunity. She must prepare for the time when thousands of the best of her sons will return to their village homes with new experiences of life and many new ideals. Much will depend on the way they are given scope for their ambitions, and on the sympathetic and generous manner in which their aspirations are met. Otherwise, we shall not keep them with us in our country parishes, to our own grievous loss!

Northampton Daily Echo
31/3/15

663
663 II/2

WAR SERVICE.

Call to the Women of Northampton.

HOW TO REGISTER.

The Mayor of Northampton (Councillor F. C. Parker) presided at a meeting held in the Council Chamber, Town Hall, on Tuesday evening, when the Government scheme for the registration of women for war service was explained by Miss Eleanor J. Beardsley, of Nottingham, the Assistant Organising Officer for Women's Work in the Eastern Division of the Labour Exchange. There was a good attendance of representatives of women's and girls' societies, and a committee was formed to carry out the objects of the gathering.

A Shortage at Northampton.

The Mayor explained the purpose of the meeting, and said that he was rather afraid there was not much surplus labour to draw upon in Northampton. He had been making inquiries, and his information went to show that if more female labour was available work could be found for it. The Government was endeavouring to ascertain the number of women willing to take paid employment in industrial, agricultural, and clerical work, and among the trades particularly affected, and for which women were wanted, were farm work, leather stitching, brushmaking, the machinery of clothing, and light machinery for armaments.

Miss Beardsley said the desire was to obtain a census of the female labour available throughout the country. She understood in Northampton there was not really sufficient labour to draw upon, but she wanted to appeal to all classes of women to register, so that in the event of more men joining the colours temporary labour might be drawn upon in Northampton to fill their places. Home ties were always a difficulty in regard to the movement of woman labour, and the desire was to groove certain trades to the town instead of taking women away.

Miss Beardsley read the statement issued by the President of the Board of Trade, pointing out that "if the full fighting power of the nation is to be put forth on the field of battle, the full working power of the nation must be made available to carry on its essential trades at home. Already in certain important occupations there are not enough men and women to do the work. This shortage will certainly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the forces. . . . . Any woman who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service."

Training in Agriculture.

A training scheme for agriculture, Miss Beardsley explained, had already been commenced, and women were being taught milking and general farm work, including the feeding and management of cows and calves and field operations, such as hoeing. Possibly butter and cheese making might be added. The minimum training suggested was a fortnight, and after instruction the women would be drafted to farms where labour is required. She had heard that in the Kettering and Wellingborough districts farmers had been selling their cows owing to lack of labour to milk them.

Strong, suitable women between the ages of 18 and 40 could be dealt with under the training scheme, but before they were sent into training they would have to produce a medical certificate showing freedom of infectious disease and of good personal character. Free board and lodging were provided at the Training College, which was at Kingston-on-Soar, and railway fares were paid. So far as possible work would be found for women near their homes, but they must be prepared to take up farm work wherever it was offered.

And in Ordnance Work.

Another scheme was for training women to make baskets for shells. Perhaps as many as 1,000 women would be wanted early in April for the ordnance works; at Coventry, where 100 women were employed in ordinary times, 1,000 were now engaged, and premises were being extended with a view to increasing the number of workers. It was as necessary to obtain women for that work as for men to enlist. Another branch of war service in which women could be engaged was in machining sacks, which were needed in trench warfare.

All the women on the unemployed registers throughout the country would be absorbed before the women for war service was resorted to. Women who were already in employment, particularly those engaged on Government work, were not desired to register. A good deal of Government work was being done in Northampton, and would probably continue for some time, and she did not wish to attract workers who were urgently wanted in their present positions. In some trades employers would not release men who desired to enlist, but in some of those cases women could probably help by doing the work that was necessary and so assisting men to get away, and at the same time helping to carry on business.

Registration can be made at the Labour Exchange or by filling up a form and posting it to the Exchange.

A Few Questions.

Replying to questions, Miss Beardsley said that anyone with a slight training in nursing would, by registering, be assisting to meet the shortage of nurses. Applications were being made for women workers to release clerks for service. Asked whether it would be possible for a group of women to work together, Miss Beardsley said that was a matter that could be arranged. A group of friends might be drafted to Coventry, for instance.

The following ladies volunteered to serve on the committee, of which Miss Stone, the chief women's officer at Northampton Labour Exchange, will act as secretary:—The Mayoress (Mrs. F. C. Parker), Mrs. S. F. Smith (National Women's Suffrage Society), Mrs. G. Swan (Women's Liberal Association), Mrs. J. Woods (Primrose League), Miss Shipp (Catholic Women's League), Miss Grew (Girls' War Club), Miss Denniston (Charity Organisation Society), Miss Ashford (Women's Social and Political Union), Mrs. L. T. Jones (Working Girls' Club), Mrs. Sparham (Salvation Army), Miss Wallace (Secondary Schools Association), Miss Sale (Band of Hope Union), Miss Emery (Adult Schools), Mrs. Capell (Y.W.C.A.), and Mrs. Naylor and Mrs. S. H. Smith (Women's Co-operative Guild).

Girl Telegraph Messengers?

Mr. G. H. Beasley, the Superintendent of the Labour Exchange, moving a vote of thanks to the Mayor for presiding, said he thought he could state with confidence that nearly the whole of the workpeople of Northampton are engaged on Government contracts. It was necessary, however, to have a reserve of labour available, and although it might seem foolish to ask certain people to do certain work there was no insuperable difficulty in training anyone. He hoped when the committee got into working order, work that was suitable for Northampton workers, and for which suitable pay would be given, would come to Northampton.

It did not follow that because a person registered that person would be compelled to accept the conditions offered; it would be open to them to refuse. There would be nothing in the nature of compulsion, the scheme was voluntary, and the only object was to release more men. He was having difficulty now in regard to male labour, and they might possibly see girl telegraph messengers about the streets before long, as there was a shortage of boys.

Seconded by the Rev. W. R. Harvey, the resolution was unanimously carried.

The Mayor, replying, said he did not think it would be at all difficult with the present day education for girls to undertake clerical work provided they had a little tuition in double entry. Undoubtedly in some trades men were doing work which women, with a little practical experience, could undertake, and he thought there were in Northampton many young ladies who would assist in any direction they could provided they did not have to leave the town. He had no doubt of the patriotism of the women and girls of Northampton, and was certain they would do all that was possible in the direction desired.

Northampton Daily Echo,
WEDNESDAY, MARCH 31, 1915.

War Service for Women.

A MEETING was held in Northampton yesterday in support of the effort now being made to register women for "war service." This does not necessarily mean service directly associated with the military organisation. Except as to nursing the appeal is made to women who are prepared to do farm and dairy work, and to help in other industries which are now, or may be soon, embarrassed by the loss of men who have joined the colours.

As the register of women is being organised through the Labour Exchanges, the promoters of the meeting must have been aware that in Northampton there is at present no surplus of women who ordinarily work for wages. The appeal, however, is not exclusively to them. Miss Beardsley, who expounded the scheme, asked "women of all classes to register." It requires some imagination to realise that milking a cow or doing light farm or garden work is really war service. But it is. People who have conscription on the brain jump to the conclusion that every such effort at organisation as this census is a preliminary to compulsory military service of all men of Army age, and that trades and industries will soon be in jeopardy unless there is wholesale recruiting of women for work. We do not accept that theory. So far as can be judged by observers not in the confidence of the War Office, events since August seem to show that conscription is unnecessary. Even from the strictly military point of view the objections to it in this country appear to be overwhelming. Men are still wanted, and in large numbers, but munitions and stores are wanted still more; and in its favoured position Britain is called on not only to supply the needs of its own forces but largely to provide for our Allies at the same time. That is one of the reasons why compulsory military service seems now to be out of the question for us.

But the fact remains that already two or three million men have joined the colours, and the number will increase so long as the need continues. This makes it difficult to carry on some industries, notably farming, which is of the first importance to the comfort as well as to the safety of the country. In many commercial offices there is also a troublesome shortage of clerks. The Mayor suggested yesterday that many middle-class girls would be willing to make good that deficiency. We do not doubt that for a moment, but it would mean more than good disposition. Some training would be necessary, with regular working hours and acceptance of discipline; and for the ladies whom the Mayor had in mind useful service would be impossible unless it was undertaken seriously as a duty imposed by the nation's need.

We do not enter now on the many subsidiary but important problems which this appeal opens out. First, is the essential condition that everything shall be done with the determination that the men who risk their lives in the service of the country shall not return home to find that their old positions are permanently filled by others.

Common Cause, April 1st. 1918.

Women's Register for War Work.

The first returns gave 16,020 as the total number of women on the new registers up to Tuesday, March 23rd; 4,000 more had registered by Friday, and the Board of Trade anticipates a speedy increase upon these numbers. The pressing needs of agriculture are recognised and hundreds of women have expressed a choice for agricultural and dairy work. Some of the occupations sought after show, as The Daily Telegraph remarks, "the extraordinary range of activity and ambition of the modern woman." There are applications for work in wireless telegraphy, in butchering, grooming, and even for the care of wild animals at the Zoo! The question of payment raises many difficulties, and we note an interesting proposal by The Nation that the Government should appoint an advisory Board of representative and experienced women, including Trade Unions and Suffrage Societies, to keep in close touch with the men's unions, and to confer with them and the Government as to the terms of the agreement under which registered women should engage themselves for work. It is for such a conference that the National Union is asking, in the following resolution sent to the Government: "Since the Government has invited a large number of Women's Societies to assist in the organisation and mobilisation of women's work for war service, the N.U.W.S.S. asks the Government to call a Conference of these Women's Organisations and Women's Trade Unions with a view to coming to an agreement as to the basis on which the Women's Societies and Trade Unions can co-operate with the Government in mobilising the women's labour of the country."

Women as Tram Conductors.

We learn that the Glasgow Branch of the National Women's Suffrage Aid Corps, has persuaded the local Tramways Committee to ask the general manager to submit a report on the proposal to employ women as conductors on tramway cars. This report is now in preparation and should be ready in a few days. There are many reasons why the experiment should prove successful, and we note with satisfaction that the men's minimum of 27s. is to be insisted upon for the women, who, however, are to be employed only during the war, a condition which, of course, detracts greatly from the advantages of this work regarded as an opening for women. One other drawback is the great length of the working day; and we gather that on this account the occupation is not altogether popular among male workers. It appears that 1,800 tramway men have joined the army, and there is now a shortage of 300 employees on the car service.

The Standard, April 2nd. 1918.

WOMEN'S WAR WORK.

25,000 APPLICATIONS AT LABOUR EXCHANGES.

ALL TRADES INCLUDED.

Applications by women for work so that men may be liberated to join the forces are pouring in at the Labour Exchanges in ever-increasing numbers. It is estimated that nearly 25,000 applications, the majority of which have not yet been classified, have been registered.

The smallest number comes from Ireland, where 270 are seeking appointments; 2830 are from Scotland and 7018 from the metropolitan districts. It is anticipated by the officials that the total will be doubled by the end of the month. Applications have also come from abroad. One woman wrote: "I want to help my country in any way. I will come to England at my own expense. Tell me what I may do." Some of the women applicants have husbands or sons at the front, and are anxious to take a part in, as one eager applicant phrased it, "the fight for home and freedom."

No fewer than 3000 women have applied for clerical work, and 2400 for agricultural work including dairy and ordinary farm tasks. Others wish to be drivers of taxi-cabs, chauffeurs of motor cars, lift attendants, porters, tramway conductors, barbers, and shop assistants. One woman is anxious for employment as a designer; another wants to take up engineering; a third will take the place of a night watchman.

The applicants vary from girls in their early teens to matrons with families. The more

The Times, April 1st 1918.

663

THE ARMY OF WOMEN.

OVER 20,000 APPLICANTS FOR WAR WORK.

LONDON TO THE FORE.

The total number of applications received by the Labour Exchanges throughout the country in response to the appeal for women to undertake war work is 20,723. This figure is for the eight days ended March 26. Since that date a large number of applications have come to hand, totalling probably 2,000. The work of classifying these is now going on.

Of the 20,723 no fewer than 7,518 applications have been received from the London district alone. To this should be added the total for the South-eastern district—1,171.

Yorkshire compares very favourably with Scotland. The great industrial districts in the Midlands and Lancashire have done rather badly, but this is probably due to the fact that a large proportion of the women are already employed in factory and other work. Wales, too, has not done so well, only 473 women having offered their services. An appeal to women is to be made on Sunday next in the Free Churches throughout Wales. Ireland's total is also small, only 270 applications having been received.

A large number of applications from the London district are from middle-class and well-to-do women, many of whom have expressed a desire to do armament work. In several cases the women have formed themselves into little groups, so that when the time comes for them to take up the work in real earnest they may do so in company with their friends and be employed side by side in the same factories. Many applicants express a preference for motor-driving, either taxicabs or vans, while others wish to do office work.

A number of applications have been received from Englishwomen abroad. One woman in New York, a teacher, actually sent a reply-paid cable offering her services for ammunition work, and begging to be informed whether they would be acceptable. She was willing to pay the expenses of her journey out of her own pocket.

Several inquiries have been received from the big drapers and other firms, and one railway company has asked for the services of 50 ladies.

The Mechanical Mechanical World, April 2nd 1918

WOMEN IN WAR SERVICE.

To the Editor of the MECHANICAL WORLD.

SIR,—Will you be good enough to allow a woman engineer some space in your valuable journal? The subject of mobilising the women willing to work on war service, as suggested by the Board of Trade, is of interest as being in direct connection in some ways with the engineering trades. I therefore write to ask the help of your readers in letting me know in what special work in their factories they are prepared to engage women workers, and whether there is any particular method of training they would desire to fit girls for working for them. I am also anxious to find out what openings there are for lady tracers and draughtswomen. I am, of course, aware that for years past the former have been employed to a certain extent; but what works are willing to open their doors to them that have hitherto been closed to anything but male workers? Are there many consulting engineers, etc., that are willing to employ lady clerks and assistants provided they have a certain technical knowledge? If one could be assured of patriotic assistance from men in this direction, it would be a great encouragement to open out and start a scheme of training for women and girls. I do not wish to add to the numerous existing organisations for women's work, but to assist in the management, under the auspices of one of them, of a special branch for training and helping women to work during the war in the factories directly connected with munitions of war and other necessary engineering undertakings.

From the women's point of view, I am able to say exactly what work they are capable of, for having myself been through the orthodox training of workshop apprenticeship, the drawing-office, and finally a technical college course, I can truly say what work at the bench, lathe, and experimental laboratories (mechanical and electrical) a woman is fitted to undertake.

I hope to have at least one or two girls under my personal supervision in my own office, but naturally I wish to obtain sufficient interest to institute a larger scheme of training in special workshops.

C. Darrt.

62, New Bond street, London, W., March 19.

663.

North Mail. Newcastle.
24. 6. 15.

WOMEN AND WAR WORK.

A PLEA FOR ORGANISATION.

By MARY FRASER.

The industrial world is in a state of flux, which the French philosopher tells us is the natural process of evolution. "Shifting" is going on all round; men are forsaking callings hitherto protected by trade union regulations from female invasion, and women are slipping easily into the places thus vacated.

In the midst of the universal upheaval it is difficult to know where to take your stand. There is work to be done, and time is precious; the wasted moments mean that, in that vague strip of land in Flanders known as "the front," some man dies for lack of fighting material.

I do not believe, as so many cry, that there are millions of "slackers" in England. I believe that, man, woman, and child, we are determined to do our best to end the war. But how to commence? What is the task that lies nearest to us? How shall we best use the modicum of ability that is ours?

Ready to Help.

Since March last 60,000 women have registered at the Labour Exchanges throughout the country for war work; some of these women have been employed before, and are either tired of their present occupation or have decided that they can be of more use elsewhere.

Let them think a second time. The woman, trained and capable, who is diligently doing her daily and accustomed duty, is freeing a man for the war as much as she who, inadequately trained, rushes into a munition factory under the mistaken idea that she can be of any real use in making shells. Shells require a great deal of making. The process of manufacture is complicated, from the time the shell blank is forged until the moment that the perfected article issues from the arsenal an up-to-date instrument of wholesale slaughter.

Sir Robert Hadfield, whose great munition factory in Sheffield is a seething hive of industry, is opposed to the introduction of women into his works, and I am in perfect agreement with him. These workshops, with their machines and their furnaces, are not suitable working-places for any woman of any class whatsoever. The heat is intense, the men who work there are barely clad, sparks fly on every side, and it is innate in the roughest man to see that a woman comes to no harm.

Best Course.

This very chivalry of his must hamper his industry when a woman stands beside him in the workshop, no matter how desirous she is of effacing herself and her womanhood. Of the 700 women who have registered at the Central Labour Exchange in Sheffield for war work, not one, a week or so ago, had obtained employment in any munition factory. The decision not to admit them was taken in the best interests of both men and women.

At Sheffield University Professor Ripper will train men from other trades for munition work. In his admirably fitted workshops he has machines which will enable a man to learn to use deftly the tools that are required in shell-making. Women may learn as well as men, but as yet there are no women pupils. Professor Ripper, eager as anyone to help in the work of ending the war, only advocates the employment of women when the supply of men has failed.

There is an idea prevalent among a certain section of women that high wages are to be obtained in a munition factory. Let them disabuse their minds of this; all that they will be offered for a day of hard toil is an unskilled labourer's pay. How should it be otherwise? How can a woman expect to master in a few weeks the intricacies of a trade to which men serve an apprenticeship of five or seven years?

In the new Army, on the other hand, we hear that young and able-bodied men, who have enlisted with the object of killing as many Germans as possible, have now been enrolled in the commissariat department, and have exchanged the bayonet for the rolling-pin. They are to receive instruction in the art of preparing food economically and of serving it in appetising fashion.

Now the first "cordon bleu" was a woman, and she prepared a feast for a monarch, and the kitchen, we have been told so by the men, is pre-eminently the woman's place. Why not, then, an army of cooks for the War Office, mobilised from the kitchens of England? Teach our men to be soldiers and our women to be cooks, and we shall evolve order out of chaos.

In our great drapery establishments there are men still measuring out yards of cloth to those women who have money to spend; in our grocery stores there are young giants engaged in selling small parcels of tea and sugar to little boys and girls. Can the most ardent trade unionist tell us that this has ever been a suitable occupation for an able-bodied man?

Even the Snop Assistants' Union has protested against it. "Give us women for the distributing trades," they cry to the Labour Exchanges, "and we will give you men for the war."

No Breakdown.

In our railway offices there are women ticket clerks and on the platform women ticket collectors, and as yet I have not heard of any feminine breakdown from overstrain; showing that these occupations are well within the limit of female capacity. I would appeal to authority to allow this sifting process to continue.

This war is devastating; it has already taken the pick of our manhood; there is scarcely a woman in England who does not mourn some life laid low. Debarred from the fighting line by our sex, we, too, ask to give of our best to the nation; but we are tired of playing at tasks that are of no use.

Employ us, it is our humble petition. Let the trained and capable woman take her proper place. We cannot make shells without previous apprenticeship, but we are doctors and journalists, and nurses and cooks, and shop assistants and typists; we teach classics and modern languages and the latest Swedish drill; in fact, we are so trained and so capable that it is difficult to imagine how any man can find an excuse to stay at home.

And we are not employed! The newspaper offices do not require us, even to correct their proofs; the trained nurse sits at home, twiddling her fingers, while amateur incompetence is in charge of our wounded.

Attractive young actresses are starving while they might be selling ribbons with profit, while many a middle-class housewife to-day has nothing to cook. She has sent sons to the front, and is ready to "mother" a whole battalion, and nothing would please her better than to be allowed to look after Tommy's digestion.

Are we to stand for ever outside, asking for work for which we are fitted? Man has made this war, let him conduct it in Flanders, in Russia, and in Turkey; the everyday tasks of our national life can, with the aid of a little organisation, safely be left in the hands of the women.

Cork Examiner.
1. 4. 15.

WOMEN FOR WAR SERVICE.

Sir,—The secretary of the Irish Women's Suffrage Federation begs me to send you enclosed resolutions, sent out in answer to the Government's circular letter requesting women to come forward for war service work. This letter was sent to every Suffrage society. Thanking you in anticipation for inserting reply.—Yours faithfully,

A. HELEN.

The following resolutions were passed at a meeting of the Executive Committee of the Irishwomen's Suffrage Federation, held in Dublin on Saturday, March 29th, 1915:—(1) "That the Irishwomen's Suffrage Federation, realising the importance of the appeal to women for National War Service, would remind the Government that women's position has not yet been regularised by the State, as until they have been admitted to citizenship their opportunities for doing national service must inevitably suffer, while their industrial position cannot be safeguarded as it ought to be in the best interests of women and the nation."

(2) "That the Irishwomen's Suffrage Federation heartily respond to the Government's call for help, and they are glad to have this opportunity of being of service to their country, and they desire that every society in the Federation should work for this end. They hope with representatives of other societies to form an Advisory Committee which will be able and willing to give advice as to wages and conditions of work."

83 Grand Parade, Cork,
March 31st, 1915.

663 II/4

The Manchester Guardian, April 2nd. 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

RESPONSE TO THE APPEAL.

WORK IN THE ARMAMENT FACTORIES POPULAR.

The response to the appeal to women to register themselves for "war service" has varied greatly. In Leeds and in Sheffield, for instance, women have enrolled themselves freely, while in Liverpool, Birmingham, and Newcastle comparatively few have offered themselves.

The total for Scotland—over 6,000—is deceptive, because the Scottish division of the Labour Exchanges includes some of the northern counties of England and extends as far south as Middlesbrough, where many women have given in their names.

A feature of the registrations in Glasgow is the large proportion of women who are desirous of assisting directly in the manufacture of war munitions.

NEWCASTLE.

So far as Newcastle in particular and Tyneside in general are concerned, the demand for war material has been the means of providing a very large number of women and girls with employment. At the well-known Elswick works of Sir W. G. Armstrong, Whitworth, and Co., Limited, several hundreds are engaged in connection with the manufacture of shells and other war material. Nor is this the only establishment in the locality where female labour has prominence. In these circumstances, the response to the Government's appeal to women to enrol themselves as willing to assist in meeting the shortage of men available in various sections of the industrial world has not been so large as it might otherwise have been, but the officials of the Labour Exchanges in Newcastle give the assurance that their lists have already been filled to a satisfactory extent. At the central exchange in Newcastle the names run to a total of between two and three hundred, and these represent individuals who are qualified and ready to apply themselves to quite a variety of vocations. In the east end of the city, as well as in the west—where women are engaged for the Elswick Works,—equally gratifying reports are forthcoming, though there are objections to going into details of any kind.

LEEDS.

The Government's appeal for war service by women met with a ready response in Leeds, and the assistants at the Women's Labour Exchange have been kept constantly busy dealing with applications from women anxious to offer their services. On Monday of last week 500 women made inquiries at the offices, and all the week a steady stream of inquiries necessitated the officials at the Exchange working overtime.

Up to yesterday about 700 women had actually filled in the forms, although the number of forms issued far exceed that number.

The bulk of the volunteers are of the working class, and while a few are doubtless anxious to seize the opportunity of making a little extra money the majority are only too eager to do anything which will be of direct service to the nation. This spirit is indicated by the fact that many women of all classes have expressed a desire to go into an ammunition factory "to make bullets to kill the Germans," and the Exchange has already supplied the local ammunition firm, Messrs. Greenwood and Batley, with a number of women workers.

Many women have offered themselves for service with the railway companies, for clerical work in the offices, and for the cleaning of railway carriages. The latter work is regarded as very suitable for women who have been accustomed to charing.

A good many applicants, too, including a number of well-to-do suburban women, have offered to do motor-driving and later work women. In point of fact the registration appears to have been misunderstood, and most of the volunteers have been disappointed to find that they were not offered immediate work. Those who have been enrolled comprise in the main teachers, governesses, nurses, and the like, and but few women who may be termed industrial workers. In comparison with other large centres the number of women trained to industrial labour in Liverpool is small.

SCOTLAND.

In the Edinburgh district between 2,000 and 3,000 registration forms were issued, but so far only about 400 women have registered. There are several active women's suffrage societies in Edinburgh, however, and they have thrown themselves into the movement. They have got a number of forms and are passing them round among women whom they can influence. It is expected that a number of registrations will yet come back filled up through their medium. The women who have registered mostly belong to the middle classes, and have not previously worked for their bread. A number have expressed their willingness to do whatever work they are deemed suitable for; others have recorded that they are ready to work on farms.

The Scottish division of the Labour Exchanges includes not only Scotland but Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmorland, and Durham, extending down as far as Middlesbrough, which is included in the East. A large number of the registrations came from Middlesbrough, and many of these are from women already employed. To a considerable extent this is also the case in other towns, so that the total of over 6,000 given for the Scottish district up to date does not mean that number of additional women ready for "war service." It means to some extent women who are desirous of change and are willing to work in armament factories or at other occupations than their own in the hope of better wages.

A large proportion of the women who have enrolled themselves at Glasgow have expressed a preference for work in armament factories. This employment appeals to them evidently on the ground that it affords an opportunity of assisting directly in the production of war munitions. That and the fact that there are several armament works in the district, understood to be capable of employing large staffs of women workers in the manufacture of explosives, no doubt accounts for the rush on this particular industry. It is generally known that women can be trained in a very short time to do the light machining and other work necessary in the making of shells, particularly shrapnel, and the facility with which the work can be learned may also have been a consideration influencing the women in the selection they have made. Already a number of women are employed locally in the manufacture of shells. There is a staff in at least one Glasgow engineering shop which has been adapted recently as a factory for this purpose. There is another factory in Paisley employing about twenty female hands, while Messrs. Armstrong, Whitworth, and Co. have also started 60 women in the works at Alexandria which they acquired some time ago from the Argyll Motors, Limited. This firm, it is understood, will be prepared to employ many more women as they complete their installations of new plant.

Messrs. William Beardmore and Co. are also willing, it is stated, to employ women in their large armament business at Parkhead. They are to start with a staff of 300, and if the experiment proves successful that staff will be augmented.

After armament work the class of employment most in favour with the Glasgow applicants is office work. A very considerable number have also offered themselves for service on farms.

SOUTH WALES.

The number of women who have entered their names upon the War Register in Cardiff and South Wales generally is not so large as in other parts of the kingdom. This is mainly due to the fact that labour is very scarce in South Wales, and that there are really very few women out of employment. Besides, few women in South Wales are accustomed to outdoor work. Attention is to be directed to the matter from all the pulpits in South Wales on Easter Sunday, and it is expected that the

Many women have offered themselves for service with the railway companies, for clerical work in the offices, and for the cleaning of railway carriages. The latter work is regarded as very suitable for women who have been accustomed to charing.

A good many applicants, too, including a number of well-to-do suburban women, have offered to do motor-driving and farm work. Most of these, however, will have to be taught. Apart from a few who have returned from Canada with their patriotic soldier menfolk, there are not many women in the city who know much about farming, and arrangements are being made to teach them at the University farms at Garforth and in Derbyshire.

The ages of the applicants range from fifteen to sixty years.

The response so far is regarded as satisfactory, but in order to stimulate it a public meeting was held last night in the Town Hall, presided over by the Lady Mayoress, who was supported by the Lord Mayor, the Countess of Harewood, Lady Dorothy Wood, and others.

SHEFFIELD.

The response in Sheffield to the Government's appeal to women to offer themselves for employment with a view to releasing men for service at the front has been even better than was expected. Up to the present 850 women have registered their names at the Labour Exchange, and the number is constantly growing. Though, of course, the larger proportion are of the working class, many of the women, including wives and daughters in middle-class families, do not ordinarily seek any paid occupation, and have registered simply out of patriotic motives.

The classes of occupations for which the women have offered themselves are very varied and include farm work, railway carriage cleaning, and work in the armament factories, such as varnishing the inside of shells, and shell turning and polishing. The greater number do not specify any particular form of employment, and are willing to take up whatever work they might be called upon to do.

BIRMINGHAM.

In Birmingham about 200 women have so far been enrolled on the War Register. Nearly half the number have not hitherto followed any occupation, and of the remainder the majority offer themselves for clerical work.

There are special local reasons which explain to some extent what may appear a meagre response to the Government's appeal. Birmingham trades normally find employment for a very large number of women, and since the war began the percentage has considerably increased. At the present time the demand for women and girls on the part of manufacturers is far in excess of the supply. Apart from the requirements of firms producing munitions of war, military clothing and ornaments, &c., women's labour is urgently needed by the printing trade, the leather trades, and the metal industries. Moreover, many untrained women who might be expected to register as willing to prepare themselves for occupations which would liberate more men for active service are already undertaking philanthropic work of one kind or another. Others, whose husbands are in the army or navy, are sufficiently well provided for and have not the spur of necessity which would drive them to seek employment. It is expected, however, that when the scheme is better known many more women and girls will place their names on the register.

LIVERPOOL.

The response of Liverpool women can only be described as "fair," and the explanation forthcoming is that no action of an official character has been taken by the civic authorities to bring the matter before the notice of and South Wales generally is not so large as in other parts of the kingdom. This is mainly due to the fact that labour is very scarce in South Wales, and that there are really very few women out of employment. Besides, few women in South Wales are accustomed to outdoor work. Attention is to be directed to the matter from all the pulpits in South Wales on Easter Sunday, and it is expected that the response next week will be very satisfactory.

BELFAST.

Belfast has perhaps been least affected of the chief centres of the United Kingdom, so far as the shortage of male labour is concerned. As a matter of fact a large number of men have been sent to the Clyde and the North-east Coast shipbuilding yards. Hence the necessity of employing women in the place of men has not arisen in an acute form. Nevertheless steps have been taken to meet the necessity, should it come, by the opening of a register, and a considerable number of women have enrolled themselves. Apart from numbers, which are very satisfactory, the type of volunteer is excellent. Most of the women are of independent means. Some are married, and a number of others are utilising the opportunity of finding an avenue for more remunerative employment than they have at present. While the majority of the volunteers specify the avocation they would prefer, others have expressed their anxiety to do anything, so long as it would assist the Empire at the present crisis. The words of one of the women—"Tell me what I can do, and if it is within my power it shall be done," illustrate the spirit of all who have handed in their names. Of course, with the best spirit in the world, women would not be of any use in certain Admiralty work at present being carried out in Belfast.

WOMEN WHO REPLACE MEN

TO GET THE SAME PAY FOR THE SAME WORK.

Mr. Lloyd George has sent a letter to Miss Sylvia Pankhurst in reply to her inquiry as to whether the Treasury agreement between the Board of Trade and the Labour representatives would secure that women shall receive equal pay for equal work with the men whom they may replace. The Chancellor of the Exchequer wrote:—

"Dear Miss Pankhurst,—The words which you quote would guarantee that women undertaking the work of men would get the same piece rates as men were receiving before the date of this agreement. That, of course, means that if the women turn out the same quantity of work as men employed on the same job they will receive exactly the same pay.—Yours sincerely,

(Signed) "D. LLOYD GEORGE."

Miss Pankhurst has now replied as follows:—

"Dear Mr. Lloyd George,—Many thanks for your letter with its valuable explanation that women are to receive the 'same piece-work rates as men were receiving before the date of this agreement.' I conclude that the women will also receive any war bonus and increase of wages as a result of the war which would have been paid had men been employed. It is important to know, also, whether the same time rates are to apply in the case of women as those which were paid to men, because, if this were not the case, employers might merely engage women to work on time rates to avoid paying the standard rate to men. I hope that you will be able to give me a definite answer on this point, as you will understand how anxious women are in regard to the matter.—Faithfully yours,

(Signed) "E. SYLVIA PANKHURST."

663 II/5 663

The Liverpool Post, April 2nd. 1918.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

AN APPEAL TO SOUTH-WEST LANCASHIRE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE POST AND MERCURY.

Sir,—At the first outbreak of the war the women of Great Britain were insistent in demanding "What can we do to help?" Work was found for many of them, and they have performed it wisely and well, relieving distress, helping the dependants of soldiers and sailors, finding employment for those whose work had been destroyed or temporarily suspended.

But the war has gone on now for six months, and all women are not fully employed to-day. Some have completed the work they had undertaken; some who were then ineligible are now ready to accept work, and this time the insistent demand comes, not from the women, but from the Board of Trade, who in this hour of the nation's need is calling on every able-bodied woman in the United Kingdom to register at once for war service at their local Labour Exchange, where papers containing full particulars of this new branch of war service can be obtained.

There are three strong reasons for responding to this appeal. First, in order that more men may be set free to fight for their country; secondly, in order to speed up the supply of munitions and other essentials for the continuance of the war; and, thirdly, in order to prevent that waste of energy which must occur if women's work be not fully utilised.

The new recruits are asked to register for war service—that is, for the special needs of this difficult time—and we have the assurance of the Labour Exchange officials that they will only supplement, and not displace, the regular industrial worker, and that the wages and conditions of their service will be duly guarded.

Men have responded splendidly to the call of their country and their King. May we through the medium of your widely-read paper appeal to the women of South-West Lancashire to do likewise. Surely they will not and cannot fail when the call comes to them, as it now does, directly: Women! Your King and country need you!—Yours, &c.,

LYDIA A. BOOTH,
President Liverpool Branch National Union of Women Workers.
EDITH BRIGHT,
Local President League of Honour.
JESSIE J. BEAVAN,
Hon. Sec. Liverpool Women's War Service Bureau.
ELIZABETH MACADAM.
ELEANOR F. RATHBONE,
Hon. Sec. Liverpool Women's Industrial Council.
MABEL FLETCHER,
Conservative and Unionist Women's Franchise Association.
OLIVIA JAPP,
Hon. Sec. Liverpool Society for Women's Suffrage.

Daily Telegraph, April 2nd. 1918.

WOMEN'S WORK IN WAR TIME

In reference to the appeal to women to register themselves for employment hitherto undertaken by men now serving, or about to enlist, in the Army, the secretary of the Women's Social and Political Union writes suggesting that the disappointing response so far made by the women of the country is due largely to the fact that the urgency of the appeal has not been sufficiently emphasised.

It has not been made clear, the union declares, that a million more men are wanted for the Army, and that every one of these men must be replaced by a woman who will do the work the men have been doing up to the time of enlistment.

As a means of impressing the public with the seriousness of the situation, the union recommends a household canvass of women willing to register and serve, that bills on the subject should be distributed outside churches, theatres, art schools, and any place where women congregate, and that clergymen should bring to the notice of their congregations the importance of the question. The scheme, it is added, has not been nearly enough advertised by the authorities.

The Irish Independent, April 3rd 1918.

WOMEN'S WAR WORK.

Applications by women for work so that men may be liberated to join the forces are pouring in at the Labour Exchanges in ever-increasing numbers. It is estimated that nearly 25,000 applications, the majority of which have not yet been classified, have been registered. The smallest number comes from Ireland, where 270 are seeking appointments; 2,850 are from Scotland, and 7,518 from the metropolitan districts. It is anticipated by the officials that the total will be doubled by the end of the month. Applications have also come from abroad. No fewer than 3,600 women have applied for armament work and 2,400 for agricultural work, including dairy and ordinary farm tasks. Others wish to be drivers of taxi-cabs, chauffeurs of motor cars, lift attendants, porters, tramway conductors, barbers, and shop assistants. The more elderly women incline to clerical work.

Morning Post, April 3rd. 1918.

THE APPEAL TO WOMEN WORKERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING POST.

Sir,—There seems to be a general consensus of opinion that the response of the women of England to the Government appeal for workers is disappointing. Certainly the total reached seems small, although at the Women's Emergency Corps and at other special centres the number of women who have registered has been most encouraging. We desire to point out that the inadequate returns are accounted for by the method adopted for enrolling the women.

Women of the industrial classes are not in the habit of consulting the daily Press for guidance in the ruling of their lives—an enormous proportion of them do not indulge in the luxury of newspapers, but take their news from the headlines on the posters; certainly they do not read the admirable articles on the subject of their duties and responsibilities that followed the issue of the Government appeal in the leading papers.

May we suggest that what is wanted is a recruiting poster for women, to be as widely distributed as the Army recruiting posters for men have been, distributed not only by the women's societies but by the central political associations, the Lords Lieutenant, and other county organisations, so that it may penetrate into the remotest villages?

We further suggest that the forms should be obtainable through the post-offices in country places, which are often many miles from the nearest Labour Exchange.

The "War Service" form is admirable from the point of view of those who have to compile statistics from the returns; but the average Englishwoman is essentially a practical person, and from her point of view the document is a vague one. Women are as patriotic as men, but the number of women without domestic ties and cares is numerically negligible; those in a position to feel justified in filling up what is practically a blank cheque in the dark are necessarily a very small percentage even of the minority of the women of the country who have had the appeal brought to their notice. A poster that contained a certain amount of definite information about the work that lacks labour (the number of women required in ammunition factories, before a certain date, for instance), as well as a simple stirring appeal to women to fill the empty places, would bring forward as many women as the country requires.—Yours, &c.,

CHRISTINE MURRELL, M.D.,
Chairman of the Executive Committee.
Women's Emergency Corps, York-place, Baker-street.
April 1.

The Times, April 5th. 1918.

THIRTY THOUSAND "WAR WOMEN."

DESIRE FOR ARMAMENT WORK.

Offers of war service continue to be received in large numbers at the Labour Exchanges, and the total number already received was estimated on Saturday to have reached about 30,000. Already 20,000 of these have been classified, and during this week details of the classification will be available.

A considerable number of applications have been received from women who saw in the scheme an opportunity to change from a distasteful occupation to a congenial one. Laundresses have been very energetic in filling up forms, but as there is actually a scarcity of good laundresses it may not be deemed good policy to assist a movement out of this industry. Domestic servants, too, do not appear to be wholly contented with their lot. A great number of the women who apply personally or by letter are asking to be employed on armament work; in most cases they are not aware of the conditions, which include a 12 hour day and night shift on alternate weeks. One letter received at the Central Bureau on Saturday contained a request for work as a docker, and contained the writer's conviction that all dock labourers ought to be at the front and their places taken by women.

The Association of Headmistresses is proving very helpful. One headmistress has called a meeting of 600 of her "old" girls to explain to them the idea of war service. Another has started an Easter holiday session for her present pupils to train them in clerical work should they be required to take the place of men in offices.

The work of getting in touch with employers has not been officially begun pending the classification of the first 20,000 applicants. But on Thursday last some 63 applicants were placed with employers who had of their own initiative applied for some of these war service women. It may be noted that the Board of Trade has just given employment to 100 women to take the place of 100 men who have joined the Colours.

The Scots Pictorial, April 3rd. 1915. 663 II / 7 663.

The Woman's View BY "M.B."

WOMEN AND THE NEED OF THE NATION

How They Can Help—But Not By Crowding Out Men Nor By Underselling

A FEW days since the President of the Board of Trade, on behalf of the Government, issued an appeal to the women of the country. "In certain important occupations," he declared, "there are not enough men and women to do the work. This shortage will certainly spread to other occupations as more and more men join the fighting forces. In order to meet both the present and the future needs of national industry during the war, the Government wish to obtain particulars of the women available, with or without previous training, for paid employment. Accordingly, they invite all women who are prepared, if needed, to take paid employment of any kind—industrial, agricultural, clerical, &c.—to enter themselves upon the Register of Women for War Service which is being prepared by the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges. . . . The object of registration is to find out what reserve force of women's labour, trained or untrained, can be made available if required. . . . Any woman who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service."

Well spoken by the Board of Trade, and the response on the part of the women up till now has been satisfactory. But the working out of the scheme is surrounded by many difficulties. One of the gravest is that women who have their living to earn and who are willing to train for the employment thrown open to them by the present shortage of men will be in an awkward position when the men return. They would hardly wish, even if they were permitted to do so, to retain the places which men gave up in order to fight for their country, but will they be able to find other employment? This question is one that will have to be dealt with, for even although there is the dreadful certainty that many of the men will not return, or that they will return too maimed and broken to be equal to their former work, a proportion of them will come back, and must find their places waiting. Between them the Government, the trade unions, and the societies that look after the welfare of women will have to arrange a reasonable and a just solution, the interests of the men and the women to be equally and fairly and fully considered. That difficulty once smoothed out others may be met and dealt with as they arise.

Miss Mary Macarthur, the Scotswoman who is head of the Women's Trade Union League, and has much to do with the Queen's Work for Women Fund, sees an objection to the proposal because it will be responded to by women who are not normally wage-earners, while 50,000 women who are wage-earners in normal times are unemployed. These, she holds, should be given their chance before the introduction into wage-earning occupations of new and presumably independent women is contemplated. She is right in so contending, but her estimate of the unemployment among women appears to some who know the industrial world to be exaggerated. On all sides one hears complaints concerning the shortage of female, as well as of male, labour. A good many women who used to work in laundries, at charing, and other occupations have retired into private life because they are able to live at home in comfort on the separation allowances granted them as wives or dependents of soldiers, while the work of looking after billeted soldiers absorbs the energies of a good many other women. Moreover, there is no reason why normal wage-earners at present unemployed should not apply for whatever work is going seems to them suitable. The fact that they have had experience as workers is not likely to tell against them.

A difficulty that one hopes will be dealt with shortly and sharply is the underpaying of women. In a few of the more artistic occupations, as acting, singing, and dancing, women receive payment that takes account of what they are worth—Madame Melba and Miss Marie Lloyd, Madame Rejane and Miss Gertie Millar, and Mlle. Gaby Deslys, for instance, are not handicapped by their sex when the salary lists are made up, and a few women teachers and a few women writers are equally fortunate. Where a woman does a man's work there is absolutely no reason why she should receive less than a man's wage; that she does receive less, as a rule, is hardly to be questioned. It is sometimes urged that a woman never does a man's work as well as the man would do it, but there seems little reason why this should be true save when the work is of a kind that calls for greater physical strength than a woman can provide. Only in the rarest cases is a woman the equal in bodily strength and endurance of even the most lightly-built man, and in cases where a man's strength is looked for she cannot, in fairness, expect the pay that would be made to a man. In laundries, one is assured, a man can do the work that would require two or even three women.

There seems no reason why a woman should not preside over the ordinary shop counter just as well as a man. Grocers are chary of employing women assistants, but if a man is employed for any very heavy work necessary, the woman of mediocre powers could sell sugar and dried fruits, tea and soap, and biscuits just as well as a man. A well-known provision firm in London that employs a large number of hands has replaced most of its white-aproned young men by white-pinafored young women, and the result appears satisfactory enough. The fact that a woman can run a lift as well as a man is being demonstrated. She is much more in her place as the seller of lace window curtains, of dress materials, of china and glass than a man, and why, in shops where that most tiresome of creatures, the shopwalker, is still employed, should the shopwalker be a male? Why should men travellers sell silks and satins and fairy-like blouses, why should the waitress allow it to be said that the waiter is worth double the money she can command? Why should the man gardener be more capable than the woman, especially in small gardens where no amount of wheeling or other heavy work is required? The Board of Trade calls for women dairy workers, for leather stitchers and brush makers. There is a large demand for them in the armament factories, and they would be welcomed in some agricultural districts where men are scarce. I do not know how things stand in Ireland at present, but when I stayed there on holidays some years ago the women did most of the milking, they fed the cows and the pigs, cleaned the stys and the byres sometimes, helped in the fields and with the threshing. I have even seen a woman guiding two horses in the ploughing season, but that was exceptional, and many kinds of agricultural work would be too hard for women.

Women are showing that they can make toys as well as any German, and there is surely no reason why cheap foreign toys should flood our markets ever again. Other work that will not return to Germany ought to provide scope for female energies, and there are hundreds of ways in which the sex could help. The thing most urgently required at present, however, is that women shall come forward as far as possible to relieve men able to fight. We shall need every man before this most wicked and cruel and senseless of all wars ends as we all hope and pray and believe it will end. Faith and prayer need work to back them up, and the call is for women who can, and will, work. That the women of the country, who have not grudged the sending of their dearest to the trenches and the deep sea and the lowly grave in France, will hang back now when their efforts will enable other men to go I do not think likely. But they must have a good will and the determination to do their best for as long as may be necessary, however little of the heroic or the romantic the work has about it. And they must see that they displace permanently no fighting man who is able to return to his post after the war, nor take the bread out of the mouth of the woman who needs it more, nor undersell. The men are doing their best as honourable soldiers of the Empire, the women will surely do no less.

663 II/8

663.

Daily Telegraph, April 6th 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

SAME WAGES AS MEN.

At the annual conference of the National Amalgamated Union of Shop Assistants, Warehousemen, and Clerks, at Manchester, yesterday, Mrs. Ward (Tottenham-court-road, London) moved:

"That this annual meeting resolves that with regard to women now entering the grocery and provision trades the three-fourths basis be cancelled, and exactly the same minimum wage be fixed for women and for men, and instructs the new executive committee, together with our National and Local Minimum Wage Committees, to act accordingly. The new minimum shall apply to all women having entered the trade since August 4, 1914."

Mrs. Ward considered the crisis had become acute because women were being used for recruiting purposes. Men were being forced out, in order that they could be pressed into the Army, and women were taking their places. Wherever this was done they ought not to be paid on the three-fourths basis, but on the full basis. (Hear, hear.)

Miss Trim (London) said women were tired of being placed in the position of blacklegs.

Mr. P. C. Hoffmann (Paddington) reminded the conference that the union had not been able to supply men for the grocery trade even before the war, and women had been taken promiscuously at sweated rates of labour. They had not succeeded in getting a minimum for men, let alone women.

An urgency resolution from the executive committee that wherever members were receiving less than the district minimum rate of wages to at once bring the fact to the notice of their branch was accepted in place of Mrs. Ward's motion.

"REMEMBER THOSE IN THE TRENCHES."

Mr. Thompson (Newcastle) said so-called patriots suggested that they should remember the men in the trenches, but whose men were they? The trade unionists were of the same class, and those employers who talked about the folly and wickedness of striking for a farthing an hour did not suggest it was folly and wickedness to reduce wages a farthing an hour. One Government organ suggested the other day that the poor should bear with exemplary patience—which was their heritage—the suffering which the war had brought upon them, but banks and railway companies could be guaranteed against loss, and contractors and shipowners could amass increased profit. He supposed that was their heritage. (Cheers.) They had read of a certain Emperor who fiddled while the principal city of his empire was burning. He trusted that on the question of maintaining their wages rate they were not going to be democratic Neros. (Hear, hear.)

Another urgency resolution was moved by Mr. Hughes (North London) in the following terms: "That this conference deplores the action of the Army Council in issuing the circular entitled 'Five Questions to Patriotic Shopkeepers,' in view of the fact that it is likely to jeopardise the position of shopworkers very seriously, inasmuch as it will place in the hands of employers a weapon that can be used to determine the duration of employment. Further, that as shopworkers have come forward in such large numbers, we believe that betters results would be obtained by less coercive advertisements and a more frank appeal to the patriotism of shopworkers." Mr. Hughes said the circular had caused dismissal of men of military age.

A Delegate: Have the Government asked shopkeepers to get rid of their assistants? (Shouts of "Yes!" and "No!")

The resolution was adopted.

Morning Post, April 6th. 1915.

THE DUTY OF WOMEN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING POST.

SIR,—Much has been written by women on the subject of the change of fashions and the duty of supporting the dressmaking trade. To me it seems that at this time there is only one duty: To set aside all personal needs and to remember nothing but national needs, both our Allies' and our own.

An opportunity has been offered to women to work for such things as are actually essential to the very existence of our nation, on a fair living wage. Surely it would be highly suitable if those whose trades are now no longer needed would turn their attention to work that is needed? I do not think we should be asked to support dressmakers and milliners when what we need are shells and cartridges, bicycles, jam, and a hundred other commodities, in far larger quantities than can be turned out by the men still left in this country. As the Board of Trade is organising women's labour, all women whose ordinary business it is to cater for the luxuries we cannot now afford should adapt themselves to the changed conditions, after very carefully making arrangements to return to their usual work when their services are no longer required by the Government.

Better paid work is urgently needed by women. Is there any reason why certain men—the foreigners now serving in clubs, hotels, hydros, and boarding, as well as private houses—should not be sent to work on the land, to grow food for themselves and their fellow-countrymen, at present prisoners in this country? Let them also mend the roads, dig the ditches, act as builders and labourers in the Midlands, while suitable young girls from the overcrowded cities are thoroughly trained to take their places permanently as parlourmaids and waitresses, to their own advantage and to the safety of the country. Then, when the war is over, the 60,000 foreign waiters, cooks, hall porters, lift boys, &c., we are supposed to have in this country to-day could return to their Fatherland much improved in physique by reason of their more suitable work, and our labourers and yeomen would find their places waiting them on their return.

If every lady who now only thinks she would like to serve her country, and is really doing nothing of material advantage to the nation, would sacrifice a certain amount of domestic ease she might reconstruct her household in the very practical service of her country. One has only to think of the thousands and thousands of well-to-do houses where superior girls are employed, girls who would be quite able to work in the best and most fashionable hotels, to realise the gigantic work that the mistresses of these houses could do, if they would only send the treasured parlourmaid to some public institution and in her place train and patiently bear with an inexperienced girl. Let ladies persuade their butlers to train girls to replace the footmen, of whom there are still far too many—in livery! Workrooms to provide women with temporary work are no doubt of value in meeting a present need, but from these very workrooms a certain number of suitable girls could be picked out for domestic training. In this way permanent, well-paid work would be provided for the class that most needs training and financial assistance.

It seems a mere waste of energy to make work when every worker, actual and potential, is needed. What we should do is to organise the work in such a way as to save as much as possible all dislocation when the ordinary routine of life is restored.—Yours, &c.,

April 3. A WORKING WOMAN.

Aberdeen Daily Journal, April 6th. 1915.

ABERDEEN WOMEN AND W. SERVICE.

POSTMEN AND 'BUS DRIVERS

Over 200 applications have been received at the Aberdeen Labour Exchange from women who are willing to relieve men of military age from their everyday occupation during the war so that the men may join the forces of the King. It would appear, therefore, that the women of Aberdeen and the surrounding district are realising the importance of offering to do the work so that the men may be released to safeguard the Empire, and in reality to protect the homes of the country. Women who are willing to help in this great task of endeavouring to augment our military forces to the utmost extent, with as little interference as possible with the ordinary affairs of the nation, are offering themselves both from the east end and the west end.

A number of women of independent means are included among the applicants, and it is quite evident that the burden is not going to be put on the working class alone. A proportion of the applicants, of course, are from working women who are meantime out of employment and would be glad to obtain a situation. Women, however, who have never found it necessary to work for a living have sent in their names as willing to undertake, for instance, such work as light machining in engineering or armament factories. A number of married women who were formerly in employment have offered to return to their previous occupations so that more men might go to the assistance of their husbands who are meantime in the trenches.

A glance over the cards of applications shows the variety of occupations in which the women are willing to help. A number are anxious to be trained to take the places of postmen, and others would relieve commercial travellers or salesmen. One or two women who have motor cars of their own would be willing to act as drivers of motor cars. One lady, who is meantime home on holiday from India, is included among those willing to serve in this capacity. Others are ready to do field and outdoor work on the farms so that the crops may be secured, and many have declared themselves willing to be trained for anything that may be required. Almost in every case they have stated that they will be ready to give up the work immediately the war is over, so that those whose legitimate occupations they have been temporarily following may be reinstated.

Although the number on the register has been thus rapidly increasing, there seems still to be a feeling of doubt as to who should register. It should be clearly understood that every woman who can help, no matter how well-off she may be, or how few may be the hours that she will be able to work, is desired to register her name as willing to assist in the great crisis of the nation. Forms of application can be sent to those forwarding their addresses to Mr Duncan, the manager of the Labour Exchange.

Lincolnshire Echo, April 7th. 1915.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN

IMPORTANT MEETING IN LINCOLN.

The special attention of Lincoln women is drawn to an announcement that the Mayoress of Lincoln is convening a public meeting to be held in Newland Lecture Hall, to-morrow (Thursday) afternoon, at three o'clock, when the Government scheme of how women and girls of all classes may help during the present crisis will be explained and discussed. It is intended that specimens of the kind of work to be done shall be on view. Amongst the classes of work in which help is urgently needed and in which it is desired that women may assist are the making of nose bushes for shells, aeroplanes, acetylene welding, to assist in banks, etc., and in various forms of agriculture.

The Mayor (Councillor M. A. Ashley) will preside over the meeting, at which the speakers will include Miss Beardsley (Board of Trade—Women's Department), the Dean of Lincoln, Mr. A. Ramsey, and Councillor A. Taylor, while amongst those who have promised their presence in support are the Rev. Canon J. W. Townroe, Rev. W. A. Purey Cust, Rev. G. Barrett, Mr. R. C. Minton, Mr. B. Spink, Mrs. Barrett, Mrs. Monks, Miss Giles, Miss E. Townsend, and Miss Connell. The attendance of all women interested very cordially asked for by the Mayoress.

Dundee Courier, April 7th. 1918.

DUNDEE WOMEN ARE MAKING

NOBLE RESPONSE TO GOVERNMENT'S CALL

FOR FEMALE LABOUR FOR WAR SERVICE.

The women of Dundee are giving practical expression to their patriotism by registering themselves for special war service under Government supervision.

When it became apparent that a large fighting force must be mobilised, and that the raising of such a force would seriously affect the industry of the country, the Government found themselves on the horns of a dilemma. Men engaged in the production of armaments and on railway service were not expected to enlist, but there existed the possibility of a dislocation of national industry through the drain upon tradesmen and others.

Active Patriots.

The solution of the problem came from the women of the nation. The "Sister Susie" type of patriotism was too passive. They cried out to the Government to use them, especially in positions where a woman could undertake the duties of a man—in the fields of non-productive industry—so that the man could feel himself free to serve with arms. And the Government heard their cry.

It was decided to take a census of the women of the country who were free and willing to take up among others the following occupations:—Farm work, dairy work, leather stitching, brush making, clothing machining, light machining for armament. The Board of Trade set about the task, and a noble response is being made.

Dundee Women's Response.

A large number of Dundee women have already volunteered their services. The female working-class labour of the city finds boundless employment in the mills and factories, which are working busily at present, but the educated woman is anxious to free as many men as possible for service with the army and navy. The majority of those who have enrolled themselves have applied for clerical work and situations in shops. Some have expressed a desire to be useful in the making of shells, and others want to put their knowledge of the working of the petrol motor to practical account. Several have registered themselves for no specified calling, but placed themselves at the disposal of the authorities declaring themselves willing to undergo training in any occupation to which they may be set.

From England come reports of women who have taken their husbands' places. One man was a Town's Officer; his wife is now performing his duties while he handles his rifle in the trenches. Another woman is sweeping chimneys, and in Glasgow there are several lady tram conductors.

Aberdeen Free Press, April 8th. 1918.

GRATIFYING RESPONSE IN ABERDEEN.

Although the response to the appeal for women to register themselves as being willing to undertake "war work" so that the men may be relieved to join some branch of His Majesty's forces was at first rather poor, the officials of the Aberdeen Labour Exchange have now no cause for complaint, and state that applications for registration are rolling in in such numbers that difficulty is being found in coping with them.

A very large number of registration forms were received yesterday morning from the surrounding county districts, as well as letters requesting forms to be sent on to ladies residing in various parts of the county. The registration roll now contains the names of some 300 women, who are willing to do what they can for the common weal.

One young woman, who is married and who was previously employed as a telegraphist in the Post Office, is willing to resume duty there. Another young woman, 23 years of age, who has never worked before, is quite confident of her ability to act as a tram conductor. Others would undertake the duties of motor car drivers, buyers, salesmen, shop assistants, typists, and railway booking clerks, while many are desirous of employment in ammunition factories.

One married woman, whose husband is at the front, would make herself useful in any capacity of which she might be fit. A strapping country lass has forwarded her photo along with a letter in which she states that if need be she would don the "breeks" and take her place in the trenches.

Many ladies who are well to do have intimated their intention of handing over any money that they may earn to funds for the assistance of soldiers and sailors.

It should be clearly understood that women are not wanted to fill positions that are already occupied by women, but to undertake employment that has hitherto been for the most part in the hands of men

Those desirous of securing registration forms should apply to Mr R. P Duncan, manager of the Aberdeen Labour Exchange.

663 II/9 663

The Daily News & Leader, April 8th. 1918.

WOMEN EAGER FOR WAR SERVICE.

Splendid Response to Appeal of the Government.

OFFERS FOR ARMAMENT WORK.

By Mrs. RUNCIMAN.

The Government's appeal to women to enlist for war service has every prospect of meeting with a cordial response as soon as it has become sufficiently known and understood among the great number of women who do not habitually read the newspapers and are not reached by the ordinary channels of publicity. Already many women's societies and organisations have eagerly offered their help in publishing the appeal broadcast among their members. Public meetings are being held in different parts of the country, and the numbers on the new register, which in the first week reached over 20,000, will, without doubt, rapidly increase when there has been sufficient time for these efforts to have effect. Women are just as eager as men to play their part in this war; they have shown every readiness to make use of opportunities offered to them.

We like to reflect with considerable pride on the wonderful way in which our young men of all classes responded to the call for military service, even at the beginning of the war before the magnitude of the need was fully recognised, but no less remarkable was the patriotic fervour which led great numbers of women to lay aside at once all their customary occupations and interests, to plunge into any work that seemed to offer a prospect of enabling them to feel that they were taking a definite share in war service. Women and girls who had not before thought it necessary to cultivate the domestic arts, eagerly flocked to classes in ambulance, cookery and sick nursing, in order to get the training without which they could not expect to be employed in hospital work even in the humblest capacity.

EXIT THE AMATEUR "ANGEL."

The desire for war work was accompanied by the recognition of the fact that in this war there is no place for the untrained and incompetent amateur. We have for ever banished the type of ministering angel, not quite unknown in our last war, who was content to fulfil her highest patriotic aspirations equipped only with lace pocket handkerchiefs and bottles of eau de Cologne! She is replaced to-day by the short-skirted muscular young woman with a first-aid certificate and a motor driver's licence. Her one desire is to prove that she understands the meaning of a real hard day's work, and she is ready to go anywhere and face anything for the privilege of serving in the war.

A struggle so stupendous as that in which we are now engaged necessarily sooner or later drives things into their true proportion; the essentials of life stand out clearly, sincerity of purpose takes the place of vague sentimentalism, and practical possibilities more and more direct the stream of women's patriotism, which at first sometimes overflowed the boundaries of practical endeavour.

INCREASED OPPORTUNITIES.

But from the outset women's societies, with the advantage of efficient organisation, were able to turn themselves without any delay into competent and active agencies for the various needs which were continually revealed. Suffrage societies, numbering many medical women among their members, promptly laid aside for the time being their agitation for a greater share in political life, and seized the opportunity of taking a practical share in the national struggle, notably in hospital work.

Still more admirable has been the example shown by many women, who, having lost all that was most dear to them in the relentless hazards of warfare, now concentrate their efforts on helping in whatever way is open to them, the cause for which their sons and husbands have died. The war service circular now gives an additional workers engaged in their manufacture. To secure these two objects the first necessity is that all women willing to work should register, and every effort on the part of individuals or societies to hasten registration is most valuable. It is only when the available resources of women's labour are completely known that wise distribution becomes possible.

There are some occupations undertaken by women in the past into which they can immediately be drafted. But they will be wanted for new work also, for which some training may be necessary and will be provided. There is already evidence that women are to be found quite ready to start work which under ordinary circumstances they might well consider uncongenial and even unpleasant, and they will undertake it simply because they recognise that for the moment it is the most useful thing they can do.

VOLUNTEER SHELL FILLERS.

It is true that zeal is sometimes a little out of touch with actuality. The lady who has offered to come and fill shells for a month with her maid shows a healthy spirit, but she hardly realised that her effort would have to be more prolonged to be of any value. Dexterity even in the filling of shells is not acquired in a moment. One feels more confidence in the tenacity of another woman, who was also one of the first to register for shell filling. She had good reason for her choice, because having had her laundry destroyed in one of the East Coast raids she felt she could infuse into this particular patriotic duty a special personal satisfaction.

It is certainly a remarkable fact that of the very many women who have registered under the category of "Light Armament work," by far the greater proportion have not previously done work of the kind. Considerable numbers also have enlisted for agricultural service who have formerly been otherwise employed.

Figures are not yet available for any detailed analysis of the results of the appeal. So far the response made by women workers is by no means unsatisfactory. It still remains to be seen how far employers are ready to avail themselves of women's work, and how far trade unionists throughout the country are willing to accept the intrusion of women into domains hitherto exclusively reserved for men. Employers will for the most part probably only need to be satisfied that women are competent to do the work; they need the labour, and if women can do it well enough to justify the various reorganisations which will in some cases necessarily follow the introduction of women's labour, they will be eager to accept it.

It is true that some employers are not predisposed to be convinced that women are capable of doing work which they have not previously done. There still exist men who are reluctant to believe that a woman can be trusted with anything outside what is inaccurately but tenaciously described as her "sphere"! But necessity, if she knows no law, is at least equally impatient of mere convention, and now, if ever, women will have a chance of showing their suitability for new kinds of work from which they have hitherto been excluded.

TRADE UNION NERVOUSNESS.

We cannot be surprised if trade unionists should be a little nervous over the introduction of women in new industries. Women workers have not hitherto shown a just appreciation of the value of their methods in securing good trade conditions. The trades union movement among women has disappointed many people, and women's labour has undoubtedly suffered by the absence of that power of co-operation and organisation which has done so much for men. But no woman under

...eedeen Free Press,
April 8th. 1915.

...TIFYING RESPONSE IN ABERDEEN.

...ough the response to the appeal for women ...ter themselves as being willing to under- ... war work" so that the men may be re- ...e to join some branch of His Majesty's ...was at first rather poor, the officials of the ...en Labour Exchange have now no cause ...plaint, and state that applications for re- ...n are rolling in in such numbers that ...y is being found in coping with them. ...ry large number of registration forms were ...d yesterday morning from the surrounding ... districts, as well as letters requesting ... to be sent on to ladies residing in various ...of the county. The registration roll now ...s the names of some 300 women, who are ... to do what they can for the common weal. ... young woman, who is married and who ...eviously employed as a telegraphist in the ...Office, is willing to resume duty there. An- ... young woman, 23 years of age, who has ... worked before, is quite confident of her ... to act as a tram conductor. Others would ...ake the duties of motor car drivers, buyers, ...en, shop assistants, typists, and railway ...g clerks, while many are desirous of em- ...ent in ammunition factories. ... married woman, whose husband is at the ... would make herself useful in any capacity ...ich she might be fit. A strapping country ...s forwarded her photo along with a letter ...ich she states that if need be she would ...he "breeks" and take her place in the ...es. ...y ladies who are well to do have intimated ...intention of handing over any money that ...may earn to funds for the assistance of sol- ...and sailors. ...should be clearly understood that women ...ot wanted to fill positions that are already ...ied by women, but to undertake employ- ... that has hitherto been for the most part ... hands of men ...se desirous of securing registration forms ...d apply to Mr R. P Duncan, manager of ...Aberdeen Labour Exchange.

to classes in ambulance, cookery and sick nursing, in order to get the training without which they could not expect to be employed in hospital work even in the humblest capacity.

EXIT THE AMATEUR "ANGEL."

The desire for war work was accompanied by the recognition of the fact that in this war there is no place for the untrained and incompetent amateur. We have for ever banished the type of ministering angel, not quite unknown in our last war, who was content to fulfil her highest patriotic aspirations equipped only with lace pocket handkerchiefs and bottles of eau de Cologne! She is replaced to-day by the short-skirted muscular young woman with a first-aid certificate and a motor driver's licence. Her one desire is to prove that she understands the meaning of a real hard day's work, and she is ready to go anywhere and face anything for the privilege of serving in the war.

A struggle so stupendous as that in which we are now engaged necessarily sooner or later drives things into their true proportion; the essentials of life stand out clearly, sincerity of purpose takes the place of vague sentimentalism, and practical possibilities more and more direct the stream of women's patriotism, which at first sometimes overflowed the boundaries of practical endeavour.

INCREASED OPPORTUNITIES.

But from the outset women's societies, with the advantage of efficient organisation, were able to turn themselves without any delay into competent and active agencies for the various needs which were continually revealed. Suffrage societies, numbering many medical women among their members, promptly laid aside for the time being their agitation for a greater share in political life, and seized the opportunity of taking a practical share in the national struggle, notably in hospital work.

Still more admirable has been the example shown by many women, who, having lost all that was most dear to them in the relentless hazards of warfare, now concentrate their efforts on helping in whatever way is open to them, the cause for which their sons and husbands have died. The war service circular now gives an additional opportunity to women of all kinds and classes to undertake further service for their country. If they cannot actually work themselves they can help to make the appeal known far and wide among possible workers.

UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG WOMEN.

But there were also many women who saw in the outbreak of hostilities no increased opportunities for service, but, on the contrary, their very means of existence actually destroyed. Unemployment among women was at first a serious menace. Happily the danger is rapidly diminishing, and now that there is actually a general shortage of labour, though the shortage is unevenly distributed, registration, organisation, and wise distribution ought to do a great deal to alleviate the lot of women workers still unemployed. They will not necessarily be able to get back into their own trade, but they may find work similar enough to prevent their running the danger of losing the special dexterity in their own trade to which they would naturally hope ultimately to return.

For instance, a good needlewoman might not care to enter a rough factory where her fingers would be hardened and stiffened, but she might find occupation in a drapery shop without harming her own business qualifications.

A cook might make a temporary grocer's assistant, and even gain a little technical experience meanwhile. Already it has been found possible by special classes in an Agricultural College to equip successfully former domestic servants for dairy work and as milkers on farms. Woman labour is in some ways more adaptable, because more fluid, than man's; a woman worker can more often be transferred from one district to another without involving the transference of a whole household.

It is not, however, only among women of the artisan class that unemployment has been severely felt. Women engaged in the various classes of commercial and professional work have also suffered greatly, and any comprehensive scheme for marshalling the available forces of women's labour will include the large numbers of trained and educated women eager to offer their services to fill vacancies caused by war in the higher branches of industrial life.

A TWOFOLD SERVICE.

The object of the circular is to enlist the services of all available women, firstly in order to release potential soldiers now engaged in industrial and other occupations, and secondly to ascertain the extent of munitions of war ing had her laundry destroyed in one of the East Coast raids she felt she could infuse into this particular patriotic duty a special personal satisfaction.

It is certainly a remarkable fact that of the very many women who have registered under the category of "Light Armament work," by far the greater proportion have not previously done work of the kind. Considerable numbers also have enlisted for agricultural service who have formerly been otherwise employed.

Figures are not yet available for any detailed analysis of the results of the appeal. So far the response made by women workers is by no means unsatisfactory. It still remains to be seen how far employers are ready to avail themselves of women's work, and how far trade unionists throughout the country are willing to accept the intrusion of women into domains hitherto exclusively reserved for men. Employers will for the most part probably only need to be satisfied that women are competent to do the work; they need the labour, and if women can do it well enough to justify the various reorganisations which will in some cases necessarily follow the introduction of women's labour, they will be eager to accept it.

It is true that some employers are not predisposed to be convinced that women are capable of doing work which they have not previously done. There still exist men who are reluctant to believe that a woman can be trusted with anything outside what is inaccurately but tenaciously described as her "sphere"! But necessity, if she knows no law, is at least equally impatient of mere convention, and now, if ever, women will have a chance of showing their suitability for new kinds of work from which they have hitherto been excluded.

TRADE UNION NERVOUSNESS.

We cannot be surprised if trade unionists should be a little nervous over the introduction of women in new industries. Women workers have not hitherto shown a just appreciation of the value of their methods in securing good trade conditions. The trades union movement among women has disappointed many people, and women's labour has undoubtedly suffered by the absence of that power of co-operation and organisation which has done so much for men. But no woman under the war service scheme is going to object to the principle of equal pay for equal work, which has been already adopted in the recent Government Conference with trade unionists on this subject. And if men are satisfied that women's labour is not going to be used to undercut or oust men's labour, under the plea of war's necessities, it is hard to believe that any serious opposition will come from them.

This is not the time to discuss the possible effect that this demand for women to take the place of men may have on the development of industrial and professional openings for women in the future. No one can judge now the extent to which the present dislocation of labour will continue after the war is over. Months of open-air life, even under the arduous conditions of active service, may have a lasting effect in alienating young men's ambitions from a sedentary life indoors. It is inevitable that many men will never return to their old employment, and it may well happen that some women will find themselves ultimately invited to take permanently the places they temporarily filled to meet an emergency.

In any case, all of us who are interested in the general question of women's employment welcome any opportunity for removing even temporarily some of the artificial barriers which have stood in the way of women's industrial and professional progress. If the barriers are really artificial, due to some convention which has only needed a sudden emergency to sweep away, we may rest assured that they will not easily be set up again.

On the other hand we count on women being ready to come forward for work, attractive or unattractive, animated by no spirit of sex advantage, but urged on only by the same devotion to the national service which has sent our men in thousands to the battlefield.

WOMEN WORKERS FOR WAR.

The official organ of the General Federation of Trade Unions makes the suggestion that women who are being employed as war workers should be granted a war trade union ticket.

It is pointed out that unorganised the women workers are dangerous, and might be used by the employers to reduce the wages of the men. A conference is advocated between the unions involved in war work and the Women Workers' Federation and such unions as have women members to consider the manner in which the women who are being freshly employed should be organised.

The Daily News & Leader, April 8th 1915. 663 II 10 663

WOMEN EAGER FOR WAR SERVICE.

Splendid Response to Appeal of the Government.

OFFERS FOR ARMAMENT WORK.

(By MRS. RUNCIMAN.)

The Government appeal to women to enlist for war service has every prospect of meeting with a cordial response as soon as it has become sufficiently known and understood among the great number of women who do not habitually read the newspapers and are not reached by the ordinary channels of publicity. Already many women's societies and organisations have eagerly offered their help in publishing the appeal broadcast among their members. Public meetings are being held in different parts of the country, and the members on the new register, which in the first week reached over 20,000, will without doubt rapidly increase when there has been sufficient time for these efforts to have effect. Women are just as eager as men to play their part in this war. They have shown every readiness to make use of opportunities offered to them.

We like to reflect with considerable pride on the wonderful way in which our young men of all classes responded to the call for military service even at the beginning of the war before the magnitude of the need was fully recognised, but no less remarkable was the patriotic fervour which led great numbers of women to lay aside at once all their customary occupations and interests, to plunge into any work that seemed to offer a prospect of enabling them to feel that they were taking a definite share in war service. Women and girls who had not before thought it necessary to cultivate the domestic arts eagerly flocked to classes in ambulance, cookery, and sick nursing in order to get the training without which they could not expect to be employed in hospital—not even in the humblest capacity.

Exit the "Angel" in Lace.

The desire for war work was accompanied by the recognition of the fact that in this war there is no place for the untrained, incompetent amateur. We have for ever banished the type of ministering angel, not quite unknown in our last war, who was content to fulfil her highest patriotic aspirations equipped only with lace pocket-handkerchiefs and bottles of eau de cologne! She is replaced to-day by the short-skirted, muscular young woman with a first-aid certificate and a motor-driver's licence. Her one desire is to prove that she understands the meaning of a real hard day's work. She is ready to go anywhere and face anything for the privilege of serving in the war.

A struggle so stupendous as that in which we are now engaged necessarily, sooner or later, drives things into their true proportion; the essentials of life stand out clearly. Sincerity of purpose takes the place of vague sentimentalism, and practical possibilities more and more direct the stream of women's patriotism, which at first sometimes overflowed the boundaries of practical endeavour. But from the outset women's societies, with the advantage of efficient organisation, were able to turn themselves without any delay into competent and active agencies for the various needs which were continually revealed. Suffrage societies, numbering many medical women among their members, promptly laid aside for the time being their agitation for a greater share in political life, and seized the opportunity of taking a practical share in the national struggle, notably in hospital work.

Increased Opportunities.

Still more admirable has been the example shown by many women who, having lost all that was very dear to them in the relentless hazards of warfare, now concentrate their efforts on helping in whatever way is open to them the cause for which their sons and husbands have died. The war service circular now gives an additional opportunity to women of all kinds and classes to undertake further service for their country. If they cannot actually work themselves they can help to make the appeal known far and wide among possible workers. There were also many women who saw in the outbreak of hostilities no increased opportunities for service, but, on the contrary, their very means of existence actually shattered. Unemployment among women was at first [illegible] by actually increasing the number of workers engaged in their manufacture.

To secure these two objects the first necessity is that all women willing to work should register, and every effort on the part of individuals or societies to hasten registration is most valuable. It is only when the available resources of women's labour are completely known that wise distribution becomes possible. There are some occupations undertaken by women in the past into which they can immediately be drafted. But they will be wanted for new work also, for which some training may be necessary and will be provided. There is already evidence that women are to be found quite ready to start work which under ordinary circumstances they might well consider uncongenial and even unpleasant, and they will undertake it simply because they recognise that for the moment it is the most useful thing they can do.

Volunteer Shell-fillers.

It is true that zeal is sometimes a little out of touch with actuality. The lady who has offered to come and fill shells for a month with her maid shares a healthy spirit, but she hardly realised that her efforts would have to be more prolonged to be of any value. Dexterity even in the filling of shells is not acquired in a moment. One feels more confidence in the tenacity of another woman, who was also one of the first to register for shellfilling. She had good reason for her choice, because, having had her laundry destroyed in one of the East Coast raids, she felt she could infuse into this particular patriotic duty a special personal satisfaction. It is certainly a remarkable fact that of the very many women who have registered under the category of "light armament work" by far the greater proportion have not previously done work of the kind. Considerable numbers also have enlisted for agricultural service who have been formerly otherwise employed.

Figures are not yet available for any detailed analysis of the results of the appeal. So far the response made by women workers is by no means unsatisfactory. It still remains to be seen how far employers are ready to avail themselves of women's work, and how far trade unionists throughout the country are willing to accept the intrusion of women into domains hitherto exclusively reserved for men. Employers will for the most part probably only need to be satisfied that women are competent to do the work; they need the labour, and if women can do it well enough to justify the various reorganisations which will in some cases necessarily follow the introduction of women's labour they will be eager to accept it. It is true that some employers are not predisposed to be convinced that women are capable of doing work which they have not previously done. There still exist men who are reluctant to believe that a woman can be trusted with anything outside what is inaccurately but tenaciously described as her "sphere"! But necessity, if she knows no law, is at least equally impatient of mere convention, and now, if ever, women will have a chance of showing their suitability for new kinds of work, from which they have hitherto been excluded.

Trade Union Nervousness.

We cannot be surprised if trade unionists should be a little nervous over the introduction of women in new industries—women workers have not hitherto shown a just appreciation of the value of their methods in securing good trade conditions. The trade union movement among women has disappointed many people, and women's labour has undoubtedly suffered by the absence of that power of co-operation and organisation which has done so much for men. But no woman under the war service scheme is going to object to the principle of equal pay for equal work which has been already adopted by the recent Government conference with trade unionists on this subject. And if men are satisfied that women's labour is not going to be used to undercut or oust men's labour under the plea of war's necessities it is hard to believe that any serious opposition will come from them.

This is not the time to discuss the possible effect that this demand for women to take the place of men may have on the industrial and professional openings for women in the future. No

The Lincolnshire Echo. April 8th. 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR WORK

GOVERNMENT SCHEME EXPLAINED TO LINCOLN MEETING.

The necessity for the women of England to come forward and help the nation in the tremendous task which it has on hand was brought home to the minds of Lincoln women this afternoon, when a meeting, convened by the Mayoress (Mrs. M. A. Ashley), was held in the Newland Lecture Hall, which was filled beyond the extent of comfort. At the outset the Mayor presided, but had to leave, and left the task of guiding the meeting in the able hands of the Mayoress.

A great deal of valuable information upon the subject was given by Miss Beardsley, a representative of the Women's Department of the Board of Trade, who explained in some considerable detail the intentions and objects of the Board of Trade, and the scheme which they have inaugurated for enlisting the services of women in the work of the country to take the places of men who have gone on military or naval service, or are eligible to undertake that service. She also explained the war service list which the Board of Trade are endeavouring to compile throughout the country, and emphasised that the scheme was an attempt to see whether the women could not supply the necessary labour to carry on the work of the nation and relieve the men for service. She also emphasised that all the labour for which women registered themselves was to be paid labour, and that it was up to them to see that they obtained their full value.

The second speaker was the Dean of Lincoln (Dr. T. C. Fry), who expressed his delight at the plan of the Board of Trade. It had come out, he said, very late, but not too late. (Hear, hear.) This was the price we had to pay for our liberty and he impressed upon all the women present that we had to sink or swim together. The men must be appealed to to see that the conditions under which the women worked were kept up to the proper level. Dr. Fry dealt with what the women in Germany were doing under a military organisation and also with what was being done in other countries by the women workers. The members of the Board of Trade and the members of the great trades unions, the Dean added, could deal with any cases where promises were forgotten at all, but "in the meantime, for Heaven's sake, give your work all of you that we may maintain our liberties and help our brothers." (Hear, hear.)

Major Everitt, as one of the recruiting officers of the city and county of Lincoln, reminded the meeting that at the outbreak of the war Lincolnshire did not move as rapidly as it ought to have done. Now things were different. They had raised four and a half battalions, and the county seemed to have risen to its responsibilities. They were now recruiting on an average 140 men weekly, and in the last two weeks the number had been 150. As regarded the city itself, things were different. As soon as the war broke out a great many men came forward, but he was sorry to say things were somewhat changed, and they were getting very few men from the city. He saw a great many men about, and he could not think they were all physically unfit. He came there to try and get some of the women to be recruiters. A great many of these men he saw were accompanied by young women, and he could not but think these young women might see that the men were wearing the King's uniform. The young women could be excellent recruiters if they would not have anything to do with what were called the shirkers.

Miss Embleton, of Barnsley, followed with a speech in which she dealt with some of the work which women might undertake in war time, and also dealt with labour conditions in the Ridings of Yorkshire so far as they effected women and half-timers. She laid stress on the fact that at this time women were doing work which they were least expected to do, and then, touching on the woman in the home, appealed to her audience to keep themselves fit, to keep their homes right, and to keep alcoholic drink out of their homes. "Use your money wisely and well. Rule your lives intelligently and patriotically at this moment, and don't harm the national life."

Councillor A Taylor, in a speech from the Trade Union point of view, admitted that this movement of the Board of Trade had been looked upon with considerable suspicion by the organised men, but after having heard the scheme explained he was quite sure that misunderstanding arose because the men did not understand what the Board of Trade really sought to do.

Mr. R. C. Minton proposed, and the Rev. Geo. Barrett seconded, a vote of thanks to the Mayoress and the speakers, and this having been carried the meeting closed by the singing of the National Anthem.

An extended report of the proceedings will appear in Saturday's "Lincoln Gazette."

have effect. Women are just as eager as men to play their part in this war. They have shown every readiness to make use of opportunities offered to them.

We like to reflect with considerable pride on the wonderful way in which our young men of all classes responded to the call for military service even at the beginning of the war before the magnitude of the need was fully recognised, but no less remarkable was the patriotic fervour which led great numbers of women to lay aside at once all their customary occupations and interests, to plunge into any work that seemed to offer a prospect of enabling them to feel that they were taking a definite share in war service. Women and girls who had not before thought it necessary to cultivate the domestic arts eagerly flocked to classes in ambulance, cookery, and sick nursing in order to get the training without which they could not expect to be employed in hospital—not even in the humblest capacity.

Exit the "Angel" in Lace.

The desire for war work was accompanied by the recognition of the fact that in this war there is no place for the untrained, incompetent amateur. We have for ever banished the type of ministering angel, not quite unknown in our last war, who was content to fulfil her highest patriotic aspirations equipped only with lace pocket-handkerchiefs and bottles of eau de cologne! She is replaced to-day by the short-skirted, muscular young woman with a first-aid certificate and a motor-driver's licence. Her one desire is to prove that she understands the meaning of a real hard day's work. She is ready to go anywhere and face anything for the privilege of serving in the war.

A struggle so stupendous as that in which we are now engaged necessarily, sooner or later, drives things into their true proportion; the essentials of life stand out clearly. Sincerity of purpose takes the place of vague sentimentalism, and practical possibilities more and more direct the stream of women's patriotism, which at first sometimes overflowed the boundaries of practical endeavour. But from the outset women's societies, with the advantage of efficient organisation, were able to turn themselves without any delay into competent and active agencies for the various needs which were continually revealed. Suffrage societies, numbering many medical women among their members, promptly laid aside for the time being their agitation for a greater share in political life, and seized the opportunity of taking a practical share in the national struggle, notably in hospital work.

Increased Opportunities.

Still more admirable has been the example shown by many women who, having lost all that was very dear to them in the relentless hazards of warfare, now concentrate their efforts on helping in whatever way is open to them the cause for which their sons and husbands have died. The war service circular now gives an additional opportunity to women of all kinds and classes to undertake further service for their country. If they cannot actually work themselves they can help to make the appeal known far and wide among possible workers. There were also many women who saw in the outbreak of hostilities no increased opportunities for service, but, on the contrary, their very means of existence actually destroyed. Unemployment among women was at first a serious menace. Happily the danger is rapidly diminishing, and now that there is actually a general shortage of labour, though the shortage is unevenly distributed, registration, organisation and wise distribution ought to do a great deal to alleviate the lot of women workers still unemployed. They will not necessarily be able to get back into their own trade, but they may find work similar enough to prevent their running the danger of losing the special dexterity in their own trade, to which they will naturally have ultimately to return.

For instance, a good needlewoman might not care to enter a rough factory where her fingers would be hardened and stiffened, but she might find occupation in a drapery shop without harming her own business qualifications. A cook might make a temporary grocer's assistant, and even gain a little technical experience meanwhile. Already it has been found possible by special classes in an agricultural college to equip successfully former domestic servants for dairy work and as milkers on farms. Woman labour is in some ways more adaptable because more fluid than man's; a woman worker can more often be transferred from one district to another without involving the transference of a whole household.

Taking the Place of Men.

It is not, however, only among women of the artisan class that unemployment has been severely felt. Women engaged in in the various classes of commercial and professional work have also suffered greatly, and any comprehensive scheme for marshalling the available forces of women's labour will include the large numbers of trained and educated women eager to offer their services to fill vacancies caused by war in the higher branches of industrial life. The object of the circular is to enlist the services of all available women, firstly in order to release patriotic soldiers now engaged in industrial and other occupations, and, secondly, to accelerate the output of munitions of war [illegible] staff work which under [illegible] stances they might well consider uncongenial and even unpleasant, and they will undertake it simply because they recognise that for the moment it is the most useful thing they can do.

Volunteer Shell-fillers.

It is true that zeal is sometimes a little out of touch with actuality. The lady who has offered to come and fill shells for a month with her maid shares a healthy spirit, but she hardly realised that her efforts would have to be more prolonged to be of any value. Dexterity even in the filling of shells is not acquired in a moment. One feels more confidence in the tenacity of another woman, who was also one of the first to register for shellfilling. She had good reason for her choice, because, having had her laundry destroyed in one of the East Coast raids, she felt she could infuse into this particular patriotic duty a special personal satisfaction. It is certainly a remarkable fact that of the very many women who have registered under the category of "light armament work" by far the greater proportion have not previously done work of the kind. Considerable numbers also have enlisted for agricultural service who have been formerly otherwise employed.

Figures are not yet available for any detailed analysis of the results of the appeal. So far the response made by women workers is by no means unsatisfactory. It still remains to be seen how far employers are ready to avail themselves of women's work, and how far trade unionists throughout the country are willing to accept the intrusion of women into domains hitherto exclusively reserved for men. Employers will for the most part probably only need to be satisfied that women are competent to do the work; they need the labour, and if women can do it well enough to justify the various reorganisations which will in some cases necessarily follow the introduction of women's labour they will be eager to accept it. It is true that some employers are not predisposed to be convinced that women are capable of doing work which they have not previously done. There still exist men who are reluctant to believe that a woman can be trusted with anything outside what is inaccurately but tenaciously described as her "sphere"! But necessity, if she knows no law, is at least equally impatient of mere convention, and now, if ever, women will have a chance of showing their suitability for new kinds of work, from which they have hitherto been excluded.

Trade Union Nervousness.

We cannot be surprised if trade unionists should be a little nervous over the introduction of women in new industries—women workers have not hitherto shown a just appreciation of the value of their methods in securing good trade conditions. The trade union movement among women has disappointed many people, and women's labour has undoubtedly suffered by the absence of that power of co-operation and organisation which has done so much for men. But no woman under the war service scheme is going to object to the principle of equal pay for equal work, which has been already adopted by the recent Government conference with trade unionists on this subject. And if men are satisfied that women's labour is not going to be used to under-cut or oust men's labour under the plea of war's necessities, it is hard to believe that any serious opposition will come from them.

This is not the time to discuss the possible effect that this demand for women to take the place of men may have on the industrial and professional openings for women in the future. No one can judge now the extent to which the present dislocation of labour will continue after the war is over. Months of open-air life, even under the arduous conditions of active service, may have a lasting effect in alienating young men's ambitions from the sedentary life indoors. It is inevitable that many men will never return to their old employment, and it may well happen that some women will find themselves ultimately invited to take permanently the places they temporarily filled to meet an emergency. In any case, all of us who are interested in the general question of women's employment welcome any opportunity for removing, even temporarily, some of the artificial barriers which have stood in the way of women's industrial and professional progress. If the barriers are really artificial, due to some convention which it has only needed a sudden emergency to sweep away, we may rest assured that they will not easily be set up again.

On the other hand, we count on women being ready to come forward for work, attractive or unattractive, animated by no spirit of sex advantage, but urged on only by the same devotion to the national service which has sent our men in thousands to the battlefield.

TRADE UNION TICKET.

The official organ of the General Federation of Trade Unions makes the suggestion that women who are being employed as war workers should be granted a war trade union ticket. It is pointed out that, unorganised, the women workers are dangerous and might be used by the employers to reduce the wages of the men. A conference is advocated between the unions involved in war work and the Women Workers' Federation and such unions as have women members to consider the manner in which the women who are being freshly employed should be organised.

selves was to be paid labour, and [illegible] up to them to see that they obtained their full value.

The second speaker was the Dean of Lincoln (Dr. T. C. Fry), who expressed his delight at the plan of the Board of Trade. It had come out, he said, very late, but not too late. (Hear, hear.) This was the price we had to pay for our liberty and he impressed upon all the women present that we had to sink or swim together. The men must be appealed to to see that the conditions under which the women worked were kept up to the proper level. Dr. Fry dealt with what the women in Germany were doing under a military organisation and also with what was being done in other countries by the women workers. The members of the Board of Trade and the members of the great trades unions, the Dean added, could deal with any cases where promises were forgotten at all, but "in the meantime, for Heaven's sake, give your work all of you that we may maintain our liberties and help our brothers." (Hear, hear.)

Major Everitt, as one of the recruiting officers of the city and county of Lincoln, reminded the meeting that at the outbreak of the war Lincolnshire did not move as rapidly as it ought to have done. Now things were different. They had raised four and a half battalions, and the county seemed to have risen to its responsibilities. They were now recruiting on an average 140 men weekly, and in the last two weeks the number had been 150. As regarded the city itself, things were different. As soon as the war broke out a great many men came forward, but he was sorry to say things were somewhat changed, and they were getting very few men from the city. He saw a great many men about, and he could not think they were all physically unfit. He came there to try and get some of the women to be recruiters. A great many of these men he saw were accompanied by young women, and he could not but think these young women might see that the men were wearing the King's uniform. The young women could be excellent recruiters if they would not have anything to do with what were called the shirkers.

Miss Embleton, of Barnsley, followed with a speech in which she dealt with some of the work which women might undertake in war time, and also dealt with labour conditions in the Ridings of Yorkshire so far as they effected women and half-timers. She laid stress on the fact that at this time women were doing work which they were least expected to do, and then, touching on the woman in the home, appealed to her audience to keep themselves fit, to keep their homes right, and to keep alcoholic drink out of their homes. "Use your money wisely and well. Rule your lives intelligently and patriotically at this moment, and don't harm the national life."

Councillor A Taylor, in a speech from the Trade Union point of view, admitted that this movement of the Board of Trade had been looked upon with considerable suspicion by the organised men, but after having heard the scheme explained he was quite sure that misunderstanding arose because the men did not understand what the Board of Trade really sought to do.

Mr. R. C. Minton proposed, and the Rev. Geo. Barrett seconded, a vote of thanks to the Mayoress and the speakers, and this having been carried the meeting closed by the singing of the National Anthem.

An extended report of the proceedings will appear in Saturday's "Lincoln Gazette."

The New Witness
April 8th. 1915.

"THE WOMEN'S MOBILISATION"

To the Editor of THE NEW WITNESS.

SIR,—There are one or two statements in Mr. Sheridan Jones's article on "The Women's Mobilisation" which appear to me to be, in the language of Parliament, "highly controversial." He refers, for instance, to an "amazing" pronouncement by Miss Courtney to the effect that "women, not men, should act as shop assistants and waiters," adding by way of comment that "Miss Courtney urges this step . . . as something eminently desirable per se." This reading of the pronouncement may or may not be justified, but I am quite certain that if the duties of serving in a shop are physically harmful to women (a conclusion which the best regulated shops are rapidly rendering invalid) they are spiritually demoralising to men. This being the case I am quite prepared to back up Miss Courtney in urging the replacement of male shop assistants by females, not because such occupation is desirable per se, but because it is less undesirable for women than for men. The anabolism of woman, her characteristic of service, specially fit her for work of this class; the physical conditions under which such work is carried out can be improved by organisation, by legislation and by education. Even a shopwalker can be rendered susceptible to education provided the pressure be sufficient—but to suggest that we should tolerate for ever the mental, moral and spiritual degradation of men in order to avoid physical discomfort to women is to give to matter a position of superiority over mind and thus reverse the foundation of all philosophy, and all civilisation, too. Even Wilde could only make woman represent "the triumph of matter over mind" by accepting the fact that "man represented the triumph of mind over matter."

I hope I need not labour to prove the spiritual decline of men under the influence of shop life. Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., was, I believe, a shop assistant and should know. If he doesn't, his shop-walking superior, Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, M.P., certainly does. At any rate, I will take it for granted until it is controverted, and being so, is it possible to doubt that, with all its physical disabilities, shop life is more desirable for women than for men?

The rest of Mr. Jones's arguments can be taken en bloc and applied to almost any industry in which women are ousting men. They certainly do not apply exclusively to shop assistants. In any case, presuming the continuance of the monogamic order after the war, how many women shop assistants will ever have a chance to become "wives and mothers"?

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

39, Mallinson Road, S.W., ED. J. REED.

Cotton Factory Times,
April 9th. 1915.

Women's "War Service."

DISCUSSION BY THE LEIGH TRADES COUNCIL.

Councillor J. Gregory, the president occupied the chair at the Leigh and District United Trades Council meeting at the Council Schools on Tuesday, and delegates were present from 26 trade unions, including seven textile societies.

The Ashton-under-Lyne and Dukinfield Trades Council wrote asking for information re the Leigh municipal housing, and it was decided that the information should be obtained and sent. In regard to the Tyldesley housing scheme it was stated that the Government had refused to sanction loans until twelve months after the end of the war.

Letters were read in regard to the suggestion that women workers should come forward to replace men who were wanted for army and navy work.—Several delegates thought that if the workers did not keep careful watch the practice would eventually lead to a reduction in wages.—The typographical delegate said half the members of their society were out of work. He thought that their members above military age who were drawing unemployment pay ought to be put temporarily in other trades where men were badly wanted.

Another delegate said if women did men's work they ought to receive men's pay, otherwise it would be the thin end of the wedge towards reducing wages, and a third speaker said there was a Government guarantee that women would be paid like men when they were doing men's work. The women ought to be organised.

The Chairman suggested that the secretary should write to the manager of the Labour Exchange and enquire what arrangements he had for seeing that women were paid equal to men for doing equal work, and this was carried.

A discussion took place on the drink question, and the general opinion was that men were not as a rule neglecting their work in order to get a drink.

One delegate said that there had been an increase of 568 cases of sickness in the engineering trade through overwork.

It was resolved by 24 votes to seven that the Trades Council protest against the total closing of public houses, and also against the opinion that drink was causing a dearth of labour in producing munitions of war.

6637 II/11

663

Yorkshire Observer,
April 8th. 1915.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

REGISTRATION SCHEME AT BINGLEY.

Last night a largely-attended meeting of women was held in the lecture theatre at the Bingley Technical School in connection with the appeal being made by the Board of Trade for women workers. The meeting had been arranged conjointly by the various women's organisations of Bingley, and was presided over by Mr. T. Turner (chairman of the Bingley District Council). The chief speaker was Miss Hartop, a representative of the Board of Trade, who explained how that Board was endeavouring to organise a reserve of labour in order to meet present needs in certain industries, and any possible future emergencies In some industries, she said, there was already a shortage of workers owing to the men having joined the forces in such numbers. Agriculture was one of them, and special measures were being taken in order that women could without delay give assistance in agricultural and dairying work. The appeal was specially to the young women of the middle classes, the women who usually had not to undertake any paid work The movement was one which would require most careful organisation, and the first thing it was necessary to do was to find out the available reserve of labour, and therefore all women who could respond were asked to register their names.

After her address, Miss Harter answered a number of questions. A resolution pledging the meeting to do all in its power to further the registration of women for war service was proposed by the Rev. J. Jack, seconded by Miss Davies, and adopted unanimously. Afterwards a committee consisting of Miss Moulden, Miss Crabtree, Miss Davies, Mrs. Nunns, Mrs. Severs, the Rev. J Jack, and Mr. H. C. Sexton, was elected, wtih power to add to its number, for the purpose of canvassing the town and compiling a register of women willing to undertake work.

Daily News & Leader,
April 8th. 1915.

HE NEW WOMEN WORKERS.

The article which we publish to-day from the pen of Mrs. Runciman puts very clearly one side of the questions raised by the Government's call to women workers. Women have, as a matter of fact, responded with a wholly admirable devotion to the calls made on their services in so many unexpected directions by the exigencies of the war. It would be grossly unjust not to recognise both the enthusiasm which has prompted them to offer their services in such numbers, and the extraordinary efficiency of these services themselves. We do not doubt that Mrs. Runciman is right in assuming that the Government's appeal will meet with a very warm response. It is true also that it will go some way to solve the serious unemployment among large classes of women which threatened grave results in the early stages of the war. Yet it would be a mistake to ignore the fact that this movement may very well take a form which will aggravate intensely the anxieties and difficulties of the industrial situation after the war. If they are faced in time these difficulties may be at least greatly mitigated. To loose a vast mass of labour such as the new armies represent on a market paralysed by the exhaustion of an enormously costly war is a tremendous peril at the best; with women occupying a large percentage of the posts available, it is vastly aggravated. Yet strong forces will be at work to make for this result. Many women will be attracted by the glamour of their new independence; many more, after the war, may be really dependent on their earnings: the cheapness and docility of female labour will be an attraction to the employer. It is for the Government to see that their emergency experiment does not turn into a permanent peril, and that it does not in effect result in a lowering of the standard of living.

Derby Express,
April 9th. 1915.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

By LILY MACARTHUR
(Of the Derby Labour Exchange).

The recent appeal of the Government to all women willing to undertake work "for the duration of the war" deserves a stirring response from all women of the Empire. Our men have freely sacrificed pleasant and profitable pursuits to engage in the bloody and disagreeable business afoot in Flanders. They go for us. That is one of the main reasons—to protect women and children at home: to redress the wrongs of Belgium and French women and children—these thoughts are in the minds of all our gallant fighters to-day.

The call of the Government is an ominous one; it evidently means that industries hitherto mainly carried on by men, and even now suffering from shortage caused by recruiting are to be still further depleted of men in their prime. The poster "Every fit man wanted," has a deeper significance in the light of the appeal for women's labour. We must believe that from now on all the able-bodied men's labour is to be bent upon carrying the war through: either as soldiers or makers of munitions and equipment. Even the latter "umbrella" is to be searched, and women employed upon the lighter munitions, as they are at present upon equipment.

The fact that emerges from these strange times is that men of all classes and grades are engaged in warfare. The working men alone cannot carry it wholly through. And just as all classes of men must serve, so we must draw upon all classes of women for this fresh demand. Working women, especially those in industry, are already working "all the hours God sends," and for them to leave one useful and necessary job to undertake another will get the country "no forrarder."

What is wanted is that those hundreds of thousands of women who so willingly offered their services to the country in any capacity at the outbreak of the war last August shall come forward now, and offer again to carry a share of the Empire's burden.

There are in Derby scores of patriotic women, eager to be useful, with trained brains and healthy bodies. Their services are needed; they could fill honourable and useful posts, and they themselves would feel that satisfaction at "doing their bit" which so evidently irradiates the consciences of the many soldiers in those dangerous and uncomfortable trenches. These men are doing things they never dreamed of being called upon to do. Yet the glorious spirit among them, so amusingly depicted in Punch's "Incorrigibles," carries them through long, difficult days with a cheer. The war mobilising of women will result in the same fellowship and stimulus if it is responded to in the same generous way.

Many women of the leisured classes, however, have now their hands full of Belgian relief work, war committees, and the like. Wherever indispensable work of this kind is being done, it would be wrong to relinquish it, but many more are only doing such work in a very casual fashion. It remains for such to gird themselves for more arduous toil for the glory of England.

The Government ask all women who have time and ability to register themselves at the local Labour Exchanges and have supplied forms there for applicants to fill up. The particulars filled in will be afterwards gone over, and lists prepared of the labour available for various kinds of industries. Some firms in the North have already experimented on putting women on in the engineering works on the Clyde; many can be employed upon shell making, light fittings, etc.; some, no doubt, will find employment in banks, insurance offices, and commercial pursuits hitherto closed to women.

There are also posts as lift attendants, waiters, ticket collectors, booking clerks, etc., quite suitable for women and girls, and no doubt these will largely be thrown open as the war becomes more exacting upon our reserves of able-bodied men.

These are the ways in which women can be useful in war time. Every woman who undertakes a post hitherto filled by a man, and thus releases or equips him, is serving her country as directly as the man is. The call for women ought to have a stirring response; it is, rightly understood, as thrilling a summons as the roll of the drums of the marching regiments. "Fall in!" We watch our soldier boys daily marching and training for the Glory of England. We need not stand any longer waving a futile handkerchief. Let every woman say "Fall in"—for the glory of England.

[Any woman by sending a postcard to the Labour Exchange, London Road, Derby, giving her name and address can have a war service form sent her, when her name will be put on the war register, and in the event of her services being required full particulars of the vacancy will be submitted before it need be accepted.]

663 II/12.

663

The Common Cause,
April 9th. 1915.

Women and War Service.

We learn with the utmost satisfaction that the Women's Conference with the Board of Trade desired by the National Union, as mentioned in our last issue, is to be held on Monday, April 12th, at 3.30 p.m., at Whitehall Gardens. Mr. Runciman invites the N.U.W.S.S. to send "not more than two representatives" to attend the Conference. On Saturday last the total number of applications received from women for war work was estimated at about 33,000.

Equal Pay for Equal Work.

The business of filling up the gaps in the ranks of labour by extending the employment of women is steadily increasing. A notable instance is the putting of women to the machinery by which the tins of Army rations and jam are hermetically soldered down. So far, this work has been exclusively done by men, but owing to a shortage of male labour to deal with the immediate pressure of work, women are now employed. We are glad to note that the men insist that the full trade union wage shall be paid to any woman employed, and accordingly these new workers are earning nearly £2 a week.

Woman and the Motor Van.

We learn that the National Motor Cab Co. now employ nearly thirty women, who are already making a success of driving motor vans about the London streets. They are paid 4s. a day when in the garage, and 5s. a day when out with the van. The driving of taxi-cabs, however, is still forbidden, and no woman can obtain a license in London. That this prohibition is based rather on prejudice than reason, is proved by the useful work of the Parisian "Chauffeuse," who is taking the place of her man at the front, and driving the car which is often his private property. She is successfully at work also on the trams and underground railways of Paris.

Women and "Economic Conscription."

About three hundred representatives of the National Amalgamated Union of Shop-Assistants assembled at Manchester on Sunday for their annual Conference. In the Presidential address a strong protest was made against a threatened "influx of cheap labour, coupled with a most invidious form of economic conscription in the shape of a suggested replacement of able-bodied male labour in the shops by female labour, a replacement which the union was asked by authority to forward by every means in its power." It is evident that only the strict application of the principle of equal pay for equal work can meet this difficulty, and, in any case, the practice of dismissing men of military age in order to force them to enlist is a form of tyranny against which we cannot too indignantly protest.

Sweated Shop Assistants.

But when the President of the Union goes on to condemn women's labour in shops on the ground of its unhealthiness, we are not deeply impressed. The conditions of women shop assistants cannot be too carefully safeguarded, but this masculine concern for the health of women competitors is too familiar a piece of bluff to be taken very seriously. We much regret that the meeting, while passing an emergency resolution to insist upon the full minimum wage for men, rejected an addendum fixing the same wage for women. It was argued that the rank and file of women had made no demand for such rates. This is an ancient argument against the rights of the sweated worker, and the women's lack of spirit is perhaps accounted for when we learn that over 1,000 women members of the Union receive less than 12s. a week.

Women Teachers' Demand.

We are glad to note the protest made by the National Federation of Women Teachers on Saturday against inequality of payment between the sexes. Miss Dix informed the meeting that she came from a city where women worked by the side of men preparing munitions of war; but they did not pay those women the same as they paid the men. A resolution was passed urging the Government to insist upon equal payment for the women who fill the places of men.

The Cotton Factory Times, April 9th. 1915:

663 II/13 663

THE MOBILISATION OF WOMEN.

AN "EXPLANATION" THAT DID NOT EXPLAIN.

FRAUGHT WITH DANGER.

By ADA NIELD CHEW.

His Majesty's Government, concerned for the due prosecution of the European War with a view to the Allies' success, is now calling upon the help of women. Circulars headed "War Service for Women" are being scattered broadcast, and we of the weaker sex are feeling duly important as a result of the solicitations which are offered us to fill them up. I got one over a week ago, and confess that I scanned it eagerly. Readers of the "Factory Times" will not accuse me of wanting to keep women out of any employment which they can perform efficiently, nor of backwardness in grasping opportunities on their behalf. Yet I finished reading the Board of Trade's appeal to women with a dubious mind, and am uneasy still—after a week's cogitation. Naturally, therefore, I accepted with alacrity an invitation to hear an "explanation" of it from an official, which was given to a selected few of us at our Labour Exchange last night. I am now more in the dark than ever, and am only clear on one point, and that is, that unless those of us who want to prevent a lowering of the standard of living of the working class, and who even want to keep the ground already won by a century of trade union effort, are alive and active as we never were before, we shall find ourselves, at the end of this war, perhaps with a balance of power in favour of the Allies, but no less certainly with a gigantic struggle of another sort in front of us. We do not mind a struggle—it is every-day experience to the advance guard of the Labour army; but we do want it to be for a step forward, and not merely a frantic effort to get back a little of what our fathers gained for us. It therefore behoves us to watch every step of the way we tread in these difficult days.

What Does It Mean?

There is a shortage of men, and the women are now invited to take "war service." What exactly does that mean? We do not know. We only know that more bullets and shells are wanted, and that women must do what they can to release the men for making bullets to kill others the while their own comrades offer themselves to the enemy's bullets. Many questions were asked at our "explanatory" meeting, and it is true to say that not a single enlightening answer was given. We are wanted, we were told, to offer our services, and as soon as the Government knows how many of us are willing to serve we shall be told what to do. Naturally this sort of thing does not satisfy any except women who are out of work, or who have no longer vision than the delightful thought that they are "serving their country." I suggest that the proposal of the Government, without any organised plans or definite ideas of what they want or mean to do with women when they get them, is stupidly vague, and will not appeal to the best type of woman, who naturally does not want to pledge herself to she knows not what.

The official was asked whether it was proposed to pay the women the same that men had been receiving. She did not know, but supposed that it would be the same rate that women were usually paid! Everybody knows that, with the exception of doctors, university lecturers, and cotton weavers, the rate of pay for women in every trade and profession is less than that for men; and as none of the three occupations named is likely to be affected, this simply means that the worst possible calamity to Labour is going to be allowed to happen—that women are going to undercut men wholesale, under the guise of serving their country, forsooth! Whilst the men make the shells and fire them, the women are to act as traitors behind their backs!

Whose Profit?

If this is to be so, one wonders who are going to pocket the extra profit between the men's labour and the women's? During the discussion which took place on this point a lady in the meeting pointed out that employers are paying a subsidy to the men at the front, and they would not be able to afford to pay women the same wages as men! So that the patriotism of women is evidently going to be exploited to relieve the burdens cast by their patriotism on the employers, and this, unless we are "wick" enough to prevent it, is going to receive the sanction of His Majesty's Government.

Some of us were so obviously dubious, and made so many objections to this danger, that we were reminded that we were expected to "think of the country" first, and to "leave the future to take care of itself." We were actually treated to the silly threat that we may "soon have no country" if we are not willing to throw overboard all that our fathers and grandfathers suffered to get for us. I hope we shall not be blinded by "bluff" of this sort, and that we shall remember in time that we owe a duty to the past and to the future as well as to the present. There is no reason why women should not help in time of war, nor indeed is there ony reason why women should not do any or all of so-called "men's work" which they are able to do; but there is every reason, both to those whose efforts raised the standard of living to what it is for the workers, and to the army of helpless children who are coming after us, why every woman should resolutely refuse to take any work which men have done for less pay than men received. The Government ought to give a definite pledge to this effect, and the workers should see that they do it.

A Class Division.

We were informed that the "classes" will be divided, probably. That is, that well-to-do women who have ordinarily nothing to do with their time will not be expected to mix with the lower orders. The former will, presumably, be given the clean jobs. It was suggested after the meeting that they would not use the money they earned (it would not be enough for them to live on!) but would probably "give it to charity." How do working men like the idea of leisured women coming and taking the jobs which usually keep their own "house doors open" and giving the wages away as worthless? Personally, there is a side to this of which I rather enjoy the thought. All the jobs done by working men are not clean jobs, and if it is true, as was stated by the official, that most of the women who are rushing to register are "women who do not need to work" it will have to mean their taking some dirty jobs. There is great talk of drafting the women to agricultural work, for instance. I happen to know rather intimately the whole daily routine of a farm, having had a father who was a farmer, and I confess I am looking forward with some amusement to the experiment of drafting leisured ladies to take the place of agricultural labourers. I can so well picture my father having a couple of ladies who have "had no need to work" in the place of his wagoner and cowman! I know of absolutely no work on a farm which is not hard and more or less dirty, and I am sure that only people who can work laboriously and long will be welcome. It will be interesting to watch this part of the scheme.

How It Might Work.

There is nothing about farming which a woman cannot do as well as a man, but a "lady"—in the usually accepted meaning of that term—cannot do it: perhaps, however, the idea will be to get working women to clean out the cowsheds and pig-sties, and to get the ladies to learn to make the butter and cheese, and to milk the cows (with a working woman to carry the cans and clean up after them, no doubt). The farmer will be required, probably, to take two sets of women, the one who can labour and the one who can do the picturesque and decorative. In that case will the wage be equal, and what the man got? And will the "lady" do the ploughing and manuring? Otherwise, unless she can take the man's work she will not be worth the man's pay to the farmer. I am not pitying or excusing him, but merely putting his point of view.

Nothing more fraught with possibilities or dangers has the war brought on us than this last development. The women are bound to come in at a time like this. The "ladies" will be glad to return to their state of "having no need to work" when the war is over, but a number of women—how large we do not yet know—will come into the Labour market to stay. We can, if we are wise enough, prevent this being a disaster to Labour. The National Workers' War Emergency Committee is to call a conference to deal with the situation. We shall all be well advised to give it our very earnest and careful consideration.

Blackburn Weekly Telegraph April 10th. 1915:

Women and War Service.

BY A CORRESPONDENT.

The appeal of the Government to women to register their names for employment has met with very satisfactory response in the country generally. In some places public meetings have been held, and the recruiting of women volunteers for industrial service has shown that the women are not going to be outdone in patriotic effort by the young men who have left home, work, and friends to join the colours.

The intention of the Government is to mobilise women who are willing to work and to fit them in where their services are most urgently needed. Some are registering for farm work, others for work in armament firms, some for railway work, some express willingness to undertake nursing, while others are anxious to try any work which their previous training fits them for or for which training may be provided.

The appeal is not made merely to women who ordinarily work for their living, but to all women who have no definite calling who are willing to help in this time of national stress. It has already been proved that women can adapt themselves to new kinds of employment with surprising quickness. One of our leading railway companies has now over 400 women and girls employed as booking-clerks, ticket collectors, carriage cleaners, &c., positions all filled by men before the war, and the result is voted an unqualified success. Corporations are employing women in various capacities, i.e., tram conductors, clerks, school attendance officers, &c., and it is difficult to say within what boundaries women's service must be limited. If it should be necessary for the authorities to enlist further batches of men for military and naval service, we have no option but to look to our women to fill up the industrial gaps and keep industry and commerce going here while our brave lads are fighting yonder.

The Government scheme is intended to get ready for that contingency. Already there are numerous vacancies waiting to be filled, and many more are sure to occur soon. We understand that the response to this appeal locally has not been very great, but this is probably due to want of publicity. The Board of Trade has this work in hand, and women who desire to enlist for war service should call at the Labour Exchange, Darwen-street, or send a postcard to the manager, and a form of application will be sent.

It has been suggested that women who have had experience as textile workers, but who do not now follow that employment, should come forward and register for textile work. There must be hundreds of women in Blackburn who could run three or four looms. If so, by coming forward now and showing their willingness to do so, it would be possible for hundreds of men textile workers to join the colours, and let these women take their places for the duration of the war.

In some trades the work may not be exactly suitable for women; in others, long training would be necessary, while in some industries, either the employers or the unions raise various objections. In the textile trade none of these drawbacks exists. Elderly people who in youth were textile workers can do the work again, and there is no danger of the employers paying less wages, for the woman textile worker is the best-paid industrial woman employee in the country. So far as our Lancashire textile centres are concerned, the idea seems practical if only the women who have once been textile workers would take the matter up. Perhaps our local Recruiting Committee will consider this, and appeal first to the women to register, and then to the textile men to enlist. In any case, Blackburn has done her part so well for King and country in this, the biggest crisis we shall ever know, that it is only fair to assume that if further efforts are necessary, they will be made. And this is the opportunity, not only for ex-textile workers, but for all women who are not definitely employed, of whatever class. We have amongst us dozens of young women who through good fortune, accident of birth, or other favourable circumstances, have no need to go out to earn a living. These surely ought to place their services at their country's disposal now. They will honour their brave comrades of the "explanation" of it from an official, which was given to a selected few of us at our Labour Exchange last night. I am now more in the dark than ever, and am only clear on one point, and that is, that unless those of us who want to prevent a lowering of the standard of living of the working class, and who even want to keep the ground already won by a century of trade union effort, are alive and active as we never were before, we shall find ourselves, at the end of this war, perhaps with a balance of power in favour of the Allies, but no less certainly with a gigantic struggle of another sort in front of us. We do not mind a struggle—it is every-day experience to the advance guard of the Labour army; but we do want it to be for a step forward, and not merely a frantic effort to get back a little of what our fathers gained for us. It therefore behoves us to watch every step of the way we tread in these difficult days.

What Does It Mean?

There is a shortage of men, and the women are now invited to take "war service." What exactly does that mean? We do not know. We only know that more bullets and shells are wanted, and that women must do what they can to release the men for making bullets to kill others the while their own comrades offer themselves to the enemy's bullets. Many questions were asked at our "explanatory" meeting, and it is true to say that not a single enlightening answer was given. We are wanted, we were told, to offer our services, and as soon as the Government knows how many of us are willing to serve we shall be told what to do. Naturally this sort of thing does not satisfy any except women who are out of work, or who have no longer vision than the delightful thought that they are "serving their country." I suggest that the proposal of the Government, without any organised plans or definite ideas of what they want or mean to do with women when they get them, is stupidly vague, and will not appeal to the best type of woman, who naturally does not want to pledge herself to she knows not what.

The official was asked whether it was proposed to pay the women the same that men had been receiving. She did not know, but supposed that it would be the same rate that women were usually paid! Everybody knows that, with the exception of doctors, university lecturers, and cotton weavers, the rate of pay for women in every trade and profession is less than that for men; and as none of the three occupations named is likely to be affected, this simply means that the worst possible calamity to Labour is going to be allowed to happen—that women are going to undercut men wholesale, under the guise of serving their country, forsooth! Whilst the men make the shells and fire will not be expected to mix with the lower orders. The former will, presumably, be given the clean jobs. It was suggested after the meeting that they would not use the money they earned (it would not be enough for them to live on!) but would probably "give it to charity." How do working men like the idea of leisured women coming and taking the jobs which usually keep their own "house doors open" and giving the wages away as worthless? Personally, there is a side to this of which I rather enjoy the thought. All the jobs done by working men are not clean jobs, and if it is true, as was stated by the official, that most of the women who are rushing to register are "women who do not need to work" it will have to mean their taking some dirty jobs. There is great talk of drafting the women to agricultural work, for instance. I happen to know rather intimately the whole daily routine of a farm, having had a father who was a farmer, and I confess I am looking forward with some amusement to the experiment of drafting leisured ladies to take the place of agricultural labourers. I can so well picture my father having a couple of ladies who have "had no need to work" in the place of his wagoner and cowman! I know of absolutely no work on a farm which is not hard and more or less dirty, and I am sure that only people who can work laboriously and long will be welcome. It will be interesting to watch this part of the scheme.

How It Might Work.

There is nothing about farming which a woman cannot do as well as a man, but a "lady"—in the usually accepted meaning of that term—cannot do it: perhaps, however, the idea will be to get working women to clean out the cowsheds and pig-sties, and to get the ladies to learn to make the butter and cheese, and to milk the cows (with a working woman to carry the cans and clean up after them, no doubt). The farmer will be required, probably, to take two sets of women, the one who can labour and the one who can do the picturesque and decorative. In that case will the wage be equal, and what the man got? And will the "lady" do the ploughing and manuring? Otherwise, unless she can take the man's work she will not be worth the man's pay to the farmer. I am not pitying or excusing him, but merely putting his point of view.

Nothing more fraught with possibilities or dangers has the war brought on us than this last development. The women are bound to come in at a time like this. The "ladies" will be glad to return to their state of "having no need to work" when the war is over, but a number of women—how large we do not yet know—will come into the Labour market to stay. We can, if we are wise enough, prevent this being a disaster to Labour. The National Workers' War Emergency Committee is to call a conference to deal with the situation. We shall all be well advised to give it our very earnest and careful consideration.

stress. It has already been proved that women can adapt themselves to new kinds of employment with surprising quickness. One of our leading railway companies has now over 400 women and girls employed as booking-clerks, ticket collectors, carriage cleaners, &c., positions all filled by men before the war, and the result is voted an unqualified success. Corporations are employing women in various capacities, i.e., tram conductors, clerks, school attendance officers, &c., and it is difficult to say within what boundaries women's service must be limited. If it should be necessary for the authorities to enlist further batches of men for military and naval service, we have no option but to look to our women to fill up the industrial gaps and keep industry and commerce going here while our brave lads are fighting yonder.

The Government scheme is intended to get ready for that contingency. Already there are numerous vacancies waiting to be filled, and many more are sure to occur soon. We understand that the response to this appeal locally has not been very great, but this is probably due to want of publicity. The Board of Trade has this work in hand, and women who desire to enlist for war service should call at the Labour Exchange, Darwen-street, or send a postcard to the manager, and a form of application will be sent.

It has been suggested that women who have had experience as textile workers, but who do not now follow that employment, should come forward and register for textile work. There must be hundreds of women in Blackburn who could run three or four looms. If so, by coming forward now and showing their willingness to do so, it would be possible for hundreds of men textile workers to join the colours, and let these women take their places for the duration of the war.

In some trades the work may not be exactly suitable for women; in others, long training would be necessary, while in some industries, either the employers or the unions raise various objections. In the textile trade none of these drawbacks exists. Elderly people who in youth were textile workers can do the work again, and there is no danger of the employers paying less wages, for the woman textile worker is the best-paid industrial woman employee in the country. So far as our Lancashire textile centres are concerned, the idea seems practical if only the women who have once been textile workers would take the matter up. Perhaps our local Recruiting Committee will consider this, and appeal first to the women to register, and then to the textile men to enlist. In any case, Blackburn has done her part so well for King and country in this, the biggest crisis we shall ever know, that it is only fair to assume that if further efforts are necessary, they will be made. And this is the opportunity, not only for ex-textile workers, but for all women who are not definitely employed, of whatever class. We have amongst us dozens of young women who through good fortune, accident of birth, or other favourable circumstances, have no need to go out to earn a living. These surely ought to place their services at their country's disposal now. They will honour their brave comrades of the sterner sex who have gone forth to help to secure our freedom and liberty. Here is their chance to share those honours. Women bear many of the sorrows of war. May not activity in some useful work even lessen this burden and yield good to our beloved country?

Women, your country needs your help. Register now for useful service at home while your sons, brothers, and husbands are making sure of victory in France, Belgium, and on the seas.

663 II/14

663

The Queen, April 10th. 1915.

REGISTERING FOR WAR SERVICE.

The Government Calls on Women.

By MRS MARGARET HEITLAND.

Are you able to work and free to work, but not working? You should have your name entered at once on the Special Register of Women for War Service which is being prepared by the Government Labour Exchanges. . . . Any woman who by working helps to release or equip a man for fighting does national War Service. Every woman who can work and is free to work should come forward.

BOARD OF TRADE. MARCH, 1915.

THE GOVERNMENT has called on women—at last. Eight months ago, when the war broke out, women were not called to work—they called themselves. They registered themselves through the women's suffrage and other societies to which they belonged and organised themselves into bands of workers. They organised hospitals in France and Serbia, staffed with women doctors and nurses, they raised very big funds for Red Cross, St. John Ambulance, and other nursing societies, some of them threw up lucrative work and became nurses themselves; they started relief work-rooms and, better still, started new industries and revived stricken trades. Many of those who could not advantageously change their profession have gone on working as before, but have given their earnings to ease some national difficulty. And in addition, practically every woman has made or bought clothing for the troops or has helped to sustain Belgian refugees.

The Government's call, then, has come late. Many thousands of women have not waited for it, but have long ago found the national work which they can do best.

Coming so late, it has also to some extent come unnoticed. Every day of the week during all these anxious months of watching, women have observed in the newspapers that they were asked to render some kind of war service. They have grown accustomed to it. But they have never before been asked by any Government to offer their general professional and industrial services. And just for this very reason—that they never have been asked to work for their nation before and therefore never expected to be asked—they have scarcely yet realised that they are asked. In London many women realise that this fine, this rousing appeal, has been made. But I gravely doubt whether most of the women in the smaller provincial towns and villages of these islands know that if they have any spare time and strength they ought to apply to the nearest Labour Exchange for a "War Service for Women" form and fill it up at once.

At the Central Labour Exchange, Broadway, Westminster, where up to the 25th of March over 14,000 filled-in registration forms had been received, women come and go all day long. There is a special "War Service for Women" department with its own staff of secretaries.

The volunteer arrives probably with rather a sinking feeling, a sensation of dejection which is intensified as she finds herself one of a large and ever-increasing crowd. She looks about. The secretary is putting a few questions to a lady who is "all fifty" (but, of course, "doesn't look it") whose sight is obviously failing and who may have done charitable work in an unsystematic way. She takes an optimistic view of her powers of patriotic service. She is succeeded by a bright young woman who might be very fairly useful as a hospital probationer. Two or three girls in knitted coats have come together from Hackney or Bermondsey to keep each other in countenance. There are several quite wealthy women in handsome furs; and there are a good many others of all ages and classes. They all want to do "their bit," and their purpose does them credit. They leave it to the Government authorities to decide what their bit shall be, in doing which they shall help and not harm other people. Lady Askwith, I was told, herself registered the other day.

The would-be recruits, while they wait their turn for a talk with the secretary, are busy filling up the registration forms. The questions of status and existence are soon answered. Then comes: "Have you ever done any paid work, and if so, what?" The small space left for the answer suggests only modest expectations in the matter of a professional record. Then come questions about the possibility of doing other work than that to which the volunteer is used; the possibility also of leaving home in order to do paid work, and the willingness to be trained for work. The most specific inquiries in the catechism deal with the various departments of work on land or farm for which the labour of women is now in urgent demand. These departments are milking, dairy work, care of live stock, light farm work, market gardening, poultry farming, and ordinary gardening, by which last, I suppose, the upkeep of private gardens is meant.

The questions are, after all, not difficult to answer. Most of us can do something useful. We have only to look back over our lives to see what we have done best in order to find a suggestion of what we could do now. The work must be of the kind that would come technically under the heading "Labour." I do not suppose that the Board of Trade can place "art." Art is delicate and elusive; it cannot be held in the rough meshes of a national supply and demand net.

Still, I should be loath to say that there was any kind of work, however superfine, that is at this juncture definitely useless. The great point is to ascertain how much labour is available and of what kinds. This is really the task on which the staff at the Central Labour Exchange is engaged. The registered offers are all being rapidly classified and graded, as fast almost as they are received.

The past few weeks have been marked by the rallying of many men to the colours. London shows the effect in the disappearance of commissionaires from shop doors, of men from the counter and the office. Travelling about the country one finds girls for the first time in charge of railway booking-offices, and trained young women are appearing in chemists' shops, and in increased number in provincial post offices. Men still sell sugar and chocolates and serve cups of tea in many places, but it is possible that if the Government insisted on women being employed for these functions while the war lasts and likewise stipulated that the scale of wages must not be lowered, the men could be freed to do work for which their greater muscular strength qualifies them.

The business is to find how many are the women who could work more or more usefully than they now are doing, and what the qualifications and abilities of these women are.

Let us look a little at some of the higher branches of the nation's work. Some of the most competent men in the Government offices have felt they must do more than they are doing to help Great Britain to stand against the enemy. Seventy, I believe, are going from this very office in Broadway alone. Their places must for the time being be taken by women who will determine to give good service. They must prove themselves worthy of a great opportunity. They will be in many cases beginners, and are therefore to start at a weekly wage of 26s., which, if the clerks prove satisfactory after trial, will be raised to 30s. For girls with a first-rate high school or university education there are some opportunities for work in connection with various important statistical returns which are being made. One of the chief qualifications is the knowledge of decimals and of the making out of percentages. Let young women who think of applying for duties of this kind try to get some private instruction or attend evening classes in the subject; that is to say, if they have not already mastered it in the course of their training in arithmetic or economics. There are many good chances now for clear-headed, able girls, with an interest in records, and not too great a determination to bring out human facts to prove some pet theory of their own. In the Censor's department a considerable number of educated women are employed; some of these are receiving from £2 to £3 a week. I mention salaries, not because women when they are offering war service should be eager to make money at all, but because they will be rightly eager not to injure the wage-earning power of other people, and most of all not to injure it in the case of men who will return to the field of ordinary paid labour after their splendid sacrifices.

In the north, in Glasgow and Newcastle, women are in great demand in the armament works. Their duties are chiefly the filling of shells. There is also a large demand for baskets to hold shells, and in this industry women are needed. A slackening of the strain in the army clothing trades is perceptible, but there is still a great call for women who can do leather stitching. A good many women who can drive a car are waiting to see whether Scotland Yard will license them, one of the big motor-cab companies in London having announced its readiness to engage two hundred chauffeuses as soon as the hesitation is overcome.

The Board of Trade and the Board of Agriculture are combining to get women trained in general dairy work. They have already received promises from several of the leading agricultural colleges and dairy schools to accept a limited number of women and to give them short courses of practical instruction.

This call from the Government on the women of the country is potentially—as I see it—the biggest event in the history of women's claim to citizenship that any of us has yet known. Potentially, I say, because I cannot tell how far women are going to realise and to seize the great occasion. I should like to see all who are not actually engaged in wage-earning work, or disabled by illness, or quite tied by duties to children or invalids, register themselves and their powers of service. For, be it noted, part time can be offered, and it is not indispensable that every woman should leave her present home. I long to see women's citizenship and powers of service acknowledged in time of war—not only acknowledged, too, but fully utilised.

All over the country are women and girls whose powers and time are not properly employed. They are not altogether idle, but are not really busy either. They are moving about paying visits to each other; or they are staying at home because they have not enough money to move about. They take up work and let it drop; take up other work, let that drop also; and then but for the war, they would go abroad for some months. It is not their fault that they lead this patchy, ineffective existence. A steady, progressive career has so long appeared to be outside the limits of their lives.

Now, things are changing before our eyes. Women may become almost as important as the men who are in the organised trades. Their work is wanted; their country has need of them life is transformed.

Derby Telegraph, April 10th 1915.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

(To the Editor of the "Derby Daily Telegraph.")

Sir,—Allow me to thank you for kindly publishing in yesterday's paper my article on war service for women. As a result there has already been an excellent response, many women of the better class having sent in their names signifying their willingness to help to do something to enable us to continue "business as usual." There is therefore every evidence of a patriotic spirit among the women of Derby, but we still want many more names for the war register. I may just add that no one is compelled to accept any post which may be offered: the question of accepting or refusing will be discussed with each lady as vacancies arise. Yours faithfully,

Lily Macrosty

Board of Trade Labour Exchange, London-road, Derby.
April 10, 1915.

663 II/15 663

The Times,
April 10th. 1915.

WOMEN'S PAY FOR WAR SERVICE.

CONFERENCE IN LONDON NEXT WEEK.

The conference called by the Government in response to the appeal of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies to discuss how women's cooperation can be made available in connexion with the register for war service, will take place next Tuesday at 5 o'clock at the Board of Trade. Representatives of suffrage societies, the Society for Opposing Women's Suffrage, the National Union of Women Workers, the Women's Cooperative Guild, the Head Mistresses' Association, and other groups have been invited, and Mr. Runciman is expected to take the chair.

The most important question will be that of equal pay for equal work; the second, that of training women who desire war service, but have never worked before; and the third, the question of housing accommodation and general conditions of labour.

A number of the women who have offered their services have volunteered to work for nothing, some suggesting that their pay might be devoted to war charities. Apart from these, the great mass of women whose offers of labour are being rapidly classified will have to be paid, and it is in arranging their rates of pay that the conference is likely to appeal for Government help. It is hoped, in the interests of the men who will return after the war, no less than in that of the women, to secure equal pay for equal work. The labour bureaux are, says an official, in the position of brokers; they cannot fix rates. They only introduce the employer to the employee. Sometimes they can hint to the employee that lower than the usual rate is being offered, but they cannot insist upon the usual rates being paid in any trade.

Guarding against Undercutting.

This fact, combined with the unorganized condition of women's labour, has caused the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies to ask for the present conference. "We want at the present crisis to guard against women undercutting men, and also against the possibility of any addition being made to the number of the existing sweated trades. These women are coming in temporarily, and the Government should see that it is not permissible to the employer to pay them such a wage that he would be reluctant to replace them with the returning men at the end of the war."

At the offices of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies attention was called to the fact that in the higher branches of the Civil Service—the Board of Trade, the Education Department, and the Local Government Board—there are many men who could be released from work by women who were their academic equals. In the majority report of the Royal Commission on the Civil Service some important recommendations were made as to employing women more largely in various branches of the service. In the General Post Office there are 3,000 women clerks employed, and only about 500 in the rest of the service. It is further suggested that there need be no difficulty as to the employment of women postmen.

It is estimated that 80 per cent. of the women of the British Isles are working at the present moment, either on voluntary work or on professional or industrial work.

Manchester Guardian,
April 10th. 1915.

War Service for Women.

The Workers' National War Emergency Committee, which held a representative conference last month on the subject of preventable rises in the price of food and fuel, is organising a women's conference on similar lines for next Friday to discuss war service for women. Delegates from women's trade unionist, labour, Socialist, co-operative, suffragist, and kindred societies are being invited, and the principal set of resolutions will be moved by Miss Mary MacArthur. These call for adequate safeguards against a depression of the standard of living or of working conditions, emphasise the principle of equal pay for equal work, and urge that every woman who registers for war service should join the trade union in the trade for which she is volunteering service. Another resolution demands a representation of organised women workers on the advisory committee of workers appointed by the Government, and suggests that not only should this committee advise the Board of Trade as to detailed conditions and terms upon which arrangements can be made for the transference of women from one trade to another, but that before giving such advice the committee itself shall consult organised representatives of the trades concerned. Dr. Marion Phillips is to bring forward a proposal asking the Government to take the logical step, after acknowledging the essential importance of women's co-operation, of giving a definite assurance that at the earliest possible moment "the long overdue reform of universal suffrage" will be dealt with.

The Morning Post, April 12th. 1915

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

NEW MACHINERY FOR TURNING OUT SHELLS.

Mr. Runciman, the President of the Board of Trade, will receive a deputation from women's societies to-morrow afternoon in connection with the war service for women scheme. Wages and conditions generally will be discussed at this conference. Up to the beginning of the month over 33,000 women had registered for war service, and demands for large numbers of women to take the places of men in certain trades are now being received at the Central Office of the Labour Exchanges, Queen Anne's Chambers, Westminster. Several railway companies are interesting themselves in the question of female labour during the war. Women are not only employed as carriage cleaners, but a start has been made to employ them as porters. The Great Central Railway Company is making the experiment. It is yet too early to say whether it is successful. This company is also employing women on the clerical staff. Many women are finding employment as clerks, thus relieving men who are anxious to join the Army. A large number of men employed as clerks by the Board of Trade have been released for military service, and women and girls are being appointed to the temporary vacancies.

FARMERS AND THE SHORTAGE OF LABOUR.

Large grocery companies have also approached the Board of Trade with a view to employing women in their establishments. Some have agreed to take eligible women without any training. Farmers are feeling the shortage of labour very keenly, and are making known their wants to the Labour Exchanges. Already women are being employed on farms where there is a shortage of labour or where the agricultural labourers desire to be released so that they can serve their country. In London women are employed as ward-cleaners in a military hospital, thus replacing R.A.M.C. orderlies. They are also taking the places of men in making telephone instruments, and are doing men's work in mustard and starch works.

In time the number of women employed on ammunition work will be largely increased. The Central Office of the Labour Exchanges has received intimation from large firms now turning out shells that the supply of female labour may be drawn upon to a great extent in May and June. These firms are laying down special machinery, notably light lathes, which will be ready for use in a few weeks. Hitherto women have been employed in certain processes of shell-making, and the object in laying down the new machinery is that they shall make the shells themselves, from the first process to the last. More women are being employed in ammunition factories every day.

AN ULSTER MOVEMENT.

The Ulster Women's War Service League has been formed by the Belfast branches of the Ulster Women's Unionist Council. Members will be asked to volunteer for certain work now being performed by men, who will thus be released for military service, and members will be pledged to retire when called upon to leave vacancies for men returning from the war. Care will be taken not to accept an offer of work without adequate remuneration, so as not to disturb the labour market.

Western Mercury, April 12th. 1915.

663 II/16

663

WORK FOR WOMEN

WHILE MEN ARE SERVING KING AND COUNTRY.

INSTRUCTION CENTRES FOR CORNWALL.

A meeting was held at Truro on Saturday to consider the question of war service for women. The chair was occupied by Lady Valletort, and those present included Lady Falmouth, Lady Molesworth St. Aubyn, Lady St. Levan, the Hon. Miss St. Aubyn, Mrs. Hext, Mrs. Tremayne, Mrs. Percy Williams, Miss Hanna, and Miss Nicholas.

Lady Valletort said the war service scheme had been started by the Board of Trade, and it was felt they ought to make some effort in Cornwall to support it. That was only intended to be a preliminary meeting, and it might be considered advisable to hold meetings in various parts of the county to make the scheme generally known. There must be many women and girls who would be willing to help at the present time, and it might be possible to train women for the work required. There were many women, she was sure, anxious to demonstrate their patriotism. There was nothing degrading in women working for their country. If at the end of the war—one of the most terrible the world had known—the women in that county could say they had done something to help, they would not think their time had been wasted or any humiliation had been suffered in doing the work of men who were going through the severest hardships upon the battle fields of Flanders.

THE SCHEME EXPLAINED.

Miss Dean, who attended on behalf of the Government department, explained that though the appeal was issued by the Board of Trade it had nothing to do with the Labour Exchange in the ordinary way. It was a special appeal for service during the period of the war. It was really a call to women to let it be known what number would be available in all parts of the country, or would be willing, if called upon, to take work and help to make certain work go on during the absence of the men at the front. It was purely a war service appeal, and they wanted it definitely understood that the people who registered would not be called upon at once probably to do work, but might be called upon in time to do the work they thought they could do. The time might come when they might want a very large number of women, and many would be required for establishments at which ammunition would be manufactured. In doing this work the women would be only following in the footsteps of the women of France, who were doing a large amount of work in their country. They wanted women as tram-car drivers, motor drivers, occupying positions in factories and workshops and all kinds of shops, agricultural work, etc. This appeal for war service was for all classes of women. It was not at all meant that it should be confined to working women, but to all who could take their part and do their little bit if called upon in time of an emergency until the war ended.

THOUSANDS AND THOUSANDS REGISTERING

The response to the appeal to register in Cornwall had produced thirty-one names. In the south-western counties over a thousand women had registered in the last fortnight, and thousands and thousands had registered up and down the try. In Cornwall the registrations included a tailoress, two for dairy work, four for garden work, one for any agricultural work, three for domestic service, three for professional work, eleven for clerical and commercial work, one as a shop assistant, and one prepared to do anything. Everything would be done to prevent any underselling of labour, and so make it difficult for men to return to their work after the war. It was not intended that those who registered for war service should permanently occupy the places of men, but to keep the job going while the men were at the war. They would be most careful to safeguard the conditions under which the work was undertaken. The immediate need was generally felt to be an agricultural one, for a shortage of agricultural labour was already being experienced, and it was felt that much of the work might be done by women.

PREJUDICE IN DEVON AND CORNWALL.

Very great prejudice was met with in Devon and Cornwall against employing women. It was nothing like so great in Somerset and Gloucestershire. It was felt that a shortage of men would eventually be found in the far west counties, and that they must get women ready during the next few months to do farm work. In many places women had come forward gloriously, and in Gloucestershire best of all. Students were being sent to be trained at agricultural colleges, and some were going to be taken at the Seale-Hayne College, the Government contributing a grant. They wanted to bring the need to the attention of people in the country districts, and then she was sure the women would respond to the appeal. She was afraid Cornish people generally did not think enough about the war, and did not credit that it was going to be a long and serious business. There was scope for women in gardening and poultry-keeping, and in all classes of employment, while many would be required in the new factories which were to be established for the manufacture of ammunition. In the divisional office with which she was connected twelve more men were joining the colours, and their places were to be temporarily filled by women.

THE POSITION AFTER THE WAR.

The point was raised by Lady Mary Trefusis whether, if women were introduced on farms to replace male labour, they could be certain that the farmers would be prepared to discharge these women at the end of the war and reinstate the men. The feeling was expressed that men returning would be reinstated, though in some cases the women labour might also be retained.

WHAT HAS ALREADY BEEN DONE.

The Hon. John Boscawen remarked on the agricultural instruction that had been given in Cornwall for several years. Three hundred girls passed through the dairy school every year, so that something ought to be known by the women folk of Cornwall about dairying. Then over sixty girls were passed through a course of instruction in milking, so it could not be said that the county was doing nothing regarding educating women as to work on farms. Then they had run a cheese school, and six students were taken in for a month, they being also instructed in calf-rearing, the management and feeding of cows, etc. All were now perfectly capable of taking an instructor's place anywhere. If the men went to the war, their wives were left in their cottages on the farms, and it was most necessary that some instruction should be given to these women, so that they should be able to help the farmer, especially where they were occupying a cottage which might be offered to a man who was left behind and could do farm work. Peripatetic teaching was the proper way to carry on this work in the county.

It was thought that if a grant could be obtained from the Board of Agriculture, useful work in the giving of instruction to women might be carried on in the county.

A suggestion was made that perhaps a farmer would take one or two women on his farm and give them practical instruction in farm work. Mrs. Tremayne, however, said farmers generally had wives and daughters. And what was the use of bringing in somebody else when they were there? She should imagine that a farmer's wife or daughter would be ashamed to see some other woman come on the farm to do the milking and dairying.

NINE CENTRES.

The Hon. John Boscawen said that it would be possible to run nine centres of instruction in the county, and they could give instruction to a large number of women in a very short time.

It was eventually decided that a letter should be addressed to the Board of Agriculture asking for a grant towards supporting nine centres for agricultural instruction in the county.

The ladies attending the meeting were asked to endeavour, in their various districts, to spread information that would induce women to offer their services in connection with this scheme, especially to farmers who might be in want of labour.

Mrs. Tremayne inquired if anyone personally knew of anyone requiring labour on the farms.

Lady Margaret Boscawen: We are very short of labour, and had we no women milkers our dairy customers would come very badly off.

Mrs. Tremayne said she did not notice that anyone of the actual farming class seemed to want workers.

Mr. Lanyon (chairman of the Farmers' Union): If an advertisement were put in the papers for a girl ready to go on the farm and do ordinary work you would have 300 or 400 applications.

Those present were constituted a committee to be called together if occasion necessitated.

Manchester Evg. Mail,
April 12th 1915.

WOMEN IN WAR WORK.

NEW MACHINERY FOR TURNING OUT SHELLS.

Mr. Runciman, the President of the Board of Trade, will receive a deputation from women's societies to-morrow afternoon in connection with the war service for women scheme. Wages and conditions generally will be discussed at this conference.

Up to the beginning of the month over 33,000 women had registered for war service, and demands for large numbers of women to take the places of men in certain trades are now being received at the Central Office of the Labour Exchanges, Queen Anne's Chambers, Westminster. Several railway companies are interesting themselves in the question of female labour during the war.

Large grocery companies have also approached the Board of Trade with a view to employing women in their establishments. Some have agreed to take eligible women without any training. Farmers are feeling the shortage of labour very keenly, and are making known their wants to the Labour Exchanges. Already women are being employed on farms where there is a shortage of labour or where the agricultural labourers desire to be released so that they can serve their country. In London women are employed as ward-cleaners in a military hospital, thus replacing R.A.M.C. orderlies. They are also taking the places of men in making telephone instruments, and are doing men's work in mustard and starch works.

In time the number of women employed on ammunition work will be largely increased. The Central Office of the Labour Exchanges has received intimation from large firms now turning out shells that the supply of female labour may be drawn upon to a great extent in May and June. These firms are laying down special machinery, notably light lathes, which will be ready for use in a few weeks. Hitherto women have been employed in certain processes of shell-making, and the object in laying down the new machinery is that they shall make the shells themselves, from the first process to the last. More women are being employed in ammunition factories every day.

Sheffield Telegraph,
April 13th. 1915.

FEMALE LABOUR.

DEMAND AND SUPPLY IN SHEFFIELD.

The Sheffield register of women who are prepared to replace in suitable occupations men who are serving their country in the army and navy now contains over 1,000 names. Many women and girls have already been placed in situations. A considerable number of the younger ones are tending light machinery in shops where small tools and metal parts are produced. Owing to these machines being largely automatic, and their output mostly repetitive, this work is easily learned by fairly intelligent girls, and the experiment is proving successful.

The number of girl mechanics is therefore likely to increase. Several local firms have under consideration plans for utilising the services of women during the war in the place of men in various other directions, and some interesting developments may result therefrom.

There is likely to be an unprecedented demand for women typists and clerks, as several of the armament firms and a number of ordinary steel-works who have hitherto refused to employ females in their offices are being compelled by circumstances to put aside any prejudices they may have held on the subject. Some have already installed staffs of female clerks, and others are making arrangements to do so at an early date.

The Liverpool Courier,
April 13th. 1915.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

POOR RESPONSE FROM LIVERPOOL.

HOW RECRUITING MAY BE STIMULATED.

The Board of Trade circular with regard to war service for women was considered yesterday at a well attended meeting of the Liverpool and Birkenhead branch of the National Union of Women Workers, held at 27, Leece-street. Mrs. A. A. Booth presided. It was pointed out that there were many openings for women workers, but the response to the appeal was disappointing.

Miss Knowles, organising officer, Women's Department, Labour Exchanges, spoke of the opportunities which were open to women workers to assist the country at the present time. In connection with armament work, there was great difficulty in getting out a sufficient supply of ammunition to meet the needs of the forces in the field, and to provide for the training of the men preparing for service. At present one firm alone required 1,000 women for armament work, in a month's time another 1,000 would be required, and in August a further 2,000 for this particular firm. That showed the demand there was for women who were employed in filling shells, testing fuses, and in automatic engineering work. Then a large number were required to assist army clothing contractors, who were badly handicapped for want of machinists. Many were needed for farm work, and the shortage of labour in this industry was particularly acute in the South of England and in Scotland. In Lancashire and Cheshire, if Irish labour was forthcoming in the summer, the problem would not be so difficult.

Dairy Workers Wanted.

There were many openings for dairy workers. In Cheshire farmers were selling their cows on account of lack of workers, and in consequence the supply of milk for the Liverpool district might be jeopardised. For this work the Board of Trade was providing training centres for women. In clerical work and in shops men might, for the war, to a large extent be replaced by women.

With regard to the response to the appeal of the President of the Board of Trade, Miss Knowles said she did not think they were getting the support from the women of the country they ought to if it was realised this question was one of vital importance. The response from Lancashire and Cheshire was comparatively small, there being only about 2,000 applicants up to the present time. In Liverpool there were only about 300 applicants. The types of workers were very miscellaneous and mixed, and in Liverpool there was a large number who would be willing to take up clerical work, but who were wholly inexperienced. They would like to get more applicants for farm work, but a good deal of this would have to be taken up away from people's homes, so that those who registered must make it clear whether they were prepared to leave home for the time of the war. A difficulty was bound to arise at the end of the war, when women would have to retire from the labour market and make way for the men when they returned. In this connection the Board of Trade was trying to impress upon people that the work was only temporary and of an emergency character, and that women were only being placed as substitutes for men for the time being.

Women Comrades Brigade.

Miss Eleanor Rathbone pointed out that this was the first time the Government had made an appeal to women to help in war, and she hoped there would be an adequate response. (Hear, hear.) She felt disgusted that the response from Lancashire had been so poor, and had been thinking how to remove such a discreditable state of things. She believed it did not arise from any intentional slackness on the part of women, but rather owing to the fact that the appeal had not yet reached those for whom it was intended. She thought women's societies could help by calling attention to the appeal, and they might issue a census paper to find out how many people were registering and who not registering, why not, and what other form of war work they were doing. They might organise women into bands—something in the nature of the comrades' brigade or the dockers' regiment. Then she considered there ought to be a uniform for the women, and for fear of enthusiasm slacking, it would be well if the women, when registered, underwent some sort of drill or exercise, so that they could get accustomed to mass together and to discipline. Then they might have a half-time arrangement for married women to carry on certain kinds of work in which they had been engaged before marriage. The voluntary societies might also guide wage conditions, and prevent unscrupulous employers offering women sweated wages. What they wanted was equal wages for an equal value of work. She believed if women took up work in the way suggested it would have a very stimulating effect on recruiting all over the country.

Replying to a question, Miss Knowles said there were plenty of openings now which they could fill up with women without interfering in any way with trade unions.

The Times,
April 13th. 1915.

WAR WORK FOR WOMEN.

DEPUTATION TO MR. RUNCIMAN TO-DAY.

The President of the Board of Trade will receive this afternoon the deputation of representatives of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, the National League for Opposing Women's Suffrage, the Women's Emergency Corps, the East London Federation of Suffragettes, and the United Suffragists who desire to submit a list of occupations in which women's labour might be more extensively utilized than at present and thereby release men for military service. Mrs. Fawcett will probably head the deputation, who will ask for the establishment of a minimum wage for unskilled labour, for equal standard rates of pay with men for women, and the repeal of every regulation or enactment penalizing matrimony among Government employees.

Applications by women for war work continue to be received by the Central Labour Exchange and by provincial branches. The most recent returns show that up to April 1 33,000 women had volunteered for various forms of service. Since that date the numbers have been well up to the average. Fresh returns will be issued, together with a résumé of the work accomplished, in the course of a day or two.

Of the 33,000 applications, London was responsibly for 13,000 and the south-eastern district 2,028. Yorkshire yielded 2,900, Scotland 4,253, Ireland 590e Wales 670, the north-western district 2,263, the North of England (Northumberland, Westmorlands and Cumberland) 3,742, the south-western counties 704, and the West and East Midlands 1,946. The classification returns have not yet been completed, but when they are issued they will show some novel forms of war work for which women have not onl volunteered, but have been accepted. The response from various parts of the United Kingdom have us to the present been uneven. London, as the figure, available show, has done well. Ireland and Wales have done very poorly, as have the south-eastern counties of England.

Manchester Guardian,
April 13th. 1915.

A Women's Deputation.

No one who has come into personal touch with the work of the women's societies can fail to be struck by the vigour and determination with which they are carrying on their work. I mentioned a day or two ago a conference of women's societies which is to take place shortly to consider conditions of women's war service. To-morrow Mr. Runciman is receiving at the Board of Trade a deputation from several societies on the same subject, and many of the points to be considered by the conference will be raised at the Board of Trade, so that there should be some definite idea of Government intentions to be laid before the conference when it meets. I believe that it was at the suggestion of the Women's Freedom League that Mr. Runciman sent out invitations for the deputation, but he has omitted the Women's Industrial Council and the National Federation of Women Workers—an unfortunate oversight. However, the women are approaching the matter in no spirit of antagonism. As one of the Women's Freedom League delegates says: "You can't stop women helping, and we are only trying to get things put on an equable basis. There is never any lack of patriotism among women, and we should not dream of trying to hold them back even if we could." The Government, she adds, have a great chance of utilising all the elements that exist of a valuable "women's parliament" to help them in what is undoubtedly a rather difficult problem. To secure the organised co-operation of women would be a great and lasting gain.

The Times, April 14th. 1915.

663 II/18

663

THE NATION'S CALL TO WOMEN.

EXAMPLE OF THE WAR OFFICE.

GROWING TRADE DEMANDS.

In correspondence which has recently been published in The Times, complaint has been made that in the interests of economy, sufficient use has not been made of women labour, and that men of sound health and of recruitable age have been employed by the Government Departments in clerical work while the country was engaged in a life and death struggle. Inquiry tends to show that while there is some foundation for both contentions, the authorities are doing their utmost to remove all cause of complaint.

Since the opening of hostilities the War Office has been steadily building up a staff of female clerks and typists. Before the outbreak of war, women were employed only as typists; since that time many women clerks have been engaged, and they are doing their work very satisfactorily. Their services were obtained through the Civil Service Commission and the Labour Exchanges. At the present time about 300 women are employed by the Military Department, and more are about to be added.

Owing to the ever-increasing congestion at Whitehall, it has become necessary to house the Contracts Department in a special building at Westminster. There the experiment of employing women and girls as messengers will be made. It must be regarded as an experiment solely, but every precaution has been taken to ensure its success. The messengers will be controlled by a lady superintendent, and as the work grows at the War Office, room is likely to be found for the employment of at least another 150 women as clerks, typists, and messengers.

SERVICE IN THE TRADES.

THE NEED FOR MORE WOMEN.

The importance which is attached to the substitution of women for men in certain trades was emphasized yesterday when a conference took place at the Board of Trade between the President of the Board of Trade and representatives of a number of women's organizations. We have received the following official account of the conference :—

MR. RUNCIMAN ON THE POSITION.

Mr. RUNCIMAN, in opening the proceedings, said that up to the beginning of April over 33,000 women had registered themselves on the Special Register of Women for War Service. Among the applications for service for which the women have registered themselves he noted specially the following :—

Armament workers	6,000
Clothing Trades	4,000
Milkmaids and Dairy workers ..	1,700
Gardeners	500
Other Agricultural workers	2,000
Shop Assistants	1,100
Leather workers	500
Commercial and Clerical	5,000

Most of those registered are working women of previous experience, though not necessarily in the occupation for which they express a preference. There are some experienced women available for nearly all classes of occupations. Thus, 1,500 of the applicants state that they have had previous experience in agriculture. Nearly 4,000 applicants have been previously employed as clerks, and over 1,000 in shops. These applications have all been sifted and applications for women should be made to the ocal Labour Exchanges.

Mr. Runciman then explained that a Special Register of women was necessary because, although there were considerable numbers of women on the ordinary Labour Exchange Register, taking the country as a whole, it did not follow that in any particular district sufficient women were available for the present demand, and the supply would certainly be insufficient for the prospective demand, which he hoped would be created by increased recruiting. Steps were being taken in consultation with the Home Office to increase recruiting and the temporary substitution of women for the men leaving in a number of trades. The actual work to which many of the women would be called would, of course, depend upon the success of these efforts in particular trades. In any case, it was not intended that the women on the Special Register should be placed in employment at the expense of the women registered at the Exchanges in the ordinary way. The women on the Special Register would be called on only if there were not sufficient women available on the ordinary Labour Exchange register of the locality.

WAGES AND CONDITIONS.

As regards the wages and conditions on which women should be employed, he pointed out that, as a general principle, the Exchanges did not, and could not, take direct responsibility as to the wages and conditions, beyond giving in each case such information as was in their possession. In regard, however, to Government contractors, it had been laid down that the piece rates for women should be the same as for men, and further special instructions had been given to the Exchanges to inform inexperienced applicants of the current wages in each case, so that they should be fully apprised as to the wage which it was reasonable for them to ask. A general safeguard against permanent lowering of wages by the admission of women to take the place of men on service would be made by asking employers, so far as possible, to keep the men's places open for them on their return.

As regards the housing of women moved into a district for work, Mr. Runciman stated that in certain districts special steps had already been taken by the Exchanges by means of local housing committees to find and inspect suitable lodgings for women. The necessity for this would probably develop, and in this the help of the women's organizations might be most valuable.

By arrangement with the Board of Agriculture a certain number of women had already received, and others were now receiving, short training in some of the agricultural colleges. Some of those having completed their training had at once been put in employment. Arrangements for training in other occupations would, he hoped, be made as and when definite need arose.

A long discussion followed, and a large number of questions were asked and suggestions put forward. Mr. Runciman dealt with a number of these and promised to communicate with the societies further with regard to others, with a view in particular of availing himself of the offers of help made.

The following were the organizations represented and the names of the representatives at the conference :—

Catholic Women Suffrage Society.—Miss O'Sullivan.
Conservative and Unionist Women's Franchise Association.—Mrs. Ridley Smith.
East London Federation of the Suffragettes.—Miss E. Sylvia Pankhurst.
Girls' Friendly Society.—Miss Lettice Digby.
Head Mistresses' Association.—Miss Reta Oldham.
Liverpool Society.—Miss Eleanor F. Rathbone.
Local Government Advancement Committee.—Mrs. Humphry Ward.
National League for Opposing Women's Suffrage.—Mrs. Archibald Colquhoun.
National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies.—Mrs. Rackham. Mrs. Deane Streatfeild.
Union of Jewish Women.—Mrs. Nathaniel L. Cohen.
United Suffragists.—Miss Barbara Ayrton Gould.
"Woman's Dreadnought."—Miss Norah L. Smyth
Women's Cooperative Guild.—Miss Margaret Llewellyn Davies.
Women's Freedom League.—Miss C. Nina Boyle. Mrs. K. S. Tanner.
Women's Unionist and Tariff Reform Association.—Miss E. Goring-Thomas.
Women Writers' Suffrage League.—Mrs. Sarah A. Tooley.
Woolwich Branch Women's Cooperative Guild.—Mrs. Anna Ross.
Y.W.C.A.—Miss A. A. Horne. Miss Grace Bristow; Mrs. Ross Cooper.

CAR CONDUCTORS IN GLASGOW.

During the past fortnight two women have been employed experimentally by the Glasgow Corporation as tramway conductors, and there seems a probability of female labour being largely used in this work in the city. Last week the women worked on a typically busy route of the city's tramway service, and they proved themselves capable of dealing with the traffic. The Tramways Committee, who appear to be in favour of the continuance of the experiment, have instructed the manager to submit a report dealing with the extent to which female labour may be utilized, and the question of pay. The tramways manager will engage a dozen women with no previous experience of tramway matters for the work. Applications from women for employment on the cars are pouring in daily.

Echo & Evg. Chronicle, April 14th. 1915.

Women and War Service.

Mr. Runciman's interview last night with a trade union deputation on the subject of women's work in war time brought out some interesting facts, and should be helpful both to applicants for work and to the directing officials. While a great deal of service to the nation can be done at present by women in place of men, and should be welcomed, a hasty rush is to be deprecated. In many trades there has been a natural jealousy on the part of men workers lest women, by coming in at lower wage rates, should produce a deteriorating effect upon the position of men, who must normally be regarded as the principal bread-earners. Women having shown themselves in some occupations difficult to organise and weak in resisting power, men have feared that their appearance in increased numbers would spell a general lowering of the status of labour.

Reason still exists for care in regard to the emergency employment of women as substitutes for men. At the interview with Mr. Runciman, Miss Mary Macarthur stated that there were cases of women working 94 hours a week, and others outside the factory gates who could not get a job. That is bad organisation, and a bad precedent when we return to peace conditions. As regards lowered wages, probably there is less to fear. Mr. Runciman stated that in Government contract work it had been laid down that the piece rates for women should be the same as for men. But, of course, the entry of women into trades in place of men affects a much wider area than Government contracts, and care must be taken that the influx of new and inexperienced workers is not exploited for the benefit of the greedier class of employer.

Then we have the question how far it is possible to rely on promises that men's places will be restored to them after the war. The great bulk of employers will doubtless act honourably in this matter, but a minority might not, and the only way to keep that minority from permanently substituting women for men workers, at lower rates, is to secure at the outset that women's labour is not given too cheaply.

There is a broader social view which requires also to be kept in mind, and that is that the home should not be sacrificed to the factory. The war may or may not be followed by a general lowering of the standards of life, through dull trade and want, but it is clear that many young families are being bereaved of their natural protectors, and the mother's care is all the more essential. It is a very great and complex problem altogether, but there is good ground for hope in the way that women of all classes are combining to meet it, and in the readiness of Government to help wherever help is needed.

663. North Mail. 14. 4. 15.

TO RELEASE MEN.

Mrs Runciman's Call to Women of North.

TOWN HALL MEETING.

"I think it must be that the ladies of Newcastle have not yet realised the gravity of the situation in which this country is placed," said the Lord Mayor of Newcastle (Ald. J. Fitzgerald), referring to the small number of women present at the meeting held in Newcastle Town Hall last night in the interests of the "War Register of Women."

His lordship presided, and had the support of the Mayor of Gateshead (Ald. Wardill), and the speakers were Mrs Walter Runciman, Dr Ethel Williams, and Mr Edward Shortt, K.C., M.P., who appealed to women of all classes to register for war service to relieve men who may shoulder a rifle or man a gun with his Majesty's forces.

Following his opening reference to the attendance, the Lord Mayor said that our brave soldiers at the front were upholding the most glorious traditions of the British Army, but they wanted assistance, and assistance must be forthcoming if this war was to be brought to a successful termination.

More men, more guns, more shells, and still more munitions of war were required, and unless they were to hand, the task in which our brave men were engaged would be prolonged far beyond anticipations and lives would be needlessly sacrificed.

His lordship felt confident that the women of Newcastle were prepared to do everything in their power to assist the Army and Navy to bring this terrible conflict to a speedy and successful termination.

Mrs Walter Runciman did not doubt the readiness of the women to lend their aid at this time of crisis. They only had to realise how serious was the situation.

"I believe the women are just as ready to do their bit as the men," asserted the wife of the President of the Board of Trade, amid applause, and she proceeded to point out that large numbers of women would be absorbed in the extensions to armament factories.

New Class of Workers.

"Under this war service scheme we want to rope in women who have never before registered in a Labour Exchange," proceeded Mrs Runciman. "We want to rope in women who have never before worked for their living, but are capable and willing to work now in the national interests."

Only the other day employment had been found for the women who had registered at Newcastle Labour Exchange for war service in finding lodgings for the additional armament workers who have been drafted into the city. That was a useful piece of work, but only an example, and Mrs Runciman could not see why, when sufficient women offered themselves for the purpose, the city tramcars should not be driven and conducted by women, and thus relieve the men physically fit for service with the colours.

Why, the speaker inquired, should not women measure gas and electric light metres, and perform similar functions now performed by men? They wanted women to register for any kind of work, but it must be understood that there was to be no permanent supplanting of men's labour. The women, under the plea of national necessity, had no intention of ousting the men or of depriving them of the privileges won for them by their trade unions, and the women must be relied upon to get a fair remuneration for the work they did.

Up to April 1 33,000 women had registered themselves for war service, and of that total 5,000 had never worked before. Large numbers had volunteered for armament work which was often disagreeable, and that showed the true fighting spirit.

On the subject of disagreeable tasks, Mrs Runciman pointed out that the women who volunteered must be prepared to stick to the work whatever happened. We could not afford to have "slacking off." Women must make up their minds that they were going to work and stick to it, but they must not be disappointed if they were not called upon immediately they registered.

North's Brave Women.

"So long as one man is wanted in the trenches or in the engineering shops and shipbuilding yards, it is a waste of national strength to employ a man upon work a woman could do," declared the senior member for Newcastle in the course of an eloquent address, which he prefaced with a review of the heroic women who figure in the early centuries of our national history.

To-day the women of the country were doing their share. "We know there are many women—aye, and men—who in the still night watches sob their souls out for those they have lost, but when the full light of day comes the women are as stiff-lipped, bright-eyed, and show as brave a front as any man. They are taking their part, and all they want is the opportunity to do the best they can for the Empire," asserted Mr Shortt, amid loud applause.

No part of the Empire was prouder of its men than the counties of Northumberland and Durham, not only in regard to recruiting, said Mr Shortt. It was the men of those counties who had taken the lead amongst the trade unionists and had said: "We are going to set everything on one side and do our work. Who was it that had sent that splendid message on Sunday to the Prime Minister? The men of Tyneside, who were ready to 'deliver the goods.'"

Mr Shortt was convinced that the women of Tyneside would help them to deliver the goods, and we would be as proud of them as we were of the men.

Dr Ethel Williams, in the course of a brief speech, emphasised the necessity for women insisting on men's pay for men's work.

Several questions were asked, including an inquiry as to whether war service registration was not a form of compelling men to enlist.

Mr Patterson, divisional superintendent of Labour Exchanges, thought not. Quite the contrary, in fact.

Mr Angus Watson, Miss Younger, the Sheriff (Dr Dawson), and Sir Walter Plummer were associated in votes of thanks to the speakers and the chairman.

663. Leicester Post. 14. 4. 15.

SUFFRAGETTE "BARGAINING."

There was something like a raid of women on the Board of Trade this afternoon. They commenced to arrive a little before five o'clock by taxi, by 'bus, and on foot, and there was an interested little group of the general public to watch the arrivals who included such well-known Suffragists as Miss MacArthur, Miss Bardfield, Miss Boyle, and Miss Pankhurst, and ladies with decidedly other views, including Mrs. Humphrey Ward. Mrs. Fawcett, who was expected to introduce the deputation, was not present, nor was Mrs. Despard. For nearly two hours Mr. Runciman heard the views of his visitors, and I gather that they covered a pretty wide area. "Equal pay for equal work," was, of course, the feature of most of the requests. Miss Sylvia Pankhurst, for the East End Suffragettes, put this and other safeguards as a sine qua non of women's co-operation in the Government scheme for mobilising labour, but the representative of the Society for Opposing Women Suffrage strongly opposed this attitude, she made it clear. She tells me that in the view of her society women will rally to the help of the State in the present emergency, without attempting to impose conditions. It is unnecessary to add that she joined issue with Miss Pankhurst's plea that women should have vote in return for their services. The Women's Freedom League wanted all barriers to matrimony removed in the case of women workers and the representatives of the National Union of Women Suffrage Societies, the largest body represented, offered some interesting suggestions on the housing question. Mr. Runciman testified to the valuable character of some suggestions offered, but was unable, of course, to promise anything beyond careful consideration. He suggested, I believe, the possibility of a further conference.

663. Daily Mail 14. 4. 15.

33,000 WOMEN RECRUITS.

THE VOLUNTEERS FOR SPECIAL WAR SERVICE.

Up to the end of March 33,000 women had registered themselves for special war service, said Mr. Walter Runciman, President of the Board of Trade, to a deputation of women representing 18 women's societies at the Board of Trade last night.

The following figures were given by Mr. Runciman showing how many women had declared themselves willing to work in the respective branches of industry:—

Armament works	6,000	Agricultural work	2,000
Clothing factories	4,000	Shop assistants	1,100
Dairy work ...	1,700	Leather work..	500
Gardeners ...	500	Clerical or Commercial	5,000

It had been agreed, said Mr. Runciman, that in Government contracts the same piece rates should be paid to women as to men, but no rule was laid down as to time rates. He mentioned that in his own department 600 women were now employed.

Since the Controller of the London telephone service announced four days ago that women were wanted for night telephone duty nearly 2,000 letters a day from applicants have swamped the normal post at the Controller's office in Queen Victoria-street.

WOMEN ARMY CLERKS.

LORD R. CECIL AND SUBSTITUTES FOR SOLDIERS.

Lord Robert Cecil, speaking yesterday at a meeting of the New Constitutional Society for Women's Suffrage at the Knightsbridge Hotel, said he knew from personal experience that there were a large number of women who were only too anxious to find some outlet for their energies at the present moment.

What was wanted was that, as far as possible, women should take the places of men who were willing to fight. There was the great question of agricultural labour in which women could be of valuable assistance. He was not sure that the Government had done everything they might do. He was told the other day—it might be inaccurate; he hoped it was—that there were a thousand soldiers now engaged in Army post-office duties. He could not imagine that women should not do that work or a great part of it.

He had seen soldiers acting as clerks in a number of hospitals. It seemed incredible that these men should be employed in making out hospital lists when that work could be done just as well by women. With tact and good will on both sides, a large number of things being done by men might be done by women. When the time came he believed women would be heard as much as men in the discussion of the terms of peace that ought to be put forward.

663 II/19

663.

Daily Graphic. 14. 4. 15.

WOMEN'S WORK AND WOMEN'S WAGE.

The deputation of women's societies that waited upon Mr. Walter Runciman yesterday was engaged in attempting—like many other reformers—to utilise the pressure of the war as a leverage for solving some of the most difficult problems of peace. The main grievance of Mrs. Fawcett and her fellow-Suffragists is that women are paid at lower rates than men, and the demand was put forward for an equalisation of the rates of pay. It is an old demand, but whatever the Government may be tempted to do in time of war, when peace returns the inequality of pay will return with it. These sex enthusiasts persist in ignoring the hard fact that in most industrial occupations the average woman is a less efficient wealth-producer than the average man. That is the ultimate reason why women are paid a lower wage than men, and no protests can get rid of the fact. Doubtless custom also has some slight—though diminishing—influence in determining women's wages. Possibly, too, women are economically injured by such regulations as those which prevent them from retaining their employment under certain public bodies if they marry. But these are matters which have only the remotest connection with the needs of the war. At the present moment the important matter is to enlist as many women as possible for industrial work, in order that as many men as possible may be enlisted for the firing line. The difficulty in the way is not one of wages, but one of willingness. If the women are willing to come forward means will quickly be found to give them the necessary training, and their wages will then be determined by their efficiency and the general demand for labour.

663. Eastern Daily Press. 14.4.15.

There was something like a raid of women on the Board of Trade this afternoon. They commenced to arrive a little before five by taxi, by bus, and on foot, and there was an interested little group of the general public to watch the arrivals, who included such well-known suffragists as Miss MacArthur, Miss Bondfield, Miss Boyle, and Miss Pankhurst, and ladies with decidedly other views, including Mrs. Humphrey Ward. Mrs. Fawcett, who was expected to introduce the deputation, was not present, nor was Mrs. Despard. For nearly two hours Mr. Runciman heard the views of his visitors, and I gather that they covered a pretty wide area. Equal pay for equal work was, of course, the feature of most of the requests. Miss Sylvia Pankhurst, for East End suffragettes, put this and other safeguards as a sine qua non of women's co-operation in the Government scheme for mobilising labour, but the representative of the Society for Opposing Woman Suffrage strongly opposed this attitude. She made it clear, she tells me, that in the view of her society women will rally to the help of the State in the present emergency without attempting to impose conditions. It is unnecessary to add that she joined issue with Miss Pankhurst's plea that women should have votes in return for services. The Women's Freedom League wanted all barriers to matrimony removed in the case of women workers, and the representatives of the National Union of Woman Suffrage Societies, the largest body represented, offered some interesting suggestions on the housing question. Mr. Runciman testified to the valuable character of some of the suggestions offered, but was unable, of course, to promise anything beyond careful consideration. He suggested, I believe, the possibility of a further conference.

Daily News. 14.4.15. 663.

WOMEN WORKERS FOR WAR SERVICE.

Safeguards Against Lowering of Wages.

Mr. Walter Runciman, M.P., the President of the Board of Trade, received a deputation yesterday of representatives of eighteen women's organisations in relation to the appeal of the Government to the women of the country to register themselves specially for war service.

In opening the proceedings, Mr. Runciman observed that up to the beginning of April over 33,000 women had registered themselves in response to the appeal, among them being the following:

Armament workers	6,000
Clothing trades	4,000
Milkmaids, etc.	1,700
Gardeners	500
Other agriculturists	2,000
Shop assistants	1,100
Leather workers	500
Commercial and clerical	5,000

It was not intended, Mr. Runciman explained, that the women on the Special Register should be placed in employment at the expense of the women registered at the Labour Exchanges in the ordinary way.

As regards wages and conditions he pointed out that the Exchanges could not take direct responsibility, but in regard to Government contractors it had been laid down that the piece rates for women should be the same as for men. A general safeguard against permanent lowering of wages by the admission of women to replace men on service would be made by asking employers, so far as possible, to keep the men's places open for them on their return.

WOMEN AND ARMY POST OFFICE

The Government's call for women was discussed at a meeting of the New Constitutional Society for Women's Suffrage held at the Knightsbridge Hotel yesterday afternoon.

Lord Robert Cecil, M.P., expressed the opinion that there was still much more for women to do which was direct war service. He did not think the Government had made the most of the opportunities. For instance, 1,000 soldiers were now engaged in the army post office, and soldiers were doing the work of clerks in the hospitals. If women replaced these men—and he could see no reason why they should not—more men would be released for the firing line.

The Rev. Lewis Donaldson, of Leicester, described the Government's "War Service for Women" circular of March 18 as a document attesting the true repentance of obstructionists in high places. Under the force of circumstances the Government had recognised the principle which suffragists had spent weary years in preaching. He trusted that women taking men's places would receive exactly the same remuneration as the men had received.

Morning Post. 14. 4. 15.

QUEEN'S WORK FOR WOMEN.

The Queen's Work for Women Fund yesterday reached a total of £152,376 9s. 5d. Another "mile of pennies," realising £220, has been completed. The latest subscribers include Miss E. J. Gosling, £10.

All communications and gifts for sale should be addressed to Lady Roxburgh, Hon. Secretary, 33, Portland-place, London, and all cheques should be made payable to Mrs. C. Arthur Pearson, Hon. Treasurer, at the same address, and crossed "Queen's Work for Women Fund Account." The book of newspaper extracts relating to the work and activities of the Fund can now be obtained from the Headquarters, 33, Portland-place. All correspondence respecting the work of the Central Committee on Women's Employment must be addressed to Miss Mary R. Macarthur, Hon. Secretary, 8, Grosvenor-place, Hyde Park Corner.

Daily Express, April 14th. 1915.

33,000 WOMEN WAR WORKERS.

6,000 FOR SERVICE IN THE ARMS FACTORIES.

BATTALIONS?

The women's reply to the Government's appeal for war workers was made known by Mr. Runciman, President of the Board of Trade, yesterday.

He presided at a conference of women held at the Board of Trade to discuss various questions raised by the appeal, and said that the response up to April 1 was as follows:—

Women registered.....Over	33,000
Want to work in armament factories	6,000
In clothing factories.....	4,000
Clerical workers.....	5,000
Dairy workers.....	1,700
Gardeners	500
Other agricultural work.....	2,000
Shop assistants.....	1,100
Leather stitchers	500

"Most of those registered are working women of previous experience, though not necessarily in the occupation for which they express a preference," said Mr. Runciman.

"There are some experienced women available for nearly all classes of occupations. Thus, 1,500 of the applicants stated that they have had previous experience in agriculture. Nearly 4,000 applicants have been previously employed as clerks, and over 1,000 in shops.

"These applications have all been sifted, and applications for women should be made to the local labour exchanges."

CONDITIONS.

Mr. Runciman said the supply of women would certainly be insufficient for the prospective demand which he hoped would be created by increased recruiting. Steps were being taken in consultation with the Home Office to increase recruiting and the temporary substitution of women for the men leaving in a number of trades.

He explained that it was not intended that the women on the special register should be placed in employment at the expense of the women registered at the exchanges in the ordinary way. The women on the special register would be called on only if there were not sufficient women available on the ordinary labour exchange register of the locality.

"In regard to Government contractors," he said, "it has been laid down that the piece rates for women shall be the same as for men, and further special instructions have been given to the exchanges to inform inexperienced applicants of the current wages in each case, so that they shall be fully apprised as to the wage which it is reasonable for them to ask.

"A general safeguard against permanent lowering of wages by the admission of women to replace men on service will be made by asking employers, so far as possible, to keep the men's places open for them on their return."

HOUSING PROBLEM.

Mr. Runciman said the most serious difficulty was the housing question, which was bound to arise when a large number of women were transferred to any particular district. In this connection women's organisations could be of the greatest value to the Government.

He announced that the Government had arranged for a fortnight's training to be given at agricultural colleges to women going in for dairy work. The women receive from Government sources £3 for the fortnight—£1 for fee and £1 a week living allowance. Some have already completed their training and obtained posts.

One of the women delegates, Miss Rathbone, suggested that middle-class workers who registered should be organised into companies, battalions, and regiments.

"The Government have no imagination," she exclaimed.

Mr. Runciman seemed impressed by the suggestion.

Complaint was made that women had to work twelve hours a day in armament factories. It was also stated that able-bodied young men, especially in police offices, were employed in such duties as typewriting, which could be done as well by women.

In reply to Lady Aberconway, Mr. Runciman said that in the Board of Trade 600 extra women had been engaged since the war began.

Miss Nina Boyle stated that 600 male typists engaged by the War Office might have been released for the war if women typists had been employed instead.

TO REPLACE SOLDIERS.

"I am not sure that the Government have done everything they might do," said Lord Robert Cecil yesterday at a meeting of the new Constitutional Society for Woman Suffrage, held at the Knightsbridge Hotel.

"I was told the other day—it may be inaccurate—that there are a thousand soldiers now engaged in the duties of the Army Post Office. I cannot imagine why women should not do that work, or a great part of it. I believe there is quite a lot of work directly and intimately connected with the Army which is being done by soldiers, and which might be done just as well by women.

"I have been through a number of hospitals, and have seen soldiers acting as clerks. It seems incredible that soldiers should be employed in making out hospital lists when that work could be done just as well by women as by men."

Mrs. Cecil Chapman, who presided, said that the old Victorian song, "For men must work and women must weep," should now be changed to "For men must fight and women must work."

Mrs. Runciman, wife of the President of the Board of Trade, speaking at Newcastle last night, appealed for a large number of women to register, as they would be needed very quickly for the extensions of armament factories.

An agreement which has just been accepted by the members of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers provides for the employment of women and semi-skilled men in the production of shells and fuses for military and naval uses. They will receive the wages usually paid for the work.

The question of women's employment during the war has caused trouble in the pottery trade. More than half the employees at present are women and girls, and the men are alarmed at the prospect of an extension of women's employment. Up to the present it has been found impossible to reach an agreement between the masters and men on the subject.

The employees of the Co-operative Wholesale Society's hosiery factory at Huthwaite, Notts, unanimously passed a resolution on Monday thanking the directors for war bonuses of 15 and 10 per cent. on incomes up to £200 a year.

Dundee Courier
April 14th. 1915.

Women Volunteers for War Service.

Considerable progress is being made with the scheme for substituting female for male labour, thus releasing men for military service.

Mr Runciman stated yesterday that over 33,000 women had been registered. Some of these volunteers are already being utilised, and the President of the Board of Trade hinted at a new recruiting campaign which would bring all the available female labour into active demand.

In many cases, of course, the employment of the women volunteers can only be experimental. It is inevitable that they should be drawn very largely from the classes which have least experience of modern industrial conditions. They are amateurs as compared with the women who register at the Labour Exchanges in the ordinary way.

They are not to be allowed to encroach on the preserves of the woman worker; but the scope for the volunteers is very wide, and it seems a pity that their efforts should not be directed in other than the highly specialised branches which are most generally favoured. There are many minor forms of employment in which the substitution of female labour for male could be carried out with the minimum of inconvenience, and the most beneficial effect on recruiting.

663 II/21 663

The Scotsman
April 14th. 1915.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN IN WAR TIME.

BOARD OF TRADE CONFERENCE.

MR RUNCIMAN ON ORGANISATION.

A CONFERENCE took place at the Board of Trade yesterday between the President of the Board of Trade and representatives of a number of women's organisations. The following were the organisations represented and some of the names of the representatives:—Catholic Women's Suffrage Society, Conservative and Unionist Women's Franchise Association, East London Federation of Suffragettes (Miss E. Sylvia Pankhurst), Girls' Friendly Society, Head Mistresses' Association, Liverpool Society, Local Government Advancement Committee (Mrs Humphry Ward), National League for Opposing Women's Suffrage (Mrs Archibald Colquhoun), National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, Union of Jewish Women, United Suffragists, Women's Dreadnought, Women's Co-operative Guild (Miss Margaret Llewellyn Davies), Women's Freedom League (Miss C. Nina Boyle), Women's Unionist and Tariff Reform Association (Miss E. Goring Thomas), Women Writers' Suffrage League, Woolwich Branch Women's Co-operative Guild, and the Young Women's Christian Association.

WOMEN'S SPECIAL REGISTER.

Mr Runciman, in opening the proceedings, said that up to the beginning of April over 33,000 women had registered themselves on the special register for women for war service. Among the applicants for service, for which the women had registered themselves, he noted especially the following armament workers:—6000 in the clothing trades, 4000 milkmaids and dairy workers, 1700 gardeners, 500 other agricultural workers, 2000 shop assistants, 1100 leather workers, 500 commercial, and 5000 clerical. Most of those registered are working women of previous experience, though not necessarily in the occupation for which they express a preference. There are some experienced women available for nearly all classes of occupation; thus fifteen hundred of the applicants state that they have had previous experience in agriculture, nearly four thousand applicants have been previously employed as clerks, and over one thousand in shops. These application have all been sifted, and applications for women should be made to the local Labour Exchange. Mr Runciman then explained that a special register of women was necessary, because although there were considerable numbers of women on the ordinary Labour Exchange register, taking the country as a whole, it did not follow that in any particular district sufficient women were available for the present demand, and the supply would certainly be insufficient for the prospective demand which he hoped would be created by increased recruiting. Steps were being taken in consultation with the Home Office to increase recruiting, and the temporary substitution of women for men leaving in a number of trades. The actual work to which many of the women would be called would, of course, depend upon the success of these efforts in particular trades. In any case, it was not intended that women on the special register should be placed in employment at the expense of women registered at the Exchanges in ordinary way. Women on the special register would be called on only if there were not sufficient women available on the ordinary Labour Exchanges register of the locality.

WAGES AND CONDITIONS OF LABOUR.

As regards wages and conditions on which women should be employed, he pointed out that as a general principle the Exchanges did not and could not take direct responsibility as to wages and conditions beyond giving in each case such information as was in their possession. In regard, however, to Government contractors, it had been laid down that piece rates for women should be the same as for men, and further special instructions had been given to the Exchanges to inform inexperienced applicants of current wages in each case, so that they should be fully apprised as to the wage which it was reasonable for them to ask. A general safeguard against the permanent lowering of wages by the admission of women to replace men on service would be made by asking employers, so far as possible, to keep the men's places open for them on their return.

WORK OF WOMEN'S ORGANISATION.

As regards housing of women moved into a district for work, Mr Runciman stated that in certain districts special steps had already been taken by the Exchanges by means of local housing committees to find and inspect suitable lodgings for women. The necessity for this would probably develop, and in this the help of women's organisations might be most valuable. By arrangement with the Board of Agriculture a certain number of women had already received, and others were now receiving, short training in some of the agricultural colleges. Some of these, having completed their training, had at once been put in employment. Arrangements for training in other occupations would, he hoped, be made as and when definite need arose.

A lengthy discussion followed, and a large number of questions were asked and suggestions put forward. Mr Runciman dealt with a number of these, and promised to communicate with the societies further with regard to others, with the view in particular of availing himself of the offers of help made.

MRS RUNCIMAN ON THE EXTENSION OF ARMAMENT FACTORIES

Shop assistants 1,100
Leather stitchers 500

"Most of those registered are working women of previous experience, though not necessarily in the occupation for which they express a preference," said Mr. Runciman.

"There are some experienced women available for nearly all classes of occupations. Thus, 1,500 of the applicants stated that they have had previous experience in agriculture. Nearly 4,000 applicants have been previously employed as clerks, and over 1,000 in shops.

"These applications have all been sifted, and applications for women should be made to the local labour exchanges."

CONDITIONS.

Mr. Runciman said the supply of women would certainly be insufficient for the prospective demand which he hoped would be created by increased recruiting. Steps were being taken in consultation with the Home Office to increase recruiting and the temporary substitution of women for the men leaving in a number of trades.

He explained that it was not intended that the women on the special register should be placed in employment at the expense of the women registered at the exchanges in the ordinary way. The women on the special register would be called on only if there were not sufficient women available on the ordinary labour exchange register of the locality.

"In regard to Government contractors," he said, "it has been laid down that the piece rates for women shall be the same as for men, and further special instructions have been given to the exchanges to inform inexperienced applicants of the current wages in each case, so that they shall be fully apprised as to the wage which it is reasonable for them to ask.

"A general safeguard against permanent lowering of wages by the admission of women to replace men on service will be made by asking employers, so far as possible, to keep the men's places open for them on their return."

HOUSING PROBLEM.

Mr. Runciman said the most serious difficulty was the housing question, which was bound to arise when a large number of women were transferred to any particular district. In this connection women's organisations could be of the greatest value to the Government.

He announced that the Government had arranged for a fortnight's training to be given at agricultural colleges to women going in for dairy work. The women receive from Government sources £3 for the fortnight—£1 for fee and £1 a week living allowance. Some have already completed their training and obtained posts.

One of the women delegates, Miss Rathbone, suggested that middle-class workers who registered should be organised into companies, battalions, and regiments.

women must work.

Mrs. Runciman, wife of the President of the Board of Trade, speaking at Newcastle last night, appealed for a large number of women to register, as they would be needed very quickly for the extensions of armament factories.

An agreement which has just been accepted by the members of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers provides for the employment of women and semi-skilled men in the production of shells and fuses for military and naval uses. They will receive the wages usually paid for the work.

The question of women's employment during the war has caused trouble in the pottery trade. More than half the employees at present are women and girls, and the men are alarmed at the prospect of an extension of women's employment. Up to the present it has been found impossible to reach an agreement between the masters and men on the subject.

The employees of the Co-operative Wholesale Society's hosiery factory at Huthwaite, Notts, unanimously passed a resolution on Monday thanking the directors for war bonuses of 15 and 10 per cent. on incomes up to £200 a year.

Dundee Courier
April 14th. 1915.

Women Volunteers for War Service.

Considerable progress is being made with the scheme for substituting female for male labour, thus releasing men for military service.

Mr Runciman stated yesterday that over 33,000 women had been registered. Some of these volunteers are already being utilised, and the President of the Board of Trade hinted at a new recruiting campaign which would bring all the available female labour into active demand.

In many cases, of course, the employment of the women volunteers can only be experimental. It is inevitable that they should be drawn very largely from the classes which have least experience of modern industrial conditions. They are amateurs as compared with the women who register at the Labour Exchanges in the ordinary way.

They are not to be allowed to encroach on the preserves of the woman worker; but the scope for the volunteers is very wide, and it seems a pity that their efforts should not be directed in other than the highly specialised branches which are most generally favoured. There are many minor forms of employment in which the substitution of female labour for male could be carried out with the minimum of inconvenience, and the most beneficial effect on recruiting.

Mr Runciman, in opening the proceedings, said that up to the beginning of April over 33,000 women had registered themselves on the special register for women for war service. Among the applicants for service, for which the women had registered themselves, he noted especially the following armament workers:—6000 in the clothing trades, 4000 milkmaids and dairy workers, 1700 gardeners, 500 other agricultural workers, 2000 shop assistants, 1100 leather workers, 500 commercial, and 5000 clerical. Most of those registered are working women of previous experience, though not necessarily in the occupation for which they express a preference. There are some experienced women available for nearly all classes of occupation; thus fifteen hundred of the applicants state that they have had previous experience in agriculture, nearly four thousand applicants have been previously employed as clerks, and over one thousand in shops. These application have all been sifted, and applications for women should be made to the local Labour Exchange. Mr Runciman then explained that a special register of women was necessary, because although there were considerable numbers of women on the ordinary Labour Exchange register, taking the country as a whole, it did not follow that in any particular district sufficient women were available for the present demand, and the supply would certainly be insufficient for the prospective demand which he hoped would be created by increased recruiting. Steps were being taken in consultation with the Home Office to increase recruiting, and the temporary substitution of women for men leaving in a number of trades. The actual work to which many of the women would be called would, of course, depend upon the success of these efforts in particular trades. In any case, it was not intended that women on the special register should be placed in employment at the expense of women registered at the Exchanges in ordinary way. Women on the special register would be called on only if there were not sufficient women available on the ordinary Labour Exchanges register of the locality.

WAGES AND CONDITIONS OF LABOUR.

As regards wages and conditions on which women should be employed, he pointed out that as a general principle the Exchanges did not and could not take direct responsibility as to wages and conditions beyond giving in each case such information as was in their possession. In regard, however, to Government contractors, it had been laid down that piece rates for women should be the same as for men, and further special instructions had been given to the Exchanges to inform inexperienced applicants of current wages in each case, so that they should be fully apprised as to the wage which it was reasonable for them to ask. A general safeguard against the permanent lowering of wages by the admission of women to replace men on service would be made by asking employers, so far as possible, to keep the men's places open for them on their return.

WORK OF WOMEN'S ORGANISATION.

As regards housing of women moved into a district for work, Mr Runciman stated that in certain districts special steps had already been taken by the Exchanges by means of local housing committees to find and inspect suitable lodgings for women. The necessity for this would probably develop, and in this the help of women's organisations might be most valuable. By arrangement with the Board of Agriculture a certain number of women had already received, and others were now receiving, short training in some of the agricultural colleges. Some of those, having completed their training, had at once been put in employment. Arrangements for training in other occupations would, he hoped, be made as and when definite need arose.

A lengthy discussion followed, and a large number of questions were asked and suggestions put forward. Mr Runciman dealt with a number of these, and promised to communicate with the societies further with regard to others, with the view in particular of availing himself of the offers of help made.

MRS RUNCIMAN ON THE EXTENSION OF ARMAMENT FACTORIES.

Mrs Runciman, wife of the President of the Board of Trade, speaking at Newcastle last night on women's war service, said there was need for a very large number to register. They would be needed very quickly for the extensions of armament factories, and could take the places of men whom employers were now reluctant to release for fear of jeopardising industries. She mentioned as instances of employment for women tramways, railways, gas and electrical undertakings, agriculture, shops, and clerical works. Women would get equal pay with men for equal work, and were in no way intended permanently to displace men.

Midland Evg News. April 14th. 1915.

663 II/22 663

WOMEN'S WAR HELP.

IMPORTANT BOARD OF TRADE CONFERENCE.

33,000 REGISTERED.

The importance which is attached to the substitution of women for men in certain trades was emphasised yesterday when a conference took place at the Board of Trade between the President of the Board of Trade and representatives of a number of women's organisations. The following is an official account of the conference:

Mr Runciman, in opening the proceedings, said that up to the beginning of April over 33,000 women had registered themselves on the Special Register of Women for War Service. Among the applications for service for which the women have registered themselves he noted specially the following:—

Armament workers	6,600
Clothing Trades	4,000
Milkmaids and Dairy workers	1,700
Gardeners	500
Other Agricultural workers	2,000
Shop Assistarts	1,100
Leather workers'	500
Commercial and Clerical	5,000

Most of those registered are working women of previous experience, though not necessarily in the occupation for which they express a preference. There are some experienced women available for nearly all classes of occupations. Thus, 1,500 of the applicants state that they have had previous experience in agriculture. Nearly 4,000 applicants have been previously employed as clerks, and over 1,000 in shops. These applications have all been sifted and applications for women should be made to the local Labour Exchanges.

Mr Runciman then explained that a Special Register of women was necessary because, although there were considerable numbers of women on the ordinary Labour Exchange Register, taking the country as a whole, it did not follow that in any particular district sufficient women were available for the present demand, and the supply would certainly be insufficient for the prospective demand, which he hoped would be created by increased recruiting.

Steps were being taken in consultation with the Home Office to increase recruiting and the temporary substitution of women for the men leaving in a number of trades. The actual work to which many of the women would be called would, of course, depend upon the success of these efforts in particular trades. In any case, it was not intended that the women on the Special Register should be placed in employment at the expense of the women registered at the Exchanges in the ordinary way. The women on the Special Register would be called on only if there were not sufficient women available on the ordinary Labour Exchange register of the locality.

Wages and Conditions.

As regards the wages and conditions on which women should be employed, he pointed out that, as a general principle, the Exchanges did not, and could not, take direct responsibility as to the wages and conditions, beyond giving in each case such information as was in their possession. In regard, however, to Government contractors, it had been laid down that the piece rates for women should be the same as for men, and further special instructions had been given to the Exchanges to inform inexperienced applicants of the current wages in each case, so that they should be fully apprised as to the wage that it was reasonable for them to ask. A general safeguard against permanent lowering of wages by the admission of women to take the place of men on service would be made by asking employers, so far as possible, to keep the men's places open for them on their return.

As regards the housing of women moved into a district for work, Mr Runciman stated that in certain districts special steps had already been taken by the Exchanges by means of local housing committees to find and inspect suitable lodgings for women. The necessity for this would probably develop, and in this the help of the women's organisations might be most valuable.

By arrangement with the Board of Agriculture a certain number of woman had already received, and others were now receiving, short training in some of the agricultural colleges. Some of those having completed their training had at once been put in employment. Arrangements for training in other occupations would, he hoped, be made as and when definite need arose.

A long discussion followed, and a large number of questions were asked and suggestions put forward. Mr Runciman dealt with a number of these and promised to communicate with the societies further with regard to others, with a view in particular of availing himself of the offers of help made.

Safeguards Demanded.

According to the special correspondent of the "Daily Telegraph" there were present at the conference, in addition to the ladies officially mentioned, Miss Mary Macarthur, of the Women's Trades Union League; Mrs Creighton, of the National Union of Women Workers; Miss Margaret Bondfield, of the Shop Assistants' Union, and others. Mrs Fawcett was to have been the first speaker, but in her absence the deputation was not formally introduced.

From subsequent conversation with some of the ladies, it appeared that both Mr Runciman and the delegates asked various questions. The points that were strongly urged by the latter were that in employing women the Government should give a good lead in the matter of just treatment and equal wages. There was also on the part of several who spoke a demand for the formation of an advisory committee to the Government on women's work.

Others pointed out strongly that due safeguards must be forthcoming on the part of the Government as to the scale of wages, the system of giving adequate training to the workers, and due provision as to reasonable facilities for housing women who should take up such work as may be found; this latter, of course, being a very important point as regards the sending of women workers on to the land and into distant places.

At the conclusion of Mr Runciman's speech the ladies were invited to state their case.

Miss Sylvia Pankhurst urged that women should be paid the same rates as men, both as to time and piece work, for unskilled labour, and should also receive the special bonuses. For skilled labour their wages should approximate to those of men. Maintenance of not less than £1 a week should be provided in connection with Government training schemes and schemes subsidised out of public funds. Since the interests of every woman were of vital concern, it was imperative that the Parliamentary franchise should be extended to every woman over 21 years of age.

Long Hours.

Miss Llewellyn Davies spoke of the evils of long hours, and instanced cases of girls employed at a munitions factory working twelve-hour day shifts, with some night shifts in addition. Such employment wore out a woman's capacity, and so did not bear adequate results.

Lady Aberconway asked what proportion of women workers had been taken on in the Government departments since the war began.

Mr Runciman said 600 women were working in the Board of Trade department.

Miss Mary MacArthur remarked that although girls were working eighty-four hours a week at a factory named, there were crowds of women at the gates daily waiting for work. She considered that the statements about the shortage of women labour were thus disproved.

Miss Nina Boyle strongly condemned the regulations and enactments penalising matrimony among Government women employees. She also observed that 600 extra men clerks had been taken on at the War Office to deal with women's allowances—work which could very well be done by women. She also related that at a certain police station in South Wales she had seen a number of strapping young men, all over 6ft in height, working typewriters. Surely they should be at the front, and the work be done by women.

Manchester Guardian. April 14th. 1915.

THE CALL TO WOMEN.

LORD R. CECIL ON PREMATURE PEACE TALK.

LONDON, TUESDAY.

Lord Robert Cecil spoke on the nation's call to women at a meeting of the New Constitutional Society for Women's Suffrage in the Knightsbridge Hotel to-day. He said that the amount of work which women were already doing must not be underrated, but there were still a very large number of women who were anxious to find an outlet for their energies. A woman whose husband was lost at Mons had written to the branch of the Red Cross Society with which he was connected, saying: "There seems nothing for the women to do but to sit and wait and knit and almost break their hearts." It was surely untrue that in this great crisis there was nothing for women to do but to sit and wait and knit. Women had done magnificent work in the hospitals as doctors and nurses, but there was a great deal more work directly connected with the war for them to do, apart from the domestic work which was essential to the life of the nation.

Army Work for Women.

He was not sure that the Government had done everything they might have done. He was told—it might be inaccurate—that there were 1,000 soldiers engaged in the duties of the army post office. He could not imagine why women should not do that work. Quite a lot of work directly connected with the army which was being done by soldiers might be done by women. The clerks of hospitals were soldiers, and it seemed incredible that when every man was wanted to fight soldiers should be employed making out lists. If the Government would go into the matter and see what part of the military machine might be worked by women they would find that a considerable number of places might be filled by women. As to the extent to which women could replace men in civilian work, it would be necessary to proceed with great caution, so as to avoid disputes which would not add to the military efficiency of the nation, but with tact and goodwill on all sides it would be found that many things now done by men might be done by women.

Women would have no right to complain of the Government if they did not take advantage of the offer to register themselves. It was mainly due to the fact that women had not realised the offer that had been made that the figures of women who had registered so far were disappointing. Only 33,000 had registered. The number of the women of England was about eight or ten millions.

No Use Discussing Peace Terms Yet.

He had been invited on entering the meeting to attend a meeting to discuss the terms of peace. There was no one who did not ardently and earnestly desire peace. He thought that those who were so clamouring to discuss terms of peace were sometimes led to say that all war was wicked, and that this war, though it might have more justification than most, was still a wicked thing. He heartily dissented from that view. Those who believed this war to be just and necessary held that war was necessary because in the world at present there was international anarchy. The machinery which controlled the administration of justice between individuals did not exist as between nations—there was no sovereignty or government of nations. When great injustice was committed or threatened or great danger threatened to a nation she must fight to enforce justice and to protect herself. We were not merely slaughtering men, we were carrying out the dictates of justice and enforcing in the only way it could be enforced the moral law as applied to nations. Until some decision had been reached and victory was assured there could be no useful discussion of the terms of peace. (Applause.) We were false to our trust and to the very conception of international morality when we began to talk of peace before our task was finally accomplished.

When the time came he hoped and believed that women would be heard as much as men in the discussion of the terms of peace. He believed that their influence at that time would be of incalculable value. He was one of those who believed that it was not material force which ultimately counted; spiritual force was what was really powerful. In the spiritual side of life women were certainly in no respect inferior to men. When it came to the final settlement, which all hoped would be such as

.....	500
Other Agricultural workers ...	2,000
Shop Assistants	1,100
Leather workers'	500
Commercial and Clerical	5,000

Most of those registered are working women of previous experience, though not necessarily in the occupation for which they express a preference. There are some experienced women available for nearly all classes of occupations. Thus, 1,500 of the applicants state that they have had previous experience in agriculture. Nearly 4,000 applicants have been previously employed as clerks, and over 1,000 in shops. These applications have all been sifted and applications for women should be made to the local Labour Exchanges.

Mr Runciman then explained that a Special Register of women was necessary because, although there were considerable numbers of women on the ordinary Labour Exchange Register, taking the country as a whole, it did not follow that in any particular district sufficient women were available for the present demand, and the supply would certainly be insufficient for the prospective demand, which he hoped would be created by increased recruiting.

Steps were being taken in consultation with the Home Office to increase recruiting and the temporary substitution of women for the men leaving in a number of trades. The actual work to which many of the women would be called would, of course, depend upon the success of these efforts in particular trades. In any case, it was not intended that the women on the Special Register should be placed in employment at the expense of the women registered at the Exchanges in the ordinary way. The women on the Special Register would be called on only if there were not sufficient women available on the ordinary Labour Exchange register of the locality.

Wages and Conditions.

As regards the wages and conditions on which women should be employed, he pointed out that, as a general principle, the Exchanges did not, and could not, take direct responsibility as to the wages and conditions, beyond giving in each case such information as was in their possession. In regard, however, to Government contractors, it had been laid down that the piece rates for women should be the same as for men, and further special instructions had been given to the Exchanges to inform inexperienced applicants of the current wages in each case, so that they should be fully apprised as to the wage that it was reasonable for them to ask. A general safeguard against permanent lowering of wages by the admission of women to take the place of men on service would be made by asking employers, so far as possible, to keep the men's places open for them on their return.

As regards the housing of women moved into a district for work, Mr Runciman stated [illegible] with some of the ladies, it appeared that both Mr Runciman and the delegates asked various questions. The points that were strongly urged by the latter were that in employing women the Government should give a good lead in the matter of just treatment and equal wages. There was also on the part of several who spoke a demand for the formation of an advisory committee to the Government on women's work.

Others pointed out strongly that due safeguards must be forthcoming on the part of the Government as to the scale of wages, the system of giving adequate training to the workers, and due provision as to reasonable facilities for housing women who should take up such work as may be found; this latter, of course, being a very important point as regards the sending of women workers on to the land and into distant places.

At the conclusion of Mr Runciman's speech the ladies were invited to state their case.

Miss Sylvia Pankhurst urged that women should be paid the same rates as men, both as to time and piece work, for unskilled labour, and should also receive the special bonuses. For skilled labour their wages should approximate to those of men. Maintenance of not less than £1 a week should be provided in connection with Government training schemes and schemes subsidised out of public funds. Since the interests of every woman were of vital concern, it was imperative that the Parliamentary franchise should be extended to every woman over 21 years of age.

Long Hours.

Miss Llewellyn Davies spoke of the evils of long hours, and instanced cases of girls employed at a munitions factory working twelve-hour day shifts, with some night shifts in addition. Such employment wore out a woman's capacity, and so did not bear adequate results.

Lady Aberconway asked what proportion of women workers had been taken on in the Government departments since the war began.

Mr Runciman said 600 women were working in the Board of Trade department.

Miss Mary MacArthur remarked that although girls were working eighty-four hours a week at a factory named, there were crowds of women at the gates daily waiting for work. She considered that the statements about the shortage of women labour were thus disproved.

Miss Nina Boyle strongly condemned the regulations and enactments penalising matrimony among Government women employees. She also observed that 600 extra men clerks had been taken on at the War Office to deal with women's allowances—work which could very well be done by women. She also related that at a certain police station in South Wales she had seen a number of strapping young men, all over 6ft in height, working typewriters. Surely they should be at the front, and the work be done by women.

---

hearts." It was surely untrue that in this great crisis there was nothing for women to do but to sit and wait and knit. Women had done magnificent work in the hospitals as doctors and nurses, but there was a great deal more work directly connected with the war for them to do, apart from the domestic work which was essential to the life of the nation.

Army Work for Women.

He was not sure that the Government had done everything they might have done. He was told—it might be inaccurate—that there were 1,000 soldiers engaged in the duties of the army post office. He could not imagine why women should not do that work. Quite a lot of work directly connected with the army which was being done by soldiers might be done by women. The clerks of hospitals were soldiers, and it seemed incredible that when every man was wanted to fight soldiers should be employed making out lists. If the Government would go into the matter and see what part of the military machine might be worked by women they would find that a considerable number of places might be filled by women. As to the extent to which women could replace men in civilian work, it would be necessary to proceed with great caution, so as to avoid disputes which would not add to the military efficiency of the nation, but with tact and goodwill on all sides it would be found that many things now done by men might be done by women.

Women would have no right to complain of the Government if they did not take advantage of the offer to register themselves. It was mainly due to the fact that women had not realised the offer that had been made that the figures of women who had registered so far were disappointing. Only 33,000 had registered. The number of the women of England was about eight or ten millions.

No Use Discussing Peace Terms Yet.

He had been invited on entering the meeting to attend a meeting to discuss the terms of peace. There was no one who did not ardently and earnestly desire peace. He thought that those who were so clamouring to discuss terms of peace were sometimes led to say that all war was wicked, and that this war, though it might have more justification than most, was still a wicked thing. He heartily dissented from that view. Those who believed this war to be just and necessary held that war was necessary because in the world at present there was international anarchy. The machinery which controlled the administration of justice between individuals did not exist as between nations—there was no sovereignty or government of nations. When great injustice was committed or threatened or great danger threatened to a nation she must fight to enforce justice and to protect herself. We were not merely slaughtering men, we were carrying out the dictates of justice and enforcing in the only way it could be enforced the moral law as applied to nations. Until some decision had been reached and victory was assured there could be no useful discussion of the terms of peace. (Applause.) We were false to our trust and to the very conception of international morality when we began to talk of peace before our task was finally accomplished.

When the time came he hoped and believed that women would be heard as much as men in the discussion of the terms of peace. He believed that their influence at that time would be of incalculable value. He was one of those who believed that it was not material force which ultimately counted; spiritual force was what was really powerful. In the spiritual side of life women were certainly in no respect inferior to men. When it came to the final settlement, which all hoped would be such as to remove, if not finally, for generations the fear of such a catastrophe—if the settlement was to be in accordance with the principles of right and justice,—he looked to the women of the country not less than to the men to exert their overwhelming influence on the side of right, justice, mercy, and clemency—but also on the side of justice.

The Globe, April 14th. 1915?

WOMEN WAR WORKERS.

33,000 RESPOND TO GOVERNMENT APPEAL.

WOULD-BE SHELL MAKERS.

Mr. Runciman, President of the Board of Trade, presiding at a conference of women held at the Board of Trade yesterday, said the response up to April 1 to the Government appeal for women war workers was as follows:—

Women registered	Over 33,000
Want to work in armament factories	6,000
In clothing factories	4,000
Clerical workers	5,000
Dairy workers	1,700
Gardeners	500
Other agricultural work	2,000
Shop assistants	1,100
Leather stitchers	500

"There are some experienced women available for nearly all classes of occupations," said Mr. Runciman. "Thus, 1,500 of the applicants stated that they have had previous experience in agriculture. Nearly 4,000 applicants have been previously employed as clerks, and over 1,000 in shops. These applications have all been sifted, and applications for women should be made to the local labour exchanges."

INSUFFICIENT SUPPLY.

Mr. Runciman said the supply of women would certainly be insufficient for the prospective demand which he hoped would be created by increased recruiting. Steps were being taken to increase recruiting and the temporary substitution of women for the men leaving in a number of trades.

It was not intended that the women on the special register should be placed in employment at the expense of the women registered at the exchanges in the ordinary way. The women on the special register would be called on only if there were not sufficient women available on the ordinary labour exchange register of the locality.

"In regard to Government contractors," he said, "it has been laid down that the piece rates for women shall be the same as for men. A general safeguard against permanent lowering of wages by the admission of women to replace men on service will be made by asking employers, so far as possible, to keep the men's places open for them on their return."

HOUSING DIFFICULTY.

Mr. Runciman said the most serious difficulty was the housing question, which was bound to arise when a large number of women were transferred to any particular district. In this connection women's organisations could be of the greatest value to the Government.

He announced that the Government had arranged for a fortnight's training to be given at agricultural colleges to women going in for dairy work. The women receive from Government sources £3 for the fortnight—£1 for fee and £1 a week living allowance. Some have already completed their training and obtained posts.

One of the women delegates, Miss Rathbone, suggested that middle-class workers who registered should be organised into companies, battalions, and regiments.

Complaint was made that women had to work twelve hours a day in armament factories. It was also stated that able-bodied young men, especially in police offices, were employed in such duties as typewriting, which could be done as well by women.

In reply to Lady Aberconway, Mr. Runciman said that in the Board of Trade 600 extra women had been engaged since the war began.

Miss Nina Boyle stated that 600 male typists engaged by the War Office might have been released for the war if women typists had been employed instead.

SOLDIERS' CLERICAL WORK.

"I am not sure that the Government have done everything they might do," said

The Daily Graphic, April 14th. 1915.

33,000 WOMAN WAR WORKERS.

SIX THOUSAND VOLUNTEERS FOR MAKING SHELLS.

OFFICIAL STATEMENT.

Mr. Walter Runciman, receiving a deputation representing sixteen women's societies and trades unions at the Board of Trade last night, informed them that up to March 31st 33,000 women had registered themselves for special war service. He gave the following figures showing the spheres in which they had declared themselves willing to work:—

6,000 in armament factories,
4,000 in clothing factories,
1,700 in dairy work,
500 as gardeners,
2,000 for other agricultural work,
1,100 as shop assistants,
500 as leather workers,
5,000 as clerical or commercial assistants.

Of these, said Mr. Runciman, a very large proportion had had previous experience. He explained that preference would be given to persons registered at the local Labour Exchange in any district where work was available; then to those who were on the local special war service register, and lastly persons from a distance registered in other Labour Exchanges. Conferences had been arranged with representatives interested in the cotton and basket-making industries, but these were more prospective than immediate. One move recently made to meet one of their desires was an instruction to Labour Exchanges to bring to the notice of persons registering the current rates of wages in the district. They had also agreed that in Government contracts the same piece rates should be paid to women as to men, but there was no rule laid down as to time rates.

But, added Mr. Runciman, the most serious difficulty was the housing question, and that was where the women's organisations could be of the greatest value. The work of attending to the proper housing of workmen drafted into various districts could be far better done by them than by Government officials.

Miss Sylvia Pankhurst and Mrs. Drake both spoke strongly on the question of rates of wages, and declared that there was no argument for equality of pay for piece work which did not equally apply to time rates.

663 II/23
66

Mr Runciman said the supply of women would certainly be insufficient for the prospective demand which he hoped would be created by increased recruiting. Steps were being taken to increase recruiting and the temporary substitution of women for the men leaving in a number of trades.

It was not intended that the women on the special register should be placed in employment at the expense of the women registered at the exchanges in the ordinary way. The women on the special register would be called on only if there were not sufficient women available on the ordinary labour exchange register of the locality.

"In regard to Government contractors," he said, "it has been laid down that the piece rates for women shall be the same as for men. A general safeguard against permanent lowering of wages by the admission of women to replace men on service will be made by asking employers, so far as possible, to keep the men's places open for them on their return."

HOUSING DIFFICULTY.

Mr. Runciman said the most serious difficulty was the housing question, which was bound to arise when a large number of women were transferred to any particular district. In this connection women's organisations could be of the greatest value to the Government.

He announced that the Government had arranged for a fortnight's training to be given at agricultural colleges to women going in for dairy work. The women receive from Government sources £3 for the fortnight—£1 for fee and £1 a week living allowance. Some have already completed their training and obtained posts.

One of the women delegates, Miss Rathbone, suggested that middle-class workers who registered should be organised into companies, battalions, and regiments.

Complaint was made that women had to work twelve hours a day in armament factories. It was also stated that able-bodied young men, especially in police offices, were employed in such duties as typewriting, which could be done as well by women.

In reply to Lady Aberconway, Mr. Runciman said that in the Board of Trade 600 extra women had been engaged since the war began.

Miss Nina Boyle stated that 600 male typists engaged by the War Office might have been released for the war if women typists had been employed instead.

SOLDIERS' CLERICAL WORK.

"I am not sure that the Government have done everything they might do," said Lord Robert Cecil yesterday at a meeting of the new Constitutional Society for Woman Suffrage at Knightsbridge.

"I was told the other day—it may be inaccurate—that there are a thousand soldiers now engaged in the duties of the Army Post Office. I cannot imagine why women should not do that work, or a great part of it. I believe there is quite a lot of work directly and intimately connected with the Army which is being done by soldiers, and which might be done just as well by women.

"I have been through a number of hospitals, and have seen soldiers acting as clerks. It seems incredible that soldiers should be employed in making out hospital lists when that work could be done just as well by women as by men."

Mrs. Cecil Chapman, who presided, said that the old Victorian song, "For men must work and women must weep" should now be changed to "For men must fight and women must work."

register, and lastly persons from a distance registered in other Labour Exchanges. Conferences had been arranged with representatives interested in the cotton and basket-making industries, but these were more prospective than immediate. One move recently made to meet one of their desires was an instruction to Labour Exchanges to bring to the notice of persons registering the current rates of wages in the district. They had also agreed that in Government contracts the same piece rates should be paid to women as to men, but there was no rule laid down as to time rates.

But, added Mr. Runciman, the most serious difficulty was the housing question, and that was where the women's organisations could be of the greatest value. The work of attending to the proper housing of workmen drafted into various districts could be far better done by them than by Government officials.

Miss Sylvia Pankhurst and Mrs. Drake both spoke strongly on the question of rates of wages, and declared that there was no argument for equality of pay for piece work which did not equally apply to time rates.

663.
Morning Post. 14.4.15

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

DEPUTATION TO THE BOARD OF TRADE.

STATEMENT BY MR. RUNCIMAN.

A Conference took place at the Board of Trade yesterday between the President of the Board of Trade and representatives of a number of women's organisations.

The following, according to the official report, were the organisations represented, and the names of the representatives: Catholic Women's Suffrage Society, Miss O'Sullivan; Conservative and Unionist Women's Franchise Association, Mrs. Ridley Smith; East London Federation of the Suffragettes, Miss E. Sylvia Pankhurst; Girls' Friendly Society, Miss Lettice Digby; Head Mistresses' Association, Miss Reta Oldham; Liverpool Society, Miss Eleanor F. Rathbone; Local Government Advancement Committee, Mrs. Humphry Ward; National League for Opposing Women's Suffrage, Mrs. Archibald Colquhoun; National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, Mrs. Rackham and Mrs. Deane Streatfeild; Union of Jewish Women, Mrs. Nathaniel L. Cohen; United Suffragists, Miss Barbara Ayrton Gould; "Woman's Dreadnought," Miss Norah L. Smyth; Women's Co-operative Guild, Miss Margaret Llewellyn Davies; Women's Freedom League, Miss C. Nina Boyle and Mrs. K. S. Tanner; Women's Unionist and Tariff Reform Association, Miss E. Goring Thomas; Women Writers' Suffrage League, Mrs. Sarah A. Tooley; Woolwich Branch Women's Co-operative Guild, Mrs. Anna Ross; Y.W.C.A., Miss A. A. Horne and Miss Grace Bristow; and Mrs. Ross Cooper.

Mr. RUNCIMAN, in opening the proceedings, said that up to the beginning of April over 33,000 women had registered themselves on the Special Register of Women for War Service. Among the applications for service for which the women had registered themselves he noted specially the following: Armament workers, 6,000; clothing trades, 4,000; milkmaids and dairy workers, 1,700; gardeners, 500; other agricultural workers, 2,000; shop assistants, 1,100; leather workers, 500; and commercial and clerical, 5,000. Most of those registered were working women of previous experience, though not necessarily in the occupation for which they expressed a preference. There were some experienced women available for nearly all classes of occupations. Thus 1,500 of the applicants stated that they had had previous experience in agriculture. Nearly 4,000 applicants had been previously employed as clerks, and over 1,000 in shops. These applications had all been sifted, and applications for women should be made to the local Labour Exchanges.

SPECIAL REGISTER NECESSARY.

Mr. Runciman then explained that a special register of women was necessary because, although there were considerable numbers of women on the ordinary Labour Exchange register, taking the country as a whole, it did not follow that in any particular district sufficient women were available for the present demand, and the supply would certainly be insufficient for the prospective demand, which he hoped would be created by increased recruiting. Steps were being taken in consultation with the Home Office to increase recruiting, and the temporary substitution of women for the men leaving in a number of trades. The actual work to which many of the women would be called would, of course, depend upon the success of those efforts in particular trades. In any case, it was not intended that the women on the special register should be placed in employment at the expense of the women registered at the Exchanges in the ordinary way. The women on the special register would be called on only if there were not sufficient women available on the ordinary Labour Exchange register of the locality.

WAGES AND HOUSING.

As regards the wages and conditions on which women should be employed, he pointed out that, as a general principle, the Exchanges did not and could not take direct responsibility as to the wages and conditions, beyond giving in each case such information as was in their possession. In regard, however, to Government contractors, it had been laid down that the piece rates for women should be the same as for men, and further special instructions had been given to the Exchanges to inform inexperienced applicants of the current wages in each case, so that they should be fully apprised as to the wage which it was reasonable for them to ask. A general safeguard against permanent lowering of wages by the admission of women to replace men on service would be made by asking employers, so far as possible, to keep the men's places open for them on their return. As regards the housing of women moved into a district for work, Mr. Runciman stated that in certain districts special steps had aleady been taken by the Exchanges by means of local housing committees to find and inspect suitable lodgings for women. The necessity for that provision would probably develop, and in that connection the help of the women's organisations might be most valuable. By arrangement with the Board of Agriculture a certain number of women had already received and others were now receiving short training in some of the Agricultural Colleges. Some of those having completed their training had at once been put in employment. Arrangements for training in other occupations would, he hoped, be made as and when definite need arose.

A discussion followed, and a large number of questions were asked and suggestions put forward. Mr. RUNCIMAN dealt with a number of them, and promised to communicate with the societies further with regard to others, with a view in particular of availing himself of the offers of help made.

LORD R. CECIL ON WOMEN'S INFLUENCE.

Organised by the New Constitutional Society for Women's Suffrage, a largely-attended public meeting was held yesterday afternoon at the Knightsbridge Hotel to hear addresses on "The Nation's Call to Women."

Mrs. CECIL CHAPMAN, who presided, said she thought that there was considerable perplexity in the minds of women as to the direction in which they could use their energies, and that the appeal which had been issued had not been made sufficiently known to women. A splendid opportunity was afforded to women by the present emergency.

Lord ROBERT CECIL, M.P., said that the present position was absolutely unparalleled and that women no less than men were only too anxious to assist. He must honestly say that he was disappointed by the number of women who had registered so far. There were eight or ten million women in England. Surely there were more than 33,000 women able and willing to do war work at this crisis. Why had not more registered? Registration was the first and most obvious thing to do. Material work was not the only work that women could do. It was the spiritual forces that were really powerful. He knew of no great controversy in the world which had been determined by force alone. On the spiritual side of life women were in no respect inferior to men; and when it came to the final settlement, which all hoped and prayed would be such as would remove, if not for ever at any rate for generations, fear of another catastrophe such as that in which we were now engaged, if the settlement was to be permanent and in accordance with the ultimate principles of right and justice, he should look to the women not less than the men of this country to assert their influence, their overwhelming influence, on the side of right and justice, of mercy and clemency. (Cheers.)

FORTHCOMING CONFERENCE.

The scheme for the employment of women will be discussed at a conference organised by the War Emergency Workers' National Committee at the Caxton Hall, Westminster, on Friday. At this conference women's Trade Unionist, Labour, Socialist, Co-operative, Suffrage, and kindred societies will be represented, and there will be delegates from the industries—farm and dairy work, leather stitching, brush-making, clothing machining, and light machining for armaments—in which it is proposed that women should enter. The resolutions to be submitted will urge that where a woman is doing the same work as a man she should receive the same rate of pay, and that the principle of equal pay for equal work should be rigidly maintained; that the advisory committee of workers appointed by the Government should include representatives of organised women workers, and should advise the Board of Trade as to detailed terms and conditions upon which arrangements can be made for the transference of women from one trade or district to another for work formerly done by men; and that women, while desiring to co-operate with the Government in taking what steps may be necessary for the defence of the country, should be given a definite assurance that at the earliest possible moment the long overdue reform of universal suffrage will be dealt with.

The Daily Telegraph,
April 14th. 1915.

WOMEN'S SERVICE FOR THE COUNTRY'S WORK.

33,000 REGISTERED.

MINISTER'S STATEMENT.

DETAILS OF THE OFFER.

Mr Runciman received yesterday evening, at the Board of Trade, a number of ladies representative of the chief organisations of women, who desired to lay before him various matters in connection with the call of the Government upon women for war service. The proceedings were private, but it was understood that there were present with the President of the Board, Mr. G. B. Beveridge and Mr. Ray, of the Labour Exchanges. Some thirty ladies formed the deputation.

In the course of the evening the following official report was issued:

Mr. Runciman, in opening the proceedings, said that up to the beginning of April over 33,000 women had registered themselves on the Special Register of Women for War Service. Among the applications for service for which the women had registered themselves he noted specially the following:

Armament workers	6,000
Clothing trades	4,000
Milkmaids and dairy workers ...	1,700
Gardeners	500
Other agricultural workers	2,000
Shop assistants	1,100
Leather workers	500
Commercial and clerical	5,000

SUPPLY INSUFFICIENT.

Most of those registered were working women of previous experience, though not necessarily in the occupation for which they expressed a preference. There were some experienced women available for nearly all classes of occupations. Thus, 1,500 of the applicants stated that they had had previous experience in agriculture. Nearly 4,000 applicants had been previously employed as clerks, and over 1,000 in shops. These applications had all been sifted, and applications for women should be made to the local Labour Exchanges.

Mr Runciman then explained that a special register of women was necessary because, although there were considerable numbers of women on the ordinary Labour Exchange Register, taking the country as a whole, it did not follow that in any particular district sufficient women were available for the present demand, and the supply would certainly be insufficient for the prospective demand, which he hoped would be created by increased recruiting. Steps were being taken in consultation with the Home Office to increase recruiting, and the temporary substitution of women for the men leaving in a number of trades. The actual work to which many of the women would be called would, of course, depend upon the success of these efforts in particular trades.

In any case, it was not intended that the women on the special register should be placed in employment at the expense of the women registered at the exchanges in the ordinary way. The women on the special register would be called on only if there were not sufficient women available on the ordinary Labour Exchange register of the locality.

REGULATION OF WAGES

As regards the wages and conditions on which women should be employed, he pointed out that, as a general principle, the exchanges did not and could not take direct responsibility as to the wages and conditions beyond giving in each case such information as was in their possession.

In regard, however, to Government contractors, it had been laid down that the piece rates for women should be the same as for men, and, further, special instructions had been given to the exchanges to inform inexperienced applicants of the current wages in each case, so that they should be fully apprised as to the wage which it was reasonable for them to ask. A general safeguard against permanent lowering of wages by the admission of women to replace men on service would be made by asking employers, so far as possible, to keep the men's places open for them on their return

As regards the housing of women moved into a district for work, Mr. Runciman stated that in certain districts special steps had already been taken by the exchanges by means of local housing committees to find and inspect suitable lodgings for women. The necessity for this would probably develop, and in this the help of the women's organisations might be most valuable.

The Daily Chronicle,
April 14th. 1915.

663

663 II/25

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

TRADES, WAGES, AND CONDITIONS

MR. RUNCIMAN'S REPLY TO DEPUTATION.

Replying to a deputation of women representing 18 trade unions, co-operative and suffrage societies, at the Board of Trade last night, Mr. Runciman said that down to the beginning of April 33,000 women had registered themselves on the Special Register of Women for War Service.

Among the trades and callings for which the women have registered themselves he noted specially the following:—

Armament workers	6,000
Clothing trades	4,000
Milkmaids and dairy workers ...	1,700
Gardeners ...	500
Other agricultural workers ...	2,000
Shop assistants ...	1,100
Leather workers	500
Commercial and clerical ...	5,000

Most of those registered are working women of previous experience, though not necessarily in the occupation for which they express a preference.

STEPS TO INCREASE RECRUITING.

There are some experienced women available for nearly all classes of occupations. About 1,500 applicants have had previous experience in agriculture. Nearly 4,000 applicants have been previously employed as clerks, and over 1,000 in shops. These applications have all been sifted, and applications for women should be made to the local Labour Exchanges.

Mr. Runciman explained that a special register of women was necessary because, although there were considerable numbers of women on the ordinary Labour Exchange register, taking the country as a whole, it did not follow that in any particular district enough women were available for the present demand, and the supply would certainly be insufficient for the prospective demand, which he hoped would be created by increased recruiting.

Steps were being taken in consultation with the Home Office to increase recruiting, and the temporary substitution of women for the men leaving in a number of trades. The actual work to which many of the women would be called would depend on the success of these efforts in particular trades.

Women on the Special Register would be called on only if there were not enough women available on the ordinary Labour Exchange register of the locality.

SAME PIECE RATES AS MEN.

As a general principle the Exchanges did not and could not take direct responsibility as to the wages and conditions, beyond giving in each case such information as was in their possession.

With regard to Government contractors, it had been laid down at the piece rates for women should be the same as for men, and further special instructions had been given to the Exchanges to inform inexperienced applicants of the current wages in each case, so that they should know the wage it was reasonable for them to ask.

A general safeguard against permanent lowering of wages by the admission of women to replace men on service would be made by asking employers, so far as possible, to keep the men's places open for them on their return.

As regards the housing of women moved into a district for work, Mr. Runciman stated that in certain districts special steps had already been taken by the Exchanges, by means of local housing committees, to find and inspect suitable lodgings for women. The necessity for this would probably develop, and in this the help of the women's organisations might be most valuable.

By arrangement with the Board of Agriculture a certain number of women had already received, and others were now receiving, short training in some of the agricultural colleges. Some of those having completed their training had been put in employment at once.. Arrangements for training in other occupations would be made as and when definite need arose.

In an informal discussion that followed Mrs. Drake said there was nothing to prevent any employer from taking women on at time rates in trades where piecework was the rule.

Miss Mary Macarthur urged the need of greater care when women were called on to make extra exertions. She knew of cases where women were working 94 hours a week, while there were others outside the factory gate who could not get a job.

Lady Aberconway asked what proportion of extra workers had been taken on in Government departments since the war began.

Mr. Runciman answered that in his own department 600 women typists had been taken on, and Miss Nina Boyle pointed out that the 600 male typists taken on by the War Office might have been released for service if women had been taken on instead.

Mrs. Rackham, a Poor Law guardian, complained that the Government was not giving as clear a lead to the private employer as it should do on the questions of wages and conditions.

Mr. Runciman thanked the deputation for their views, which, he said, embodied many valuable suggestions.

Western Mercury,
April 14th. 1915.

The Ladies Disagree.

There was something like a raid of women on the Board of Trade this afternoon. They commenced to arrive a little before five by taxi, by 'bus, and on foot, and there was an interested little group of the general public to watch the arrivals, who included such well-known suffragists as Miss Macarthur, Miss Bondfield, Miss Boyle, and Miss Pankhurst, and ladies with decidedly other views, including Mrs. Humphrey Ward.

Msr. Fawcett, who was expected to introduce the deputation, was not present, nor was Mrs. Despard.

For nearly two hours Mr. Runciman heard the views of his visitors, and I gather that they covered a pretty wide area. Equal pay for equal work was, of course, the feature of most of the requests. Miss Sylvia Pankhurst, for the East End Suffragettes, put this and other safeguards as a sine qua non of women's co-operation in the Government scheme for mobilising labour, but the representation of the Society for Opposing Woman Suffrage strongly opposed this attitude. She made it clear, she tells me, that in the view of her society women will rally to the help of the State in the present emergency without attempting to impose conditions.

It is unnecessary to add that she joined issue with Miss Pankhurst's plea that women should have votes in return for their services.

The Women's Freedom League wanted all barriers to matrimony removed in the case of woman workers, and the representatives of the National Union of Woman Suffrage Societies, the largest body represented, offered some interesting suggestions on the housing question.

Mr. Runciman testified to the valuable character of some of the suggestions offered, but was unable, of course, to promise anything beyond careful consideration. He suggested, I believe, the possibility of a further conference.

in each case, so that they should be fully apprised as to the wage which it was reasonable for them to ask. A general safeguard against permanent lowering of wages by the admission of women to replace men on service would be made by asking employers, so far as possible, to keep the men's places open for them on their return

As regards the housing of women moved into a district for work, Mr. Runciman stated that in certain districts special steps had already been taken by the exchanges by means of local housing committees to find and inspect suitable lodgings for women. The necessity for this would probably develop, and in this the help of the women's organisations might be most valuable.

By arrangement with the Board of Agriculture a certain number of women had already received and others were now receiving short training in some of the agricultural colleges. Some of those, having completed their training, had at once been put in employment. Arrangements for training in other occupations would, he hoped, be made as and when definite need arose.

A lengthy discussion followed, and a large number of questions were asked and suggestions put forward. Mr. Runciman dealt with a number of these, and promised to communicate with the societies further with regard to others, with a view in particular of availing himself of the offers of help made.

SOCIETIES REPRESENTED.

The following were the organisations represented and the names of the representatives:

Catholic Women's Suffrage Society ..	Miss O'SULLIVAN.
Conservative and Unionist Women's Franchise Association	Mrs. RIDLEY SMITH.
East London Federation of the Suffragettes	Miss E. SYLVIA PANKHURST.
Girls' Friendly Society	Miss LETTICE DIGBY.
Head Mistresses' Association	Miss RETA OLDHAM.
Liverpool Society ...	Miss ELEANOR F. RATHBONE.
Local Government Advancement Committee...	Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD.
National League for Opposing Women's Suffrage	Mrs. ARCHIBALD COLQUHOUN.
National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies	Mrs. RACKHAM. Mrs. DEANE STREATFEILD.
Union of Jewish Women	Mrs. NATHANIEL L. COHEN.
United Suffragists ..	Miss BARBARA AYRTON GOULD.
"Woman's Dreadnought" ...	Miss NORAH L. SMYTH.
Women's Co-operative Guild	Miss M. LLEWELLYN DAVIES.
Women's Freedom League	Miss C. NINA BOYLE. Mrs. K. S. TANNER.
Women's Unionist and Tariff Reform Association...	Miss F. GORING THOMAS.
Women Writers' Suffrage League... ...	Mrs. SARAH A. TOOLEY.
Woolwich Branch Women's Co-operative Guild	Mrs. ANNA ROSS.
Y.W.C.A.	Miss A. A. HORNE. Miss GRACE BRISTOW. Mrs. ROSS COOPER.

EQUAL WAGES.

SAFEGUARDS DEMANDED.

BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

Apparently the list of women's representatives present at the conference issued by the Board of Trade last night is incomplete, for there were present, in addition to the ladies mentioned, Miss Mary Macarthur, of the Women's Trades Union League; Mrs. Creighton, of the National Union of Women Workers; Miss Margaret Bondfield, of the Shop Assistants' Union; Lady Aberconway, Lady Barlow, Mrs. Cavendish-Bentinck, Mrs. Drake, and others. Mrs. Fawcett was to have been the first speaker, but in her absence the deputation was not formally introduced.

From subsequent conversation with some of the ladies, it appeared that both Mr. Runciman and the delegates asked various questions. The points that were strongly urged by the latter were that in employing women the Government should give a good lead in the matter of just treatment and equal wages. There was also on the part of several who spoke a demand for the formation of an advisory committee to the Government on women's work. Others pointed out strongly that due safeguards must be forthcoming on the part of the Government as to the scale of wages, the system of giving adequate training to the workers, and due provision as to reasonable facilities for housing women who should take up such work as may be found; this latter, of course, being a very important point as regards the sending of women workers on to the land and into distant places.

Mr. Runciman expressed his thanks to the various speakers for the many valuable suggestions that had been put forward, and added that if he deemed it desirable he would ask them to attend again for further conference and discussion.

P.T.O.

The Daily Telegraph,
April 14th. 1915.

In amplification of the official summary of Mr. Runciman's speech, printed above, it may be stated that the right hon. gentleman mentioned that though the Board of Trade had tried to keep the Labour Exchange register separate from the special registers, about 2,000 names overlapped. In apportioning Government employment to women, the authorities proposed to adopt the following order of priority:

1. Local people registering at local Labour Exchanges.
2. Local people registering on the local war registers
3. Those who come from a distance to register.

Conferences had already been arranged in the cotton and biscuit-making trades, but he wished it to be understood that the employment of women in those occupations was more prospective than immediate. During the fortnight's training which the Government had arranged at agricultural colleges for dairy work—believing that that would be quite long enough training for the work the women would be called upon to do—the women would receive £1 a week for maintenance.

SERIES OF SUGGESTIONS.

At the conclusion of Mr. Runciman's speech the ladies were invited to state their case.

After Mrs. Drake had spoken,

Miss Sylvia Pankhurst urged that women should be paid the same rates as men, both as to time and piece work, for unskilled labour, and should also receive the special bonuses. For skilled labour their wages should approximate to those of men. Maintenance of not less than £1 a week should be provided in connection with Government training schemes and schemes subsidised out of public funds. In any readjustment of staffs after the war priority of employment should be given to the worker who had dependents, and the Government should make itself responsible for the maintenance of the workers displaced after the war until suitable work at an adequate wage had been found for them. Any advisory committee to work with the authorities should include representatives of organised women workers, who should also be appointed to any arbitration court that might be set up. A sole arbitrator appointed in a matter which primarily concerned women's labour should be a woman. Since the interests of every woman were of vital concern, it was imperative that the Parliamentary franchise should be extended to every woman over 21 years of age.

LONG HOURS FOR GIRLS.

Mrs. Rackham complained that the Government were not giving as clear a lead as they might to private employers on the questions of employment, wages, and conditions as applying to women.

Miss Llewellyn Davies spoke of the evils of long hours, and instanced cases of girls employed at a munitions factory working twelve-hour day shifts, with some night shifts in addition. Such employment wore out a woman's capacity, and so did not bear adequate results.

Lady Aberconway asked what proportion of women workers had been taken on in the Government departments since the war began.

Mr. Runciman said 600 women were working in the Board of Trade department.

WORKLESS WOMEN.

Miss Mary Macarthur remarked that although girls were working eighty-four hours a week at the factory named by Miss Davies, there were crowds of women at the gates daily waiting for work. She considered that the statements about a shortage of women labour were thus disproved.

Mrs. Tanner pointed out that as a large number of men whose places were being taken by women would not return, it was inevitable that some of the women should remain permanently, and that it behoved the Government to take timely steps to deal with such a situation.

PENALISING MATRIMONY.

Miss Nina Boyle strongly condemned the regulations and enactments penalising matrimony among Government women employés. She also observed that 600 extra men clerks had been taken on at the War Office to deal with women's allowances—work which could very well be done by women. She also related that at a certain police-station in South Wales she had seen a number of strapping young men, all over 6ft in height, working typewriters. Surely they should be at the front, and the work be done by women.

Miss Rathbone suggested the organisation of middle-class women workers in regiments and detachments, and the establishment of women's recruiting stations, and the display of recruiting posters for women. In her opinion the response to the appeal for registration had not been adequate. A great many women, she feared, were holding back for fear they would injure the men in their employment, or that they would be sweated.

FROM PILLAR TO POST.

Miss Oldham wanted to know where all the wonderful training of women workers was going on, and urged that the demand for long-shift working put many women out of court.

Miss Margaret Bondfield told a story of a woman register of women willing to help, and it was the duty of every woman who had time and energy at her disposal to register. He had seen that morning that 33,000 had registered; but what was 33,000 when there must be 8,000,000 or 10,000,000 women in this country?

Women of the leisured class had done admirable and devoted service, often leaving it to others to settle what work would be most useful to the cause we all had at heart. Their devotion had been beyond praise; and he believed that in the great national experiment it would be found that the leisured women would be most ready to sacrifice their leisure.

WOMAN AND THE TERMS OF PEACE.

He had spoken of material work; but that was not the only thing that women could do. Until peace was assured there could be no useful discussion of the terms of peace; but when the time came to discuss them he for one hoped and believed women would be heard as much as men. It was spiritual force that was really powerful, and he looked to the women of this country to exercise their overwhelming influence on the side of mercy and clemency, but no less on the side of justice. (Cheers.)

The Rev. Lewis Donaldson said he looked upon the Government's appeal as the Magna Carta of the liberties of women. Not as anti-Suffragists could any Government survive after issuing such an appeal.

663

The Daily Chronicle,
April 14th. 1915.

663 II/25

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

TRADES, WAGES, AND CONDITIONS.

MR. RUNCIMAN'S REPLY TO DEPUTATION.

Replying to a deputation of women representing 18 trade unions, co-operative and suffrage societies, at the Board of Trade last night, Mr. Runciman said that down to the beginning of April 33,000 women had registered themselves on the Special Register of Women for War Service.

Among the trades and callings for which the women have registered themselves he noted specially the following:—

Armament workers	6,000
Clothing trades	4,000
Milkmaids and dairy workers	1,700
Gardeners	500
Other agricultural workers	2,000
Shop assistants	1,100
Leather workers	500
Commercial and clerical	5,000

Most of those registered are working women of previous experience, though not necessarily in the occupation for which they express a preference.

STEPS TO INCREASE RECRUITING.

There are some experienced women available for nearly all classes of occupations. About 1,500 applicants have had previous experience in agriculture. Nearly 4,000 applicants have been previously employed as clerks, and over 1,000 in shops. These applications have all been sifted, and applications for women should be made to the local Labour Exchanges.

Mr. Runciman explained that a special register of women was necessary because, although there were considerable numbers of women on the ordinary Labour Exchange register, taking the country as a whole, it did not follow that in any particular district enough women were available for the present demand, and the supply would certainly be insufficient for the prospective demand, which he hoped would be created by increased recruiting.

Steps were being taken in consultation with the Home Office to increase recruiting, and the temporary substitution of women for the men leaving in a number of trades. The actual work to which many of the women would be called would depend on the success of these efforts in particular trades.

Women on the Special Register would be called on only if there were not enough women available on the ordinary Labour Exchange register of the locality.

SAME PIECE RATES AS MEN.

As a general principle the Exchanges did not and could not take direct responsibility as to the wages and conditions, beyond giving in each case such information as was in their possession.

With regard to Government contractors, it had been laid down at the piece rates for women should be the same as for men, and further special instructions had been given to the Exchanges to inform inexperienced applicants of the current wages in each case, so that they should know the wage it was reasonable for them to ask.

A general safeguard against permanent lowering of wages by the admission of women to replace men on service would be made by asking employers, so far as possible, to keep the men's places open for them on their return.

As regards the housing of women moved into a district for work, Mr. Runciman stated that in certain districts special steps had already been taken by the Exchanges, by means of local housing committees, to find and inspect suitable lodgings for women. The necessity for this would probably develop, and in this the help of the women's organisations might be most valuable.

By arrangement with the Board of Agriculture a certain number of women had already received, and others were now receiving, short training in some of the agricultural colleges. Some of those having completed their training had been put in employment at once.. Arrangements for training in other occupations would be made as and when definite need arose.

In an informal discussion that followed Mrs. Drake said there was nothing to prevent any employer from taking women on at time rates in trades where piecework was the rule.

Miss Mary Macarthur urged the need of greater care when women were called on to make extra exertions. She knew of cases where women were working 94 hours a week, while there were others outside the factory gate who could not get a job.

Lady Aberconway asked what proportion of extra workers had been taken on in Government departments since the war began.

Mr. Runciman answered that in his own department 600 women typists had been taken on, and Miss Nina Boyle pointed out that the 600 male typists taken on by the War Office might have been released for service if women had been taken on instead.

Mrs. Rackham, a Poor Law guardian, complained that the Government was not giving as clear a lead to the private employer as it should do on the questions of wages and conditions.

Mr. Runciman thanked the deputation for their views, which, he said, embodied many valuable suggestions.

Western Mercury,
April 14th. 1915.

The Ladies Disagree.

There was something like a raid of women on the Board of Trade this afternoon. They commenced to arrive a little before five by taxi, by 'bus, and on foot, and there was an interested little group of the general public to watch the arrivals, who included such well-known suffragists as Miss Macarthur, Miss Bondfield, Miss Boyle, and Miss Pankhurst, and ladies with decidedly other views, including Mrs. Humphrey Ward.

Msr. Fawcett, who was expected to introduce the deputation, was not present, nor was Mrs. Despard.

For nearly two hours Mr. Runciman heard the views of his visitors, and I gather that they covered a pretty wide area. Equal pay for equal work was, of course, the feature of most of the requests. Miss Sylvia Pankhurst, for the East End Suffragettes, put this and other safeguards as a sine qua non of women's co-operation in the Government scheme for mobilising labour, but the representation of the Society for Opposing Woman Suffrage strongly opposed this attitude. She made it clear, she tells me, that in the view of her society women will rally to the help of the State in the present emergency without attempting to impose conditions.

It is unnecessary to add that she joined issue with Miss Pankhurst's plea that women should have votes in return for their services.

The Women's Freedom League wanted all barriers to matrimony removed in the case of woman workers, and the representatives of the National Union of Woman Suffrage Societies, the largest body represented, offered some interesting suggestions on the housing question.

Mr. Runciman testified to the valuable character of some of the suggestions offered, but was unable, of course, to promise anything beyond careful consideration. He suggested, I believe, the possibility of a further conference.

men, all over 6ft in height, working typewriters. Surely they should be at the front, and the work be done by women.

Miss RATHBONE suggested the organisation of middle-class women workers in regiments and detachments, and the establishment of women's recruiting stations, and the display of recruiting posters for women. In her opinion the response to the appeal for registration had not been adequate. A great many women, she feared, were holding back for fear they would injure the men in their employment, or that they would be sweated.

FROM PILLAR TO POST.

Miss OLDHAM wanted to know where all the wonderful training of women workers was going on, and urged that the demand for long-shift working put many women out of court.

Miss MARGARET BONDFIELD told a story of a woman having been sent from one Labour Exchange to another, only to find when she applied for a situation that sixty other women had been interviewed before her.

There were several other speakers.

Mr. RUNCIMAN thanked the deputation, and said their suggestions would receive the careful consideration of the Government.

UNIONS AND THE UNSKILLED.

Our Blyth Correspondent telegraphs: The agreement which has just been accepted by the members of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers providing for the employment of females and semi-skilled men in the production of shells and fuses for military and naval uses, is a unique trade-union document. It contains the following among other clauses:

Operations on which skilled men are at present employed, but which, by reason of their character, can be performed by semi-skilled or female labour, may be done by such during the war period. Where semi-skilled or female labour is employed in place of skilled labour, the rates paid should be the usual rates of the district obtaining for the operations performed.

Any federated employer shall at the conclusion of the war, unless the Government notify that the emergency continues, reinstate the working conditions of his factory on the pre-war basis, and as far as possible afford re-employment to his men at present serving with his Majesty's Forces.

These proposals shall not warrant any employer in making such arrangements as will effect a permanent restriction of employment in favour of semi-skilled men or female labour. Semi-skilled or female labour shall first be affected by any discharges either before or after the war period. The employers agree to take all possible steps to ensure the distribution of Government work throughout the kingdom.

THE NATION'S CALL.

A GREAT DEAL TO BE DONE.

For the purpose of hearing addresses on "The Nation's Call to Women" a meeting of the New Constitutional Society for Women's Suffrage was held yesterday afternoon at the Knightsbridge Hotel. Mrs. Cecil Chapman presided, and the speakers were Lord Robert Cecil, M.P., and the Rev. Lewis Donaldson.

In spite of the appeal which had been issued by the Government, there was, Mrs. CHAPMAN said, a good deal of perplexity in the minds of women as to what they could do. We had to look forward to a shortage of 200,000 agricultural labourers, and altogether this was a splendid opportunity for women to show that they were capable of rising to a great emergency.

Lord ROBERT CECIL, M.P., expressed his agreement with the chairman as to the need of doing more to bring the Government's appeal to the knowledge of women. From his own personal experience he knew that there were a very large number scattered about the country who were most anxious to find some outlet for their energies. He was connected with a branch of the Red Cross Society which was doing its best to assist the relatives of those wounded in action, and among the letters they had received was one from a woman, who wrote, "There is nothing to do but sit and wait and knit, and it almost breaks our hearts." That was surely untrue. Women had already done magnificent work, especially in the hospitals, but he was sure that there was a great deal more that they might be asked to do directly in connection with the war.

SOLDIERS DOING CIVILIAN WORK.

He was not sure that the Government had done all they might. (Cheers.) He was told the other day—he hoped it was not true—that there were 1,000 soldiers engaged in the work of the Army post-office, and he could not imagine why women should not do that work. There was a lot of other work indirectly connected with the war done by soldiers which might well be done by civilians or women. He remembered going to a hospital and seeing that the clerks were soldiers.

Then there was the question as to how far women could replace men in ordinary civilian work. The Government had made a great effort by starting a

The Daily Citizen,
April 15th. 1915.

WAR SERVICE AND FAIR WAGES.

Proceedings in the House of Commons yesterday were almost formal. Nothing was said about the Government's proposals for dealing with the drinking problem. There was a meeting of the Cabinet before the House assembled, and at this, it is asserted, the scheme was again considered. A vast amount of discussion has been carried on. Most of it, however, has been in the nature of "kite-flying." By contrast with the sweeping suggestions which have been advanced, ranging over the whole distance between the opposite poles of prohibition and State monopoly, the Government scheme, when it is forthcoming, will, no doubt, appear very modest. The "kite-flying" will have served its purpose.

The fact appears to be, as we have already stated it, that the scheme will be concerned chiefly with spirits. Meanwhile, until the scheme is forthcoming, little profit is to be derived from further discussion. We turn, therefore, to a question of at least equal importance, and one that at any rate is definite. A conference by the Workers' War Emergency Committee is to be held to-morrow to deal with war service for women. Mr. Runciman has taken the opportunity in the interim of consulting with representativees of various women's organisations. At that interview figures were produced of the women who have registered themselves for "war service" in response to the appeal jointly sent out by the Board of Trade and the Board of Agriculture, but, as it has since transpired, at the instance, to begin with, of the latter body. Further, at that interview, though the fact does not appear in the officially edited statement, information asked for concerning the demand for women's services on the part of employers apparently could not be supplied. While some 88,000 women, it would seem, have registered themselves for "war service" in various capacities, how many are wanted for service, in what capacities and where? is a field of inquiry that the Board of Trade does not appear to have covered. This is a singular omission. At the consultation both Miss Mary Macarthur and Miss Margaret Bondfield zrought forward facts which, to say the least of it, threw serious doubts on the alleged shortage of women's labour. Miss Mary Macarthur and Miss Bondfield were of those present the best entitled to speak with knowledge of what the industrial position as it affects women really is. Their names, and the important national organisations they represent, were left out of the published official list of those who attended. Indeed, there is no mention that women's trade unions were represented at all.

This, again, is singular, and, if not accidental, suggests a hostility to trade unions that cannot be considered fortunate, though it is quite in keeping with the muddling policy of the Board of Trade, which during the past few months has assuredly not suggested that we are any nearer to the millenium of official competence. The only effect of Mr. Runciman's consultation will be to give to-morrow's conference added point, and to confirm the view tha the "war service" appeal was inspired at bottom by a wish to supply farmers with work at a cheap rate. The appeal is to be deprecated for two reasons. First, so far as work on actual war supplies is concerned, the Board of Trade have been unable to show there is any shortage. Secondly, proofs are forthcoming that the shortage of agricultural labour is due to unjust wages.

Writing in the Times, the agricultural expert who wrote the "Pilgrimage of Farming" states that present and prospective farming profits justify an all-round increase in rural wages of

663 II/26 663.

The New Witness, April 15th 1915.

MRS. FAWCETT, who for so many years has represented the saner element in the Suffrage movement, is heading a deputation of women's societies to Mr. Runciman at the Board of Trade with a view to extending the facilities in war work open to women, and to demand equal standard rates of pay with men and the repeal of every regulation or enactment penalising matrimony among government employees. We have every sympathy with this demand for equal wages for women with men, and for this reason. The advantage of the employment of women to the capitalist lies in their cheapness. If an employer is obliged to pay the same wages to female as to male employees it obviously ceases to be an economic advantage to him, and of the two he will prefer male labour as more capable of prolonged effort. The employment of women in war works at reduced rates tends to decrease the demand for male labour, and at the end of the war men of the labouring classes who have enlisted in the army may return to find their places occupied by women. The establishment of equal wages renders this contingency remote. Let women be paid the same rate as men in the manufacture of munitions of war, then we may be certain that the end of the war will secure the return of the man to his job, and the release of woman from employment obviously unfitted to her sex. We are opposed to the abolition of government regulations forbidding the employment of married women on the ground that it must tend to increase the rate of infant mortality and to lower the standard of women's health; it being clearly impossible that a woman can perform the functions of motherhood and at the same time work in a factory, an office or a shop.

Aberdeen Evg. Express
April 15th. 1915.

WOMEN'S EMPLOYMENT.

OVER 350 REGISTERED AT ABERDEEN.

FORTHCOMING ACTION.

The register of women who have volunteered to undertake work being performed at present by men, with the object of releasing the latter for military service, has been signed, at the Aberdeen Labour Exchange, by fully 350 individuals, and women are enrolling, on an average, at the rate of from 50 to 100 per week. As has already been mentioned, all classes of society are represented among the applicants, who include a large number of women who have never worked for a living, and some who are unemployed and in needy circumstances. The occupations chiefly favoured are clerical work, dairy and farm employment, and service in ammunition factories.

Eager to "'List."

In addition to personal calls, there have been numerous applications by post. In a number of cases women in the country districts have been ready, and even insistently eager, to shoulder a rifle. Others have expressed the hope that the undertaking of the men's work will be a step in the direction of their being allowed themselves to take their place with the soldiers in the fighting line.

A big organised attempt is to be made all over the country to induce employers to release for military service every man who can be spared.

Glasgow Herald
April 15th. 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

LABOUR IN COTTON MILLS.

The Home Office began in Manchester yesterday an important series of conferences with the object of extending women labour in the cotton mills and relieving men for active service and for making munitions of war.

The day was spent in conference with card-room workers. Representatives of other trade unions will be met later, and finally there will be a joint conference between representative bodies of employers and workmen. The proportion of women workers in carding and weaving departments is already large.

THE LONDON CONFERENCE.

With reference to the conference on war service for women held at the Board of Trade on Tuesday, the Board of Trade announce that, in addition to the organisations mentioned in the notice already published, the following were represented:—

The Mothers' Union—Dowager Countess of Chichester; National Union of Women Workers—Mrs Creighton and the Hon. Lily Montagu; Women's Liberal Federation—Lady Abercon-way and Mrs Reid; Women's Trade Union League—Miss Mary MacArthur and Miss Margaret G. Bondfield.

Government scheme, when it is forthcoming, will, no doubt, appear very modest. The "kite-flying" will have served its purpose.

The fact appears to be, as we have already stated it, that the scheme will be concerned chiefly with spirits. Meanwhile, until the scheme is forthcoming, little profit is to be derived from further discussion. We turn, therefore, to a question of at least equal importance, and one that at any rate is definite. A conference by the Workers' War Emergency Committee is to be held to-morrow to deal with war service for women. Mr. Runciman has taken the opportunity in the interim of consulting with representativees of various women's organisations. At that interview figures were produced of the women who have registered themselves for "war service" in response to the appeal jointly sent out by the Board of Trade and the Board of Agriculture, but, as it has since transpired, at the instance, to begin with, of the latter body. Further, at that interview, though the fact does not appear in the officially edited statement, information asked for concerning the demand for women's services on the part of employers apparently could not be supplied. While some 88,000 women, it would seem, have registered themselves for "war service" in various capacities, how many are wanted for service, in what capacities and where? is a field of inquiry that the Board of Trade does not appear to have covered. This is a singular omission. At the consultation both Miss Mary Macarthur and Miss Margaret Bondfield zrought forward facts which, to say the least of it, threw serious doubts on the alleged shortage of women's labour. Miss Mary Macarthur and Miss Bondfield were of those present the best entitled to speak with knowledge of what the industrial position as it affects women really is. Their names, and the important national organisations they represent, were left out of the published official list of those who attended. Indeed, there is no mention that women's trade unions were represented at all.

This, again, is singular, and, if not accidental, suggests a hostility to trade unions that cannot be considered fortunate, though it is quite in keeping with the muddling policy of the Board of Trade, which during the past few months has assuredly not suggested that we are any nearer to the millenium of official competence. The only effect of Mr. Runciman's consultation will be to give to-morrow's conference added point, and to confirm the view tha the "war service" appeal was inspired at bottom by a wish to supply farmers with work at a cheap rate. The appeal is to be deprecated for two reasons. First, so far as work on actual war supplies is concerned, the Board of Trade have been unable to show there is any shortage. Secondly, proofs are forthcoming that the shortage of agricultural labour is due to unjust wages.

Writing in the Times, the agricultural expert who wrote the "Pilgrimage of Farming" states that present and prospective farming profits justify an all-round increase in rural wages of 5s. a week; that farmers are well aware of it, but, rather than pay a fair wage, many of them prefer, through obstinacy, to let their establishments decline. In the opinion of this authority the 80,000 men who have gone into the Army off the farms will never go back at the old wages and under the old conditions, nor can the existing shortage, estimated at from 10 to 12 per cent., be made up unless and until wages are raised and conditions altered. It is not in these circumstances the business of any Minister to use the machinery of his Department for helping farmers to go on paying unjust wages by employing women at any rates they choose to fix. It is merely helping to perpetuate one of the worst of national iniquities. Organised workers will line up solidly to defeat such an effort. If women are to be employed on farms they must be paid rates which will not assist to cheat the rural labourer.

labour as more capable of prolonged effort. The employment of women in war works at reduced rates tends to decrease the demand for male labour, and at the end of the war men of the labouring classes who have enlisted in the army may return to find their places occupied by women. The establishment of equal wages renders this contingency remote. Let women be paid the same rate as men in the manufacture of munitions of war, then we may be certain that the end of the war will secure the return of the man to his job, and the release of woman from employment obviously unfitted to her sex. We are opposed to the abolition of government regulations forbidding the employment of married women on the ground that it must tend to increase the rate of infant mortality and to lower the standard of women's health; it being clearly impossible that a woman can perform the functions of motherhood and at the same time work in a factory, an office or a shop.

Aberdeen Evg. Express
April 15th. 1915.

WOMEN'S EMPLOYMENT.

OVER 350 REGISTERED AT ABERDEEN.

FORTHCOMING ACTION.

The register of women who have volunteered to undertake work being performed at present by men, with the object of releasing the latter for military service, has been signed, at the Aberdeen Labour Exchange, by fully 350 individuals, and women are enrolling, on an average, at the rate of from 50 to 100 per week. As has already been mentioned, all classes of society are represented among the applicants, who include a large number of women who have never worked for a living, and some who are unemployed and in needy circumstances. The occupations chiefly favoured are clerical work, dairy and farm employment, and service in ammunition factories.

Eager to "'List."

In addition to personal calls, there have been numerous applications by post. In a number of cases women in the country districts have been ready, and even insistently eager, to shoulder a rifle. Others have expressed the hope that the undertaking of the men's work will be a step in the direction of their being allowed themselves to take their place with the soldiers in the fighting line.

A big organised attempt is to be made all over the country to induce employers to release for military service every man who can be spared.

Glasgow Herald
April 15th. 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

LABOUR IN COTTON MILLS.

The Home Office began in Manchester yesterday an important series of conferences with the object of extending women labour in the cotton mills and relieving men for active service and for making munitions of war.

The day was spent in conference with card-room workers. Representatives of other trade unions will be met later, and finally there will be a joint conference between representative bodies of employers and workmen. The proportion of women workers in carding and weaving departments is already large.

THE LONDON CONFERENCE.

With reference to the conference on war service for women held at the Board of Trade on Tuesday, the Board of Trade announce that, in addition to the organisations mentioned in the notice already published, the following were represented:—

The Mothers' Union—Dowager Countess of Chichester; National Union of Women Workers—Mrs Creighton and the Hon. Lily Montagu; Women's Liberal Federation—Lady Aberconway and Mrs Reid; Women's Trade Union League—Miss Mary MacArthur and Miss Margaret G. Bondfield.

The Daily Telegraph, April 15th. 1915. 663/11/27 663.

WOMEN'S SERVICE FOR THE COUNTRY'S WORK.

TO-DAY'S CONFERENCE.

SOME OFFICIAL FIGURES.

To-day the question of employing women for war service, which on Tuesday formed the subject of a deputation to Mr. Runciman from representatives of the chief organisations of women, will again be brought prominently forward at the conference of women's trade unionist, Labour, Socialist, co-operative, Suffrage, and kindred societies, summoned by the Workers' National Committee. The conference takes place at Caxton Hall, Westminster.

Trade unions which include both men and women in their membership, in addition to the unions catering solely for women, are to be represented. The industries in respect of which women's aid is sought are those of farm and dairy work, leather stitchery, brush-making, clothing machining, and light machining for armaments. The conference is one of the most important that have been called together in this country to discuss the position of women in relation to employment, whether for war or otherwise.

According to the last census the number of women and girls of 10 years and upwards was as follows:

Engaged in occupations ...	4,830,734
Retired or unoccupied ...	10,026,379

Of these 6,862,025 were unmarried, 6,630,284 married, and 1,364,804 widowed; and of the unmarried 3,122,493 were classified as "unoccupied."

As many as 10,243 girls between the ages of 10 and 13, and no fewer than 39,033 between the ages of 13 and 14 were returned as "engaged in occupations."

VARIED OCCUPATIONS.

As regards commercial occupations, 4,301 women were returned under the heading of merchants, agents, and accountants. There were also 5,489 women engaged in banking and insurance. Female commercial and business clerks numbered 117,057. Ordinary indoor domestic service gave employment to 1,271,990, and, in addition, 63,868 were engaged in hotels and in lodging and eating-houses. Female domestic outdoor workers included one groom and 103 gardeners.

Other women workers enumerated included 25 farm bailiffs, 6 shepherds, 140 builders, 166 painters and decorators, 127,115 tailors, 66,578 milliners, 339,240 dressmakers, 10,271 milksellers and dairyworkers, 11,881 butchers, 66,242 bakers and confectioners, 53,638 grocers, 91,352 boarding and lodging-house keepers, 56,043 hotel keepers and publicans, 2,571 pawnbrokers, and 126,061 charwomen.

The total of 33,000, who, as stated by Mr. Runciman, have enrolled themselves on the special register of women for war service, would seem to be very small in proportion to the eight or ten million women in this country who are of an active age.

This 33,000, however, does not accurately represent the number of women seeking employment in some form who could, presumably, be "turned on" to war service to release men for the Army if required.

The Board of Trade returns show that for the four weeks ended Feb. 12, 1915, there were in the uninsured trades 31,090 women on the ordinary register, for whom 19,952 places were provided, and 7,353 girls for whom employment was found.

In this connection it should be recalled that the Workers' (War Emergency) National Committee of the Labour party, after considering the Government's call to women, framed a resolution pointing out that "there are still 60,000 men and boys, and 40,000 women and girls on the live register of the Labour Exchanges for whom the Board of Trade has so far failed to find situations, or provide training, whilst many thousands more are working short time." Mr. Runciman, it is to be noted, made no reference (according to the official report) to this statement, which, it is understood, is to be made the matter of further comment at to-day's conference.

PRINCIPAL RESOLUTIONS.

Miss Mary Macarthur is to preside at to-day's conference, and the following are two of the principal resolutions:

That this conference, representing the women's trade union, Labour, Socialist, co-operative, Suffrage, an dkindred organisations, declares that as it is imperative in the interests of the highest patriotism no emergency action should be allowed unnecessarily to depress the standard of living of the workers or the standard of working conditions, adequate safeguards must be laid down for any necessary transference or substitution of labour, and it therefore urges:

(a) That all women who register for war service should immediately join the appropriate trade union in the trade for which she is volunteering service and that membership of such organisation should be the condition of her employment for war service;

(b) That where a woman is doing the same work as a man she should receive the same rate of pay, and that the principle of equal pay for equal work should be rigidly maintained;

(c) That in no case should any woman be drafted from the war register to employment at less than an adequate living wage, and that the stereotyping of sweated conditions must at all costs be avoided:

(d) That adequate training with maintenance should be provided for suitable women whom it is proposed to place in employment under the foregoing conditions, and that in choosing candidates for such training preference should be given, where suitability is equal, to the normal woman wage-earner now unemployed.

(e) That in any readjustment of staffs which may have to be effected after the war priority of employment shall be given to workmen whose places have been filled by women.

That this conference demands that the Advisory Committee of Workers appointed by the Government for facilitating the carrying out of the proposals for the acceleration of output on Government work should include representatives of organised women workers; this Committee should advise the Board of Trade as to detailed terms and conditions upon which arrangements can be made for the transference of women from one trade or district to another for work formerly done by men, and that before giving such advice the Advisory Committee shall consult the organised representatives of the trade or section of trade concerned, so that any action may be taken in the closest co-operation with the trade union interested.

WORK ON THE RAILWAY.

Meantime, and whilst municipal authorities in some parts of the country are seriously considering the question of employing women as tram conductors, certain of the great railway companies having termini in London have cut the gordian knot, so to speak, and have already installed women as ticket collectors, carriage-sweepers, and even as porters.

Some months have elapsed since the Great Central Railway Company first introduced women cleaners into the carriage sheds connected with the Marylebone terminus. Their number is now probably between thirty and forty. More recently, however, several additional women—probably half a dozen in all—have been engaged on carriage-cleaning duties in Marylebone Station itself. The official badge of their occupation is a brassard worn on the left arm; the implements of their trade are their broom and their dust-box.

At first, naturally, they drew upon themselves a good deal of attention, as they raided carriage after carriage, in pursuit of dust and litter; but now they seem to be accepted as part of the recognised order of things within the station precincts. Even the two women porters have almost ceased to excite notice. They ply their calling very unobtrusively, and they are, of course, spared the heaviest work.

At Paddington, on the other hand, there may be seen any day on certain of the local platforms a little group of young women doing duty industriously as ticket collectors. There are four of them so far, all dressed quite simply, with nothing to distinguish them from the ordinary young woman passenger, beyond the brassard carrying the initials "G.W.R." over the words "Ticket Collector," which they display on their left arm. [illegible]s badge, and a pair of checking-pliers, constitute their insignia of office. It was only last week that they entered upon their duties, to which they themselves, no less than the passengers with whom they deal, seem to have taken quite kindly.

The Liverpool Post, April 16th. 1915.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

APPEAL FOR REGISTRATION OF AVAILABLE WORKERS.

"Any woman who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service, and every woman should register who is able and willing to take employment."

This phrase appears in the Board of Trade circular in regard to war service for women, and with a view to furthering the Board's object a public meeting was held yesterday afternoon at the Wallasey Town Hall, the Mayor (Alderman Swanwick) presiding over a crowded attendance.

Miss Knowles, organising officer for women's work for the North-Western Division, said the object of the Board of Trade was to secure a census of women who could release more men for active service should the necessity arise. This was not a movement to obtain cheap female labour. She appealed to the leisured classes to register themselves on patriotic grounds, and also to married women and others who had a trade at their finger ends, but who no longer worked at it. Women workers were much required in ammunition factories for filling shells, and so on. She knew of one firm which could employ 1,500 women now, 1,000 more in May, and 2,000 more in August if the war continued. They were also wanted to release men in clothing factories, in agricultural and dairy work, for clerical work, as shop assistants, and for light duties on the railways. Preliminary training for these various employments would, of course, be necessary, for women were not conceited enough to suppose they could at once step into the places of the men. There was no intention to displace the men on their return from the war, and it was being made clear that the employment offered was emergency work only. So far, the result had been distinctly disappointing, as only 33,000 women had registered throughout the whole country. It could only be that the scheme was not properly understood, and she wished to make it clear that this was war service work and was not compulsory service.

Miss M'Adam, of the University School of Social Science, who attended in place of Miss Eleanor Rathbone, who was detained in London, remarked that there were many thousands of women in the country who felt that there was no outlet for them. There was now, however, for the first time in history, an appeal from the Government for women to come forward and help. Women who were not strong enough to work full time could register as half-timers. The Government wished to know how many women were available in an emergency, and it would be a great aid to recruiting if the women were ready to take the places of the men if those who were still working were required on active service. Our women should show that if the worst came to the worst they were ready to offer themselves for the service of the country, and she appealed to all employers to give to women all the work it was possible for women to do. She proposed the formation of a committee to carry on the work of organisation.

Alderman T. Raffles Bulley, in seconding, said he did not believe that the women, when the way was pointed out to them, would be less willing to help than the men had been and he hoped the women of the district would register themselves in great numbers.

Dr. Mary Davies, who supported, said she had heard hundreds of women say how they wished they could fight, and here was now their chance, for they could with their two hands do work as important as that done by a soldier with his gun. She had recently been in France, and she had come back with the fear that the women of Great Britain and Ireland might not rise to the occasion as the women of France had done. All men of military age were on active service in France, and the work of the country was being done by the women. The Board of Trade were asking the women of this country to register, and she hoped there would be a ready response in that district.

The proposal was adopted, and on the motion of Mr. J. J. Burnley (borough treasurer), seconded by Mr. C. H. Birchall, the speakers were thanked, a similar compliment being paid to the Mayor for presiding.

663 II/28 663.

The Common Cause, April 16th. 1915.

WOMEN'S CONFERENCE WITH THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE.

A Conference took place on Tuesday between the President of the Board of Trade and representatives of a number of women's organisations, for the purpose of discussing the registration of women for war service. Mrs. Rackham and Mrs. Deane Streatfield attended on behalf of the National Union, and put forward its views in regard to women's work.

National Union Views.

The following recommendations were made :—

(1) That equal pay for equal work should be an essential condition of service; (2) that training for women should be definitely organised; (3) that the question of housing the workers should be considered.

The National Union made the suggestion that an Advisory Board be established in London upon which women's organisations should be fully represented, and that these should include various types of workers, professional, clerical, and industrial. Local committees should also be formed in all districts where the women were employed. It was also urged by the National Union that many more women should be employed in the Civil Service, especially the higher branches, and that more women inspectors were greatly needed.

Mr. Runciman's Statement.

Mr. Runciman, in opening the proceedings, said that up to the beginning of April over 33,000 women had registered themselves on the special register of women for war service. Among the applications for service for which the women have registered themselves he noted specially the following : Armament workers, 6,000; clothing trades, 4,000; milkmaids and dairy workers, 1,700; gardeners, 500; other agricultural workers, 2,000; shop assistants, 1,100; leather workers, 500; commercial and clerical, 5,000. Most of those registered are working women of previous experience, though not necessarily in the occupation for which they express a preference. There are some experienced women available for nearly all classes of occupations. Thus, 1,500 of the applicants state that they have had previous experience in agriculture. Nearly 4,000 applicants have been previously employed as clerks and over 1,000 in shops. These applications have all been sifted, and applications for women should be made to the local Labour Exchanges. Mr. Runciman then explained that a special register of women was necessary, because although there were considerable numbers of women on the ordinary Labour Exchange register, taking the country as a whole, it did not follow that in any particular district sufficient women were available for the present demand, and the supply would certainly be insufficient for the prospective demand which he hoped would be created by increased recruiting. Steps were being taken in consultation with the Home Office to increase recruiting, and the temporary substitution of women for the men leaving in a number of trades. The actual work to which many of the women would be called would, of course, depend upon the success of these efforts in particular trades. In any case it was not intended that the women on the special register should be placed in employment at the expense of the women registered at the Exchanges in the ordinary way. The women on the special register would be called on only if there were not sufficient women available on the ordinary Labour Exchange register of the locality.

Wages and Conditions.

As regarded the wages and conditions on which women should be employed, he pointed out that as a general principle the Exchanges did not, and could not, take direct responsibility as to the wages and conditions beyond giving in each case such information as was in their possession. In regard, however, to Government contractors it had been laid down that the piece rates for women should be the same as for men, and further, special instructions had been given to the Exchanges to inform inexperienced applicants of the current wages in each case, so that they should be fully apprised as to the wage which it was reasonable for them to ask. A general safeguard against permanent lowering of wages by the admission of women to replace men on active service would be made by asking employers, so far as possible, to keep the men's places open for them on their return.

Housing and Training.

As regarded the housing of women moved into a district for work, Mr. Runciman stated that in certain districts special steps had already been taken by the Exchanges by means of local housing committees to find and inspect suitable lodgings for women. The necessity for this would probably develop, and in this the help of the women's organisations might be most valuable. By arrangement with the Board of Agriculture a certain number of women had already received, and others were now receiving, short training in some of the agricultural colleges. Some of those, having completed their training, had at once been put in employment. Arrangements for training in other occupations would, he hoped, be made as and when definite need arose.

A long discussion followed, and a large number of questions were asked and suggestions put forward.

Mr. Runciman dealt with a number of these, and promised to communicate with the societies further with regard to others, with a view in particular of availing himself of the offers of help made.

The following were the organisations represented and the names of the representatives :—

Catholic Women's Suffrage Society: Miss O. Sulli an.
Conservative and Unionist Women's Franchise Asso ation: Mrs. Ridley Smith.
East London Federation of the Suffragettes: Mi: E. Sylvia Pankhurst.
Girls' Friendly Society: Miss Lettice Digby.
Head Mistresses' Association: Miss Reta Oldham.
Liverpool Society: Miss Eleanor F. Rathbone.
Local Government Advancement Committee: Mrs. Humphry Ward.
National League for Opposing Women's Suffrage: Mrs. Archibald Colquhoun.
National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies: Mrs. Rackham, Mrs. Deane Streatfield.
Union of Jewish Women: Mrs. Nathaniel L. Cohen.
United Suffragists: Miss Barbara Ayrton Gould.
Woman's Dreadnought: Miss Norah L. Smyth.
Women's Co-operative Guild: Miss Margaret Llewellyn Davies
Women's Freedom League: Miss Nina Boyle, Mrs. K. S. Tanner.
Women's Unionist and Tariff Reform Association: Miss E. Goring Thomas.
Women Writers' Suffrage League: Mrs. Sarah A. Tooley.
Woolwich Branch, Women's Co-operative Guild: Mrs. Anna Ross.
Y.W.C.A.: Miss A. A. Horne, Miss Grace Bristow, Mrs. Ross Cooper.

Birmingham Post, April 16th. 1915.

Add the Appeal for Women Workers

To the Editor of the Daily Post.

Sir,—In the short account you published in your issue of the 14th of Lord R. Cecil's speech the fact is mentioned that only 33,000 women had responded to the Government's appeal to women for their help in order that men might be left free either for active service in the fighting line or to help in the making of munitions of war. If you will allow me, I should like to give one or two reasons for this apparently small number of women volunteers.

(1) The very large number of women, mostly of the leisured class, who have, since the beginning of the war, given their services in the St. John's Ambulance, the Red Cross, the Prince of Wales's Fund distribution, and other kindred work. These, as a rule, do not feel justified in volunteering, as the work they are already doing is valuable to the nation.

(2) Of the workers, all the women and girls—certainly here in Birmingham—may be said to be working full time and overtime.

(3) Many women, who to my knowledge have registered at the bureau either in their own district or in London, have had no notice taken of their communications, and one or two have asked me whether there was anything further they could do to draw attention to the fact that they want to be of use. This sort of neglect does not encourage others to send in their names.

(4) We hear that the municipality in Birmingham has spared such a large number of their employes that the tram service, &c., has had to be curtailed. Yes! but go into the municipal offices and see the large bodies of able-bodied clerks, or into the drapery, haberdashery, or grocery shops and notice the men there content to display a curtain, sell a reel of cotton, or a pound of tea, in every instance work which any intelligent woman could do quite as well. Possibly some slight physical defect may and does debar a few from doing as they would wish—volunteer for active service; but surely it does not prevent their offering to help in the production of the munitions of war.

Women cannot go to men and say, "I can and will do your work while it is necessary; go you and see what you can do in producing those munitions on which the authorities are never tired of telling us the whole issue of the struggle depends." But if women were asked to fill those places I feel sure plenty could be found.

The truth is the following remarks express too truly, I fear, the feelings of a good many of the men now at home—they are remarks which have been made to me many times: "A comfortable bed and a comfortable berth, he would be a fool to give them up," and "After all, German money is as good as English." I entirely agree with a girl who said to me, "I assure you we girls are not verey proud of these men."

A. G. H.

Irish Times,
April 16th. 1918.

War Work for Women.

Lord Robert Cecil, at a meeting held in London on Tuesday to discuss "the nation's call to women," said that he was disappointed to find that, out of the ten million women in the country, only thirty-three thousand had so far registered for war service. If all the circumstances are taken into account, however, the response to the Government's appeal cannot be regarded as bad. In the first place, it must be remembered that the great majority of the ten million women are already fully occupied in domestic duties, while a considerable proportion of the remainder are precluded from offering themselves for work that would take them far from their homes. Secondly, we must not forget that many thousands of women have already registered their names at the various Labour Exchanges, which it is not expected or desired that the new Special Register should displace. Thirdly, many thousands of women, particularly of the upper and middle classes, had not waited for the issue of the Government's appeal, but had offered themselves as nurses and ward-maids in the innumerable hospitals that have sprung up since the war began. Fourthly, the Government's appeal has not long been published, and has probably not yet reached a considerable number of the women who might be expected to respond to it. All things considered, we fancy that the surplus of unemployed female labour is not by any means so large as it has been thought to be, and that thirty-three thousand represents a substantial percentage of those who, under present conditions, might be expected to respond to the call. On the same day when Lord Robert Cecil spoke a Conference took place at the Board of Trade between Mr. Runciman, the President, and the representatives of a number of women's organisations. Mr. Runciman's analysis of the applications which had been received provokes some interesting reflection. The most curious fact which it revealed was that the largest group of women who had applied—6,000 in number—desired employment as "armament workers." As there cannot be many women whose previous occupations qualified them for arduous physical labour, we imagine that their preference was chiefly sentimental, and due to the hold that the cry for "shells, shells, more shells!" has taken upon the feminine mind. That four thousand should have volunteered for the clothing trades is natural enough. Highly satisfactory, because obviously genuine, is the desire of some four thousand women to be employed as milk-maids, dairy-workers, and gardeners, or in some other agricultural pursuit. Less satisfactory, but not at all surprising, is the fact that no fewer than five thousand—or close upon a sixth of the total number of applicants—expressed a preference for commercial and clerical work. That is the inevitable result of our system of elementary education, which, until the last few years, was almost exclusively of a "literary" character, and ignored the certainty that the vast majority of the pupils, whether boys or girls, would have to make a living with their hands. Happily, there has been of late an improvement in this respect, but it is still too recent to have affected a large proportion of the population.

There are numerous obstacles to the more general employment of women, chief among which may be put wages, health, and temperament. Ought women to be paid the same wages as men if they do the same work? The obvious answer is "Yes," but it is by no means universally true. While there are certain employments for which women are even better fitted than men, and in which, therefore, they deserve equal, if not higher, wages, there are others for which, as every employer knows, they are not so well suited, and they are only employed because they are cheaper. We shall only mention one—namely, that of a Post Office attendant. On the other hand, to make things even, we may quote the opinion of the manager of a business employing a large number of

Hull Daily News,
April 16th. 1918.

WOMEN WORKERS

Address by Organising Secretary at Hull

The subject of registration at the Labour Exchanges of women who are prepared to undertake war service and so release men, was discoursed upon by Miss Julia Thornton, of Doncaster, senior organising secretary for the district, at a meeting of ladies and gentlemen interested in local organisations, which was held at the Guildhall yesterday.

The chair was occupied by the Lord Mayor, who was accompanied by the Lady Mayoress.

Miss Thornton drew attention to the position of the country, having regard to the large number of men who had joined the Army since the outbreak of war, and pointed out how the industries of the country were bound to suffer in consequence of this depletion of men, more especially as an Army of the magnitude now attained by ours required to be clothed and fed, &c. With a view to overcoming the difficulty, it had been suggested that women should take the place of men where necessary and possible.

With regard to shops, there were more men than women assistants in shops, and very many of the men now serving were willing and wishful of joining the colours, and could be replaced by women. Then women could be employed on the railways—in clerical duties, ticket issuing and collecting, carriage cleaning, and acting as porters. In the textile, clothing, and boot factories there were still many occupations carried on by men which could be equally well done by women; while women could also work as tram conductors, on the clerical staffs of gas and engineering departments, as chauffeurs and motor drivers, and also in certain unskilled or semi-skilled work. There was also great need for nurses, and women could also assist in agricultural work.

ATTITUDE OF EMPLOYERS.

One of the greatest difficulties they had to face was the fact that the employers did not look with much satisfaction on the idea of substituting women for men. It was not that women were not adaptable, but really the prejudice of the employers which had to be broken down.

Dealing with the question of lodgings, Miss Thornton said in towns where women workers were likely to be required local committees of ladies were at work providing hostels and finding clean, comfortable lodgings. Women might become as important in the industrial world as men were. Their work was wanted; their country was in need of them; and it was for the women to rise to the occasion and show to the Government that they were willing to come forward and register their names in the hope that the employers would take their services.

Miss Thornton said she wished to remove any misapprehension that might exist that simply by registering their names work would be found at once. Their names would be registered, and as soon as opportunity arose communications would be sent telling them what work was available.

A vote of thanks was proposed by the Rev A. T. Greenwood.

Councillor F. W. Booth seconded, and the vote was cordially carried.

663

The Picture World,
April 16th. 1918.

Women and War Service.

Mr. Runciman's interview with a trade union deputation on the subject of women's work in war time revealed both helpful facts and difficulties.

A great deal of service to the nation can be done by women working in the places of men, but in many trades there has been a natural jealousy on the part of men lest women, by accepting lower wage rates, should imperil the hard-won advantages of the trade unionist.

In that respect Mr. Runciman pointed out that, as a general principle, the Labour Exchanges, which are organising the women workers, cannot take direct responsibility for wages and conditions, beyond giving in each case such information as they possess.

In regard to the employees of Government contractors, however, it has been laid down that the piece rates for women shall be the same as for men. But, of course, the entry of women into trades in place of men affects a much wider area than Government contracts, and care must be taken that the influx of new and inexperienced workers is not exploited for the benefit of the greedier class of employer.

To prevent that, special instructions have been given to Labour Exchanges to inform inexperienced applicants of the current wages in each case so that they shall be fully apprised as to the wage which it is reasonable for them to ask, and a further general safeguard against a permanent lowering of wages will be made by asking employers, as far as possible, to keep the men's places open for them on their return.

It is difficult to say how far it is possible to rely on promises that the men's places will be restored to them after the war. The great bulk of employers will doubtless act honourably in this matter, but a minority may not, and the only way to keep that minority from permanently substituting women for men workers at lower rates of pay is to secure at the outset that women's labour is not given too cheaply.

Therein lies one of the greatest problems of war service by women. In some occupations women have shown themselves difficult to organise and weak in resisting power.

There is an illustration of the difficulty in the cases quoted by Miss Mary Macarthur where some women are working ninety-four hours a week, while others stand at the factory gates unable to find employment.

There is also the broader social view which should be kept in mind, and that is that the home should not be recklessly sacrificed to the factory. Whatever may be the effect of the war on the standards of life, it is certain that many young families will be deprived of their natural protectors, and the mother's care in the home will become all the more necessary.

The whole problem is great and complex, but, with the readiness of the Government and of trade union leaders to help, there should be little to hinder a proper organisation of women to meet the needs of war time.

long been published, and has probably not yet reached a considerable number of the women who might be expected to respond to it. All things considered, we fancy that the surplus of unemployed female labour is not by any means so large as it has been thought to be, and that thirty-three thousand represents a substantial percentage of those who, under present conditions, might be expected to respond to the call. On the same day when Lord Robert Cecil spoke a Conference took place at the Board of Trade between Mr. Runciman, the President, and the representatives of a number of women's organisations. Mr. Runciman's analysis of the applications which had been received provokes some interesting reflection. The most curious fact which it revealed was that the largest group of women who had applied—6,000 in number—desired employment as "armament workers." As there cannot be many women whose previous occupations qualified them for arduous physical labour, we imagine that their preference was chiefly sentimental, and due to the hold that the cry for "shells, shells, more shells!" has taken upon the feminine mind. That four thousand should have volunteered for the clothing trades is natural enough. Highly satisfactory, because obviously genuine, is the desire of some four thousand women to be employed as milk-maids, dairy-workers, and gardeners, or in some other agricultural pursuit. Less satisfactory, but not at all surprising, is the fact that no fewer than five thousand—or close upon a sixth of the total number of applicants—expressed a preference for commercial and clerical work. That is the inevitable result of our system of elementary education, which, until the last few years, was almost exclusively of a "literary" character, and ignored the certainty that the vast majority of the pupils, whether boys or girls, would have to make a living with their hands. Happily, there has been of late an improvement in this respect, but it is still too recent to have affected a large proportion of the population.

There are numerous obstacles to the more general employment of women, chief among which may be put wages, health, and temperament. Ought women to be paid the same wages as men if they do the same work? The obvious answer is "Yes," but it is by no means universally true. While there are certain employments for which women are even better fitted than men, and in which, therefore, they deserve equal, if not higher, wages, there are others for which, as every employer knows, they are not so well suited, and they are only employed because they are cheaper. We shall only mention one—namely, that of a Post Office attendant. On the other hand, to make things even, we may quote the opinion of the manager of a business employing a large number of messengers. He says—speaking generally, of course: "Boys I find lazy, slow, and insolent; girls energetic, quick, and always courteous. Girls will do in an hour journeys on which boys will be gone two hours, and then you can rarely rely upon a boy to deliver his message." We observe that one or two women are being tried by the Glasgow Corporation as tram-car conductors, and shall be interested to hear how the experiment results. Only women of very exceptional qualities, we imagine, are likely to succeed in this calling, which, on a busy route, demands the activity of a monkey and the temper of an angel (particularly when dealing with women passengers), and occasionally—just after closing time—the muscles of a prize-fighter. There are many other occupations, however, now almost exclusively staffed by men, in which women ought to be able to do excellent service. The Government has set a good example in giving a large number of clerkships in the War Office and other departments to women, thus enabling some hundreds of male clerks to volunteer for the Army. If employers generally were to follow this lead, and to make a point of giving all suitable posts that fell vacant to women rather than to healthy and unencumbered men of military age, the recruiting problem would be greatly simplified.

more men than women assistants in shops, and very many of the men now serving were willing and wishful of joining the colours, and could be replaced by women. Then women could be employed on the railways—in clerical duties, ticket issuing and collecting, carriage cleaning, and acting as porters. In the textile, clothing, and boot factories there were still many occupations carried on by men which could be equally well done by women; while women could also work as tram conductors, on the clerical staffs of gas and engineering departments, as chauffeurs and motor drivers, and also in certain unskilled or semi-skilled work. There was also great need for nurses, and women could also assist in agricultural work.

ATTITUDE OF EMPLOYERS.

One of the greatest difficulties they had to face was the fact that the employers did not look with much satisfaction on the idea of substituting women for men. It was not that women were not adaptable, but really the prejudice of the employers which had to be broken down.

Dealing with the question of lodgings, Miss Thornton said in towns where women workers were likely to be required local committees of ladies were at work providing hostels and finding clean, comfortable lodgings. Women might become as important in the industrial world as men were. Their work was wanted; their country was in need of them; and it was for the women to rise to the occasion and show to the Government that they were willing to come forward and register their names in the hope that the employers would take their services.

Miss Thornton said she wished to remove any misapprehension that might exist that simply by registering their names work would be found at once. Their names would be registered, and as soon as opportunity arose communications would be sent telling them what work was available.

A vote of thanks was proposed by the Rev A. T. Greenwood.

Councillor F. W. Booth seconded, and the vote was cordially carried.

care must be taken that the influx of new and inexperienced workers is not exploited for the benefit of the greedier class of employer.

To prevent that, special instructions have been given to Labour Exchanges to inform inexperienced applicants of the current wages in each case so that they shall be fully apprised as to the wage which it is reasonable for them to ask, and a further general safeguard against a permanent lowering of wages will be made by asking employers, as far as possible, to keep the men's places open for them on their return.

It is difficult to say how far it is possible to rely on promises that the men's places will be restored to them after the war. The great bulk of employers will doubtless act honourably in this matter, but a minority may not, and the only way to keep that minority from permanently substituting women for men workers at lower rates of pay is to secure at the outset that women's labour is not given too cheaply.

Therein lies one of the greatest problems of war service by women. In some occupations women have shown themselves difficult to organise and weak in resisting power.

There is an illustration of the difficulty in the cases quoted by Miss Mary Macarthur where some women are working ninety-four hours a week, while others stand at the factory gates unable to find employment.

There is also the broader social view which should be kept in mind, and that is that the home should not be recklessly sacrificed to the factory. Whatever may be the effect of the war on the standards of life, it is certain that many young families will be deprived of their natural protectors, and the mother's care in the home will become all the more necessary.

The whole problem is great and complex, but, with the readiness of the Government and of trade union leaders to help, there should be little to hinder a proper organisation of women to meet the needs of war time.

Votes for Women, April 16th. 1913.

663 II/30

663.

Women Make Conditions

Miss Llewelyn Davies and Miss Mary Macarthur, representing the Women's Co-operative Guild and Women's Trades Unions, went into the question of hours of work, explaining that in armament factories, although there was no shortage of women's labour, women were forced to be working twelve and fourteen hours a day, often seven days a week, so that they averaged eighty-four hours a week. These speakers demanded that the Board of Trade should refuse to grant permits suspending the Factory Acts without consulting the workers of the particular industries in question. They added that unless the Government agreed to proper conditions of work and pay for the women, their Societies, which represented hundreds of thousands of working women, would refuse to co-operate. A strong recommendation was made by a large number of the delegates that an Advisory Standing Committee of women should be formed to help in the organisation of the women's work, and further, that the representatives of the Trades Unions concerned, and, in fact, all the women actually doing the work, should be consulted as to the conditions of that work.

Derby Telegraph, April 17th. 1913.

WOMEN AND WAR WORK.
A PATRIOTIC VOLUNTEER.

(To the Editor of the "Derby Daily Telegraph.")

Sir,—It is four weeks since I registered my name for war work, and as I have not yet been asked to put my shoulder to the wheel, I offer my services free for a week to any of the following occupations: Postman, car conductor, policeman, grocer's assistant, or munition worker. I will give my services to any of the above until I become efficient for one of them. But having a grown up family at home, all working (but no sons of military age) I am obliged to ask for work in the town in order to keep pace with the workers at home. At the same time, I offer my services as stated, and will gladly undertake the same. Why hold us back when we are so badly needed? Let us help before it is too late. For name and address of writer apply to the "Derby Daily Tele-

[redacted]

Midland Weekly News, April 17th 1913.

WOMEN'S WAR HELP.

IMPORTANT BOARD OF TRADE CONFERENCE.

33,000 REGISTERED.

The importance which is attached to the substitution of women for men in certain trades was emphasised on Tuesday when a conference took place at the Board of Trade between the President of the Board of Trade and representatives of a number of women's organisations. The following is an official account of the conference:

Mr Runciman, in opening the proceedings, said that up to the beginning of April over 33,000 women had registered themselves on the Special Register of Women for War Service. Among the applications for service for which the women have registered themselves he noted specially the following:—

Armament workers	6,000
Clothing Trades	4,000
Milkmaids and Dairy workers	1,700
Gardeners	500
Other Agricultural workers	2,000
Shop Assistarts	1,100
Leather workers	500
Commercial and Clerical	5,000

Most of those registered are working women of previous experience, though not necessarily in the occupation for which they express a preference. There are some experienced women available for nearly all classes of occupations. Thus, 1,500 of the applicants state that they have had previous experience in agriculture. Nearly 4,000 applicants have been previously employed as clerks, and over 1,000 in shops. These applications have all been sifted and applications for women should be made to the local Labour Exchanges.

Mr Runciman then explained that a Special Register of women was necessary because, although there were considerable numbers of women on the ordinary Labour Exchange Register, taking the country as a whole, it did not follow that in any particular district sufficient women were available for the present demand, and the supply would certainly be insufficient for the prospective demand, which he hoped would be created by increased recruiting.

Steps were being taken in consultation with the Home Office to increase recruiting and the temporary substitution of women for the men leaving in a number of trades. The actual work to which many of the women would be called would, of course, depend upon the success of these efforts in particular trades. In any case, it was not intended that the women on the Special Register should be placed in employment at the expense of the women registered at the Exchanges in the ordinary way. The women on the Special Register would be called on only if there were not sufficient women available on the ordinary Labour Exchange register of the locality.

Wages and Conditions.

As regards the wages and conditions on which women should be employed, he pointed out that, as a general principle, the Exchanges did not, and could not, take direct responsibility as to the wages and conditions, beyond giving in each case such information as was in their possession. In regard, however, to Government contractors, it had been laid down that the piece rates for women should be the same as for men, and further special instructions had been given to the Exchanges to inform inexperienced applicants of the current wages in each case, so that they should be fully apprised as to the wage that it was reasonable for them to ask. A general safeguard against permanent lowering of wages by the admission of women to take the place of men on service would be made by asking employers, so far as possible, to keep the men's places open for them on their return.

As regards the housing of women moved into a district for work, Mr Runciman stated that in certain districts special steps had already been taken by the Exchanges by means of local housing committees to find and inspect suitable lodgings for women. The necessity for this would probably develop and in this the help of the women's organisations might be most valuable.

By arrangement with the Board of Agriculture a certain number of woman had already received, and others were now receiving, short training in some of the agricultural colleges. Some of those having completed their training had at once been put in employment. Arrangements for training in other occupations would, he hoped, be made as and when definite need arose.

A long discussion followed, and a large number of questions were asked and suggestions put forward. Mr Runciman dealt with a number of these and promised to communicate with the societies further with regard to others, with a view in particular of availing himself of the offers of help made.

Safeguards Demanded.

According to the special correspondent of the "Daily Telegraph" there were present at the conference, in addition to the ladies officially mentioned, Miss Mary Macarthur, of the Women's Trades Union League; Mr Creighton, of the National Union of Women Workers; Miss Margaret Bondfield, of the Shop Assistants' Union, and others. Mr Fawcett was to have been the first speaker but in her absence the deputation was not formally introduced.

From subsequent conversation with some of the ladies, it appeared that both Mr Runciman and the delegates asked various questions. The points that were strongly urged by the latter were that in employing women the Government should give a good lead in the matter of just treatment and equal wages. There was also on the part of several who spoke a demand for the formation of an advisory committee to the Government on women's work.

Others pointed out strongly that due safeguards must be forthcoming on the part of the Government as to the scale of wages, the system of giving adequate training to the workers, and due provision as to reasonable facilities for housing women who should take up such work as may be found; the latter, of course, being a very important point as regards the sending of women workers on to the land and into distant places.

At the conclusion of Mr Runciman's speech the ladies were invited to state their case.

Miss Sylvia Pankhurst urged that women should be paid the same rates as men, both as to time and piece work, for unskilled labour and should also receive the special bonuses. For skilled labour their wages should approximate to those of men. Maintenance of no less than £1 a week should be provided in connection with Government training schemes and schemes subsidised out of public funds. Since the interests of every woman were of vital concern, it was imperative that the Parliamentary franchise should be extended to every woman over 21 years of age.

Long Hours.

Miss Llewellyn Davies spoke of the evils of long hours, and instanced cases of girls employed at a munitions factory working twelve-hour day shifts, with some night shifts in addition. Such employment wore out a woman's capacity, and so did not bear adequate results.

Lady Aberconway asked what proportion of women workers had been taken on in the Government departments since the war began.

Mr Runciman said 600 women were working in the Board of Trade department.

Miss Mary MacArthur remarked that although girls were working eighty-four hours a week at a factory named, there were crowds of women at the gates daily waiting for work. She considered that the statements about the shortage of women labour were thus disproved.

Miss Nina Boyle strongly condemned the regulations and enactments penalising matrimony among Government women employees. She also observed that 600 extra men clerks had been taken on at the War Office to deal with women's allowances—work which could very well be done by women. She also related that at a certain police station in South Wales she had seen a number of strapping young men, all over 6ft in height, working typewriters. Surely they should be at the front, and the work be done by women.

The Spectator, April 17th. 1915.

At the Board of Trade on Tuesday a Conference was held on the substitution of women for men in various trades. Mr. Runciman informed the representatives of the women's organizations that up to April more than thirty-three thousand women had enrolled themselves on the Special Register of Women for War Service. Six thousand had entered their names for employment in armament works and four thousand for employment in clothing factories. Applications for women's services should be made to the local Labour Exchanges. It was not intended, however, that women on the Special Register should be employed at the expense of women who had entered their names in the ordinary way at the Exchanges. The Special Register was, in fact, for local emergencies. In Government work the piece rates for women would be the same as for men. The Board of Agriculture had arranged for a certain number of women to receive a short training in agricultural methods. The War Office, as we learn from the Times, are employing some hundreds of women as clerks, messengers, and typists. Before the war women were employed only as typists.

Birmingham Post, April 17th. 1915.

PATRIOTIC WOMEN.

INTERESTING APPLICATIONS TO BIRMINGHAM FIRM.

It is generally known that large numbers of the women of this country have displayed the utmost eagerness to render practical service during the war, but the extent of their desire can scarcely be realised. Since the issue of the Board of Trade circular on the subject of "War Service for Women" last month local manufacturers of war material have received hundreds of applications for work from women who need never see the inside of a workshop unless they choose. At Messrs. Kynoch's works at Witton four ladies who thought they could be of service in the manner suggested in the circular—namely, doing something that would release a man for active service, were engaged, and three of them are still at work. They are employed in office duties. This firm alone have received hundreds of applications from all over the country from ladies in comfortable circumstances who "want to do something for Britain." The wife of a Wiltshire landowner, for example, wrote a short time ago offering the services of herself and a squad of twenty-five other women in the same station in life. She added that she might be able to get a second squad of twenty-five! Such instances are fairly common.

Factory life is hard and entails a heavy strain upon the endurance of those unaccustomed to it. In many cases the spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak. It says a good deal for the patriotism of British women that they should be so anxious to undertake heavy toil day after day in a factory for their country's sake. Men who can spare a little time are also eager to find work. About Easter time Messrs. Kynoch received a number of applications from masters of public schools, who explained that they had a month's holiday, and were anxious to "do their bit" during that period by engaging in the manufacture of munitions of war.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

HOW THEY WISH TO WORK.

War service for women was the question discussed yesterday at a conference held at Caxton Hall under the auspices of the War Emergency Workers' National Committee.

Among the industries which it is proposed women should enter, as announced by the Board of Trade, are farm and dairy work, leather-stitching, brushmaking, clothing, machining, and light machining, for armaments.

The societies represented at the conference included women's trade unions, Labour, Socialist, co-operative, suffrage, and kindred organisations.

Miss Mary Macarthur, who presided, said they had heard of women being ready to give their services for nothing in ammunition factories. It was a poor sort of patriotism which justified that kind of thing, and it was the duty of the nation, as it was the duty of the women themselves, to see that they were not exploited in the national emergency.

In the series of resolutions passed by the conference, it was urged that women doing the same work as men should receive the same rate of pay, that sweated labour conditions must be avoided at all costs, and that, after the war, priority of employment should be given to workmen whose places had been filled by women.

The Daily Telegraph, April 17th. 1915.

66

WAR SERVICE CALL.

A HALF-HEARTED RESPONSE.

By A WOMAN WORKER.

More than a month has elapsed since the Government put forward its appeal to women to register for paid employment in various industries which would directly or indirectly be of service towards the successful prosecution of the war. It may be recalled that it ended with the statement that 'any woman who by working helps to release a man or to equip a man for fighting does national war service. Every woman should register who is able and willing to take employment."

And after four weeks, during which the subject has been kept to the fore, we are officially informed that the response to the call has been—33,000! Of that number something over 8,000 have expressed a preference for secretarial or clerical employment, that passionate desire at all times of the young person whose primary demand is for something "light and genteel." The last census tells us that there were 3,122,500 women who were classed as "unoccupied," a word that would, of course, cover those who by age or infirmity were unable to work, but even then leaving a very large margin of others who it might reasonably have been expected would have rallied to their country's aid.

The Government has had the support in this matter, be it remembered, of all the leading organisations of women in the country. The Primrose League and the Women's Liberal Federation equally have commended it to their local branches. Another enormous range of influence has been brought to bear by the women's Suffrage societies of all shades of opinion on this question. Through the National Union of Women Workers, there is not a body of any importance working for the social and philanthropic benefit of the sex that has not been reached. The appeal has gone out endorsed with the support of these various committees, comprising the names of those most respected among women, and the result is altogether paltry.

MISTAKE AT THE OUTSET.

To the majority of the more thoughtful of women the initial mistake that was made was that of using the labour exchanges as the machinery for the creation of the new register. It is a department beloved of the Board of Trade, and it came into being just five years ago in a pleasing faith that it was going to adjust all the problems between employers and employed. Yet even in those early days the designation was against it, and dressmakers, milliners, artificial flower makers, embroideresses, and so forth objected to the word "labour" as something associated only with navvies, bricklayers, and dockers.

From the outset, there have been large classes of workers who have never resorted to them at all. By dint of a good deal of patient work, and a special office in Marlborough-street, the dressmakers to some extent have come to use them, but the teacher, the clerk, the cashier, the typist, and the shop girl avoid them entirely. That large class who do such work as dispensing, indexing inspecting under the Infant Life Protection Act for public bodies or in a dozen professional directions, would never dream of going to an exchange.

Moreover, the type of woman worker who does, when other resources have failed, make use of an exchange is at this moment in no lack of occupation. In East London there is not a tailor's workshop to-day which has not got notices displayed stating that machinists, sleeve hands, finishers, pressers, and all the others of some specialised skill, are wanted within. These notices remain up for weeks, and obtain no replies. Throughout the ready-made clothing trade the complaint as to the difficulty of getting hands is universal.

Presumably the aim of the Government was to bring to its help the younger women of leisure and education, of the same classes as those who have come forward so readily for the work of the Red Cross Voluntary Aid Detachments, and who at this moment constitute assets of real national value. But to hope to obtain their sisters and cousins through labour exchanges was futile to the utmost degree. Even the recommendations of those representing their favourite society or cause were stultified by the fact that they were simply receiving names to pass on to a labour exchange. Parents and friends merely saw visions of the factory bench, somewhere out in East Ham or Bow, and the crowds of noisy and befeathered girls which the public mind erroneously imagines these workers to be.

READY TO DO THEIR PART.

The deputation to Mr. Runciman this week, which included women of all political schools and the most diverse social orders, made it plain that there were many points on which the appeal was far from explicit. One of the best-informed of all who spoke pointed out that those who had registered weeks and months ago as wanting work could still be numbered by thousands, and that in the North there was keen competition in certain directions for what was available. There was no indication as to rates of wages or whether the woman who registered might not be sent to some distant place, irrespective of her domestic were employed only as typists.

Birmingham Post, April 17th. 1915.

PATRIOTIC WOMEN.

INTERESTING APPLICATIONS TO BIRMINGHAM FIRM.

It is generally known that large numbers of the women of this country have displayed the utmost eagerness to render practical service during the war, but the extent of their desire can scarcely be realised. Since the issue of the Board of Trade circular on the subject of "War Service for Women" last month local manufacturers of war material have received hundreds of applications for work from women who need never see the inside of a workshop unless they choose. At Messrs. Kynoch's works at Witton four ladies who thought they could be of service in the manner suggested in the circular—namely, doing something that would release a man for active service, were engaged, and three of them are still at work. They are employed in office duties. This firm alone have received hundreds of applications from all over the country from ladies in comfortable circumstances who "want to do something for Britain." The wife of a Wiltshire landowner, for example, wrote a short time ago offering the services of herself and a squad of twenty-five other women in the same station in life. She added that she might be able to get a second squad of twenty-five! Such instances are fairly common.

Factory life is hard and entails a heavy strain upon the endurance of those unaccustomed to it. In many cases the spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak. It says a good deal for the patriotism of British women that they should be so anxious to undertake heavy toil day after day in a factory for their country's sake. Men who can spare a little time are also eager to find work. About Easter time Messrs. Kynoch received a number of applications from masters of public schools, who explained that they had a month's holiday, and were anxious to "do their bit" during that period by engaging in the manufacture of munitions of war.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

HOW THEY WISH TO WORK.

War service for women was the question discussed yesterday at a conference held at Caxton Hall, under the auspices of the War Emergency Workers' National Committee.

Among the industries which it is proposed women should enter, as announced by the Board of Trade, are farm and dairy work, leather-stitching, brushmaking, clothing, machining, and light machining, for armaments.

The societies represented at the conference included women's trade unions, Labour, Socialist, co-operative, suffrage, and kindred organisations.

Miss Mary Macarthur, who presided, said they had heard of women being ready to give their services for nothing in ammunition factories. It was a poor sort of patriotism which justified that kind of thing, and it was the duty of the nation, as it was the duty of the women themselves, to see that they were not exploited in the national emergency.

In the series of resolutions passed by the conference, it was urged that women doing the same work as men should receive the same rate of pay, that sweated labour conditions must be avoided at all costs, and that, after the war, priority of employment should be given to workmen whose places had been filled by women.

And after four weeks, during which the subject has been kept to the fore, we are officially informed that the response to the call has been—33,000! Of that number something over 8,000 have expressed a preference for secretarial or clerical employment, that passionate desire at all times of the young person whose primary demand is for something "light and genteel." The last census tells us that there were 3,122,500 women who were classed as "unoccupied," a word that would, of course, cover those who by age or infirmity were unable to work, but even then leaving a very large margin of others who it might reasonably have been expected would have rallied to their country's aid.

The Government has had the support in this matter, be it remembered, of all the leading organisations of women in the country. The Primrose League and the Women's Liberal Federation equally have commended it to their local branches. Another enormous range of influence has been brought to bear by the women's Suffrage societies of all shades of opinion on this question. Through the National Union of Women Workers, there is not a body of any importance working for the social and philanthropic benefit of the sex that has not been reached. The appeal has gone out endorsed with the support of these various committees, comprising the names of those most respected among women, and the result is altogether paltry.

MISTAKE AT THE OUTSET.

To the majority of the more thoughtful of women the initial mistake that was made was that of using the labour exchanges as the machinery for the creation of the new register. It is a department beloved of the Board of Trade, and it came into being just five years ago in a pleasing faith that it was going to adjust all the problems between employers and employed. Yet even in those early days the designation was against it, and dressmakers, milliners, artificial flower makers, embroideresses, and so forth objected to the word "labour" as something associated only with navvies, bricklayers, and dockers.

From the outset, there have been large classes of workers who have never resorted to them at all. By dint of a good deal of patient work, and a special office in Marlborough-street, the dressmakers to some extent have come to use them, but the teacher, the clerk, the cashier, the typist, and the shop girl avoid them entirely. That large class who do such work as dispensing, indexing inspecting under the Infant Life Protection Act for public bodies or in a dozen professional directions, would never dream of going to an exchange.

Moreover, the type of woman worker who does, when other resources have failed, make use of an exchange is at this moment in no lack of occupation In East London there is not a tailor's workshop to-day which has not got notices displayed stating that machinists, sleeve hands, finishers, pressers, and all the others of some specialised skill, are wanted within. These notices remain up for weeks, and obtain no replies. Throughout the ready-made clothing trade the complaint as to the difficulty of getting hands is universal.

Presumably the aim of the Government was to bring to its help the younger women of leisure and education, of the same classes as those who have come forward so readily for the work of the Red Cross Voluntary Aid Detachments, and who at this moment constitute assets of real national value. But to hope to obtain their sisters and cousins through labour exchanges was futile to the utmost degree. Even the recommendations of those representing their favourite society or cause were stultified by the fact that they were simply receiving names to pass on to a labour exchange. Parents and friends merely saw visions of the factory bench, somewhere out in East Ham or Bow, and the crowds of noisy and befeathered girls which the public mind erroneously imagines these workers to be.

READY TO DO THEIR PART.

The deputation to Mr. Runciman this week, which included women of all political schools and the most diverse social orders, made it plain that there were many points on which the appeal was far from explicit. One of the best-informed of all who spoke pointed out that those who had registered weeks and months ago as wanting work could still be numbered by thousands, and that in the North there was keen competition in certain directions for what was available. There was no indication as to rates of wages or whether the woman who registered might not be sent to some distant place, irrespective of her domestic ties. Many of those who spoke pointed out the grave difficulties that the problem of housing or lodging would present, especially to any who had indicated a readiness to take up farming, dairy, or horticultural work.

With some women, too, there is a feeling that the appeal showed a studied contempt for the efforts that had been made by various agencies to be prepared for any special calls that might arise. The Women's Emergency Corps early last autumn had, for instance, a useful record of names, of hundreds who possessed some special qualifications that might be of service in such needs as might arise. Other organisations were also prepared to help in various ways. No doubt the Board of Trade imagined it possessed all the machinery for its purpose, but the position to-day as regards the register would have been very different had it called together a strong and representative committee of well-known and practical women, told them clearly the extent of the country's wants, and given a specific guarantee as to fair rates of pay. Women have responded to other calls addressed to them. They relieved a difficult position when hundreds of thousands of belts and pairs of socks were essential within a few weeks; their efforts for the Belgian refugees, to provide clubs for girls and soldiers' wives, to take up any kind of work that seemed desirable, is enough to show that the women were ready to do their part. The failure—for it is nothing less—to arouse their active sympathy in this direction is because the request has been made in a distasteful form.

The Nation,
April 17th. 1915.

A CONFERENCE was held on Tuesday at the Board of Trade on the subject of war service for women. A number of women's societies sent delegates, but the women's trade unions were not represented in anything like their full strength. Miss Mary McArthur complained of this with justice; it is difficult to understand why the Board of Trade should set more value on the opinion of the National Society for Opposing Woman Suffrage than on that of working women trade unionists. Mr. Runciman stated that 33,000 women had entered their names on the special register, most of them working women of previous experience. Eight thousand had volunteered for armament work, two thousand for agriculture. Mr. Runciman explained that in Government contracts the Government had stipulated for equal piece rates for men and women; but he stated that they had no control over wages elsewhere, though they hoped that they would prevent a permanent lowering of wages by asking employers to keep open the men's places as far as possible. There ought to be an Advisory Council for Women acting with the Advisory Council of Workmen.

The Co-operative News, April 17th. 1915. 663 II/33

WOMEN'S CORNER.

ALL communications intended for this Page should be addressed to the Editor of the "Women's Corner," "Co-operative News" Office, Long Millgate, Manchester.

MOBILISATION OF WOMEN'S INDUSTRY.

Munitions of War and Agriculture.

SINCE writing on the subject of the Government's call to women to take up the work necessarily laid down by men who have gone out to fight, we have had an opportunity of visiting a busy women's Labour Exchange during the first rush of responses from women desirous of entering their names on the register for such work, and of examining a large batch of written application forms which form the register for special war service.

It may be said that the "office" was in a working-class neighbourhood of a mainly residential town, and that probably a very different result would be reached in a purely manufacturing town, where women were accustomed to work in the mills, or in a rural district, where the women are already in close association with the requirements of agricultural life. It would differ also from the register of a fairly well-to-do section of the town, where the daughters of the house, hitherto "unemployed" in the technical sense of the term, were ready to offer service from a sense of patriotism and adventure, and not under pressure of the need to work for wages upon which to live.

The workers seen in the office to which we refer, and the evidence gathered from the forms filled up, clearly indicated that the first object of the workers was to secure some form of paid work useful to the country and agreeable to themselves.

There were women of all ages, from the little girl of fifteen, who thought she could take the place of some man in an office, to the elderly woman of sixty, who "wrote a very good hand and would like some light office work." Neither had any training in office work, but the will was good to "try what she could do."

There is no age limit set to this recruiting as in the recruiting for soldiers; but, within their limits, these applicants matched with the material found in a recruiting office, and one wondered if the Government would realise that, just as it needs a term of careful training, good feeding, and suitable clothing to turn the mass of raw recruits of Kitchener's Army into efficient fighting men, just so would it need a period of training, good feeding, and suitable clothing of this army of women recruits to fit them for the work it is proposed they should do. Ignorance of military duties is no detriment to a recruit for the Army, and ignorance of clerical or agricultural duties ought to be no detriment to the women recruits to the new industrial army. If the Government need their services, the Government must be prepared to make them fit for the service.

This was the first and most outstanding thing with which we were impressed—the large majority of the applicants for "war services" were untrained, inefficient-looking, and mainly physically unfit (at present) to undertake hard, strenuous work in munition factories or on the land.

So, too, they were, for the most part, ill-clad for such work. The clothing of a city dressmaker's assistant, or the typist girl, or even the respectable "daily" girl, would be very little use on the land, and might be quite out of place in a munition factory. The Government will go very far towards getting the women they want if they will invent and supply suitable uniforms for the different work needed.

One of the great attractions of Red Cross work lies in the suitable dress required for the workers, and the new women police are also properly clad in a distinctive uniform, suitable to the onerous duties they will have to perform.

While the world of drapery manufacturers and fashion mongers are trying to make women turn all their attention to the frivolities of styles and fashions that are of no useful service in war-time—except to distract our thoughts and to circulate our money—sensible women could hardly do a better service than to suggest uniforms and grades of uniform which women can wear during the time they are filling up the places of their brothers who have gone to the Front.

But to return to our lists of applicants. The forms asked specifically for women who would be willing to enter some form of agricultural pursuit, such as poultry farming, dairying, care of live stock, &c., and it was interesting to note the replies. Of a large number examined, the large proportion of replies indicated very scant knowledge of such work, but many replied, "Am fond of the country, and would be willing to learn"; others said, "Have been successful with chickens," "Know a little about poultry," "Used to live in country, and would like to go again"—all quite vague and ineffective without the prospect of real training in view. An astonishing number of replies came from married women—presumably with homes and children—who were anxious to "get a little daily work of some kind," though what work could be provided under those terms they seemed to have no idea. Certainly agricultural work cannot be done by married women living in towns who only want to go out for a few hours daily. One imagines that there will be a great task of winnowing to be done before the Government can make use of a tithe of the volunteers for service.

A vast amount of organisation must also take place before this mass of unorganised labour is properly treated as regards rates of pay. One of the hardest problems to solve will be that to which we referred in the "Corner" for March 27th, viz., equal pay for equal work; and, in the present condition of things, this question, along with the question of training, feeding, and clothing, cannot be left to the individual bargaining of the worker herself with the employer, but must be settled on broad, firm lines by the country at large, speaking through its organised labour associations and its organised bodies of women.

To our mind, this matter of mobilising the women workers is of the utmost importance, and should absorb our attention, even at the expense of matters which have hitherto seemed the most important. The danger of doing irreparable injury to the cause of women and the future of the race by allowing bad conditions to creep in is no mere scare. Already we hear of girls working ninety hours per week in Army contract factories and receiving wages of 8s., 9s., and 11s. per week, with an additional bonus which is deducted if the worker takes a Sunday off for rest.

Given some assurance of better conditions than this, there will be no lack of women workers; but with conditions like this, or even worse than this—as may happen if the matter is not closely watched—the destruction of the war will be doubled by the ruined health of the women of the nation. There should be no need for this, and we make no apology for again bringing the matter before co-operative women, in whose hands considerable power lies for preventing such disaster.

The matter about those women registering who have no special experience for any kind of work is under the consideration of a special women's committee appointed by the War Emergency National Workers' Committee, who have issued a circular pointing out that there are still 60,000 men and boys and 40,000 women and girls on the "live" register of the Labour Exchanges for whom the Board of Trade has so far failed to find work or to provide training, while many thousands more are working short time.

The committee also state that in drafting women into any industries care must be taken to prevent the stereotyping of bad conditions and low wages or to endanger standard conditions where these obtain. It suggests that proper means should be taken by setting up a tribunal representative of the organised wage-earners—men and women—to secure these safeguards, and that further efforts should be made to find situations for those now on the registers before taking steps to bring in fresh supplies of female labour.

It is therefore obvious that the utmost care and

MOBILISATION OF WOMEN'S INDUSTRY.

Munitions of War and Agriculture.

SINCE writing on the subject of the Government's call to women to take up the work necessarily laid down by men who have gone out to fight, we have had an opportunity of visiting a busy women's Labour Exchange during the first rush of responses from women desirous of entering their names on the register for such work, and of examining a large batch of written application forms which form the register for special war service.

It may be said that the "office" was in a working-class neighbourhood of a mainly residential town, and that probably a very different result would be reached in a purely manufacturing town, where women were accustomed to work in the mills, or in a rural district, where the women are already in close association with the requirements of agricultural life. It would differ also from the register of a fairly well-to-do section of the town, where the daughters of the house, hitherto "unemployed" in the technical sense of the term, were ready to offer service from a sense of patriotism and adventure, and not under pressure of the need to work for wages upon which to live.

The workers seen in the office to which we refer, and the evidence gathered from the forms filled up, clearly indicated that the first object of the workers was to secure some form of paid work useful to the country and agreeable to themselves.

There were women of all ages, from the little girl of fifteen, who thought she could take the place of some man in an office, to the elderly woman of sixty, who "wrote a very good hand and would like some light office work." Neither had any training in office work, but the will was good to "try what she could do."

There is no age limit set to this recruiting as in the recruiting for soldiers; but, within their limits, these applicants matched with the material found in a recruiting office, and one wondered if the Government would realise that, just as it needs a term of careful training, good feeding, and suitable clothing to turn the mass of raw recruits of Kitchener's Army into efficient fighting men, just so would it need a period of training, good feeding, and suitable clothing of this army of women recruits to fit them for the work it is proposed they should do. Ignorance of military duties is no detriment to a recruit for the Army, and ignorance of clerical or agricultural duties ought to be no detriment to the women recruits to the new industrial army. If the Government need their services, the Government must be prepared to make them fit for the service.

This was the first and most outstanding thing with which we were impressed—the large majority of the applicants for "war services" were untrained, inefficient-looking, and mainly physically unfit (at present) to undertake hard, strenuous work in munition factories or on the land.

So, too, they were, for the most part, ill-clad for such work. The clothing of a city dressmaker's assistant, or the typist girl, or even the respectable "daily" girl, would be very little use on the land, and might be quite out of place in a munition factory. The Government will go very far towards getting the women they want if they will invent and supply suitable uniforms for the different work needed.

One of the great attractions of Red Cross work lies in the suitable dress required for the workers, and the new women police are also properly clad in a distinctive uniform, suitable to the onerous duties they will have to perform.

While the world of drapery manufacturers and fashion mongers are trying to make women turn all their attention to the frivolities of styles and fashions that are of no useful service in war-time—except to distract our thoughts and to circulate our money—sensible women could hardly do a better service than to suggest uniforms and grades of uniform which women can wear during the time they are filling up the places of their brothers who have gone to the Front.

But to return to our lists of applicants. The forms asked specifically for women who would be willing to enter some form of agricultural pursuit, such as poultry farming, dairying, care of live stock, &c., and it was interesting to note the replies. Of a large number examined, the large proportion of replies indicated very scant knowledge of such work, but many replied, "Am fond of the country, and would be willing to learn"; others said, "Have been successful with chickens," "Know a little about poultry," "Used to live in country, and would like to go again"—all quite vague and ineffective without the prospect of real training in view. An astonishing number of replies came from married women—presumably with homes and children—who were anxious to "get a little daily work of some kind," though what work could be provided under those terms they seemed to have no idea. Certainly agricultural work cannot be done by married women living in towns who only want to go out for a few hours daily. One imagines that there will be a great task of winnowing to be done before the Government can make use of a tithe of the volunteers for service.

A vast amount of organisation must also take place before this mass of unorganised labour is properly treated as regards rates of pay. One of the hardest problems to solve will be that to which we referred in the "Corner" for March 27th, viz., equal pay for equal work; and, in the present condition of things, this question, along with the question of training, feeding, and clothing, cannot be left to the individual bargaining of the worker herself with the employer, but must be settled on broad, firm lines by the country at large, speaking through its organised labour associations and its organised bodies of women.

To our mind, this matter of mobilising the women workers is of the utmost importance, and should absorb our attention, even at the expense of matters which have hitherto seemed the most important. The danger of doing irreparable injury to the cause of women and the future of the race by allowing bad conditions to creep in is no mere scare. Already we hear of girls working ninety hours per week in Army contract factories and receiving wages of 8s., 9s., and 11s. per week, with an additional bonus which is deducted if the worker takes a Sunday off for rest.

Given some assurance of better conditions than this, there will be no lack of women workers; but with conditions like this, or even worse than this—as may happen if the matter is not closely watched—the destruction of the war will be doubled by the ruined health of the women of the nation. There should be no need for this, and we make no apology for again bringing the matter before co-operative women, in whose hands considerable power lies for preventing such disaster.

The matter about those women registering who have no special experience for any kind of work is under the consideration of a special women's committee appointed by the War Emergency National Workers' Committee, who have issued a circular pointing out that there are still 60,000 men and boys and 40,000 women and girls on the "live" register of the Labour Exchanges for whom the Board of Trade has so far failed to find work or to provide training, while many thousands more are working short time.

The committee also state that in drafting women into any industries care must be taken to prevent the stereotyping of bad conditions and low wages or to endanger standard conditions where these obtain. It suggests that proper means should be taken by setting up a tribunal representative of the organised wage-earners—men and women—to secure these safeguards, and that further efforts should be made to find situations for those now on the registers before taking steps to bring in fresh supplies of female labour.

It is therefore obvious that the utmost care and vigilance must be exercised by the organised workers to prevent the degradation of the standard of life and labour which the trade unions have striven so hard to set up; and to further the points raised by the National Workers' Committee, a deputation of organised women—representative of the labour movement—is to wait on Mr. Runciman (President of the Board of Trade).

y Despatch, April 17th. 1915.

SUBSTITUTES FOR MEN.

Part of Home Office In Recruiting.

A conference took place at the Board of Trade yesterday between the President of the Board of Trade and representatives of a large number of women's organisations.

Mr. Runciman, in opening the proceedings, said that up to the beginning of April over 33,000 women had registered themselves on the special register for women for war service. Among the applications for service for which the women had registered themselves he noted especially the following:—

Armament workers	6,000
Clothing trades	4,000
Milkmaids and dairy workers	1,700
Gardeners	500
Other agricultural workers	2,000
Shop assistants	1,100
Leather workers	500
Commercial and clerical	5,000

Most of those registered were working women of previous experience, though not necessarily in the occupation for which they expressed a preference. There were some experienced women available for nearly all classes of occupations. Thus 1,500 of the applicants stated that they had had previous experience in agriculture, nearly 4,000 applicants had been previously employed as clerks, and over 1,000 in shops. These applications had all been sifted, and applications for women should be made to the local Labour Exchange.

Mr. Runciman then explained that steps were being taken, in consultation with the Home Office, to increase recruiting and the temporary substitution of women for men leaving in a number of trades. The actual work to which many of the women would be called would, of course, depend upon the success of these efforts in particular trades.

He explained that preference would be given to persons registered at local Labour Exchanges in any district where work was available rather than to those who were on the local special war service register, and, lastly, persons from a distance registered in other Labour Exchanges. Conferences had been arranged with the representatives interested in the cotton and basket making industries, but these were more prospective than immediate. One move which had recently been made to meet one of their desires was an instruction to Labour Exchanges to bring to the notice of persons registering the current rates of wages in the district. They had also agreed that in Government contracts the same piece rates should be paid to women as to men, but there was no rule laid down as to time rates. "But," added Mr. Runciman, "the most serious difficulty is the housing question, and that is where the women's organisations can be of the greatest value." The work of attending to the proper housing of workmen drafted into various districts could be far better done by them than by Government officials.

Mr. Runciman dealt with a number of these, and promised to communicate with the societies further with regard to others, with a view in particular of availing himself of the offers of help made.

633/34

Manchester Guardian, April 20th. 1915. 663

Women's Work and the War.

Last week the position of women and their work in relation to the war was discussed at two important conferences. On Friday there was held the conference organised by the War Emergency Workers' National Committee, at which the delegates passed resolutions demanding that adequate safeguards should be set up to prevent a depression in the standard of living and emphasising the principle of equal pay for women if work equal to men's were done. The conference also demanded that organised women workers should be represented on the Advisory Committee of Workers appointed by the Government. It was very unfortunate indeed that more delegates from women's trade unions should not have been invited to the conference held earlier in the week at the Board of Trade. Women's trade unions should take an equal place with men's, and the Government should recognise that it will be on surer ground in its solutions for the difficult problems of women's labour if it consults with the representatives of their trade unions. Just as the men's unions have been proving themselves of very great assistance because of their specialised knowledge of labour problems, and because the Government has wisely taken them into its confidence, so, too, if given their proper chance, the women's unions will undoubtedly be of immense assistance. For they have been gaining rich experience from the trying times through which they have been passing. In the case of men's trades the outbreak of war had caused considerable dislocation, but the number of enlistments averted a high percentage of unemployment. By the end of the year the fear of general unemployment had passed, for it was seen that the trouble was being confined more or less to the luxury trades. Matters have so changed that at present the important question is how can we spare men for the front and yet do as little injury as possible to trade. But the case is different in women's industries. Following the outbreak of war there was a very large contraction in women's employment. A large number were thrown out of work, while in some women's industries employment almost entirely ceased. Very large numbers, indeed, were put on short time, which in some cases was so short that it was practically equivalent to unemployment. The state of affairs was very much worse than in men's industries.

It was early seen that the position of the woman worker was to be a very serious one, and in August Mr. Samuel appointed a committee to consider schemes for the provision of work for unemployed women during the war. The Central Committee on Women's Employment is composed solely of women, and is important not only on that account but also because of the solid work it has done and the good results it has achieved. For purposes of relief work it set up workrooms where employment has been provided which is of such a nature that the work done will not compete with ordinary industry. Besides teaching trades the Committee also established training centres in domestic economy, needlework, and hygiene. It has endeavoured to increase the labour value of those in its charge and at the same time has tried to give a very necessary training in home life. Besides setting up relief work the Committee went further and undertook business for itself on a considerable scale. It secured large orders from the War Office and from other sources for flannel and woollen goods, and these it distributed mainly among firms that were hit by the war, although some of the work was done in its own workshops. The work has been paid at trade union rates and trade union conditions have been observed. The Committee also financed a scheme for employing working girls on the land, which is likely to be permanent. While this work has been going on the position of women's trades has been gradually improving. By the end of the year, chiefly on account of large absorptions of women by the engineering, leather, and hosiery trades, the percentage of unemployment among women was greatly reduced, although it was still very much higher than the figure for men. The improvement has continued into the new year, and the percentage both for unemployment and for short time has gone down considerably, while the percentage of women who work overtime has gone up. Such statistics are, however, apt to be misleading. Short time, for example, may mean almost anything, and practically all that can be said is that while there has been very great improvement there is still considerable dislocation. On the ordinary Labour Exchange registers, for example, there are said to be between thirty and forty thousand names of women who are unemployed. In some trades, however, such as agriculture and tailoring, the supply of women falls considerably short of the demand.

During the last few weeks attention has been focused on the possibility of women entering men's industries and releasing men for service in the field, and the Government some time ago opened a registry for women who were willing to help in this way. Such women are, however, only to be used "if "there were not sufficient women available "on the ordinary Labour Exchange register "of the locality." Up to the beginning of April some 33,000 women had registered for war service, and there is little doubt that considerable use will be made of them. Armament firms will probably employ some of the 6,000 who have applied for such work, although there has already been very considerable expansion among the number of women employed in the manufacture of munitions of war. It is probable, too, that the present private conference in the cotton trade will lead to an increased employment of women in that industry. The time when there was a very clear-cut distinction between trades that were for men and trades that were for women is to a large extent past. Mobility between men's and women's trades has increased, just as mobility between different trades in the men's group has increased, because modern industry demands not so much specialised powers such as muscularity, but a general expertness and adaptability which has proved itself to be an attribute of women as well as of men. In normal times, however, the attempt to employ women in "men's trades" would be strongly resented by the trade unions, and even the plea of the necessities of the present crisis is being viewed with some suspicion. Women's wages are on a notoriously lower scale than men's, and since war began the unions have seen the cheaper labour of women, and even of children, being used to fill the places of men who have enlisted. Hence, not without reason, they fear that the employment of women at this time may be used as a means of lowering wages. They foresee, too, that the difficulty of securing industrial reinstatement after the war will be tremendously increased if women are filling war-vacancies at low wages. Hence the unions demand that adequate safeguards shall be set up against the under-payment of women's labour and to ensure that men who have been promised their places when the war is over shall get them. Were this done recruiting would undoubtedly proceed at a faster rate. The matter is no doubt so far covered by the Treasury agreement of March. But Mr. Runciman has indicated that firms other than armament firms are beyond his control. Strict safeguards of Trade yesterday between the President of the Board of Trade and representatives of a large number of women's organisations.

Mr. Runciman, in opening the proceedings, said that up to the beginning of April over 33,000 women had registered themselves on the special register for women for war service. Among the applications for service for which the women had registered themselves he noted especially the following:—

Armament workers	6,000
Clothing trades	4,000
Milkmaids and dairy workers	1,700
Gardeners	500
Other agricultural workers	2,000
Shop assistants	1,100
Leather workers	500
Commercial and clerical	5,000

Most of those registered were working women of previous experience, though not necessarily in the occupation for which they expressed a preference. There were some experienced women available for nearly all classes of occupations. Thus 1,500 of the applicants stated that they had had previous experience in agriculture, nearly 4,000 applicants had been previously employed as clerks, and over 1,000 in shops. These applications had all been sifted, and applications for women should be made to the local Labour Exchange.

Mr. Runciman then explained that steps were being taken, in consultation with the Home Office, to increase recruiting and the temporary substitution of women for men leaving in a number of trades. The actual work to which many of the women would be called would, of course, depend upon the success of these efforts in particular trades.

He explained that preference would be given to persons registered at local Labour Exchanges in any district where work was available rather than to those who were on the local special war service register, and, lastly, persons from a distance registered in other Labour Exchanges. Conferences had been arranged with the representatives interested in the cotton and basket making industries, but these were more prospective than immediate. One move which had recently been made to meet one of their desires was an instruction to Labour Exchanges to bring to the notice of persons registering the current rates of wages in the district. They had also agreed that in Government contracts the same piece rates should be paid to women as to men, but there was no rule laid down as to time rates. "But," added Mr. Runciman, "the most serious difficulty is the housing question, and that is where the women's organisations can be of the greatest value." The work of attending to the proper housing of workmen drafted into various districts could be far better done by them than by Government officials.

Mr. Runciman dealt with a number of these, and promised to communicate with the societies further with regard to others, with a view in particular of availing himself of the offers of help made.

Workers' National Committee, at which the delegates passed resolutions demanding that adequate safeguards should be set up to prevent a depression in the standard of living and emphasising the principle of equal pay for women if work equal to men's were done. The conference also demanded that organised women workers should be represented on the Advisory Committee of Workers appointed by the Government. It was very unfortunate indeed that more delegates from women's trade unions should not have been invited to the conference held earlier in the week at the Board of Trade. Women's trade unions should take an equal place with men's, and the Government should recognise that it will be on surer ground in its solutions for the difficult problems of women's labour if it consults with the representatives of their trade unions. Just as the men's unions have been proving themselves of very great assistance because of their specialised knowledge of labour problems, and because the Government has wisely taken them into its confidence, so, too, if given their proper chance, the women's unions will undoubtedly be of immense assistance. For they have been gaining rich experience from the trying times through which they have been passing. In the case of men's trades the outbreak of war had caused considerable dislocation, but the number of enlistments averted a high percentage of unemployment. By the end of the year the fear of general unemployment had passed, for it was seen that the trouble was being confined more or less to the luxury trades. Matters have so changed that at present the important question is how can we spare men for the front and yet do as little injury as possible to trade. But the case is different in women's industries. Following the outbreak of war there was a very large contraction in women's employment. A large number were thrown out of work, while in some women's industries employment almost entirely ceased. Very large numbers, indeed, were put on short time, which in some cases was so short that it was practically equivalent to unemployment. The state of affairs was very much worse than in men's industries.

It was early seen that the position of the woman worker was to be a very serious one, and in August Mr. SAMUEL appointed a committee to consider schemes for the provision of work for unemployed women during the war. The Central Committee on Women's Employment is composed solely of women, and is important not only on that account but also because of the solid work it has done and the good results it has achieved. For purposes of relief work it set up workrooms where employment has been provided which is of such a nature that the work done will not compete with ordinary industry. Besides teaching trades the Committee also established training centres in domestic economy, needlework, and hygiene. It has endeavoured to increase the labour value of those in its charge and at the same time has tried to give a very necessary training in home life. Besides setting up relief work the Committee went further and undertook business for itself on a considerable scale. It secured large orders from the War Office and from other trade union conditions have been observed. The Committee also financed a scheme for employing working girls on the land, which is likely to be permanent. While this work has been going on the position of women's trades has been gradually improving. By the end of the year, chiefly on account of large absorptions of women by the engineering, leather, and hosiery trades, the percentage of unemployment among women was greatly reduced, although it was still very much higher than the figure for men. The improvement has continued into the new year, and the percentage both for unemployment and for short time has gone down considerably, while the percentage of women who work overtime has gone up. Such statistics are, however, apt to be misleading. Short time, for example, may mean almost anything, and practically all that can be said is that while there has been very great improvement there is still considerable dislocation. On the ordinary Labour Exchange registers, for example, there are said to be between thirty and forty thousand names of women who are unemployed. In some trades, however, such as agriculture and tailoring, the supply of women falls considerably short of the demand.

During the last few weeks attention has been focused on the possibility of women entering men's industries and releasing men for service in the field, and the Government some time ago opened a registry for women who were willing to help in this way. Such women are, however, only to be used "if "there were not sufficient women available "on the ordinary Labour Exchange register "of the locality." Up to the beginning of April some 33,000 women had registered for war service, and there is little doubt that considerable use will be made of them. Armament firms will probably employ some of the 6,000 who have applied for such work, although there has already been very considerable expansion among the number of women employed in the manufacture of munitions of war. It is probable, too, that the present private conference in the cotton trade will lead to an increased employment of women in that industry. The time when there was a very clear-cut distinction between trades that were for men and trades that were for women is to a large extent past. Mobility between men's and women's trades has increased, just as mobility between different trades in the men's group has increased, because modern industry demands not so much specialised powers such as muscularity, but a general expertness and adaptability which has proved itself to be an attribute of women as well as of men. In normal times, however, the attempt to employ women in "men's trades" would be strongly resented by the trade unions, and even the plea of the necessities of the present crisis is being viewed with some suspicion. Women's wages are on a notoriously lower scale than men's, and since war began the unions have seen the cheaper labour of women, and even of children, being used to fill the places of men who have enlisted. Hence, not without reason, they fear that the employment of women at this time may be used as a means of lowering wages. They foresee, too, that the difficulty of securing industrial reinstatement after the war will be tremendously increased if women are filling war-vacancies at low wages. Hence the unions demand that adequate safeguards shall be set up against the under-payment of women's labour and to ensure that men who have been promised their places when the war is over shall get them. Were this done recruiting would undoubtedly proceed at a faster rate. The matter is no doubt so far covered by the Treasury agreement of March. But Mr. RUNCIMAN has indicated that firms other than armament firms are beyond his control. Strict safeguards should undoubtedly be laid down, and it should be made certain that where a woman is as efficient as the man she replaces she shall get the same wage, be she working by time or by piece. Less efficient workers should be paid in strict proportion. No nation can afford to degrade its women workers, and it is only by making such rules that we can prevent the exploitation of women's labour and keep the promises we have given to those who have left their jobs to fight our battles.

The North Mail,
April 20th. 1915.

CALL TO WOMEN.

Gateshead's Enthusiasm For War Service.

MRS RUNCIMAN'S ADVICE.

If enthusiasm displayed over an explanatory meeting can be taken as a criterion, then it is very evident the ladies of Gateshead are only too anxious to volunteer for war service.

Gateshead Town Hall could have been filled twice over last night with ladies who came to attend a meeting convened for the purpose of emphasising the necessity of women filling the gaps caused by the withdrawal of men from various phases of labour, and also to explain the system of registration.

So large was the attendance that three overflow meetings had to be held simultaneously. One was held in the small hall, presided over by Councillor Phillips; a second in the police court, Ald. Clough occupying the chair; whilst Mr T. Magnay conducted the third in the street.

The Mayor of Gateshead (Ald. Wardill), who presided, spoke of the probability of women being called upon to do men's work in the near future. The Corporation of the borough was endeavouring, so far as was possible, to set aside men for the purpose of making munitions.

Therefore there would be certain duties which women might be called on to fulfil in order that the government of the town might be carried on in the usual way.

Mrs Walter Runciman, the principal speaker, expressed delight at the way the women were showing themselves ready to respond to the call of their country. Since the beginning of the war she thought women had been doing all that lay within their power.

Now they wanted all the women who were willing and able to work to go to the nearest Labour Exchange and register their names. It was simply a part of the great big scheme to make full use of all the labour in the country. Their desire was to fill the gaps created by men going elsewhere, for they realised how necessary it was, if the war was to be brought to a speedy conclusion, to have more men in the fighting line and in munition factories.

Groundless Fear of Register.

Some people were rather afraid of the new war register, because they felt that with all these women registering themselves they might oust women who were really in need of employment.

That fear Mrs Runciman assured the meeting, was quite groundless, because the new war register would not in any way interfere with the existing Labour Exchange registers. It was only a reserve register, and therefore those who put their names down must not be disappointed if they were not called on for a little time.

They would not say they could do work as well as men—that might make the men unhappy—but they could say they could do it well enough.

The speaker emphasised the point that there was no intention to oust men. The men would come back to their "jobs" at the end of the war. There was not the slightest intention of making the register result in employers being able to obtain large supplies of cheap labour, so that they would feel they would never have to employ male labour again. They must see to it that women were paid according to what their work was worth.

She exhorted the women to go through with whatever they took in hand, and warned them against undertaking work in a rush of enthusiasm, then tiring and finally finding they could not continue with it.

Mrs Price, who also addressed the meeting, cited the Franco-German War, after which women were employed to a large extent in France. Hence it was that there were so many women running businesses in France. Those women were splendid citizens, and we did not want to be behind our Allies in that respect.

An address was also given by Miss Rokecliffe.

Newcastle Journal,
April 20th. 1915.

WOMEN WORKERS.

—:o:—

ENTHUSIASTIC MEETING AT GATESHEAD.

MRS RUNCIMAN'S APPEAL.

Last night a public meeting was held in Gateshead Town Hall in connection with the scheme for registering women workers during the war. The Mayor of the Borough (Ald W. E. Wardill) presided, and there were also on the platform the Mayoress (Mrs Wardill), Mrs Walter Runciman, Mrs Collier, Mrs Price, the Town Clerk (Mr W. Swinburne), Mrs W. Swinburne, Miss Rawcliffe, Mr and Mrs Morgan, Miss Noble, Capt. Estall, Mrs T. Harrison, Mr G. W. Tyas, Mr J. G. Lumsden, Mrs Colley, Mrs Simms, and others. There was a large attendance.

The Mayor said the Corporation of Gateshead were endeavouring to set aside men in order that they might make munitions of war if required, and there were important duties which women might be called upon to fulfil in order that the good government of the town might be carried on. The large attendance showed that the women of Gateshead were prepared to take their share of the work if necessary. (Applause.)

Part of a Big Scheme.

Mrs Walter Runciman said they did not appeal to women to do war service. From the beginning of the war women had done all they could to help. Women's societies had turned themselves into bodies to organise hospitals, comforts for the troops, and so forth. Now, however, they were asked to register themselves for a different kind of work. They wanted women to go to the nearest Labour Exchange and put down their names for whatever work they were willing to do.

This plan, Mrs Runciman added, was part of a big scheme to arrange, in the best possible way, to make full use of all labour in the country. When the war broke out there was a certain amount of unemployment, particularly among women. Now, they were happy to think, there was hardly any unemployment. Men were being more and more taken up, and women were stepping in to fill the gaps. They all knew how necessary it was for this war to be brought to a successful end, and the more men they had fighting in the battlefield the more men they had making munitions of war at home, the sooner the war would be over.

Some people, Mrs Runciman remarked, were rather afraid of this new war register. They said that there were many women already unemployed, and, if they had this new register, lots of women would go on to it who did not really need work, and so take jobs away from others who were really unemployed. That fear was groundless. The war register would not in any way interfere with the existing Labour Exchange. Women who urgently needed work must register in the old way at the Labour Exchange, and they would get the first chance of jobs which turned up. The new register was really a supplement to the ordinary register.

There were plenty of openings in agriculture at present, and she believed that classes would be arranged to enable women to learn milking and other dairy work. There was no intention to oust men and make this register a means for employers getting cheap labour, and feel that they need never again employ men at high wages. Women must see to it that their work was paid for according to its worth.

Miss Rawcliffe, Miss Price, and others also addressed the meeting.

Three overflow meetings were held, Councillor Philips, Alderman Clough, and Mr T. Magnay presiding.

663 II/35 663

Yorkshire Observer,
April 21st. 1915.

BRADFORD WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE

OFFERS TO WORK ON FARMS.

The question of the employment by farmers of women to replace men who are serving in His Majesty's Forces and to make up for the serious shortage of labour in agriculture was discussed at a special meeting of the Farmers' Committee of the Bradford Chamber of Trade last night. Mr. T. Rowling (chairman of the Farmers' Section) presided.

Messrs. Leach and Lightowler, representing the Board of Agriculture, attended the meeting, and Mr. Leach placed the Government scheme for the employment of female labour on farms before the committee. He said that the farmers themselves had not done what they might have done in letting the labour exchanges know what their wants were. It was of the utmost importance to the country, especially during the present crisis, that the product of the land should not suffer for the want of labour. There was a shortage of male labour in practically every industry, and men could not be found to replace farm hands who had enlisted. There had now been opened registers of women who would be prepared to do certain kinds of work on farms, and a good number were registered in Bradford. A few of them had general farm experience, and others had obtained theoretical knowledge of farming. The Board of Agriculture now desired to get into touch with the farmers through the labour exchanges, and they would tell them what they were prepared to do to combat the shortage of male labour. Many of the women were offering their services through patriotic reasons during the period of the war. The Board of Agriculture recommended that 12s. to 15s. per week was a fair wage for a woman, but the question of remuneration was for the employer and employed to agree upon.

During the discussion which followed it was stated that farming in the Bradford district was not of the character most suitable for female labour, but the chairman pointed out that a woman who would learn to milk and would fill in her time in house-work would release one man for the service of the nation.

It was decided to circularise the farmers of the district and call a meeting to consider the subject further.

Daily Mail,
April 22nd. 1915.

"WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN."

To the Editor of The Daily Mail.

Sir,—With regard to "women volunteers," of whom over 33,000 have registered themselves, do they realise what they register for?

I heard the following conversation between two dear, willing ladies the other day as we emerged from a meeting in London in connection with women's war work:—

First Lady: "Well, what will you register for?"

Second Lady: "Oh, well, I can look after chickens. I would not mind the country in the summer."

How many other women will register with the doubtful realisation of what the work is that they register for and whether it be paid work or not?

That sort of half-hearted (though quite unintentional) self-interested spirit is not what we women must be or which is expected of the women of England. Women are called upon, if only through a sense of duty and loyalty, to fight for their country every bit as much as men. We register our names so that we can take the place of men needed for active service; therefore before we register we must think it out and realise that we are prepared to work, ready to face dangers, and to rough it possibly, willingly, self-forgetting. And we can help each other by getting each other to realise what we really are ready to do.

We by registering are placing ourselves in the "firing line" at home, quick to act, ready to endure.

Women are needed who will think nothing of getting up before six on cold winter mornings and wading through snow and cutting winds in the dark to feed the chickens and any other duty we may be called upon to perform, for payment or otherwise. Our work is needed in winter, not only summer—and we are going to be prepared to face the worst at once and get ready for hardships. Then we can say we are taking the place of our menfolk.

A WOMAN WORKER.

Belfast News Letter,
April 22nd. 1915.

663 II/36 663

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

Progress of the Belfast Register.

APPLICANTS AT THE OLD TOWN HALL.

Two or three weeks ago, with a view to keeping the trade of the country in an efficient condition, the Board of Trade issued a circular appealing to women who were willing to take the place in industry and commerce of men now serving with the colours to enter their names in a special register which has been prepared by the Labour Exchanges. The circular contained a patriotic call to women to do their part in contributing to their country's success in the great struggle which is now being waged; and, so far as can be ascertained, it seems to have elicited a very cordial and widespread response. In Belfast the scheme is being supported in a thoroughly practical manner by the Ulster Women's War Service League, an organisation which was brought into existence early in the present month, under the auspices of the Ulster Women's Unionist Council, to fulfil the particular function which it is now so admirably discharging. In a statement prepared by the League it was rightly pointed out that any woman who, by working, helps to release a man or equip a man for fighting does national war service. The movement is one which is deserving of the most generous and whole-hearted support on patriotic grounds, for every man who can be spared from his ordinary occupation is needed at the front. There are many classes of work in which women can supplant men for the time being, and if the services of the former are utilised they will feel proud of their new responsibility.

The Ulster Women's War Service League started "recruiting" at the Old Town Hall on the 14th inst., when about seventy applicants were interviewed. It has now been arranged to receive candidates at the Old Town Hall every Wednesday afternoon from 3 o'clock till 5-30, and with the object of meeting the convenience of women living in various districts of the city branch offices have been opened in the North-East Unionist Club, Brougham Street; the Sandy Row Orange Hall, the Willowfield Unionist Club, and the West Belfast Orange Hall. In the north, south, and east districts representatives of the League will attend each Thursday night from 8 to 9-30, whilst candidates will be received at the West Belfast Orange Hall each Tuesday night. Some time before the League offices at the Unionist Headquarters were re-opened yesterday a long queue of women and girls had been formed, and it was deemed advisable to admit the applicants individually, so as to avoid any trouble or confusion in connection with the task of registration. Mrs. Wheeler and a large staff of lady workers were on duty in one of the rooms which have been allocated to the League, and the work was got through very expeditiously. A considerable proportion of the candidates was composed of girls who have been employed in mills and factories, and who wanted work similar to that to which they had been accustomed. Many of them were apparently under the impression that the League was akin to the Labour Exchange in reference to the securing of employment for applicants, and the circumstances had therefore to be explained to them. But other women who presented themselves did not want employment except in so far as the taking of it would enable them to serve their country, and they were quite ready to attempt any class of work which might be entrusted to them, no matter whether it should be on the farm or in an ammunition factory. These women have initiative, and would probably soon adapt themselves to any occupation requiring no more than an average amount of skill and judgment. But the largest section of the applicants consisted of girls who had been in mills and factories, and who would not easily take to new conditions and surroundings. They would, however, do splendidly in any mechanical work which might be given them, and in a factory for the making of munitions of war or some kindred undertaking they would prove exceedingly useful. If such a factory were established in Belfast, the necessary labour would be available immediately, and it is certain that a high standard of discipline and efficiency would be maintained without much difficulty, having regard to the patriotic fervour which prevails amongst our women and their eager desire to do their part in bringing about the defeat of the enemy.

Certain preliminary questions, relating to her experience and other qualifications, is put to each candidate as she enters the office, and if these should be satisfactorily answered the applicant fills up a form giving her name and address and the kind of work for which she is best fitted. It is specifically pointed out to each woman that she is undertaking the work, if she should ultimately be accepted, from the highest patriotic motives, and she is asked to sign a form pledging herself to give up any position to which she may be appointed at the close of the war. This proviso is necessary because of the fact that one of the aims of the League is to ensure that the places vacated by men who have gone to the war shall be open for them on their return home at the close of the campaign. The occupations in which the women volunteering in Belfast are willing to serve are very varied. A goodly number of the candidates have had experience of dairy and farm work, whilst others are machinists, and a few have had experience of the working of the telephone or the telegraph. The Daily Express, April 22nd. 1915.

45,000 WOMEN WAR WORKERS.

DRIVING MOTOR VANS AND OMNIBUSES.

ALL CLASSES.

Forty-five thousand women have already sent in their names to the Board of Trade as willing to take the places of men, so that they may be free to enlist.

This response to the Board of Trade's appeal—which was first suggested a month ago by the "Daily Express"—must be regarded as satisfactory in every way.

During the last month situations have been found for many of the women in the following positions usually held by men:—

Railway clerks	Night telephone operators
Railway porters	Bookstall clerks
Ticket collectors	Motor-van drivers
Stationmasters	Pithead labourers
Omnibus and tram conductors	Farmhands
Grocers' assistants	Lift attendants
Packers	Milk purveyors
Messengers

"Quite one of the most interesting things in connection with this appeal for women helpers," said Miss Elkins, of the Labour Exchange at Queen Anne's-chambers, Westminster, to a "Daily Express" representative yesterday, "is the widely different classes of people who have replied and offered themselves as workers.

"Not a few come from the highest class. Most of those are expert motorists, and offer their services as van drivers or even chauffeurs. The middle classes seem willing to do anything. There have also been many applications from the lower classes.

"An especially large number of servants have applied. Many seem to be out of work owing to the practising of economy in so many households. Others, on the other hand, are seeking to improve their position, while not a few are out for an adventure.

"A fair number of university graduates have also offered their services and have stated their willingness to undertake work in connection with which, very often, a B.A. degree seems of but little use.

"Several women have applied for work as taxicab drivers, but the Home Office refuse at present to grant them licences. In Scotland, however, women omnibus and tram conductors have appeared, while in London one large firm has already engaged a number of women as motor-van drivers for their London and country rounds. The woman driver of a taxicab may, therefore, appear very shortly."

The London firm in question is Harrods, who have already engaged eight women drivers and a number of women porters, who accompany the drivers on the van.

"These women have proved most satisfactory," said Mr. Allen, the staff superintendent, to a "Daily Express" representative yesterday. "They work the same hours as the men, but receive slightly less pay. They show no signs of being tired at the end of the day's work.

"In addition to these women drivers, we have many women porters and packers, and all through the firm we are releasing as many men as we can and employing all the women we can. They vary in class from the highest to the lowest."

WOMEN DRIVERS.

A representative of the firm who was in charge of the packing and delivery van garage was most enthusiastic about the work of the women.

"The drivers we have so far are most satisfactory," he said. "They do not, of course, yet know the districts so well as the men, but they are learning very quickly. They are really good and careful drivers. They have had few accidents, and what few they have had have been unavoidable.

"A thing which has impressed itself on me very much is the improved apparent health of these women drivers and porters since they came here. Several of the porters had been servants. They were white-faced and ill-looking when they came. Now the open air and variety have altered all that, and they look almost rudely well.

"Down in the packing and sorting department, as well, where now almost all are women, the women seem much less tired at the end of the day than the men. We cannot get men if we wanted them.

"The men in the garage do not like the change. Several drivers and porters refuse to go out on the cars with the women. Most of these men are married, you know, and I think that much of this refusal may be due to domestic reasons."

There are four women ticket-collectors at Paddington. An official in the office of the superintendent of the line told a "Daily Express" representative that little could be said about their work at present.

"It is merely an experiment," he said, "and it would not be fair to the four women to say much. So far, they are quite satisfactory. They wear blue uniforms, white hats, and white armlets. Their hours are less than the men's, and so is their pay."

WOMEN TRAM CONDUCTORS.

The Glasgow Corporation Tramway Committee decided yesterday to engage as many additional women as tramcar conductors as will be necessary to fill the vacancies created by men who have joined the forces.

Nearly 400 women will be required. The corporation offers a wage of 27s. weekly, with a service uniform.

A dozen women are already employed in this capacity, and the successful result of the experiment has influenced the committee to extend the employment.

Morning Post,
April 22nd. 1915.

House of Commons.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

Mr. J. M. ROBERTSON, in reply to Mr. HOGGE, said the object of the appeal to women to register at the Labour Exchanges was to find out what reserve of force of women's labour, trained or untrained, could be made available if required to meet the needs of the present emergency. At the Census of 1911 there were 15,650,778 women between the ages of fifteen and sixty-five. At the present time probably about 5,500,000 women between the ages of fifteen and sixty-five were occupied. The nature of any training given and the arrangements for giving it would depend in each case upon the nature of the work for which employers desired to engage the women. In the case of agriculture, where a certain number of women were already being trained, the training was being given at Agricultural Colleges, and maintenance grants had been provided by the Development Commission.

Mr. HOGGE—Is agriculture the only industry in which these women specially registered have been used so far?

Mr. J. M. ROBERTSON—No, but it is the only one in which training has been specially given.

In reply to a further question from Mr. HOGGE,

Mr. J. M. ROBERTSON said: A number of resolutions have been received from women's organisations offering co-operation with the Board of Trade in connection with the scheme of war service for women, and the President of the Board of Trade had a conference with representatives of a number of the principal women's organisations on April 13. He hopes to make a full use of these offers of co-operation, which he values very much.

serving with the colours to enter their names in a special register which has been prepared by the Labour Exchanges. The circular contained a patriotic call to women to do their part in contributing to their country's success in the great struggle which is now being waged; and, so far as can be ascertained, it seems to have elicited a very cordial and widespread response. In Belfast the scheme is being supported in a thoroughly practical manner by the Ulster Women's War Service League, an organisation which was brought into existence early in the present month, under the auspices of the Ulster Women's Unionist Council, to fulfil the particular function which it is now so admirably discharging. In a statement prepared by the League it was rightly pointed out that any woman who, by working, helps to release a man or equip a man for fighting does national war service. The movement is one which is deserving of the most generous and whole-hearted support on patriotic grounds, for every man who can be spared from his ordinary occupation is needed at the front. There are many classes of work in which women can supplant men for the time being, and if the services of the former are utilised they will feel proud of their new responsibility.

The Ulster Women's War Service League started "recruting" at the Old Town Hall on the 14th inst., when about seventy applicants were interviewed. It has now been arranged to receive candidates at the Old Town Hall every Wednesday afternoon from 3 o'clock till 5-30, and with the object of meeting the convenience of women living in various districts of the city branch offices have been opened in the North-East Unionist Club, Brougham Street; the Sandy Row Orange Hall, the Willowfield Unionist Club, and the West Belfast Orange Hall. In the north, south, and east districts representatives of the League will attend each Thursday night from 8 to 9-30, whilst candidates will be received at the West Belfast Orange Hall each Tuesday night. Some time before the League offices at the Unionist Headquarters were re-opened yesterday a long queue of women and girls had been formed, and it was deemed advisable to admit the applicants individually, so as to avoid any trouble or confusion in connection with the task of registration. Mrs. Wheeler and a large staff of lady workers were on duty in one of the rooms which have been allocated to the League, and the work was got through very expeditiously. A considerable proportion of the candidates was composed of girls who have been employed in mills and factories, and who wanted work similar to that to which they had been accustomed. Many of them were apparently under the impression that the League was akin to the Labour Exchange in reference to the securing of employment for applicants, and the circumstances had therefore to be explained to them. But other women who presented themselves did not want employment except in so far as the taking of it would enable them to serve their country, and they were quite ready to attempt any class of work which might be entrusted to them, no matter whether it should be on the farm or in an ammunition factory. These women have initiative, and would probably soon adapt themselves to any occupation requiring no more than an average amount of skill and judgment. But the largest section of the applicants consisted of girls who had been in mills and factories, and who would not easily take to new conditions and surroundings. They would, however, do splendidly in any mechanical work which might be given them, and in a factory for the making of munitions of war or some kindred undertaking they would prove exceedingly useful. If such a factory were established in Belfast, the necessary labour would be available immediately, and it is certain that a high standard of discipline and efficiency would be maintained without much difficulty, having regard to the patriotic fervour which prevails amongst our women and their eager desire to do their part in bringing about the defeat of the enemy.

Certain preliminary questions, relating to her experience and other qualifications, is put to each candidate as she enters the office, and if these should be satisfactorily answered the applicant fills up a form giving her name and address and the kind of work for which she is best fitted. It is specificially pointed out to each woman that she is undertaking the work, if she should ultimately be accepted, from the highest patriotic motives, and she is asked to sign a form pledging herself to give up any position to which she may be appointed at the close of the war. This proviso is necessary because of the fact that one of the aims of the League is to ensure that the places vacated by men who have gone to the war shall be open for them on their return home at the close of the campaign. The occupations in which the women volunteering in Belfast are willing to serve are very varied. A goodly number of the candidates have had experience of dairy and farm work, whilst others are machinists, and a few have had experience of the working of the telephone or the telegraph. The names of the applicants are sent from the offices of the League to the Labour Exchange in Frederick Street, where they are entered in a special register. Then the needs of employers, as furnished to the Exchange, are ascertained, and if the women who have volunteered for war service have the requisite qualifications they are recommended for any situations which may be open at the time, the understanding being that in offering themselves for employment their primary object is to serve the State in a great national emergency.

The number of women recruits registered at the Old Town Hall yesterday was 244, an exceedingly gratifying total.

. Forty-five thousand women have already sent in their names to the Board of Trade as willing to take the places of men, so that they may be free to enlist.

This response to the Board of Trade's appeal—which was first suggested a month ago by the "Daily Express"—must be regarded as satisfactory in every way.

During the last month situations have been found for many of the women in the following positions usually held by men:—

Railway clerks	Night telephone operators
Railway porters	Bookstall clerks
Ticket collectors	Motor-van drivers
Stationmasters	Pithead labourers
Omnibus and tram conductors	Farmhands
Grocers' assistants	Lift attendants
Packers	Milk purveyors
Messengers

"Quite one of the most interesting things in connection with this appeal for women helpers," said Miss Elkins, of the Labour Exchange at Queen Anne's-chambers, Westminster, to a "Daily Express" representative yesterday, "is the widely different classes of people who have replied and offered themselves as workers.

"Not a few come from the highest class. Most of those are expert motorists, and offer B.A. degree seems of but little use.

"Several women have applied for work as taxicab drivers, but the Home Office refuse at present to grant them licences. In Scotland, however, women omnibus and tram conductors have appeared, while in London one large firm has already engaged a number of women as motor-van drivers for their London and country rounds. The woman driver of a taxicab may, therefore, appear very shortly."

The London firm in question is Harrods, who have already engaged eight women drivers and a number of women porters, who accompany the drivers on the van.

"These women have proved most satisfactory," said Mr. Allen, the staff superintendent, to a "Daily Express" representative yesterday. "They work the same hours as the men, but receive slightly less pay. They show no signs of being tired at the end of the day's work.

"In addition to these women drivers, we have many women porters and packers, and all through the firm we are releasing as many men as we can and employing all the women we can. They vary in class from the highest to the lowest."

WOMEN DRIVERS.

A representative of the firm who was in charge of the packing and delivery van garage was most enthusiastic about the work of the women.

"The drivers we have so far are most satisfactory," he said. "They do not, of course, yet know the districts so well as the men, but they are learning very quickly. They are really good and careful drivers. They have had few accidents, and what few they have had have been unavoidable.

"A thing which has impressed itself on me very much is the improved apparent health of these women drivers and porters since they came here. Several of the porters had been servants. They were white-faced and ill-looking when they came. Now the open air and variety have altered all that, and they look almost rudely well.

"Down in the packing and sorting department, as well, where now almost all are women, the women seem much less tired at the end of the day than the men. We cannot get men if we wanted them.

"The men in the garage do not like the change. Several drivers and porters refuse to go out on the cars with the women. Most of these men are married, you know, and I think that much of this refusal may be due to domestic reasons."

There are four women ticket-collectors at Paddington. An official in the office of the superintendent of the line told a "Daily Express" representative that little could be said about their work at present.

"It is merely an experiment," he said, "and it would not be fair to the four women to say much. So far, they are quite satisfactory. They wear blue uniforms, white hats, and white armlets. Their hours are less than the men's, and so is their pay."

WOMEN TRAM CONDUCTORS.

The Glasgow Corporation Tramway Committee decided yesterday to engage as many additional women as tramcar conductors as will be necessary to fill the vacancies created by men who have joined the forces.

Nearly 400 women will be required. The corporation offers a wage of 27s. weekly, with a service uniform.

A dozen women are already employed in this capacity, and the successful result of the experiment has influenced the committee to extend the employment.

Morning Post,
April 22nd 1915.

House of Commons.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

Mr. J. M. ROBERTSON, in reply to Mr. HOGGE, said the object of the appeal to women to register at the Labour Exchanges was to find out what reserve of force of women's labour, trained or untrained, could be made available if required to meet the needs of the present emergency. At the Census of 1911 there were 15,650,778 women between the ages of fifteen and sixty-five. At the present time probably about 5,500,000 women between the ages of fifteen and sixty-five were occupied. The nature of any training given and the arrangements for giving it would depend in each case upon the nature of the work for which employers desired to engage the women. In the case of agriculture, where a certain number of women were already being trained, the training was being given at Agricultural Colleges, and maintenance grants had been provided by the Development Commission.

Mr. HOGGE—Is agriculture the only industry in which these women specially registered have been used so far?

Mr. J. M. ROBERTSON—No, but it is the only one in which training has been specially given.

In reply to a further question from Mr. HOGGE,

Mr. J. M. ROBERTSON said: A number of resolutions have been received from women's organisations offering co-operation with the Board of Trade in connection with the scheme of war service for women, and the President of the Board of Trade had a conference with representatives of a number of the principal women's organisations on April 13. He hopes to make a full use of these offers of co-operation, which he values very much.

Church Family Newspaper, April 23rd. 1915.

EQUAL PAY FOR WOMEN WORKERS.

REASONS FOR INEQUALITY.

BY SARAH A. TOOLEY.

For women to-day the air is full of the old cry from Macedonia, "Come over and help us." The stern national crisis in which we are plunged has developed a need for the work of women which has never before exercised a Government or the public mind.

After decades of struggle to have the right to work, not only in the lucrative professions, but in the average occupations requiring fair education and some technical skill, woman at length finds herself in urgent demand to fill the places of the men who are bravely fighting for our country. Upwards of 33,000 women have responded to the Government's appeal for war service, and we have Lord Robert Cecil bemoaning that the number is so small compared with the eight to ten million women in the country.

Women are ready, in the phraseology of the trenches, to do "their bit"; eager indeed to engage in any and every kind of work, but in the patriotic enthusiasm of the moment a danger arises lest they may set back the clock in the future by accepting a lower rate of remuneration than that paid to the men whose places they are filling or whose places they are being trained to fill. It would be a deplorable outcome of women's war service, if, after peace, the returning men found the rates of pay lowered by the temporary employment of women in various trades and occupations.

It sounds a mere truism to say that women should have equal pay with men for equal work. This was brought forward by speaker after speaker at the deputation of representative women received by Mr. Runciman at the Board of Trade last week, and was strongly emphasized at the Conference at Caxton Hall of the War Emergency Workers' National Committee.

Women and the Advisory Committee

Mrs. Creighton's suggestion that women should be on the Advisory Committee to aid the Government in the regulation of women's work in war service, appeared to be favourably received by Mr. Runciman, and as the women members would, we take it, be conversant with labour organisations, it should prove a safeguard against the exploitation of women as "cheap" workers.

The President of the Board of Trade has announced that it has been laid down by Government contractors that the piece rates for women should be the same as for men, and special instructions have been given to the Labour Exchanges that inexperienced applicants should be fully apprised as to the wages which it was reasonable for them to ask. This is so much to the good.

The present Government schemes for the employment of women brings up standing grievances. To the average mind, unfettered by red tape, it seems a simple, practical proposition that where a woman is doing the same work as a man she should receive the same rate of pay. Yet we know that in the teaching profession women receive lower rates of salary than men, and that a similar inequality exists in the postal and telegraph departments and in the Civil Service generally.

The appointment of the first woman Commissioner under the Insurance Act, at the same salary as the male Commissioners, raised a pæan of jubilation which pointed only too eloquently to the fact that she was crowned with unique and absolutely unprecedented laurels. Miss Mona Wilson wears the blue ribbon of sex equality in Government pay.

If we turn to clerical work in business houses, it is the exception for the girl clerk or typist to be paid as high a rate as her male colleague, yet employers testify to the reliability and skill of their women workers.

favourite restaurant Eve has got into the habit of lunching on sardines on toast while Adam fares sumptuously on steak and kidney pie.

Thus the employer may argue that as a girl does not require to spend as much on food, her scale of pay may be arranged accordingly. But the twentieth-century girl has abandoned the lackadaisical Victorian tradition. Out-door sports and exercises give her a healthy appetite, and if she is to keep fit for earning her livelihood she must demand wages to satisfy that appetite.

The second reason for the underpayment of women, that of inefficiency, cannot be urged in regard to trained workers in teaching, clerical, and post-office occupations, for example, where the average capability is much the same between men and women, neither can it affect the demand that there should be equal pay for equal work, which in itself assumes efficiency.

Still, lack of training has been at the root of the work problem as it affects women. Parents trained their sons for a trade or a profession as a matter of course, leaving the daughters to secure husbands or sink into an old maidenhood of impecunious incapability.

That is changing, and the better-educated and enlightened young woman of to-day is not a person merely to be bartered in marriage for a home. The increased numerical inequality between the sexes, which must result from the loss of so many brave men in this appalling war, makes it more imperative that women should be trained to be self-supporting. And it is satisfactory that side by side with schemes for providing women with employment are schemes for training them for their work.

What is Being Done.

The Women's Emergency Corps, which, with splendid perspicacity, began organising employment for women two days after the declaration of war, has made training a feature of its propaganda. Its toy-making department has done excellent work in providing a new industry for women, and appeals to the public for orders. The Corps has also trained some 200 women as taxi-cab drivers, but though they passed the necessary tests the authorities refused to license them because licenses have not been granted to women before. Recently the Corps has been successful in placing women on the Great Western Railway as carriage cleaners at a weekly wage of eighteen shillings.

The Queen's Work for Women Fund has also organised some training in women's industries, and wherever Queen Mary's influence is at work it may be assumed that precaution is taken to obtain a fair standard of pay.

The Government, too, is instituting training for women engaged in war services, particularly in the agricultural department. Many women and girls will be drafted from the towns into the agricultural districts, and the co-operation of local ladies and women's societies is asked for to give the newcomers a welcome and advise them as to lodgings. This opens a field of influence in country parishes which may be turned to good account by local ladies, who can do much to break down the prejudice against women engaging in gardening and agricultural pursuits, and by urging the new workers to ask for current rates of pay. The Y.W.C.A. has signified its willingness to help in the housing of girls going into strange districts.

An Example from Russia.

Mr. Stephen Graham related the other day that being in a remote country district of Russia when the war broke out, he said to the peasants, "What will become of the harvest now all the men

---

Daily Mail
April 23rd. 1915.

PAYMENT OF WOMEN WORKERS.

To the Editor of The Daily Mail.

Sir,—I see it is reported that at a Mansion House meeting at York on April 10 Miss Thornton, a Board of Trade representative, quotes Mr. Lloyd George's letter to me as having "amplified" the agreement which resulted from the recent Treasury conference between Mr. Lloyd George and Labour representatives.

I must protest against the correspondence between Mr. Lloyd George and myself being used to make women believe that women's sweated labour will not be employed to reduce the wages of men. Mr. Lloyd George stated that "women undertaking the work of men would get the same piece-work rates as men were receiving before the date of this agreement."

I replied to Mr. Lloyd George's letter asking for an assurance that if women are employed on time rates to replace men, those rates shall be the same as those that were hitherto paid to men. To this letter, which was sent on March 26, I have received no reply; but at the conference of women's societies, which was called at the Board of Trade on April 13, Mr. Runciman, President of the Board of Trade, said that in regard to Government contracts, while it had been decided that the same piece-work rates should be paid to women as to men, in regard to time rates no special conditions had been laid down with regard to women's labour. The general safeguard against women being used to displace men was that employers were being asked to take back those of their men who had served in the Army.

These words plainly show that there is absolutely no guarantee that women shall not be employed to do men's work at a lower rate. Whether the work of men has hitherto been paid by piece or by time, there is nothing to prevent women being engaged on time rates only, in which case the Government has expressly stated that it will exact no conditions.

From the woman's point of view it is unjust that women should be employed to do men's work at a lower rate; from the man's point of view it is disastrous. Guarantees to take men back into employment after the war is over can never be enforced, and if any proof of this were needed we may find it in the fact that promises by employers to make allowances to the wives of their workmen who are fighting at the front are already being broken on every hand.

E. SYLVIA PANKHURST.

400, Old Ford-road, Bow, E.

Aberdeen Free Press
April 23rd 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

ABERDEEN APPLICANTS.

450 ON WAR REGISTER.

Applications from Aberdeen women of all classes who are willing and anxious to help the country at the present time by filling situations and thus enabling more men to enlist in His Majesty's Forces are coming in daily to the Labour Exchange in Market Street, and the war register which is used exclusively for women desiring to render service in this way during the war now comprises 450 names.

In addition, the register of women for whom employment is absolutely necessary is still very high, and of course preference in finding positions is given to these. A great many suitable women on this latter register are available for work now, and the Labour Exchange has been placing them in situations at various occupations at an average of 60 a week.

It is intended to keep the war register as a reserve, but it will be readily apparent that it is necessary to have a large number on this register in order to meet any contingency that might arise during the period of war.

A great deal of organising work is being done, and there are likely to be a number of additional outlets for female labour. It is understood that the Great North of Scotland Railway Company are making special efforts to release as many men as possible for other service, and in certain cases, where suitable men are difficult to obtain, the places will be filled by women, who are to be temporarily employed as booking clerks and at other work suited to female labour. As is only fair, however, men who are not eligible for service in the Imperial forces will be given the first consideration before drawing upon the war register.

It may be mentioned that the railways in the south are now employing female labour to a large extent, women even being engaged as platform and goods porters. It is not anticipated that women will be required for work on the tramcars in Aberdeen, but it is interesting to note that a great many women here made application for tramway work.

A pleasing feature of the movement is the fact that applications for work of various kinds which have been received from ladies of the well-to-do classes almost invariably state that, if given employment, the applicants will hand over their wages for the benefit of those who are not so fortunately situated, and will readily relinquish their employment in favour of those who are under the necessity of earning their own livelihood, so it will be seen that there is no intention of depriving either men or women of their living.

Employers and various organisations in the city have been giving their hearty co-operation to Mr R. P. Duncan, manager of the Labour Exchange, in the work of finding suitable employment for women. It is believed of the men who are bravely fighting for our country. Upwards of 33,000 women have responded to the Government's appeal for war service, and we have Lord Robert Cecil bemoaning that the number is so small compared with the eight to ten million women in the country.

Women are ready, in the phraseology of the trenches, to do "their bit"; eager indeed to engage in any and every kind of work, but in the patriotic enthusiasm of the moment a danger arises lest they may set back the clock in the future by accepting a lower rate of remuneration than that paid to the men whose places they are filling or whose places they are being trained to fill. It would be a deplorable outcome of women's war service, if, after peace, the returning men found the rates of pay lowered by the temporary employment of women in various trades and occupations.

It sounds a mere truism to say that women should have equal pay with men for equal work. This was brought forward by speaker after speaker at the deputation of representative women received by Mr. Runciman at the Board of Trade last week, and was strongly emphasized at the Conference at Caxton Hall of the War Emergency Workers' National Committee.

Women and the Advisory Committee

Mrs. Creighton's suggestion that women should be on the Advisory Committee to aid the Government in the regulation of women's work in war service, appeared to be favourably received by Mr. Runciman, and as the women members would, we take it, be conversant with labour organisations, it should prove a safeguard against the exploitation of women as "cheap" workers.

The President of the Board of Trade has announced that it has been laid down by Government contractors that the piece rates for women should be the same as for men, and special instructions have been given to the Labour Exchanges that inexperienced applicants should be fully apprised as to the wages which it was reasonable for them to ask. This is so much to the good.

The present Government schemes for the employment of women brings up standing grievances. To the average mind, unfettered by red tape, it seems a simple, practical proposition that where a woman is doing the same work as a man she should receive the same rate of pay. Yet we know that in the teaching profession women receive lower rates of salary than men, and that a similar inequality exists in the postal and telegraph departments and in the Civil Service generally.

The appointment of the first woman Commissioner under the Insurance Act, at the same salary as the male Commissioners, raised a pæan of jubilation which pointed only too eloquently to the fact that she was crowned with unique and absolutely unprecedented laurels. Miss Mona Wilson wears the blue ribbon of sex equality in Government pay.

If we turn to clerical work in business houses, it is the exception for the girl clerk or typist to be paid as high a rate as her male colleague, yet employers testify to the reliability and skill of their women workers.

Five thousand women have volunteered under the war service scheme for commercial and clerical work, and every effort should be brought to bear on employers that they should pay the same rate to these girls and women as the men received whose posts they are filling.

Food or Efficiency?

One is driven to seek reasons for this inequality of pay as between young men and young women. Is it a question of food or of efficiency? The able-bodied young woman working hard in a city office requires as substantial a mid-day meal as the able-bodied young man similarly engaged. Adam's physique does not necessarily require the larger half of the apple, although in the Eden of her that appetite.

The second reason for the underpayment of women, that of inefficiency, cannot be urged in regard to trained workers in teaching, clerical, and post-office occupations, for example, where the average capability is much the same between men and women, neither can it affect the demand that there should be equal pay for equal work, which in itself assumes efficiency.

Still, lack of training has been at the root of the work problem as it affects women. Parents trained their sons for a trade or a profession as a matter of course, leaving the daughters to secure husbands or sink into an old maidenhood of impecunious incapability.

That is changing, and the better-educated and enlightened young woman of to-day is not a person merely to be bartered in marriage for a home. The increased numerical inequality between the sexes, which must result from the loss of so many brave men in this appalling war, makes it more imperative that women should be trained to be self-supporting. And it is satisfactory that side by side with schemes for providing women with employment are schemes for training them for their work.

What is Being Done.

The Women's Emergency Corps, which, with splendid perspicacity, began organising employment for women two days after the declaration of war, has made training a feature of its propaganda. Its toy-making department has done excellent work in providing a new industry for women, and appeals to the public for orders. The Corps has also trained some 200 women as taxi-cab drivers, but though they passed the necessary tests the authorities refused to license them because licenses have not been granted to women before. Recently the Corps has been successful in placing women on the Great Western Railway as carriage cleaners at a weekly wage of eighteen shillings.

The Queen's Work for Women Fund has also organised some training in women's industries, and wherever Queen Mary's influence is at work it may be assumed that precaution is taken to obtain a fair standard of pay.

The Government, too, is instituting training for women engaged in war services, particularly in the agricultural department. Many women and girls will be drafted from the towns into the agricultural districts, and the co-operation of local ladies and women's societies is asked for to give the newcomers a welcome and advise them as to lodgings. This opens a field of influence in country parishes which may be turned to good account by local ladies, who can do much to break down the prejudice against women engaging in gardening and agricultural pursuits, and by urging the new workers to ask for current rates of pay. The Y.W.C.A. has signified its willingness to help in the housing of girls going into strange districts.

An Example from Russia.

Mr. Stephen Graham related the other day that being in a remote country district of Russia when the war broke out, he said to the peasants, "What will become of the harvest now all the men are leaving for the front?" "We have no fear for the harvest," said the Cossacks as they mounted their horses, "The women will see to that," and we know that they did, and that they have planted and sown for the future harvest also. British women should not be behind if a like emergency arises.

One last thought with regard to the question of equality of pay for men and women performing the same work. I once heard a dignitary of the Church say that he counted it an insult to be given the Parliamentary vote simply because he had been born a man. The same line of argument may be applied to the giving of higher pay because of sex, irrespective of superior capability. The establishment of equality of pay for men and women performing the same work must add to the self-respect of every capable man.

have received no reply; but at the conference of women's societies, which was called at the Board of Trade on April 13, Mr. Runciman, President of the Board of Trade, said that in regard to Government contracts, while it had been decided that the same piece-work rates should be paid to women as to men, in regard to time rates no special conditions had been laid down with regard to women's labour. The general safeguard against women being used to displace men was that employers were being asked to take back those of their men who had served in the Army.

These words plainly show that there is absolutely no guarantee that women shall not be employed to do men's work at a lower rate. Whether the work of men has hitherto been paid by piece or by time, there is nothing to prevent women being engaged on time rates only, in which case the Government has expressly stated that it will exact no conditions.

From the woman's point of view it is unjust that women should be employed to do men's work at a lower rate; from the man's point of view it is disastrous. Guarantees to take men back into employment after the war is over can never be enforced, and if any proof of this were needed we may find it in the fact that promises by employers to make allowances to the wives of their workmen who are fighting at the front are already being broken on every hand.

E SYLVIA PANKHURST.

400, Old Ford-road, Bow, E.

Aberdeen Free Press
April 23rd 1918.

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

ABERDEEN APPLICANTS.

450 ON WAR REGISTER.

Applications from Aberdeen women of all classes who are willing and anxious to help the country at the present time by filling situations and thus enabling more men to enlist in His Majesty's Forces are coming in daily to the Labour Exchange in Market Street, and the war register which is used exclusively for women desiring to render service in this way during the war now comprises 450 names.

In addition, the register of women for whom employment is absolutely necessary is still very high, and of course preference in finding positions is given to these. A great many suitable women on this latter register are available for work now, and the Labour Exchange has been placing them in situations at various occupations at an average of 60 a week.

It is intended to keep the war register as a reserve, but it will be readily apparent that it is necessary to have a large number on this register in order to meet any contingency that might arise during the period of war.

A great deal of organising work is being done, and there are likely to be a number of additional outlets for female labour. It is understood that the Great North of Scotland Railway Company are making special efforts to release as many men as possible for other service, and in certain cases, where suitable men are difficult to obtain, the places will be filled by women, who are to be temporarily employed as booking clerks and at other work suited to female labour. As is only fair, however, men who are not eligible for service in the Imperial forces will be given the first consideration before drawing upon the war register.

It may be mentioned that the railways in the south are now employing female labour to a large extent, women even being engaged as platform and goods porters. It is not anticipated that women will be required for work on the tramcars in Aberdeen, but it is interesting to note that a great many women here made application for tramway work.

A pleasing feature of the movement is the fact that applications for work of various kinds which have been received from ladies of the well-to-do classes almost invariably state that, if given employment, the applicants will hand over their wages for the benefit of those who are not so fortunately situated, and will readily relinquish their employment in favour of those who are under the necessity of earning their own livelihood, so it will be seen that there is no intention of depriving either men or women of their living.

Employers and various organisations in the city have been giving their hearty co-operation to Mr R. P. Duncan, manager of the Labour Exchange, in the work of finding suitable employment for women. It is believed that in the near future the hospitals will require additional assistants for work similar to that done by probationary nurses, and there are many women on the registers who would be eligible for this class of work. In regard to nurseries it is also expected that there will be need of female labour. A new departure recently undertaken by the Labour Exchange was the sending of a number of women to employment at tree planting in the Stonehaven district, and the work they have done has been excellent, as is amply testified by letters of appreciation which have been received from employers.

The Railway Gazette, April 23rd. 1915.

663 TL/38 163

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN ON RAILWAYS.

The employment of women on railway work is extending apace. The underlying idea is that by getting the "fair sex" to fill the places of men, more and more recruits may enter the army and maintain the requisite supplies of soldiers. The urgency of the country's need is well known, and therefore we welcome the efforts that are being made by the railways to rise to the occasion. The Great Central Company appear to have led the way in providing women porters; the Great Western Railway have women ticket collectors and dining car attendants, while all the lines are employing an increasing number of women as clerks and for cleaning purposes. We are not prepared to say to what extent it may ultimately be necessary to go in the direction indicated. But it will be conceded that, except perhaps in grades engaged directly in connection with the movement of traffic, or in conditions in which a woman's dress might render her liable to risk, the more women who present themselves to take the places of men the better will it be for all. In this connection we may mention that the Board of Trade scheme for registration of women is fulfilling a most useful purpose, and we would advise all railways who are in need of assistance to avail themselves of the Register of Women for War Service.

Restaurant Car Waitress, G.W.R.

A word may perhaps be said in regard to wages. So far as we have been able to ascertain, the women who are being employed are being liberally paid. True, the standard of equality with men has not been adopted, nor would it be justifiable, but we would submit that no case exists or is likely to exist for any trade union agitation on the subject and we trust that any attempt to foment trouble will be promptly suppressed by the trade unions.

Yorkshire Post, April 26th. 1915.

THE GOVERNMENT APPEAL TO WOMEN FOR WAR SERVICE.

To the Editor of The Yorkshire Post.

Sir,—A very gratifying response was made, when, at very few days' notice, I held a mass meeting for women in the Town Hall, on March 30th, in furtherance of the above appeal. Since that time numbers of women have put down their names on the War Service Register at the Labour Exchange, but there must be many women who heard the speeches in the Town Hall and took away the official forms who have not yet returned them to the Labour Exchange. There seems to be an impression that one may as well wait until more particulars are forthcoming, and there is more likelihood of one's offer of service being accepted immediately.

Let me point out, however, that the Government have particularly asked us to register now, before more definite plans are made, in order that they may know what reserve of labour there is for them to organise. It is for us to offer ourselves, giving particulars of what we have done and think we could do, then to leave it in the hands of the organisers to say just when we are wanted and what work they think we are fitted for.

I would urge all women who are able to register to come forward at once in order that the scheme may be put in working order as quickly as possible.—Yours, etc.,

ELLEN B. BEDFORD, Lady Mayoress of Leeds.

The Town Hall, Leeds, April 23, 1915.

Daily News & Leader, April 23rd 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR WORK.

(To the Editor.)

Sir,—I see it is reported that at a Mansion House meeting at York on April 10 Miss Thornton, a Board of Trade representative, quotes Mr. Lloyd George's letter to me as having "amplified" the agreement which resulted from the recent Treasury Conference between Mr. Lloyd George and Labour representatives.

Mr. Lloyd George stated that "women undertaking the work of men would get the same piece-work rates as men were receiving before the date of this agreement."

I replied to Mr. Lloyd George's letter, asking for an assurance that if women are employed on time rates to replace men, these rates shall be the same as those that were hitherto paid to men. To this letter, which was sent on March 26, I have received no reply; but at the Conference of Women's Societies, which was called at the Board of Trade on April 13, Mr. Runciman, President of the Board of Trade, said that in regard to Government contracts, whilst it had been decided that the same piece-work rates should be paid to women as to men, in regard to time rates no special conditions had been laid down with regard to women's labour.

These words plainly show that there is absolutely no guarantee that women shall not be employed to do men's work at a lower rate

E. SYLVIA PANKHURST.

April 21.

Daily News & Leader, April 23rd 1915.

WAR WORK FOR WOMEN.

Fifty Thousand Names Expected at the Labour Exchanges.

In banks and public libraries and for agricultural pursuits and domestic work large numbers of women continue to offer themselves in the place of those who have joined the colours. Before the end of the month the national Labour Exchanges will have registered fully 50,000.

It is in outdoor employment that the innovation has attracted chief attention. Although coachwomen have not yet been seen in London, there have been applications in Ireland by women for employment to look after horses. At Paddington Station uniformed girls may be seen acting as ticket collectors. Under the direction of the Board of Trade the British Industries Fair to be held in London next month will undoubtedly furnish a considerable amount of employment for women as attendants.

Yesterday a "Daily News" representative learned that there is a steady growth of interest in the Women Signallers' Territorial Corps among the middle and higher classes of women. It is contended that no enterprise deserves more encouragement from the Government. In this corps women are trained in signalling and telegraphy. Within the last month unusual activity has taken place in the department of rifle and revolver shooting. Loans of halls are still urgently needed, and those interested are invited to communicate with the Corps at 184a, Oxford-street.

The Times, April 22nd 1915.

663

663 II | 39

WOMEN FOR MEN'S WORK.

RESPONSE IN LONDON.

A TRIBUTE TO PATRIOTISM.

The number of women who have already offered themselves for war service is approximately 45,000. This covers the number registered at the Women's Labour Exchanges throughout the country up to April 9. The classification of the figures available under the trades for which women are volunteering, though said to be for the most part completed, has not yet been issued by the Board of Trade.

Roughly speaking, the grouping of the three forms of war service for which most women have applied remains the same. Up to April 9 7,000 women had offered themselves for armament work, 6,000 for clerical work, and 5,000 for agriculture. In the latter dairy work continues to attract many women, the reason, perhaps, being that the Board of Trade has an arrangement with some of the agricultural colleges where they can be trained, places being found for them with farmers when they leave. The farmers, however, are not quite ready yet for a considerable influx of women.

In London the number of educated women coming forward is considerable, and in the total response for war service London stands, so far, first. Scotland, taken as a whole, comes next, and last of all Ireland and Wales. The results of the efforts of the Congregational ministers in Wales in calling attention to the matter in their churches are not yet known, but it is expected that the next computation of figures will show the Welsh women as more anxious to serve their country than would appear at present.

From many sources there comes news of the steady replacing by women of men eligible for the trenches. The banks all over the country are setting free large numbers of young men, and in one instance in a provincial bank, where two young women had thrown up good appointments in London to take over the work of bank clerks, their action was so much appreciated by the clerks of a rival bank in the same town that they made them a presentation of baskets of flowers and boxes of chocolate. Before the war the bank clerk was very jealous of any attempt at female intrusion.

Servants and Cleaners.

In large public libraries there is said to be some substitution of women workers going on, and the disappearance of the younger male servants in big establishments steadily continues. A post is waiting at the Labour Exchanges for a woman willing to go to the North of Ireland to do the work of a coachman, and one, as has been noted in The Times, has already replaced a man where a groom was kept, at Taplow. Women cleaners have been taken on in large firms almost everywhere, the example having been set by the Great Central Railway, where they were found to do their work more thoroughly than the men.

In view of the recognition of women in the medical service, and the rank of major bestowed on Dr. Garrett-Anderson for her work at the military hospital which she and Dr. Flora Murray are opening in Endell-street, it is curious to find that the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons still refuse to admit women. The matter was recently referred by the authorities of the College to their solicitor, and he decided that as only men students were admitted at the time the Charter was granted, only men students could be admitted in the future. The number of veterinary surgeons is not very large, only about 3,400 being on the register, and the demand from the Army and the civil authorities appears to be greater than the supply.

In the cigar and wine departments of some of the big stores women are now employed for the first time. On the other hand, in at least one big West-end drapery store devoted to women's needs, one may still see men of apparently military age directing feminine shoppers to the veilings, the ribbons, and other fripperies. The business of music-engraving, at the present moment almost entirely in the hands of alien men, will not have any war-service women, if the men can help it. One of the women's societies approached the trade union recently and received an intimation that there were no women in the trade, and they did not intend that there should be. As has already been stated, women are employed in this work in Paris and Leipzig, and at least one woman has been employed in London.

The Tramways Committee of the Glasgow Corporation yesterday decided that, in addition to the eight already serving, other women should be engaged as tramway-car conductors to fill the vacancies, 300 or 400 in number, created by men joining the Colours. The women will be paid 27s. a week.

663 II/40

663

The Daily Telegraph, April 24th. 1915.

WOMEN'S WAR WORK.

SUBSTITUTES FOR OFFICIALS.

BOARD OF TRADE CIRCULAR.

By Our Civil Service Correspondent.

As stated in The Daily Telegraph, in announcing the issue of a War Office circular to all Government offices, appealing for the release of more officials for the front, Earl Kitchener "confidently looks to the heads of departments to arrange, by finding suitable substitutes, for the necessary permission to be given freely to their subordinates who are prepared to join the colours." The Board of Trade, as the promoters of the scheme of women's war service, have now followed up Lord Kitchener's appeal by the issue of a circular to all Government departments offering women substitutes to replace all Civil servants who desire to join the colours.

This circular, for the first time, throws open every Government office to women, and demolishes, if only temporarily, the barrier of sex. Sir H. Llewelyn Smith, who signs it, states that he is directed by the Board of Trade to refer to the circular letter from the Army Council to Government Departments on the subject of enlistment in his Majesty's forces of officers of the Civil Services of the Crown.

He points out that a large number of women clerks have registered at the Labour Exchanges, and considerable numbers of those so registered have been engaged by Government Departments. In addition, a special register is being compiled by the Labour Exchanges of women who, in response to an appeal issued by the President of the Board, have signified their willingness to undertake service during the continuance of the war, to release men for combatant duties. From this register, which already includes over 30,000 names, and from the Labour Exchanges' register, it would be possible to supply a large number of women clerks qualified to take the places of officers who may be released for service with the colours.

OVER 1,000 OFFICIALS RELEASED.

Up to April 14 the Board of Trade have released over 1,000 officials for service with the colours, and in a large number of cases the men released have been replaced by women. If desired, the Board of Trade will be glad to make arrangements with the Civil Service Commission for the supply through them of temporary women clerks on similar lines to those already in force with regard to temporary men clerks. It is, therefore, suggested that should it be desired to engage women clerks, communication should be made with the Civil Service Commission and the probable nature of the requirements of each department indicated.

In a previous article I wrote: "By the employment of women in Government offices hundreds of Civil servants of military age who are eager to enlist could be released for the front," and it is satisfactory to find the idea now adopted by the Board of Trade. It remains to be seen what answer the heads of departments will make to the War Office and Board of Trade circulars. A great responsibility is theirs, and it is to be hoped that the lesser will not in their minds outweigh the greater need. At a time like this could not much of the routine be relaxed, many of the usual returns, &c., dispensed with?

In every branch of its many services, the Board of Trade, perhaps our most progressive department, is now surveying the work, in order to find out to what extent men of recruitable age may be replaced by women. It has been for years the great ambition of women and their various societies to force open the doors of the Government services. Their opportunity has come at last.

Morning Post, April 24th. 1915.

WAR WORK FOR WOMEN.

NEARLY 50,000 REGISTRATIONS.

The number of women who have registered in connection with the War Service for Women scheme is now between 45,000 and 50,000. Employers are interesting themselves more and more in the scheme, for as recruiting for the Army increases they find it necessary to make known their wants to the Central Office of the Labour Exchanges, St. Anne's Chambers, Westminster. The result is that the department is receiving heavy demands for women in industries where there is a shortage of labour and in large concerns where up till now men could not be released for military service. The Government has set an example to employers in releasing men. A few months ago young men employed in some Government departments who wished to enlist were informed that they could not be spared, as their places could not be filled. But since the War Work for Women scheme was put into operation a large number of women and girls have received temporary appointments, particularly in the Labour Exchanges and the Post Office. Following the lead of the Government, several of the large railway companies are replacing their clerks who have enlisted by women. More women are being trained by grocery firms, and in London women have begun to be employed as motor-van drivers. Since waiters of German and Austrian origin are no longer in favour in restaurants, proprietors of the larger establishments, who have not been able to obtain a sufficient number of British waiters, many of whom have joined the Colours, have applied to the Central Office of the Labour Exchanges for waitresses. More women are also being employed as lift attendants. The experiment of employing women on tramcars in Glasgow is being developed. It is understood that the London County Council have been approached with a view to women being employed as tramcar conductors, but a difficulty has been presented as to the long hours worked, and nothing has been done in the matter.

So far the Trade Unions have not offered any serious opposition to the employment of women in trades where the shortage of labour is manifest. But the leaders of women Trade Unionists have expressed concern as to what is to become of women who have replaced men when the war is over. The view is held that where women have made themselves economically independent they should not be disturbed. It is pointed out, however, that the scheme is only intended to operate during the war, and that thousands of the women who have registered have done so from patriotic motives. They realise that when the war is over the men they have replaced will return to their old positions. But a shortage of male labour in some industries is expected after the war, and it is thought that a proportion of the women who have registered for war service, and who desire to remain at work, will be able to continue for some time.

Sussex Daily News, April 2nd. 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

Sir,—Women have been called upon to register for "War Service" that it may be known what reserve of workers exists in the country ready to supply the place of men who have joined, or are joining, the new armies. Hundreds of educated women have already responded to the call. The National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies has been invited by the Board of Trade to co-operate in carrying out the Government's proposals and for the organization of women's work at this crisis, and accordingly our headquarters—which, indeed, from the beginning of the war urged the adoption of such a course—while expressing willingness to help emphasize the three following points as essential:

1.—Equal pay for equal work; no undercutting.
2.—The great importance of training.
3.—The securing of good conditions as to housing, &c., specially in agricultural districts.

There must be professional women in Brighton and Hove who have lost their work through the war, and leisured women wishing to serve their country at this juncture, who would like to take advantage of the opportunity to offer for paid work under the above scheme. Registration forms can [illegible]

663 II/40

663

The Daily Telegraph, April 24th. 1915.

WOMEN'S WAR WORK.

SUBSTITUTES FOR OFFICIALS.

BOARD OF TRADE CIRCULAR.

By Our Civil Service Correspondent.

As stated in The Daily Telegraph, in announcing the issue of a War Office circular to all Government offices, appealing for the release of more officials for the front, Earl Kitchener "confidently looks to the heads of departments to arrange, by finding suitable substitutes, for the necessary permission to be given freely to their subordinates who are prepared to join the colours." The Board of Trade, as the promoters of the scheme of women's war service, have now followed up Lord Kitchener's appeal by the issue of a circular to all Government departments offering women substitutes to replace all Civil servants who desire to join the colours.

This circular, for the first time, throws open every Government office to women, and demolishes, if only temporarily, the barrier of sex. Sir H. Llewelyn Smith, who signs it, states that he is directed by the Board of Trade to refer to the circular letter from the Army Council to Government Departments on the subject of enlistment in his Majesty's forces of officers of the Civil Services of the Crown.

He points out that a large number of women clerks have registered at the Labour Exchanges, and considerable numbers of those so registered have been engaged by Government Departments. In addition, a special register is being compiled by the Labour Exchanges of women who, in response to an appeal issued by the President of the Board, have signified their willingness to undertake service during the continuance of the war, to release men for combatant duties. From this register, which already includes over 30,000 names, and from the Labour Exchanges' register, it would be possible to supply a large number of women clerks qualified to take the places of officers who may be released for service with the colours.

OVER 1,000 OFFICIALS RELEASED.

Up to April 14 the Board of Trade have released over 1,000 officials for service with the colours, and in a large number of cases the men released have been replaced by women. If desired, the Board of Trade will be glad to make arrangements with the Civil Service Commission for the supply through them of temporary women clerks on similar lines to those already in force with regard to temporary men clerks. It is, therefore, suggested that should it be desired to engage women clerks, communication should be made with the Civil Service Commission and the probable nature of the requirements of each department indicated.

In a previous article I wrote: "By the employment of women in Government offices hundreds of Civil servants of military age who are eager to enlist could be released for the front," and it is satisfactory to find the idea now adopted by the Board of Trade. It remains to be seen what answer the heads of departments will make to the War Office and Board of Trade circulars. A great responsibility is theirs, and it is to be hoped that the lesser will not in their minds outweigh the greater need. At a time like this could not much of the routine be relaxed, many of the usual returns, &c., dispensed with?

In every branch of its many services, the Board of Trade, perhaps our most progressive department, is now surveying the work, in order to find out to what extent men of recruitable age may be replaced by women. It has been for years the great ambition of women and their various societies to force open the doors of the Government services. Their opportunity has come at last.

Morning Post, April 24th. 1915.

WAR WORK FOR WOMEN.

NEARLY 50,000 REGISTRATIONS.

The number of women who have registered in connection with the War Service for Women scheme is now between 45,000 and 50,000. Employers are interesting themselves more and more in the scheme, for as recruiting for the Army increases they find it necessary to make known their wants to the Central Office of the Labour Exchanges, St. Anne's Chambers, Westminster. The result is that the department is receiving heavy demands for women in industries where there is a shortage of labour and in large concerns where up till now men could not be released for military service. The Government has set an example to employers in releasing men. A few months ago young men employed in some Government departments who wished to enlist were informed that they could not be spared, as their places could not be filled. But since the War Work for Women scheme was put into operation a large number of women and girls have received temporary appointments, particularly in the Labour Exchanges and the Post Office. Following the lead of the Government, several of the large railway companies are replacing their clerks who have enlisted by women. More women are being trained by grocery firms, and in London women have begun to be employed as motor-van drivers. Since waiters of German and Austrian origin are no longer in favour in restaurants, proprietors of the larger establishments, who have not been able to obtain a sufficient number of British waiters, many of whom have joined the Colours, have applied to the Central Office of the Labour Exchanges for waitresses. More women are also being employed as lift attendants. The experiment of employing women on tramcars in Glasgow is being developed. It is understood that the London County Council have been approached with a view to women being employed as tramcar conductors, but a difficulty has been presented as to the long hours worked, and nothing has been done in the matter.

So far the Trade Unions have not offered any serious opposition to the employment of women in trades where the shortage of labour is manifest. But the leaders of women Trade Unionists have expressed concern as to what is to become of women who have replaced men when the war is over. The view is held that where women have made themselves economically independent they should not be disturbed. It is pointed out, however, that the scheme is only intended to operate during the war, and that thousands of the women who have registered have done so from patriotic motives. They realise that when the war is over the men they have replaced will return to their old positions. But a shortage of male labour in some industries is expected after the war, and it is thought that a proportion of the women who have registered for war service, and who desire to remain at work, will be able to continue for some time.

Sussex Daily News, April 2nd. 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

Sir,—Women have been called upon to register for "War Service" that it may be known what reserve of workers exists in the country ready to supply the place of men who have joined, or are joining, the new armies. Hundreds of educated women have already responded to the call. The National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies has been invited by the Board of Trade to co-operate in carrying out the Government's proposals and for the organization of women's work at this crisis, and accordingly our headquarters—which, indeed, from the beginning of the war urged the adoption of such a course—while expressing willingness to help emphasize the three following points as essential:

1.—Equal pay for equal work; no undercutting.
2.—The great importance of training.
3.—The securing of good conditions as to housing, &c., specially in agricultural districts.

There must be professional women in Brighton and Hove who have lost their work through the war, and leisured women wishing to serve their country at this juncture, who would like to take advantage of the opportunity to offer for paid work under the above scheme. Registration forms can be supplied by Miss Merrifield, 14, Clifton-terrace, on written application.—

Yours, &c.,

F. de G. Merrifield, Chairman.
C. M. Allum, Acting Secretary.

Special Committee Brighton and Hove Women's Franchise Society, N.U.W.S.S.
Brighton, 30th March.

The Queen, April 24th. 1915.

THE QUESTION OF TERMS.

THE GOVERNMENT RAISED HIGH HOPES when it called on women to register themselves and their capabilities for war service. It appeared as though it were about to take command of the great volume of unemployed and available labour of women in the country, and to utilise it in order to free men for military service. But somehow the hopes which the demand for war service raised a few weeks ago are delayed in their fulfilment, and they have been somewhat damped by the statement which Mr Runciman as President of the Board of Trade offered to the representatives of women's societies who waited on him on the 13th of this month.

Women have no cause to reproach themselves for want of alacrity in offering their services. Over 33,000, it appears, have already registered themselves as willing, and in many cases qualified by experience, to do some of the many kinds of work which are now especially needed, including armament work, agricultural labour, manufacturing, commercial, and retail business. So far there has been on the women's side both zeal and purposefulness.

It is to be hoped that the Government will meet the goodwill and readiness of the workers in a similar spirit. But there are several discouraging considerations which were brought out in the course of Mr Runciman's remarks. In the first place, he stated definitely that none of the women who have filled up war service forms will be employed until after the women whose names are already on the Labour Exchange lists have been engaged. The practical moral which women will draw from this is that they must register twice—once as ordinary applicants for work and once as candidates for war service. This is tiresome, and may cause complications which might have been obviated by the Government simply appealing to women to register themselves in larger numbers at the exchanges in view of the need for their work. The creation of a new and to some extent overlapping register could thus have been avoided.

But among women workers the vague manner in which the President of the Board of Trade touched on the question of terms has certainly created dissatisfaction. Indeed, Mrs Rackham, as a member of the conference and a representative of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, expressed what was in the mind of many of the company when she remarked that the Government was not giving as clear a lead to the private employer on the question of wages and conditions as it ought to do. There was undoubtedly reason to hope that the Government would have taken this occasion to make its expectation and demand quite clear that employers when engaging women in place of men should not offer terms which are in any particular less favourable than those which they have previously given. The laying down of this axiom is, indeed, the very least that must be demanded; for it should be remembered that in many industries the male workers are pressing for increased wages in order to meet the increased cost of living. These wages are not spent upon themselves alone, but upon their families. Women's wages also are spent upon their dependants as well as upon themselves. Therefore, were the creation of a double standard of wages not firmly opposed at this moment we should find that in many occupations the lower wage given to women would inevitably become the established wage. Mr Runciman assured the members of the deputation that the Government would ask employers to keep the men's places open for them. This of course is eminently right. "Keeping open," moreover, implies that the terms of payment which men will receive on returning to civil employment will not be inferior to those which they were paid before they joined His Majesty's forces. But if employers can be asked by the Government to take on their male workers at not less than their old wages, they can equally well be pressed by the Board of Trade through the Labour Exchanges not to lower the rates of payment during the absence of the men. For it can never be forgotten that some of the men will, unhappily, not return; and in such cases it is possible for certain places to be permanently filled by women at comparatively low wages if no steps at this critical time are publicly taken to prevent it. No doubt it is something gained that women when applying for certain posts through the Labour Exchanges are to be informed of the rates of payment that have hitherto been current; yet what is to prevent a hard-driven woman from offering to take less money if by so doing she thinks she may get the job? Unless and until certain rates of payment become definitely fixed as the accepted remuneration for certain work—be it done by man, woman, or child—under-cutting on the part of the worker and underbidding on the part of the employer must inevitably continue to the great injury of the whole population. For one of the most remarkable lessons of the present war in the economic field is that the general distribution of good wages among a very much larger number of people than in times of peace is conspicuously reducing the volume of pauperism and crime. And it would be a great misfortune if the nation, by allowing women to do at low wages work which men previously have done at relatively high wages, were to prepare a crop of labour troubles for the period to begin at the war's end. The good example set by the Government in establishing the same piece rates for men and women on work ordered by its contractors is all to the good, and shows the result of the pressure which women thinkers have exerted on public opinion. But there are cases where (in defiance of the copybook maxim) precept is even better than example. The precept that employers generally must act on the same principle of fixing the pay for the work and not for the age or sex of the worker would distinctly have more effect than merely offering to the world an example which nobody who hankers after immediate cheapness is obliged to follow. Meantime it will have been noticed that the Staffordshire pottery workers are alive to the dangers of the present situation, and have anticipated them by demanding that women who are put to do the work that men have done hitherto shall not receive less wages.

Although there are certain kinds of work in great demand at the present time which are not ordinarily done by women such as engineering and mining, yet it is only a short sighted observer who would say that women's work is cheap because it is not wanted. There is one kind of work that is enormously cheap and yet almost invaluable, namely the work of the trained hospital nurse. On the efficiency of her work the alternative of life or death [illegible]

663 II/41

663.

Yorkshire.

The Herald, April 24th. 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

MEETING AT SCARBOROUGH.

TRIBUTE TO THE FARM LABOURERS.

'NO BODY OF MEN HAVE RESPONDED BETTER."

The Westborough Hall, Belle Vue-parade, Scarborough, was crowded yesterday afternoon when the Mayoress, Miss Maisie Graham, presided at a public meeting of women called to consider the question of urging women to register their names in the Women's War Service Register, now being formed by the Board of Trade.

The MAYORESS, in opening the meeting, expressed the hope that the proposal would receive a hearty response from the women of Scarborough.

DEMANDS ON THE NATION.

Miss THORNTON, of the Board of Trade, said she would explain why the Board of Trade had made that appeal to the women of this country. In the strict sense of the word we were not a military nation. We relied practically on our navy to protcet us from our enemies, but events had arisen which necessitated us raising a very large army in order to join with our Allies and fight against the common enemy. They were not permitted to know exactly what response had been given to the appeal which Lord Kitchener had made from time to time to the men of the country, but roughly speaking it was estimated that one and a half millions of men had been withdrawn from the different industrial pursuits of this country. At the last census they were told there were eight millions of adult male workers in the country, and they would understand that to take away a million and a half meant not only a considerable dislocation of industry but a source of anxiety and difficulty to employers owing to the demands that the war made upon them. We not only had to find food and equipment and clothing for our own army, but to a large extent we had to assist the armies of our Allies. The Belgian soldier relied almost exclusively on the British Government, and the French and Russians relied to a considerable extent on us to supply them with food and ammunition. Since the war was commenced the industries of France and Russia had been practically carried on by the women of those countries. It was variously estimated that in this country and other countries connected with it, there were two and a half to three millions of men either fighting or being trained to fight for their country. That number of men required an immense amount of work to feed, clothe and equip. No body of men had responded better to Lord Kitchener's appeal than the farm labourers had done. There were country places where there were practically no men between eighteen and forty-five years of age left. The others had all joined the Army. (Applause.) There was a great call upon agriculture for the food supply Since September the textile mills of the country had been turning out mile after mile of cloth for suits for soldiers. The French Army was largely depending on this country for clothing and boots. Then there were all the other various equipments which the soldier required, and it meant that the employers must be very busy and greatly increase their output. Then the firms which manufactured munitions of war must be kept at full strength. Never in modern warfare had so much ammunition been required as in the present war. What was being done to satisfy the demand? There were men who had never had a day's holiday except Christmas Day since the war began, and they had women working from 65 to 75 hours a week. Women were before the war only permitted by law to work 55 hours a week, but that clause had now been removed. In the ammunition factories and in many of the clothing factories work had gone on night and day. Did they wonder that the men and women who had been so engaged were now feeling the strain? The number of men now unemployed were either unemployable or unemployed because they refused to remove to where the work was. Not a man who was physically fit need be out of work now. That was why the Government of the country were looking for women workers now. Women had already done so well in hospital work that Lord Kitchener was allowing a hospital with one thousand beds to be opened in London, and to be entirely staffed by women.

WORK FOR WOMEN.

Now the Government were asking women to come forward and allow their names to be put on the register for work if required The women were asked to come forward and show their patriotism and love for the country in the same way as the men had so handsomely responded to the appeal of Lord Kitchener [illegible] such as engineering and mining—yet it is only a short sighted observer who would say that women's work is cheap because it is not wanted. There is one kind of work that is egregiously cheap and yet almost invaluable, namely, the work of the trained hospital nurse. On the efficiency of her work the alternative of life or death, of a quick, complete recovery or lasting illness and disablement, frequently depends. Yet her payment is utterly insufficient, because she wishes to give her services to her country, and forgets that her country is not really helped by her own helplessness in later life. Army clothing also is indispensable, yet the women who make it, though they are receiving payment at higher rates than were current in the years of peace, are still not obtaining the wage that would be thought adequate for a man. The question of terms, then, is not completely answered by saying that some work is more wanted than another. This is sometimes the right answer, but not by any means always. The whole answer is a long one, and only reveals itself after long study.

Meanwhile we ought to reflect that this question of terms is hardly likely to be answered more satisfactorily if a large number of women are kept in a state of uncertainty, having volunteered for war service, and not, therefore, feeling quite free to take other paid employment. While they are waiting they have to support themselves somehow, and the fact that they are waiting tends somewhat to depreciate their value in the market, and may prevent them from standing out for good remuneration. In not a few cases women have been prepared to make considerable personal sacrifices in order to respond to the nation's call as expressed in this urgent demand on the part of the Government. There should be no possibility of any such sacrifices being made without response or result.

M. H.

on the register for work if required. The women were asked to come forward and show their patriotism and love for the country in the same way as the men had so handsomely responded to the appeal of Lord Kitchener. The appeal was issued direct to the women of leisure; to women who had lost their employment through the operation of the war, or were only working short time; and it was also intended to apply to the wives of soldiers who had gone to the front. The soldiers' wives had responded most handsomely to the appeal. The Government did not want the married women with children to respond to the appeal, for the Government thought they were already doing their duty to the State when they were bringing up a family. Children, especially male children, would be a very valuable asset in the future. Women of all classes, grades and politics were invited to come forward and work side by side just as in the war the men were doing. Women would not be expected to go down a coal mine, but they could be usefully employed in the light engineering works and release men now employed in those works who could go forward and do the heavy armament work. Women could also be employed in agricultural work. She was perfectly certain that if their great grandmothers could do that work the women of the present day could if only they got the opportunity. (Applause.) Farmers at present were very sceptical as to whether the women could do the work. They admitted women could do the milking, feed poultry, hoe turnips and sow seeds, but for the ploughing and looking after the harvest they thought women were not fit. Many women thought differently. (Applause.) In her own Government Department—the Board of Trade—they had already three hundred women who had replaced men who had enlisted. The other Government departments were slowly following in the footsteps of the Board of Trade. The War Office had now seen the error of their ways, and young men had to leave and women were taking their places. Women could also be employed as tram and 'bus conductors, ticket collectors, and in many other ways release men for service with the Army. But it must be understood that their employment was only for the period of the war and the men would have their work again when they returned.

THE RESOLUTION.

On the motion of Mrs. MACKARNESS, a resolution was unanimously passed that it was desirable that all women in Scarborough who were available for any kind of work should register their names and that the Mayor be requested to form a small committee to consider how the women could best register. Mrs. Mackarness added that she earnestly hoped the women of Scarborough would do their utmost to respond to the appeal.

Replying to a question, Miss THORNTON said a short amount of training would be given and a maintenance grant if necessary.

The MAYOR (Mr. C. C. Graham) said many ladies had already given in their names as ready to do what they could. But up to now there had been no real organisation, and unfortunately they had not been in a position to accept the services of many who offered. The people of this country must understand that they are not only fighting the German Army but the German people. An officer who had recently returned from Switzerland, and who knew Germany well, had expressed that opinion to him, and had added: "I do not know if the military spirit is not stronger amongst the women than the men." His worship was perfectly sure the women of England were not one whit behind the women of Germany in their readiness and ability to do all they could for their country. (Applause.) He was sure the excellent address of Miss Thornton's would lead many of the women of Scarborough to register. (Applause.)

Votes of thanks concluded the proceedings.

The Walsall Advertiser,
April 24th. 1915.

WAR WORK FOR WOMEN.

LOCAL MANUFACTURERS' EXPERIMENT.

WAR OFFICE AND SHORTAGE OF LABOUR.

Walsall manufacturers who are engaged upon the making of military accoutrements have made an interesting experiment in establishing at the old education offices in Bradford-street a training class where girls are to be instructed in leather work.

Details of the scheme are given in the following letter, which has been sent out to its members by the Walsall Leather Traders' Association.

"A communication has been received from the War Office urging us to start a workroom for the purpose of training women and girls for leather stitching and preparing; great quantities of leather goods will be required, and as there is even now a scarcity of skilled labour available, the question has become one of great urgency. We have therefore decided, after consultatino with the Education Committee and the Board of Trade, to establish a training class for this purpose.

A room has been placed at our disposal by the education authorities, which is now fully equipped, and an efficient and practical teacher has been engaged. We have commenced with twenty women and girls, and hope to increase this number to fifty.

The girls will be paid 8s. per week during their period of training, after which they will be at liberty to accept a situation with any firm in the town From Wednesday, April 28th work will be accepted from manufacturers which will be charged for at the standard rates when completed.

We trust you will realise the urgency and importance of this matter, and that we shall receive your hearty co-operation and assistance.—Yours, etc.,

E. M. BROOKES,
J. LECKIE,
R. BUTLER,
H. R. TAYLOR,
A. HIBBETT,
W. MILLERCHIP.

Hundreds to be Trained.

It is expected that the class will soon be increased to one of fifty and that several hundred girls will pass through it. There is no lack of female labour in the town at present but it is not skilled, and it is to turn unskilled women and girls into skilled workers that the plan has been devised.

Women and Agriculture.

The suggestion that women should take agricultural work has not found much favour locally, and we hear that only one of the fair sex has offered her services in this direction.

It is expected that local female labour can be more advantageously used in the industries of the town when once facilities for training are provided. A good supply of female labour is being provided for the Streetly ammunition works, where girls commence at a wage of 12s. a week, and, when put on piece-work, can earn from 18s. to 30s. weekly. Similar wages may be earned by proficient leather stitchers and preparers.

Regulations for Training Class.

The following regulations have been drawn up for the conduct of the new training class.

(1) Only those persons will be accepted who are willing to devote their whole time to the work at the conclusion of their training.

(2) The workrooms shall be under the supervision and control of a Committee consisting of Messrs. J. Leckie, E. M. Brookes, R. Butler and H. R. Taylor (representing the manufacturers), Mr. A. Hibbett, for the Education Committee, and Mr. Millerchip for the Board of Trade.

(3) The teaching and control of the women shall be entrusted to Mrs. A. Wood who will take full responsibility for discipline and character of work performed by the women during their period of training.

(4) The workrooms shall be open from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. with one hour for dinner from 1 p.m. to 2 p.m.

(5) The number to be employed for the first week shall not exceed 20, but shall be increased from time to time as the standard of efficiency improves.

(6) After the first week, work may be accepted from any manufacturers interested, which shall be paid for at the current rates.

(7) [illegible] month's training shall be

663 II 42 663.

Edinburgh Evg. News,
April 26th. 1915.

PEOPLE AND THE WAR.

WOMEN, YOUR COUNTRY NEEDS YOU.

Alice M. Kemp writes: Do all women realise that the Government has at last said to them, "Your country needs you"? Do they know that if they have time—a whole day or even a half—to give to service for their country, they should at once apply to the nearest Labour Exchange and get a war service for women form to fill up, or they should apply for one to the nearest suffrage society. One cannot but think that many women living in the country are not yet aware of the Government's call for help. Work on the land or farm is urgently needed for dairy work, care of live-stock, light farm work, market gardening, farming, and ordinary gardening. Already the Government are giving training to women in certain agricultural colleges. In France the women have come forward splendidly to fill all kinds of places left by the men gone to the front. Our women could do the same. One note of warning. How often in time of peace has the idea of equal pay for equal work been scoffed at. Now we begin to realise that unless women get equal pay with men for the same work they will under-cut the men, make labour cheap, and eventually drive men out of various trades. This is quite certain. Women should only accept trade union rates. The Government, in its register scheme for women's war service, asked the co-operation of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies. The N.U.W.S.S. Executive passed the following resolution: "The N.U.W.S.S. welcomes a Government scheme for the organisation of women who are willing to take paid employment for war service, provided that the necessary safeguards are secured. The points emphasised are: (1) The necessity of equal pay for equal work, thus avoiding the undercutting of men; (2) the great importance of training; (3) the securing of good conditions as to housing, &c. specially in agriculture.

The Birmingham Post,
April 27th. 1915.

Women's War Work and Wages.

The problem of the wage to be paid to women workers called to the task by the exigencies of war threatens to give some amount of trouble to not only private employers, but the Government. Mr. W. C. Anderson, the recent Labour member—whose wife is one of the best-known practical authorities on the subject—will tomorrow press the President of the Board of Trade to give the latest returns as to the number of women registering for special war service, the number who have already been placed in employment from the special war register, and the trades to which they have been attached. He will then enquire whether, as a result of the special war register, some six or eight thousand women have been encouraged to signify their willingness to undertake armament work, whether armament factories can be named in which there is a shortage of or demand for such labour, and the duration of the working shift in such cases and the rate of wages offered. Of equal significance is the fact that Mr. Arthur Henderson, the chairman of the Parliamentary Labour party, will next draw the attention of the same Minister to the resolutions passed at a special conference of trade unions and women's organisations laying down the safeguards which are considered essential in any substitution or transference of women's labour, and will ask what action he proposes to take in the matter.

Birmingham Post,
April 27th. 1915.

WAR SERVICE IN FACTORIES.

A large number of people are still coming forward for "war service" in various industries. Ever since the war broke out an arrangement has been in force by which the armament firms should receive all their labour through the Labour Exchanges. A large number of men have been dealt with by the Exchanges under this scheme, although the firms have not been held to strict observance of it. In cases where there is no Government job for men in the towns where they apply, particulars concerning them are forwarded to the Labour Exchanges' clearing-house in London, which distributes the labour amongst armament firms all over the country where required. A great deal of valuable work has been done in that way.

Some time ago the idea was conceived in Birmingham that the recruiting officers should aid the Exchanges in finding labour for Government work, and posters were issued inviting people to apply at the recruiting stations to be placed on "war work." Some hundreds of men applied, but it was found that the scheme did not work well. It has not exactly been abandoned, but people who apply at the recruiting offices now are referred to the Exchanges, who deal with them. The number of people placed in situations under the scheme cannot be ascertained. It is unlikely that there has been any wastage of qualified labour. The number of qualified men unemployed is very small, and it is stated that if a qualified man calls at a Labour Exchange in Birmingham he can be guaranteed a job within three-quarters of an hour. There is a fair amount of skilled labour still in circulation in Birmingham through the Exchanges, but owing to the shortage no man is out of work for long.

It has not yet been determined when the 1,000 men who are to be temporarily released by the Corporation for work in ammunition factories are to take up their new duties. It is thought that many of them will be given work through the Labour Exchanges, and one controlling principle will be to give a man a situation in or near the district in which he lives. Nearly the whole of the lists of names of men available from the various Corporation departments have been compiled.

Women and Farm Work.

A large number of women are offering themselves for "war service," and they come from all classes. Some ladies roll up to the Exchanges in their motor-cars, and offer to do some work that will be of service to the country. At present, comparatively few such applicants are being "placed," but, of course, they are put on the register, and when the need arises there is a great reserve of female labour that can be called upon in this way. From the West Midlands Division recently 60 women were sent to the Harper-Adams Agricultural College at Newport, Salop, to be trained for farm work. They stayed at the college for a fortnight. These women are available to do farm work formerly done by men. The Exchanges have in hand the work of coping with a demand for agricultural labour, and meetings have taken place with the Farmers' Union, the Chambers of Agriculture, and the Allied Farmers' Societies in Staffordshire, Shropshire, Herefordshire, Warwickshire and Worcestershire. The 60 women above-mentioned were trained at the college during vacation time, and it is not now possible to send any more, but if a big demand for agricultural labour arises arrangements will be made to have women trained at other places. At the moment there is no actual demand for women in the armament factories, because the firms are not yet prepared for such labour. In the Birmingham district some women are being trained in leather work.

posal by the education authorities, which is now fully equipped, and an efficient and practical teacher has been engaged. We have commenced with twenty women and girls, and hope to increase this number to fifty.

The girls will be paid 8s. per week during their period of training, after which they will be at liberty to accept a situation with any firm in the town. From Wednesday, April 28th work will be accepted from manufacturers which will be charged for at the standard rates when completed.

We trust you will realise the urgency and importance of this matter, and that we shall receive your hearty co-operation and assistance.—Yours, etc.,

E. M. BROOKES,
J. LECKIE,
R. BUTLER,
H. R. TAYLOR,
A. HIBBETT,
W. MILLERCHIP.

Hundreds to be Trained.

It is expected that the class will soon be increased to one of fifty and that several hundred girls will pass through it. There is no lack of female labour in the town at present but it is not skilled, and it is to turn unskilled women and girls into skilled workers that the plan has been devised.

Women and Agriculture.

The suggestion that women should take agricultural work has not found much favour locally, and we hear that only one of the fair sex has offered her services in this direction.

It is expected that local female labour can be more advantageously used in the industries of the town when once facilities for training are provided. A good supply of female labour is being provided for the Streetly ammunition works, where girls commence at a wage of 12s. a week, and, when put on piece-work, can earn from 18s. to 30s. weekly. Similar wages may be earned by proficient leather stitchers and preparers.

Regulations for Training Class.

The following regulations have been drawn up for the conduct of the new training class.

(1) Only those persons will be accepted who are willing to devote their whole time to the work at the conclusion of their training.

(2) The workrooms shall be under the supervision and control of a Committee consisting of Messrs. J. Leckie, E. M. Brookes, R. Butler and H. R. Taylor (representing the manufacturers), Mr. A. Hibbett, for the Education Committee, and Mr. Millerchip for the Board of Trade.

(3) The teaching and control of the women shall be entrusted to Mrs. A. Wood who will take full responsibility for discipline and character of work performed by the women during their period of training.

(4) The workrooms shall be open from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. with one hour for dinner from 1 p.m. to 2 p.m.

(5) The number to be employed for the first week shall not exceed 20, but shall be increased from time to time as the standard of efficiency improves.

(6) After the first week, work may be accepted from any manufacturers interested, which shall be paid for at the current rates.

(7) At least one month's training shall be given. When a woman reaches a stage of efficiency which will enable her to take a situation outside, she shall be at liberty to accept a position with any manufacturer in the town.

Women's Suffrage Societies. The N.U.W.S.S. Executive passed the following resolution: "The N.U.W.S.S. welcomes a Government scheme for the organisation of women who are willing to take paid employment for war service, provided that the necessary safeguards are secured. The points emphasised are: (1) The necessity of equal pay for equal work, thus avoiding the undercutting of men; (2) the great importance of training; (3) the securing of good conditions as to housing, &c. specially in agriculture.

The Birmingham Post, April 27th 1915.

Women's War Work and Wages.

The problem of the wage to be paid to women workers called to the task by the exigencies of war threatens to give some amount of trouble to not only private employers, but the Government. Mr. W. C. Anderson, the recent Labour member—whose wife is one of the best-known practical authorities on the subject—will tomorrow press the President of the Board of Trade to give the latest returns as to the number of women registering for special war service, the number who have already been placed in employment from the special war register, and the trades to which they have been attached. He will then enquire whether, as a result of the special war register, some six or eight thousand women have been encouraged to signify their willingness to undertake armament work, whether armament factories can be named in which there is a shortage of or demand for such labour, and the duration of the working shift in such cases and the rate of wages offered. Of equal significance is the fact that Mr. Arthur Henderson, the chairman of the Parliamentary Labour party, will next draw the attention of the same Minister to the resolutions passed at a special conference of trade unions and women's organisations laying down the safeguards which are considered essential in any substitution or transference of women's labour, and will ask what action he proposes to take in the matter.

the Exchanges, who deal with them. The number of people placed in situations under the scheme cannot be ascertained. It is unlikely that there has been any wastage of qualified labour. The number of qualified men unemployed is very small, and it is stated that if a qualified man calls at a Labour Exchange in Birmingham he can be guaranteed a job within three-quarters of an hour. There is a fair amount of skilled labour still in circulation in Birmingham through the Exchanges, but owing to the shortage no man is out of work for long.

It has not yet been determined when the 1,000 men who are to be temporarily released by the Corporation for work in ammunition factories are to take up their new duties. It is thought that many of them will be given work through the Labour Exchanges, and one controlling principle will be to give a man a situation in or near the district in which he lives. Nearly the whole of the lists of names of men available from the various Corporation departments have been compiled.

Women and Farm Work.

A large number of women are offering themselves for "war service," and they come from all classes. Some ladies roll up to the Exchanges in their motor-cars, and offer to do some work that will be of service to the country. At present, comparatively few such applicants are being "placed," but, of course, they are put on the register, and when the need arises there is a great reserve of female labour that can be called upon in this way. From the West Midlands Division recently 60 women were sent to the Harper-Adams Agricultural College at Newport, Salop, to be trained for farm work. They stayed at the college for a fortnight. These women are available to do farm work formerly done by men. The Exchanges have in hand the work of coping with a demand for agricultural labour, and meetings have taken place with the Farmers' Union, the Chambers of Agriculture, and the Allied Farmers' Societies in Staffordshire, Shropshire, Herefordshire, Warwickshire and Worcestershire. The 60 women abovementioned were trained at the college during vacation time, and it is not now possible to send any more, but if a big demand for agricultural labour arises arrangements will be made to have women trained at other places. At the moment there is no actual demand for women in the armament factories, because the firms are not yet prepared for such labour. In the Birmingham district some women are being trained in leather work.

The Scotsman, April 29th. 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

PATRIOTIC RESPONSE TO APPEAL.

THE Women's War Register in Scotland is continuing to make a strong appeal. The type of applicant to be found on it proves that the women of this country can boast in many instances a great variety of skill, and that those who do not have any expert knowledge at their fingers' end are ready and willing to make good the deficiency. There are already on the register applicants who have studied wireless telegraphy, an enterprise inspired from Norway, where women are occupied at wireless stations; others who have studied or are studying motor car driving, or who have organising ability in very varied directions, even, for example, in estate management. One lady, with a disregard of regulations as to proxies, has offered to fill the place of a member of Parliament at the usual allowance. Many others have come in for armament work and agricultural work, and in the latter case many have considerable experience. The register is strong in clerical and professional skill, and University and trained business women have registered in good numbers.

It would appear, also, that our banks, business houses, and railway and other companies, and employers in the distributive trades, need not fear any difficulty in making good their shortage, or in allowing the young men eager to serve their country to make their patriotic offer without delay.

HIGHLAND WOMEN EAGER.

The West Highland and coast women workers in the fish-curing and other kindred industries are just as eager as those in the bigger towns. The Labour Exchanges now have a large register of the girls in the Lewis ready to come to the mainland for indoor domestic service and for farm work, which will be useful to many employers. The numbers now registered throughout this division (Scotland and the Northern Counties of England) are 13,826. In addition, the ordinary Labour Exchange register is also very high, and these applicants, of course, receive preference in filling vacancies.

The wife of the President of the Board of Trade, Mrs Walter Runciman, has been speaking at a series of meetings on women's war service. On 19th April, at Gateshead, so great was the interest that 3500 women were addressed at a meeting in the Town Hall and three overflow meetings. To-morrow she speaks in the Free Gardeners' Hall, Edinburgh, under the auspices of the Women's War Service Committee, composed of representatives of twenty different Edinburgh societies interested in the movement. The Divisional Officer for the Scottish Labour Exchanges will be present, and will answer any questions, for which opportunity will be given at the end of the meeting.

Daily Graphic. April 28th. 1915.

WOMEN AS WAR WORKERS.

440 ALREADY EMPLOYED IN VARIED TRADES AND OCCUPATIONS.

The Board of Trade announce that the number of women registered for special war service and placed in employment up to the week ended April 16th is 440. These had been distributed among the following occupations:—

Agriculture	41
Shop assistants	27
Clothing, etc.	51
Engineering trades, construction of vehicles and metal trades	42
Laundries and domestic employment	103
Textile trades	23
Paper, printing, etc.	26
Chemical, etc.	10
Food, tobacco, lodging, etc.	31
Transport	12
Commercial and clerical	35
Other occupations	24

MORE WOMEN TRAM CONDUCTORS.

The Maidstone Corporation have just appointed several married women as tramway conductors owing to great difficulty experienced in obtaining suitable men. The women are to receive the same wage as male conductors.

663 II/43

The Yorkshire Observer, Apr. 28th. 1915. 663.

WOMEN'S OPPORTUNITY FOR SERVICE.

APPEAL BY MRS. RUNCIMAN.

THE ORGANISATION OF FEMALE LABOUR.

Mrs. Runciman, wife of the President of the Board of Trade, addressed two meetings in the Heavy Woollen District yesterday in furtherance of "War Service for Women." It had been arranged that Mrs. Runciman should speak to the women of Batley in the Mayor's Parlour at the Town Hall in the afternoon, but as the company began to assemble it became evident that the accommodation would be insufficient. The venue was changed to the Council Chamber, but that was soon overcrowded, and eventually the meeting was held in the principal hall, and that was well filled. Mrs. James Stewart presided, and was supported by the Mayoress (Mrs. Ben Turner), Mrs. John Stubley, Mrs. Craik, Mrs. James Russell, Mrs. Mawson, Miss Elsie Taylor, Miss Evelyn Taylor, Miss M. Briggs, Miss Greenwood, the Rev. Hugh Jenkins, and others.

In a letter apologising for absence owing to an engagement in London the Mayor (Mr. Ben Turner) said:—

> Healthy, hearty women would do well to take up work in our industries where vacancies occur at proper rates of wages and under ordinary conditions, so that the industries of the country can be kept going and munitions and equipment for our forces kept fully supplied. Our textile mills and clothing factories can probably find openings for women of leisure to have full employment during our national stress.

In a brief opening speech Mrs. Stewart said there must be no shirkers of either sex at this crisis in the country's history, and she was sure that British women would do all they could for the Empire's cause.

THE JOY OF WORK.

Mrs. Runciman said that owing to the security against invasion and the fact that life was going on much as usual, it was difficult for the people at home to realise the supreme struggle in which this country was engaged. The time for talking about the causes of the war had passed, and she thought there was no one present that afternoon who was not satisfied that we had a just cause and who was not prepared to make every sacrifice to bring the conflict to a satisfactory conclusion. It was not sufficient to say we were bound to win in the long run, but they must do their utmost to bring the war to an end as soon as possible. (Hear, hear.) The conflict was one of such magnitude, however, that a successful and speedy conclusion could only be reached by making use of every available man who could serve in the field or assist in the equally necessary work of providing munitions of war. Further, the national resources could not be utilised to the full without the women being brought in, and therefore an appeal was being made on behalf of war service for women as a part of a comprehensive attempt to organise the labour forces of the country. Not only must the places be filled of those men who were going away to fight, but it must be arranged for the men engaged in the less necessary occupations to be set free for employment in those occupations which were more necessary.

In appealing to women (she continued) there was no idea of compulsion in regard to men, for there was every reason to believe that the men were willing to serve their country in the best way they could; but women must make it easy for the men to give their services by showing that their places could be filled on a fairly large scale. Every woman who was willing to work and was not working now was invited to register her name at the nearest labour exchange for the particular work for which she had a fancy. It did not necessarily follow that employment would be found for them at once, and they must not be impatient, for they had to wait. Women who had never worked were wanted—and they would find how delightful it was to work—(laughter, and hear, hear)—and women who had retired from work were asked to take it up again. Following the registration of the names would come an endeavour to distribute the labour to the best advantage. The mere registration of the names would be useful in connection with a number of employers who at present felt that it would be impossible to carry on business if they lost any more men. It would be helpful to such employers if they were assured that there were 45,000 registered women who could work well enough, if not quite as well as men, to keep things going until the men came back from the war.

USURPATION ONLY TEMPORARY.

There were many occupations (continued Mrs. Runciman) in which women could be substituted for men, and the process had been commenced successfully. It might have been noticed that railway carriages and tramcars were unusually clean lately, and that was because women had been doing the cleaning instead of it being done by men. (Laughter.) There were also women ticket collectors on the railways, and women were acting as motor lorry drivers, lift attendants and tramcar conductors. Still the employment of women might be increased to an enormous extent, and it was probable that much would be done in that direction in municipal and Government offices. There was no reason why many women should not be employed as railway clerks. It was impossible to estimate how many men would yet be taken from their ordinary work, and the women were asked to register their names in order that an ample supply of labour might be ensured whatever the number of vacancies created might be. Up to the present only a few of those who had registered had been drafted into employment, but there was a likelihood of the scheme being developed rapidly very soon.

Mrs. Runciman emphasised the fact that women were only asked to undertake temporary work in connection with the war. There was a reluctance, she said, on the part of men to see women enter upon work on which they had not previously been employed or had only been engaged in small numbers. It was necessary, therefore, to assure men who felt nervous on the subject that the object of the appeal now being made was not to take work away from them, and also that there was no intention that women should work at low rates of wages and so afford a temptation to employers to retain their services permanently. It would certainly be bad policy for the men to be idle while the women worked. (Hear, hear.) Women had no desire to take advantage of a national necessity to oust men from their jobs. From a trade union point of view the question of wages was the great difficulty, but so far lovers to enlist, had rendered a service which could not be measured. Other women were not called upon to make such sacrifices, but they could help by doing continuous and if necessary disagreeable work, and even then it would be little in comparison to what was being done by the men who were fighting for their country in the trenches. (Applause.)

Miss Farmer (assistant organising officer for the Women's Work Movement in connection with the Yorkshire and East Midlands Labour Exchanges) enlarged upon Mrs. Runciman's appeal.

Both speakers were heartily thanked on the proposition of the Mayoress, seconded by Mrs. James Russell, and supported by Miss Greenwood. Mrs. Runciman briefly responded, and moved a vote of thanks to Mrs. Stewart for presiding, which was carried with acclamation.

In the evening Mrs. Runciman addressed a crowded meeting in the Victoria Hall, Dewsbury. The Mayoress (Miss H. B. Walker), who presided, appealed to the women of Dewsbury to offer to do that which needed doing. There was never a time when work and loyalty were more required than now, and she felt sure that neither men nor women would fail to respond to the call which was being made for the building up of a great industrial army. New ways in which women could relieve the work of men were always arising, and she was interested to learn the other day from the managing director of the Yorkshire (Woollen District) Tramways that as Government contracts were concerned it had been settled that as regarded piece work the women should be paid on the same scale as the men. For the rest they must rely on women to see in their own interests and the interests of industry that they were properly paid, and they would be informed as to the wages which they were entitled to receive for the work performed. In order to overcome the reluctance of employers to engage women it should be made plain that those who registered for war service were determined to carry out their duties and provide really stable labour.

RELUCTANT PARENTS.

Not only had the conventional ideas of employers to be broken down—even the most radical of women had their own conventions as to what was "nice" work. Parents who were reluctant for their daughters to register should remember that it was hard for willing and able-bodied girls not to be allowed the opportunity of doing all they could for their country at the present time. There were certain difficulties which might be overcome by organisation on the lines of a number of girl friends going out to the same employment together, and being under the supervision of some older person. Mrs. Runciman expressed a hope that the women of Batley would respond as well as those of other towns had done. Those mothers who had been called upon to make the greatest sacrifice of all, and had cheerfully encouraged their husbands, sons, or there were hopes of a number of women car conductors being employed in the Dewsbury district. (Applause.)

FISHERGIRLS IN THE MILLS.

Mrs. Runciman said the war had been going on for nine months, but our soldiers in Flanders were still having to meet from the Germans an attack as violent and determined as any previous attempts to break through our lines. It had to be recognised that the foe was by no means beaten, and that great sacrifices must be made if the war was to be brought to a successful conclusion. Now there was even a greater need than there was at the beginning of the war for men and munitions, and therefore the Government were using every effort to organise the labour of the nation on the best possible basis. Mrs. Runciman urged that no man should be prevented from serving his country because there was not a woman to take his place in an industrial occupation, and proceeded to explain the Board of Trade scheme for the registration of women who were willing to work during the war.

Miss Hartopp (formerly superintendent of the women's branch of the Dewsbury Labour Exchange, and now a Board of Trade organiser) also addressed the meeting. She said that fishergirls had been brought from the coast to Yorkshire mills, and unemployed dressmakers in the southern towns had been transferred to Yorkshire clothing factories.

On the proposition of the Vicar of Dewsbury (the Rev. C. P. Hoste), seconded by Mr. J. E. Kilburn, a resolution was adopted pledging the meeting to support the scheme of war service for women.

The Daily Citizen, April 28th. 1915.

WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE.

PLACING THE VOLUNTEERS AT WORK.

Answering a question by Mr. W. C. Anderson in the House of Commons yesterday Mr. Runciman said the total number of women regisetred for special war service up to the week ending April 16 was approximately 47,000, of whom 8,089 had entered their names as willin gto undertake armamen twork.

The total number so far placed in employment was only 440, but the work of placing was only just beginning. The special register had been formed in advance so that, in the event of the ordinary supply being insufficient to meet the national requirements, a reserve might be available without delay. In the department of armament labour, while the demand for women was not in excess of the numbers that could be supplied in the ordinary way, some of the principal factories had informed the Board of Trade that during the next few months they would require additional women, amounting for those firms alone to over 13,000.

The wages and conditions varied according to the character of the work, the experience of the woman, and other factors. The 440 women already placed had been distributed among the following occupations :—

Agriculture, 41; shop assistants, 15; leather workers, 27; clothing, etc., 51; engineering trades, construction of vehicles, and metal trades, 42; laundries and domestic employment, 103; textile trades, 23; paper printing, etc., 26; chemicals, etc., 10; food, tobacco, lodging, etc., 31; transport, 12; commercial and clerical, 35; other occupations, 24.

Mr. Arthur Henderson asked Mr. Runciman if his attention had been called to the resolutions passed at a special conference of trade union and women's organisations laying down the safeguards which were considered essential in any substitution or transference of women's labour.

Mr. Runciman said his attention had been called to the resolutions, and the whole question was receiving the careful consideration of the Department.

Nottingham Guardian, April 28th. 1915.

Forty-seven thousand women have offered their services for work in connection with the war. Of these only between four and five hundred are employed in the making of ammunition as yet, but as manufacturers complete their arrangements, many more will be wanted. The armament factories are being enlarged, and more machinery is being erected. When all this is completed, women and men will be wanted, and the supply of both, we trust, will be sufficient. Russia has just placed a very large order for ammunition in the United States, and we believe that both British and French orders are being executed there at the present time. In fact, the resources of all the allied Powers combined are unequal to the strain now placed upon them, and it will be seen at once what an advantage Germany derives from the preparations that have been going on in that country for thirty years. There has been no failure of the supply of ammunition in Germany as yet, although more than once the German troops have had orders not to waste. There will be no failure in Germany until the allies are able to destroy the Krupp works. If this could once be effected, Germany would soon feel the pinch badly.

Daily News & Leader, April 30th. 1915.

WOMEN WORKERS' PAY.

Speaking yesterday at a meeting organised by the Women Writers' Suffrage League at John-street, Adelphi, Dr. Marion Phillips said that, in spite of the Board of Trade demand for women's service, the workers who had found employment were sadly out of proportion to the actual number registered. Yet there were plenty of women working appallingly long hours in factories, and while that unequal method held the field the vitality of the sex was being wasted at the very moment when it stood in chief need of preservation.

Dr. Phillips appealed to the middle-class section not to enter the fields of unskilled labour, but to assist the organisers. So far the effect of the war had been rather to lower than to raise the wage of women.

The Times, April 29th. 1915.

WORK FOR WOMEN WAR WORKERS.

8,000 VOLUNTEERS FOR ARMAMENTS.

The President of the Board of Trade, in reply to questions by Mr. Anderson, M.P., states that the total number of women registered for special war service up to the week ended April 16 was, approximately, 47,000, of whom 8,089 had entered their names as willing to undertake armament work.

Mr. Runciman adds that the total number placed in employment so far is only 440; but the work of placing is only just beginning. The special register has been formed in advance, so that in the event of the ordinary supply being insufficient to meet the national requirements a reserve may be available without delay. In the department of armament labour, while the immediate demand for women is not in excess of the numbers that can be supplied in the ordinary way, some of the principal factories have informed the Board of Trade that during the next few months they will require additional numbers of women, amounting for these firms alone to over 13,000. The wages and conditions vary according to the character of the work, the experience of the women, and other factors.

The 440 women placed in employment are distributed among the following occupations:—Agriculture, 41; shop assistants, 15; leather workers, 27; clothing, &c., 51; engineering trades, construction of vehicles, and metal trades, 42; laundries and domestic employment, 103; textile trades, 23; paper printing, &c., 26; chemicals, &c., 10; food, tobacco, lodging, &c., 31; transport, 12; commercial and clerical, 35; other occupations, 24.

It will be reported to the London Central Unemployed Body to-morrow that there appears to be plenty of occupation for all girls and younger women if they will adapt themselves a little. Several new occupations are now open for women, such as railway cleaners and porters, light porters, lift attendants, and railway bookstall attendants. There is also a demand for women as drivers of laundry and motor vans, packers in stores, van attendants, as time-keepers, and assistants in grocers' shops. The question of the inability of people of mature age to find employment will also be considered.

Princess Arthur of Connaught will open on Saturday, at the Royal Horticultural Hall, Westminster, an exhibition organized by the Daily Express to illustrate women's work and give women ideas for new means of earning a livelihood. Lectures will be given by Dr. Elizabeth Sloan Chesser and Dr. Lilias Hamilton, and there will be conferences at which expert women farmers and gardeners will speak.

The Yorkshire Post, Apr. 29.

The reply to a question in the House of Commons yesterday shows how very small has been the response to the Government appeal for the names of women willing to do work in providing ammunition, or of such a kind as may release men required for national purposes. Seeing how very many women are still engaged in various kinds of political work, how many, especially in London, are not actually engaged in earning a livelihood, the number of attractive photographs which have appeared in the illustrated papers of postwomen, women motor drivers, and women in a variety of other pursuits, it is strange that more of them have not been induced to register for national service. They are not wanting in patriotism. When the appeal was made, we deprecated the fact that the Labour Exchanges were being lugged in, so to speak, by the ears; and possibly their being so lugged in is one of the reasons for the fewness of the applications. According to yesterday's "Times," the Government are spoiling in this way their appeal in the case of men employed by various local authorities. The Local Government Board, in response to a request by Lord Kitchener, sent to all the chief municipal Corporations, which willingly authorised the formation of lists of their employees whose services could be used in the provision of munitions. Of these men, about 16,000 are trained to handle tools; others are a very good class of handy labourers. The names of the men were sent to the War Office—and nothing has been done. The Government most absurdly sent word that the men must register at the Labour Exchanges; and this the men naturally refused to do. They are not unemployed; their quality is guaranteed by the Corporations; their capacity is certified. If the Government want them, there can be no difficulty in sending for them. The desire to discover some sort of work for the Labour Exchanges would be pathetic if it did not lead to such absurd results.

The Clarion, April 30th. 1915.

Men's Work" and Women's Wages.

SIR,—At a Mansion House meeting at York on April 10, Miss Thornton, a Board of Trade representative, quotes Mr. Lloyd George's letter to me as having "amplified" the agreement which resulted from the recent Treasury Conference between Mr. Lloyd George and Labour representatives.

I must protest against the correspondence between Mr. Lloyd George and myself being used to make women believe that women's sweated labour will not be employed to reduce the wages of men. Mr. Lloyd George stated that "women undertaking the work of men would get the same piecework rates as men were receiving before the date of this agreement."

I replied to Mr. Lloyd George's letter asking for an assurance that if women are employed on time rates to replace men, these rates shall be the same as those that were hitherto paid to men. To this letter, which was sent on March 26, I have received no reply; but at the Conference of women's societies, which was called at the Board of Trade on April 13, Mr. Runciman, President of the Board of Trade, said that in regard to Government contracts, whilst it had been decided that the same piecework rates should be paid to women as to men, in regard to time rates no special conditions had been laid down with regard to women's labour. The general safeguard against women being used to displace men was that employers were being asked to take back those of their men who had served in the Army.

These words plainly show that there is absolutely no guarantee that women shall not be employed to do men's work at a lower rate. Whether the work of men has hitherto been paid by piece or by time, there is nothing to prevent women being engaged on time rates only, in which case the Government has expressly stated that it will exact no conditions.

From the woman's point of view it is unjust that women should be employed to do men's work at a lower rate; from the man's point of view, it is disastrous. Guarantees to take men back into employment after the war is over can never be enforced, and if any proof of this were needed, we may find it in the fact that promises by employers to make allowances to the wives of their workmen who are fighting at the Front are already being broken on every hand.

E. SYLVIA PANKHURST.

Nottingham Express, April. 30th. 1915.

RELEASE THE MEN.

Nottingham Women's Poor Response to Country's Appeal.

The response in Nottingham to the appeal for women volunteers for war work has not been so far such as to inspire great official gratification. According to figures authoritatively supplied, the total of women who have offered their services up to date is 250, which is not regarded as representing anything like the response anticipated. "There is much room for improvement," said one well-known gentleman officially connected with the movement, "and it is time our women replied to the spirit of the question addressed them from the Exchange front. This is a time of war, and women who do realise that are also coming into recognition of the fact that gowns and hats are far from representing the real issues of life."

Other appeals are to be issued to the women of the city, and it is felt that when the idea of the scheme is thoroughly understood the Nottingham sisterhood will prove as patriotic as their men folk now undertaking the hard work of war.

It is not proposed to employ the volunteers as yet—although two have left the city to be trained in agriculture—for there is still available a fair supply of male labour, and there still exist employers who prefer men. When that supply is exhausted, as it sooner or later must be, then will come the opportunity of the women. It is expected that thousands of women will be ready to answer the call for ammunition work, where a big demand is stated to be imminent.

The Leicester Mail,
April 29th. 1915.

WOMEN WAR WORKERS.

There can be little doubt that the Government appeal for women workers has failed, and it is well that the probable reason for the failure should be ascertained, and another effort made on different lines. It is fresh in the minds of the public that the Government asked for the names of women who were willing either to work in the provision of ammunition, or to take the place of men engaged in a hundred and one occupations who had volunteered or might volunteer for the front, or who were willing to be transferred to war munition factories. Here is a wide scope for the operation of female labour, and in view of the number of women who have devoted a large amount of time to political work, or who at present are not engaged in earning their own living, it was reasonable to expect a big response. Yet up to the present time only some 47,000 women have responded out of over 18,500,000 women in England and Wales. Whatever allowance is made for married women and others who cannot be expected to obey the national call, these figures show pretty clearly that the appeal has not met with effective response.

Two things may fairly be taken for granted. One is that women are not wanting in patriotism any more than the sterner sex. The other is, that the call is no mere piece of parade, for if the men are to be released for active service, and for concentration on the production of war munitions, an appreciable percentage of the work now done by men must be done by women in the immediate future. Mr. Robertson told the House of Commons on Tuesday night that the principal armament factories alone had informed the Board of Trade that during the next few months they will require 13,000 additional female workers beyond those who have volunteered. Doubtless more than one adverse factor has operated, but unless we are wholly mistaken—and we do not write without some investigation—the initial blunder, and a serious blunder, on the part of the Government was their attempt to force all the women who are disposed to lend a helping hand to register at the Labour Exchanges, and place themselves in the hands of the officials of the Labour Exchange.

The official reason or excuse is that the Government had at hand an organisation with bureaux and departments in every town, and Ministers thought it would save time and trouble to utilise this machinery. We have no quarrel with the Labour Exchanges, but only the most hide-bound bureaucrat could pretend that they furnish the ideal system for a voluntary effort of this character. Rightly or wrongly, they are not popular even with the working men. To ask women, many of them women who if they take up war work, will take it up simply and solely from patriotic motives, to go and register at the Labour Exchange is not only to invite failure, but as we have seen to secure it. The Government scheme for obtaining women workers during the war is admirable in theory, and it ought to succeed. But it requires delicate and careful handling, for the appeal is addressed not only to women who are in want of a few shillings a week, but to women of leisure who are prepared to share the national burden which each of us ought to shoulder to the best of our capacity.

The only organisation likely to succeed in getting women war workers on a big scale is one composed of men and women animated by patriotic motives, familiar with local conditions, able to help the appeal by enforcing its patriotic side and by emphasing the need for personal service—not for its "price in the market," but because of the nation's need. Such committees might well utilise the Labour Exchanges in obtaining information of where women workers are most urgently needed, and what class of work is required. To refer every woman, whatever her social status, to the Labour Exchange is absurd. "Pure prejudice" some may reply, but the simple fact remains that the women will not go, and Ministers have got to revise their scheme or manage without the women volunteers. It is stated in the Times that at the request of Lord Kitchener, the Local Government Board asked a number of the great Municipal Corporations to furnish lists of their employees whose services might be utilised in war factories. These lists, containing names running well into five figures, have been compiled, but little or nothing has been done. Why? The Government sent word that these men must register at the Labour Exchange, and the men declined, because they are neither out-of-work nor looking for a change of occupation. This is not the time to pen caustic criticism of Government departments, and we are not out to do so. But we make bold to say that as an example of how not to do it, these two incidents would be hard to beat.

663 II/5 613

Lancashire Daily Post,
April 29th. 1915.

WORK FOR WOMEN.

POOR RESPONSE TO THE BOARD OF TRADE APPEAL.

MEETING AT BLACKPOOL.

A meeting in support of war service for women was held at Blackpool this afternoon, the Mayor, Councillor Cartledge presiding over a large attendance.

Miss F. I. Knowles, of the Labour Exchange, spoke of the work women could do. She said that if women were to replace men, some sort of training was necessary. They realised the difficulties, but she thought that the patriotism of the women was such that the ywould get over hem, though they would perhaps have to mix with those they had not mixed with before. The work women would have to do would be downright hard work. It would not be anything they would be able to take up in a moment of enthusiasm, and then drop. It would be really hand work, and in doing it they would have to roll up their sleeves. As to what was going to be done with the men when they returned from the war, she said women must not make it more difficult for them, and any women placed on war service must be prepared to retire and make way for a man after the war. But they had to face the sad fact that there would be many vacant places, and some women would have to continue in the work they had undertaken. The Board of Trade were disappointed with the census of women workers, which only amounted to 47,000. Only 3,000 registered for the whole of Lancashire and Cheshire, and she could not think that the women of these counties were not patriotic. One could only imagine they did not understand the scheme of the Board. In Blackpool less than 100 women had registered, and she appealed for more.

Mrs. Allan Bright, speaking of the war, said there was only one result to come to the war, and that result would come to the side that could hurl forward the greatest number of men, and bring up the greatest amount of ammunition. There was nothing between us and the horrors which had been seen on the Continent, but the pouring out of men and ammunition against the enemy. Nothing had ever made her more proud of the manhood of the country than the magnificent response to the call, and when they came back they would find the women fit for them. She appealed to the women present to volunteer for war service.

At the close of the meeting several women handed in their names.

Men's Wear, May 1st. 1915.

WOMEN WORKERS FOR WAR SERVICE.

MR. WALTER RUNCIMAN, M.P., the President of the Board of Trade, received, last week, a deputation of representatives of 18 women's organisations in relation to the appeal of the Government to the women of the country to register themselves specially for war service.

Mr. Runciman observed that up to the beginning of April over 33,000 women had registered themselves in response to the appeal, among them being:—Clothing trades, 4,000; shop assistants, 1,000.

It was not intended, Mr. Runciman explained, that the women on the special register should be placed in employment at the expense of the women registered at the Labour Exchanges in the ordinary way. As regarded wages and conditions, he pointed out that the Exchanges could not take direct responsibility, but in regard to Government contractors it had been laid down that the piece rates for women should be the same as for men.

A general safeguard against permanent lowering of wages by the admission of women to replace men on service would be made by asking employers as far as possible to keep the men's places open for them on their return.

Daily Graphic
27-1-16.

663 II/46 66

O WOMEN SLACKERS.

1,000 A DAY MOBILISING FOR WAR SERVICE.

QUALIFIED TAXI DRIVERS.

When the Compulsion Bill disposes of the male slacker the next to face a public tribunal will be the female shirker. She is pictured amusingly this week in the "Bystander" clad smartly in velvet and furs, being derided by her busier sisters; but according to feminist leaders—unanimous on this subject—the female slacker in real life does not exist to-day.

"Women are mobilising for war service at the rate of 1,000 a day," declared a Labour Exchange official to a DAILY GRAPHIC representative, "and if fit and capable they are quickly absorbed by the various professions now open to them. The trades open to women are not nearly so many in London as in the provinces, curiously enough, and many of the sex are leaving the metropolis for the wider opportunities in the country towns.

"There is a great demand for women for clerical work in London, and the supply of skilled volunteers is not nearly great enough. Agricultural vacancies are very great, and it is difficult to cope with the demand. More women are being employed in London for trams and omnibuses, and the engineering trades are finding the sex useful in certain branches."

PROVING THEIR WORTH.

Women are proving their worth at the making of munitions, and the volunteers for this highly dangerous type of war work would form a big army if figures could be given.

Two thousand women munition volunteers have passed through the London Society for Women's Suffrage headquarters in Victoria Street of late, and one of them, Mrs. Lowndes, seen yesterday, said that she had been at Erith for six months and was highly satisfied with the women's response for war service. A women's service register is kept by this society in Victoria Street, and the services of thousands of women have been organised and utilised from this source. The professions taken up include paid posts at the War Office, Scotland Yard, in the Ministry of Munitions, various Government departments, railway and omnibus companies, agricultural and engineering firms, and others. Clerical workers of varying grades, organisers, chemists, artists, and household workers have also been helped to obtain suitable openings.

Over 11,000 women registered in a few days early last year, it seems, for war service, and since then "the army" has grown to such dimensions that it is difficult to get an estimate. One society declares that for one trade alone—that of taxi-driving in London—there are enough qualified women ready to take out for hire every taxicab in the metropolis if Scotland Yard will remove its ban and will issue licences to women.

Englishwoman 4-1915.

The Board of Trade Scheme for registering women for War Service is a praiseworthy step in the direction of using the whole strength of the nation in the life-and-death struggle in which we are embarked. It appears to be the initial move in the readjustments necessary if many more men are to be set free to enlist. There is good ground for stating, says the Times, that the Government contemplates releasing second division clerks and copyists from numerous departments, whose places when they have joined the army might be filled by women. The Local Authorities might do the same; the great railways could well replace many clerical workers and booking-clerks by women, and the banks and many commercial houses would then follow their example. In none of these cases would a special training for more than a few weeks be necessary; in France a similar readjustment was made without difficulty in the early autumn months.

*

For the industrial sphere there is considerable possibility of expansion by taking on, as at any rate part-time workers, women who have left their trades on marriage. Married women have already returned to woollen factories to some considerable extent. If this movement were more general, it would, no doubt, relieve the pressure upon the present employees to work overtime. The khaki women workers have patriotically continued to work excessive hours during many months, and in addition to the resultant increase in sickness and accidents, it is evident that too assiduous labour is affecting the output. It is well known that beyond a certain point, extension of working hours fails to increase output, and sometimes even decreases it. If half-time adult workers were taken on, the overtime might be done by them, and we should no longer see women and young persons working longer hours than men.* Work of a less skilled kind could be done by women at present employed (or unemployed) in the luxury trades. These have at present failed to transfer their labour, firstly,

* 'Army Clothing Contracts.' THE ENGLISHWOMAN, March.

P.T.O.

for which they are so well qualified, and record with gratitude as well as pride the work of the pioneers in opening a fresh field of usefulness.

because [illegible] of working in armament and other factories did not occur to them; secondly, because no qualifying training has been available; and, thirdly, because the men employed have in several cases refused to allow women workers to be taken on. The existence of the registration scheme will sweep away the first difficulty, the new Government control of factories will put an end to the third, and a short preliminary training will not be difficult to arrange. The wilful withholding of facilities for training in industrial processes has been one of the chief difficulties of the woman worker in the past. It is plain that women of all classes should register themselves; there is no ground for the supposition that industrial workers only are called for. It is interesting to notice that the New Statesman considers that the appeal is in the main addressed to 'the unoccupied women of the middle and upper classes.' Any plan which increases the number of productive workers in Great Britain is an advantage, not only to ourselves, but to our Allies, for this war will depend more and more upon the economic soundness of the nations engaged.

*

There is no doubt that difficulties will arise in the process of substituting female for male labour in any branch of industry or Government service, and that there will be objections on the part of the Trades Unions and Labour Associations as to the evils of undercutting men's wages by cheap female labour unless the principle of equal pay for equal work is adopted. This principle will also check any tendency on the part of the employers to refuse to reinstate their former male employees after the War. Regard must also be had to the claims of women now unemployed to fill vacancies for which they are suitable. But no woman should hold back from registration until she is satisfied on all these points. When the men of the nation were called upon for military service, they did not stop to haggle about pay or future prospects. We must be proud and glad to be called upon for national service: whatever reward we gain or miss, we shall get the reward of work done, the opportunity of showing our fitness for tasks hitherto out of our reach, and an unprecedented chance of occupational training.

Suffragists, who registered themselves for service in their thousands in August and September, should be the

T. P's Journal of Great Deeds, May 1st. 1915.

663.

663 II / 47

FOR WOMEN MUST WORK

Releasing Men for the Fighting Line

THE PIT-GIRLS OF CHARLEROI. THE WOMEN OF THE CONTINENT HAVE SHOWN THEMSELVES CAPABLE OF DOING MEN'S WORK, EVEN THE EXACTING TASKS OF THE COAL-PIT

THE stress of War has taken much of the meaning from the line in Kingsley's song. "For men must work and women must weep" is no longer exactly true. Women may be weeping, but they are doing something more than that, they are working also. They have put aside their tears for the energies of patriotism. That men may accept the service of War, they have come forward and stepped into the industrial gap his going would have created. They have gone to work where men worked, and they are working under the conditions of the men.

An Army Corps

There have been already 33,000 women volunteers for special service, so Mr. Runciman tells us, and the number is increasing. This means that, in addition to the women who have always earned their own living, there are 33,000 others—nearly an Army Corps of them—each willing to release a man for the firing line by filling his position, and, incidentally, keeping it open for him until he comes back. The action of the women is not only patriotic, but it is useful in the extreme. Much of the work could not be left at all; for many of the men the call of duty was a call that they were forced to ignore.

Ready for All Kinds of Work

Now the women are helping to change all that. They have offered to fill posts, and not particular and pleasant posts at that, but all manner of jobs under all manner of conditions. They have taken the places of liftmen, motor-drivers, farm labourers, railway porters, and railway-carriage cleaners, they have filled the posts of ticket-inspectors, booking-clerks, stationmasters, postmen, armament workers, farmers, the police even, and, of course, a host of places formerly filled by clerks. They have shown a splendid and surprising adaptability, and they have studiously refrained from complaining that their new work and their new conditions are too arduous for them.

The Bold Step of Innovation

The Continent has been accustomed for many years to the sight of women taking the place of men. Women porters, women "railwaymen," women "postmen," and the like were common enough. There were, too, the women who did the heavier labours—farming and, in the North of France and Belgium, coal-working among them. The sight in this country, however, has been rare enough, and a woman following the calling of a man is still a novelty and is still remarkable, and, because of our peculiar conditions, still unusual enough to make us realise something of the devotion our women are showing in taking the bold step of innovation.

Lifts and Motors

We fancy that the idea that women might work in the place of recruitable men arose out of the action of Selfridge's in taking on lift-girls in the place of boys. The innovation was at once smooth-working, attractive, and it was palpably useful.

Then there followed women who took over the jobs of motor-van drivers when the War had made the scarcity of this class of worker felt gravely. There were many expert motorists among the women before the War, and they could now put their knowledge to a practical and useful purpose. Now there are a number of women motor-van drivers employed both in the towns and in the country. In the latter sphere they are engaged in taking agricultural produce from the farms to 663.

663 II/48

T. P's Journal of Great Deeds, May 1st. 1918.

the railway depôts with quite the despatch and reliability of men.

Agricultural Work

Agricultural labour also has given women much scope. There have been in this country for many years colleges that taught women practical farming, both for use in this country and in the colonies. Some of these women had proved their worth in Britain, but most of them went abroad to our overseas dominions. Now we are making use of as many of these scientifically trained girls as we can, and farm labourers, whose presence had been a necessity before, are now able to join the colours. Moreover, not only have women from the agricultural schools taken over such positions, but the wives of many small farmers and the wives and womenfolk of many labourers have stepped into the places of their soldier menkind, and are now ploughing and working as their husbands and brothers did before the War.

On the Railway

The railways, too, have absorbed a number of these women servers. At Willesden Junction there is already a woman booking-clerk, and there are more elsewhere, and more to follow. At Marylebone Station women have become carriage-cleaners and porters, and are doing their work well. On several railways, too, one's tickets are clipped by fair but businesslike inspectors, and at one place at least—at Troedyrhiw, on the Great Western line—in Wales a woman is already station-master in the place of an official who has joined the Army. Her name is Miss Lidster, and she manages the whole of the station business, issuing and collecting tickets, managing the parcels, and attending to the general minutiæ of the work in the accepted way of the masculine.

Clerks and Counter Hands

We have already had women behind the counters, but now their scope has increased. They are taking over the positions that have been held almost exclusively by men up to this. Many grocery shops are replacing eligible men with these new women workers, and their use has even penetrated to that exclusive region of masculine work, the banking desk. Women clerks there have always been; now there will be more of them. Many firms are making a point of employing them for choice in the place of males of enlisting age. There has also been a great influx of feminine clerical help in Government and municipal offices, both to replace men under arms and to relieve the great pressure of work that has come through the War.

Feeding the Gun

In other Governmental departments they are being taken on also. Where women can work in the manufacture of munitions, they are working. They are packing cartridges and sewing pouches and belts and kit-bags and everything sewable. They have been turned to account in this sphere in a score of different ways, and the men, whose very being was vital to an army crying for ammunition, and yet more ammunition, have been released to serve with the gun they had previously helped to feed. The women help to feed it now with the same strenuous efficiency.

Police and Post-Women

The women police are, perhaps, not actually taking the place of men, but they are serving a good cause and doing admirable work. They are eminently useful as patrols, particularly in camp and garrison areas, and they have shown their worth especially in

WOMEN WORK WHILE MEN SERVE. THE CARRIAGE-CLEANERS OF MARYLEBONE STATION HAVE TAKEN THE PLACE OF RAILWAY SERVANTS GONE TO THE FRONT

P. T. O.

663
663 II/48

dealing with other women. They, perhaps, of all the workers, have come to stay, and will continue their positions even when War is ended. Their use is being felt everywhere, and their trim uniforms and their neat bowler hats are beginning to be seen not only in great towns like London, but also in smaller provincial towns like Southampton. The woman "postman" is coming into use also, and is serving in many districts. There is one at Knaresborough, for instance, who walks a daily round of something like fifteen miles: she took up the work so that a man could go out to the fighting line.

"Fares, Please!"

Perhaps one of the most striking positions that the women are filling is that of tram-conductors. The experiment was tried in Scotland, at Glasgow and Edinburgh, and answered so successfully that the experiment became a regularised habit. The women did their work so well and the scheme was so smooth working that other towns began to take up the idea. In Cardiff two women, who had had experience on the clerical side of tram-work, were tried on the Corporation tram-cars. They worked for a fortnight, first on the less busy routes of Cardiff and then on those where the traffic was heavier. The result was so satisfactory that eight more women were put on to the work; and though these women had had neither inside nor outside experience of the tramways, they managed their task with such businesslike skill that the scheme will undoubtedly widen in the future.

The Women Willing

Indeed, in practically every kind of work the women have accepted they have proved themselves capable of doing all that is required of them, and it seems obvious that, should the necessity arise, we have immense resources behind the country from which we can replenish all posts vacated by the men. We can thus draw upon great armies of fighters without fear that by so doing we shall cripple the industrial existence of Britain. There is not the slightest likelihood that so stringent a measure would be necessary; but though the conditions will never arise, it is a very useful reflection to feel that so much strength is there. It is also a thing to be exceedingly proud of that the women are not a whit behind the men in their desire for real and actual service, and that they are ready and willing to take over the heaviest of labours for the sake of the country at any moment. The call will not come, but the pride of that knowledge is a living thing all the same.

REQUIEM

A SHOT—a boom of guns afar—
The angry utterances of War,
The sunrays through the pines come creeping
Like tiny children—timorous—peeping
At our poor slain who, sleeping, lie
Clad in their cloaks—and Majesty.

A bugle note, a distant drum,
Faint "En Avants" that bid us come;
We lay our relics by the dead,
No word is said, no tear is shed,
A flower or so, and nothing more,
Save just the last salute of war.

DRAYCOT M. DELL.

Leicester Post,
May 1st. 1915.

Leicestershire and the War.

WOMEN WORKING AS MEN.

REGISTRATION WORK IN LEICESTERSHIRE.

Although the registration of women desirous of fulfilling any kind of employment in order to release men who want to take their proper place in the more important and arduous work connected with the war only commenced about three weeks ago, nearly 500 names have already been received at the Leicester Labour Exchange from residents of Leicester and the surrounding district.

The interest displayed by the applicants has shown they are fully alive to the present requirements. In nearly every case the ladies have expressed a willingness to undertake any kind of work, their patriotism being of such a fine character that those men who vainly try to find ways and means of squaring their consciences would do well to take a lead from the sex so often inaccurately termed the weaker. Already the movement has borne so much fruit that women are at work on the land in various parts of the county, their duties in some cases being almost similar to those previously performed by the men now fighting their country's battles in different fields. Applicants from the country, strong healthy girls and young women, have, quite naturally, shown a preference for farm work, and in some cases where a technical training is desirable young women have been sent to the Midland Agricultural Dairy College at Kingston-on-Soar, where they are now being instructed in the science of agricultural work generally.

The applicants from the town have, in the main, shown no particular fancy for any class of work. "I'll do anything," has been the reply in most instances when questioned as to their desires, but apparently several will not be satisfied until they have obtained situations on the tramcars or the railways. Mr. Handley, the manager of the Labour Exchange is highly delighted with the type of women registered. They have been drawn from all classes, and thoroughly recognise that their duties will probably call for their best efforts. But whilst the number on the register is very satisfactory, many more names are required. "Five hundred" said Mr. Hindley to one of our representatives, "is good, but we want 5,000 if we can get them."

Daily Telegraph,
May 4th. 1915.

WOMEN'S WAR WORK.

60,000 REGISTERED.

According to the latest completed returns made up to April 23, the total number o women now registered for war work amounts t 52,000, and up to date would probably reach about 60,000. As yet places have been found for only 600, which would seem to suggest that the demand for women's work is rather limited But it must be remembered that the first object of the census now being taken was to ascertain the number of women available for war work, and in a short time it is hoped to be able to meet the big orders which the Labour Exchanges have received for the assistance of women.

The favourite forms of employment, and those to which the department is devoting most attention, are in connection with agriculture and munitions of war. As soon as one batch of women leaves the agricultural colleges where they are being trained, another will be sent in their place.

Glasgow Citizen,
May 5th. 1915.

The response to the Government appeal for the names of women willing to do work in providing ammunition or of such a kind as may release men required for the fighting services has, so far, not come up to expectations. In the House of Commons this week the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade stated that the total number of women who had registered up to April 16 was approximately 47,000. Of these, 8089 had entered their names as willing to undertake armament work, but employment had only been found for 440. In this class of labour the immediate demand for women, according to Mr Robertson, is not in excess of the numbers that can be supplied in the ordinary way, but in the next few months over 13,000 additional women workers will be required by some of the principal factories. If more women have not been induced to register for national service the Board of Trade officials are primarily to blame. Women, in every station of life, have abundantly proved that they are not wanting in patriotism. If they have not been able to undertake farm and dairy work, leather stitchery, brushmaking, clothing machining, and light machining for armaments, they have rendered devoted service in ministering to the sick and the dying and in caring for those whom our soldiers and sailors left behind inadequately provided for. Women have made great sacrifices, and particularly does this apply to those of the leisured classes, who have not only given time and money, but placed their homes as well as their own assistance at the disposal of the authorities. It is estimated that there are some eight million women in this country who are of an active age, and on the face of it 47,000 is a poor return. But one of the reasons for the fewness of the applications is the introduction of the Government Labour Exchanges into the question. Large numbers of women, as well as men, refuse to register their names at these offices as though they belonged to the unemployed workers. Recently, at the request of Lord Kitchener, the Local Government Board sent to all the principal municipal corporations asking for lists of employees, male and female, whose services could be used in Government work. The lists were readily returned, and included about 16,000 men who can handle tools, and others of a very good class of handy labourers. The reply came back from the Board of Trade that the men must register at the Labour Exchanges. The absurdity of the whole thing is apparent. These men are not seeking employment; they at present hold good positions and their capacity is guaranteed. If the Goverment really requires them, they know where they are to be found. The action of the Board of Trade might almost incline one to believe that their object is not so much to help in connection with the appeal of the Government as to endeavour to justify the existence of the Labour Exchanges.

663 II/49 663

The Labour News,
May 8th. 1915.

Government Appeal for Women Workers.—The Board of Trade is now preparing a special register of women for war service, and special circulars are being sent out asking for full particulars. Women will be wanted, the circular states, in the ammunition factories, clothing factories, etc., to supply the needs of the naval and military forces; to work in agricultural districts and increase the nation's supply of food; to take any work which will release men to fight, such as clerical work, shop assistants, etc. "Whatever your qualifications, or whatever kind of work you desire, you should fill up a form of registration. Filling in a form does not necessarily mean that you will obtain work, but, even if work of the kind you require is not available immediately, it may be available later. No one who fills in a form is bound to accept the work offered. It is not possible to give any definite information as to hours, wages, training, or housing, except in connection with each vacancy as it arises, but all work will be paid. It may be possible to arrange for friends to work in companies together, but this will depend on the circumstances of each vacancy. A personal call at the nearest Labour Exchange may save unsuitable vaacncies being offered." A second circular enclosed asks the question: "Are you able to work, and free to work, but not working? Women are wanted to work in the following (among other) occupations: Farm work, dairy work, leather stitching, brush making, clothing machinery, and light machinery for armaments. But even if you have no special experience of any kind of this work you should register. It may be possible to train you. It is certain that as more men join the forces more women will be wanted to work while they are away. Even if you can work only half of each day you may be useful. Any woman who by working helps to release a man or equip a man for fighting does national war service. Every woman who can work and is free to work should come forward." From inquiries made, good results are expected as a result of this appeal. Already a large number of forms have been filled up, and, judging from the urgent call being made to men for military purposes, work should quickly be found for the fair sex.

Glasgow Citizen,
May 4th. 1915.

Women and War Work.

From figures to hand, the total number of women now registered for war work amounts to nearly 60,000, but, up to the present, places have been found for only 600, which would seem to suggest that the demand for women's work is rather limited. It must be remembered, however, that the first object of the census now being taken was to ascertain the number of women available for war work, and in a short time it is hoped to be able to meet the big orders which the Labour Exchanges have received for the assistance of women. The favourite forms of employment, and those to which the Department is devoting most attention, are in connection with agriculture and munitions of war.

Keighley News. May 1st. 1918.

663 II/50

663.

THE MOBILISATION OF WOMEN LABOUR.

SCOPE OF NEW OCCUPATIONS.

A SUCCESSFUL KEIGHLEY MEETING.

A well-attended meeting, convened by the Mayor of Keighley (Mr. W. A. Brigg), was held in the Keighley Municipal Hall on Wednesday in support of the scheme for organisation of women for war work. The Mayoress (Mrs. Cecil Sharpe) presided, and in addition to the Mayor she was supported by Miss Thornton (of the Board of Trade), Miss Alice Clough, Sir Swire Smith, Mr. F. W. L. Butterfield, Mr. J. E. Haggas, Mr. H. S. Clough, Mr. and Mrs. Sam. Clough, Mr. Robert Clough, Mrs. Craven Laycock, Mrs. A. R. Byles (Derby), Miss Atkinson (head mistress of the Keighley Girls' Grammar School), Mrs. Butterfield, and Mrs. Greenwood (members of the Keighley Board of Guardians), Miss McKechnie, and others.

The Mayoress expressed her pleasure at the large number of women present. For many years, she said, women's employment had been a topic of discussion. Now they hoped tradition would be cast aside, and the Government asked them to come forward and help in whatever work they could to release men who were at present working, and so allow them to recruit for the Army. The women could not go to fight, but now they had been called upon by the Government to throw aside tradition and take up more important duties than knitting and the making of shirts. She felt sure the women of Keighley would not be behind other countries or the women of other parts of this country in this new work. In the village of Derbyshire where she lived was a farmer who had been accustomed to having men workers on his farm. The other day she met the farmer and he said to her, "This is my new farm hand." The new farm hand was a nice-looking girl from King's Lynn. (Applause.)

THE WORKSHOP OF THE ALLIES.

Miss Thornton said it was estimated that 19 per cent. of the adult male population of the country had joined the colours, and in some industries as many as 35 per cent. had left to join the Army. This had caused considerable inconvenience, especially when it was remembered that Britain was practically the workshop of the Allies, that many men had been called away from their regular employments to feed and shelter the immense number of men at present in training. Women in France and Russia, and in the British hospitals in France had shown their capacity for work. Immediately war was declared the French Government turned to their women and said they would expect them to take entire charge of the harvest and vintage. The Russian Government took a similar course. Miss Thornton went on to refer to the enormous amount of work necessitated in clothing and equipping the troops. The textile mills had been turning out miles and miles of cloth, which had been made into millions and millions of uniforms. The French and Russian armies had also to be clothed to some extent. The most important factors of all, however, under modern conditions of warfare were firearms, ammunition, and artillery; and at certain times the men at the front had not had sufficient ammunition to make the progress they should have done. Having scoured the country through the medium of the Labour Exchanges in order to get skilled, unskilled, and semi-skilled men, the Government at last remembered that perhaps they had other industrial workers—the women of this country. Personally she thought it was rather late in the day, because ever since the commencement of the war the women had shown they had a capacity for work. Already in Servia and France there were two hospitals managed and equipped entirely by women; and Lord Kitchener had now consented to one hospital of a thousand beds in London being entirely managed by women also. (Applause.) The Government were asking the women to come forward and put their names on a war service register so that they might know what reserve of labour they had to fall back upon. The appeal was made to all classes; and they were asking them to show their patriotism in exactly the same way as the men who had joined Kitchener's army had done. The appeal, however, was more especially directed to the women of leisure, or to those who had lost their employment or were working short time on account of the war.

WOMEN TRAM CONDUCTORS.

The appeal was also intended for the wives of the soldiers who had gone to the front—women who had no home ties or family, and these had responded very well indeed. They did not want the married women with families, as they considered they were doing their duty to the country by staying at home and helping with their upbringing, for one had to consider in face of the enormous number of lives that were being wasted that the children of the present generation would be a very valuable asset. (Applause.) Neither did they ask those who were at present employed to register; and although they had taken the names of some of this class she wished to make it perfectly clear that so long as they were usefully employed no attempt would be made to place them in other work. In the heavy armament works the tasks would be too heavy for women to undertake, but in the shops engaged in lighter engineering work women could be engaged as capstan drillers and light turners. By women being thus engaged men would be able to be released in order to cope with the heavier armament and heavier ammunition works. So splendid had been the response of women near the munition works that until new machinery was fitted it would be impossible to find work there just at present, but shortly other manufacturers would be engaged, and then other women would be wanted. As shop assistants, bank clerks, office workers, and in agriculture many women could take up situations and release men either for the Army or for the manufacture of munitions. In London twenty women had passed the police test as motor drivers. Many textile overlookers could be released for other engineering work, and municipal corporations had openings for women. Twelve women had been employed as tram conductors in Glasgow for five weeks, and although previously they had been placed on the quietest routes, last week they were put for three days on the busiest routes in the city, and the experiment was so successful that the Corporation were going to employ about 250 women in that city as conductors. She was hoping that in Keighley a somewhat similar state of things would prevail. Then the work of gas meter inspectors had already been taken in hand by women in several towns—(loud laughter)—whilst on the railways, as light porters, ticket collectors, and carriage and station cleaners women could be engaged. Everywhere the women went they would be ensured satisfactory lodgings and living conditions. Then there were women chauffeurs. In Oxford Street, London, only the other day she saw six women driving big motor vans. Again, in textile mills she ventured to say there were some men employed as overlookers who might be employed in heavy engineering shops, and the women thus allowed to do a little overlooking for a change. (Loud laughter.) Then there was a great field for service in nursing.

ATTITUDE OF EMPLOYERS.

One great difficulty which presented itself, however, was the position taken up by many employers. They could not get the employers accustomed to the abnormal times, but the employers' duty was to accept the great reserve of labour they wished their women to organise by registering themselves on the war service register. They wanted the women to show the Government they were willing to come forward and form this nucleus register; and when they showed them that there was this reserve of labour and that the women were willing to keep the old flag flying at home, there was no reason why men should not be in the firing line or working in ammunition factories. (Applause.)

The Mayoress said Miss Thornton suggested the masters were mostly prejudiced, but she thought the employers of labour present on the platform that night were very up-to-date in their management; and she felt sure they would not hesitate to take any woman who had qualified herself for any position in any of their works.

Several questions were put by members in the audience, amongst them being the name of a hospital which would give free training.—Miss Thornton said information on that subject could be obtained at the Labour Exchange.

The Mayoress: I believe Leeds Infirmary is doing it now.

In answer to another question, Miss Thornton said that women should be employed for the period of the war only. Of course, it had to be understood that there were thousands of men who would not come back again.—Miss Thornton also made it quite clear that from what she knew of the educated women of the present day they would not be a party to what they might call "blackleg" labour.

The Mayor, in moving a resolution pledging the ladies to do everything they could to help the Government to bring the war to a successful close, said the men of Keighley had done very well, and he knew probably better than many what work the women of Keighley had done, especially in the work of the relief committees, but there was not a single man or woman in Germany who would not make any sacrifice to bring the war to a satisfactory conclusion. Every man who discouraged another from helping the country would be incurring a responsibility for which he would have to beg the forgiveness of posterity; and that forgiveness would not be obtained very easily. (Applause.)

FACTORY LADIES.

Sir Swire Smith, in seconding the motion, said in his travels studying technical education he had found on the Continent women were extending their sphere of occupations, and England had been behindhand, but they were entitled to the same wage for the same work in quantity and quality. In America factory workers were called "factory ladies," and why should we not have factory ladies here? (Applause.) Now was the time for breaking down the prejudice against factory work. In conclusion, Sir Swire said the war would not continue permanently. Our young men would be back again, and there would be places for them, but at the same time there would be work for both men and women in proportion as they qualified for it, and he might fairly prophesy that for many years to come a larger share of the world's trade would come to this country than we had ever had before. (Applause.)

A vote of thanks to Miss Thornton was ably proposed by Miss Alice Clough.

Mr. James Ellison Haggas, in seconding, appealed to the mothers, sisters, and sweethearts present to impress upon the young men of their acquaintance the duty that lay so obviously before them. We were going to have the greatest trial during the next few months that this country had ever had to face, and the meeting must take the matter into serious consideration.

Mr. F. W. L. Butterfield, in expressing thanks to the Mayoress, said France, before organising her women, had taken care that all her men should be organised and their places marked in the armies of the Republic. We were warned to see to it that Sheffield Independent, May 4th. 1918.

663.

APPEAL TO WOMEN.

HELP DURING WAR TIME SOUGHT AT CHESTERFIELD.

An appeal to the female population of Chesterfield to register themselves for service under the Government scheme during the war, was made to a well-attended meeting of representatives of the various female organisations in the town, held in the Mayor's parlour yesterday. The meeting was convened by the Mayor (Ald. E. Shentall), who presided, and the objects of the scheme were lucidly explained by Miss Eleanor Beardsley (assistant organising officer for women's work in the East Midlands).

How to Release the Men.

At the present time Chesterfield was in the fortunate position of being able to find employment for the majority of the female population, said the Mayor, but the object was to fill up the ranks and be able to find female labour in case of necessity. Such an organisation would serve a most useful purpose, not only in releasing men to go to the service of their country, but also in alleviating distress, and in keeping together the homes and dependents of those on service.

The aim, Miss Beardsley said, was to register people of leisure and those who normally did not follow employment, into a reserve force of labour to be called upon for national service for such periods as might be necessary. The registration, to some extent, would be a census of all women available, to show how many men could, if required, be released from the varied occupation for service in the Army.

Female Workers' Pay.

While Chesterfield was so fortunate as to be able to find employment for the majority of its female population at the present time, there was the possibility of the town wanting to increase its number of women workers, and there were ladies who could assist in their own particular area instead of drafting women from another district where they might be wanted at a later date. Vacancies caused by workmen enlisting had already been filled by women in the statistical departments of the various railways, and also for cleaning the carriages, etc.

Alluding to the question of wages, Miss Beardsley said that as far as Government contracts were concerned, women would be paid the same piece work rates as men, and all along the line they would endeavour to keep up the standard rate of wages. The leisured people of Chesterfield, she said, had not come forward as in other towns, and she appealed to the representatives to see that the town was not left out in the cold.

The Dundee Advertiser, May 4th. 1918.

WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE.

Dundee Millgirls Wish to Make Ammunition.

NOVEL APPLICATION.

There is a lull in Dundee at present in the number of applications for women's war service.

When it was announced publicly that women were required to release men for the fighting line there was in Dundee, as elsewhere, a rush of applicants. Even if the applicants had no special experience they were asked to have their names entered on the register which was being prepared by the Government Labour Exchanges. Forms were distributed through the various organisations and Societies, and the response to date has been very satisfactory.

The existing lull is doubtless caused by the fact that the Government's scheme of working has not yet been divulged, the essential fact being forgotten that unless the Government can get a census of women willing to do work they cannot formulate a scheme.

One of the results of the appeal for women workers has been the expressed desire of a large number of millgirls to undertake work in factories producing munitions of war. The novelty of the work and the opportunity it would give to the girls to have a direct smack at the Germans are the probable reasons underlying their request. But millgirls must not forget that they are already engaged in Government work in the production of sandbags, which are important munitions of war. Thus their applications cannot be given effect to.

It is felt, however, that there are hundreds of women doing Red Cross work who would be much more usefully employed in work which would enable men to be released or [illegible] Clough, Sir Swire Smith, Mr. F. W. L. Butterfield, Mr. J. E. Haggas, Mr. H. S. Clough, Mr. and Mrs. Sam. Clough, Mr. Robert Clough, Mrs. Craven Laycock, Mrs. A. R. Byles (Derby), Miss Atkinson (head mistress of the Keighley Girls' Grammar School), Mrs. Butterfield, and Mrs. Greenwood (members of the Keighley Board of Guardians), Miss McKechnie, and others.

The Mayoress expressed her pleasure at the large number of women present. For many years, she said, women's employment had been a topic of discussion. Now they hoped tradition would be cast aside, and the Government asked them to come forward and help in whatever work they could to release men who were at present working, and so allow them to recruit for the Army. The women could not go to fight, but now they had been called upon by the Government to throw aside tradition and take up more important duties than knitting and the making of shirts. She felt sure the women of Keighley would not be behind other countries or the women of other parts of this country in this new work. In the village of Derbyshire where she lived was a farmer who had been accustomed to having men workers on his farm. The other day she met the farmer and he said to her, "This is my new farm hand." The new farm hand was a nice-looking girl from King's Lynn. (Applause.)

THE WORKSHOP OF THE ALLIES.

Miss Thornton said it was estimated that 19 per cent. of the adult male population of the country had joined the colours, and in some industries as many as 35 per cent. had left to join the Army. This had caused considerable inconvenience, especially when it was remembered that Britain was practically the workshop of the Allies, that many men had been called away from their regular employments to feed and shelter the immense number of men at present in training. Women in France and Russia, and in the British hospitals in France had shown their capacity for work. Immediately war was declared the French Government turned to their women and said they would expect them to take entire charge of the harvest and vintage. The Russian Government took a similar course. Miss Thornton went on to refer to the enormous amount of work necessitated in clothing and equipping the troops. The textile mills had been turning out miles and miles of cloth, which had been made into millions and millions of uniforms. The French and Russian armies had also to be clothed to some extent. The most important factors of all, however, under modern conditions of warfare were firearms, ammunition, and artillery; and at certain times the men at the front had not had sufficient ammunition to make the progress they should have done. Having scoured the country through the medium of the Labour Exchanges in order to get skilled, unskilled, and semi-skilled men, the Government at last remembered that perhaps they had other industrial workers—the women of this country. Personally she thought it was rather late in the day, because ever since the commencement of the war the women had shown they had a capacity for work. Already in Servia and France there were two hospitals managed and equipped entirely by women; and Lord Kitchener had now consented to one hospital of a thousand beds in London being entirely managed by women also. (Applause.) The Government were asking the women to come forward and put their names on a war service register so that they might know what reserve of labour they had to fall back upon. The appeal was made to all classes; and they were asking them to show their patriotism in exactly the same way as the men who had joined Kitchener's army had done. The appeal, however, was more especially directed to the women of leisure, or to those who had lost their employment or were working short time on account of the war.

WOMEN TRAM CONDUCTORS.

The appeal was also intended for the wives of the soldiers who had gone to the front—women who had no home ties or family, and these had responded very well indeed. They did not want the married women with families, as they considered they were doing their duty to the country by staying at home and helping with their upbringing, for one had to [illegible] of munitions. In London twenty women had passed the police test as motor drivers. Many textile overlookers could be released for other engineering work, and municipal corporations had openings for women. Twelve women had been employed as tram conductors in Glasgow for five weeks, and although previously they had been placed on the quietest routes, last week they were put for three days on the busiest routes in the city, and the experiment was so successful that the Corporation were going to employ about 250 women in that city as conductors. She was hoping that in Keighley a somewhat similar state of things would prevail. Then the work of gas meter inspectors had already been taken in hand by women in several towns—(loud laughter)—whilst on the railways, as light porters, ticket collectors, and carriage and station cleaners women could be engaged. Everywhere the women went they would be ensured satisfactory lodgings and living conditions. Then there were women chauffeurs. In Oxford Street, London, only the other day she saw six women driving big motor vans. Again, in textile mills she ventured to say there were some men employed as overlookers who might be employed in heavy engineering shops, and the women thus allowed to do a little overlooking for a change. (Loud laughter.) Then there was a great field for service in nursing.

ATTITUDE OF EMPLOYERS.

One great difficulty which presented itself, however, was the position taken up by many employers. They could not get the employers accustomed to the abnormal times, but the employers' duty was to accept the great reserve of labour they wished their women to organise by registering themselves on the war service register. They wanted the women to show the Government they were willing to come forward and form this nucleus register; and when they showed them that there was this reserve of labour and that the women were willing to keep the old flag flying at home, there was no reason why men should not be in the firing line or working in ammunition factories. (Applause.)

The Mayoress said Miss Thornton suggested the masters were mostly prejudiced, but she thought the employers of labour present on the platform that night were very up-to-da e in their management; and she felt sure they would not hesitate to take any woman who had qualified herself for any position in any of their works.

Several questions were put by members in the audience, amongst them being the name of a hospital which would give free training.—Miss Thornton said information on that subject could be obtained at the Labour Exchange.

The Mayoress: I believe Leeds Infirmary is doing it now.

In answer to another question, Miss Thornton said that women should be employed for the period of the war only. Of course, it had to be understood that there were thousands of men who would not come back again.—Miss Thornton also made it quite clear that from what she knew of the educated women of the present day they would not be a party to what they might call "blackleg" labour.

The Mayor, in moving a resolution pledging the ladies to do everything they could to help the Government to bring the war to a successful close, said the men of Keighley had done very well, and he knew probably better than many what work the women of Keighley had done, especially in the work of the relief committees, but there was not a single man or woman in Germany who would not make any sacrifice to bring the war to a satisfactory conclusion. Every man who discouraged another from helping the country would be incurring a responsibility for which he would have to beg the forgiveness of posterity; and that forgiveness would not be obtained very easily. (Applause.)

FACTORY LADIES.

Sir Swire Smith, in seconding the motion, said in his travels studying technical education he had found on the Continent women were extending their sphere of occupations, and England had been behindhand, but they were entitled to the same wage for the same work in quantity and quality. In America factory workers were called "factory ladies," and why should we not have factory ladies here? (Applause.) Now was the time for breaking down the prejudice against factory work. In conclusion, Sir Swire said the war would not continue permanently. Our young men would be back again, and there would be places for them, but at the same time there would be work for both men and women in proportion as they qualified for it, and he might fairly prophesy that for many years to come a larger share of the world's trade would come to this country than we had ever had before. (Applause.)

A vote of thanks to Miss Thornton was ably proposed by Miss Alice Clough.

Mr. James Ellison Haggas, in seconding, appealed to the mothers, sisters, and sweethearts present to impress upon the young men of their acquaintance the duty that lay so obviously before them. We were going to have the greatest trial during the next few months that this country had ever had to face, and the meeting must take the matter into serious consideration.

Mr. F. W. L. Butterfield, in expressing thanks to the Mayoress, said France, before organising her women, had taken care that all her men should be organised and their places marked in the armies of the Republic. Were we prepared to say to-day that all our men of fighting age were doing what they could? We knew they were not.

How to Release the Men.

At the present time Chesterfield was in the fortunate position of being able to find employment for the majority of the female population, said the Mayor, but the object was to fill up the ranks and be able to find female labour in case of necessity. Such an organisation would serve a most useful purpose, not only in releasing men to go to the service of their country, but also in alleviating distress, and in keeping together the homes and dependents of those on service.

The aim, Miss Beardsley said, was to register people of leisure and those who normally did not follow employment, into a reserve force of labour to be called upon for national service for such periods as might be necessary. The registration, to some extent, would be a census of all women available, to show how many men could, if required, be released from the varied occupation for service in the Army.

Female Workers' Pay.

While Chesterfield was so fortunate as to be able to find employment for the majority of its female population at the present time, there was the possibility of the town wanting to increase its number of women workers, and there were ladies who could assist in their own particular area instead of drafting women from another district where they might be wanted at a later date. Vacancies caused by workmen enlisting had already been filled by women in the statistical departments of the various railways, and also for cleaning the carriages, etc.

Alluding to the question of wages, Miss Beardsley said that as far as Government contracts were concerned, women would be paid the same piece work rates as men, and all along the line they would endeavour to keep up the standard rate of wages. The leisured people of Chesterfield, she said, had not come forward as in other towns, and she appealed to the representatives to see that the town was not left out in the cold.

The Dundee Advertiser, May 4th 1915.

WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE.

Dundee Millgirls Wish to Make Ammunition.

NOVEL APPLICATION.

There is a lull in Dundee at present in the number of applications for women's war service.

When it was announced publicly that women were required to release men for the fighting line there was in Dundee, as elsewhere, a rush of applicants. Even if the applicants had no special experience they were asked to have their names entered on the register which was being prepared by the Government Labour Exchanges. Forms were distributed through the various organisations and Societies, and the response to date has been very satisfactory.

The existing lull is doubtless caused by the fact that the Government's scheme of working has not yet been divulged, the essential fact being forgotten that unless the Government can get a census of women willing to do work they cannot formulate a scheme.

One of the results of the appeal for women workers has been the expressed desire of a large number of millgirls to undertake work in factories producing munitions of war. The novelty of the work and the opportunity it would give to the girls to have a direct smack at the Germans are the probable reasons underlying their request. But millgirls must not forget that they are already engaged in Government work in the production of sandbags, which are important munitions of war. Thus their applications cannot be given effect to.

It is felt, however, that there are hundreds of women doing Red Cross work who would be much more usefully employed in work which would enable men to be released or equipped for the fighting services. For such the following application by a lady should prove a stimulus:—"Please put my name down as a volunteer for any work that a practical, adaptable woman could do."

It has been found that the best recruiting results have been obtained from meetings, and with this object in view a mass meeting of teachers is to be addressed in the University Buildings, Dundee, on Thursday evening by Miss Alice Younger, chief organising officer for Scotland and the northern division of the Labour Exchanges and unemployment [illegible] arm.

663 II/51 663

The Times, May 5th 1915.

SHOPMEN FOR THE ARMY.

MR. ASQUITH'S APPEAL.

AN "OPTIMIST" WITH A WARNING.

The Prime Minister addressed a meeting which was held yesterday afternoon at the Westminster Palace Hotel to inaugurate a movement having as its object the facilitating of enlistment by men of service age who are engaged in the distributing trades.

Mr. Asquith was accompanied by Mrs. Asquith, Miss Asquith, and Miss Elizabeth Asquith. Mr. Cecil Harmsworth, M.P., chairman of the Wholesale and Retail Distributing Trades Recruiting Committee, was in the chair, and among those present were:—

Lord Valentia, General Campbell, Sir George Pragnell, Mr. Burbidge, Mr. Bird, M.P., Mr. John Marshall, Dr. Delevigne, Mr. John Hinds, M.P., Lord and Lady Colebrook, Lady Randolph Churchill, Mr. Geoffrey Howard, M.P., Mr. Arthur Peters, Mr. H. J. May, Mr. S. T. Nicholson, Colonel Strachey, Captain Passingham, Captain Tremayne, Mr. Ballantyne, Sir Arthur Whitelegge, and Mr. W. S. Nicholson.

The Prime Minister, who spoke for about 20 minutes, dwelt first upon the provision of women to fill the places of men who have enlisted and will enlist. Roughly speaking the number of shop assistants who had joined the forces up to the middle of April was 260,000; another 220,000 men fit for military service still remained. If clerks, commercial travellers, and other miscellaneous employees were included those figures would be approximately 430,000 and 360,000. Fifty thousand women had registered themselves up to the middle of April. After a reference to what he saw during his visit to Newcastle, Mr. Asquith concluded with an appeal for still more men and further sacrifices, so that "a couple of months hence," or even sooner, they as employers might be able to say that they had contributed everything they could. A magnificent beginning had been made, but we must mobilize and organize to the full. "I am an optimist," was a closing declaration. With this he joined the hope that hereafter no man or woman but would be able to say, "I was not idle, I took such part as I could in the greatest task which in all the storied annals of our country it has ever fallen to the lot of Great Britain to achieve."

In his opening remarks the CHAIRMAN said they were met to consider how the distributing trades could release more men for his Majesty's forces. Every appeal hitherto had met with a generous response, and it was hoped that such meetings would result in a large accession of men to the Colours.

MR. ASQUITH'S SPEECH.

Mr. Asquith said:

We are here this afternoon for a severely practical purpose, and I think that at the outset I ought to remind you, or inform those who are not already aware of it, that our meeting is held under the auspices of a committee appointed by my right hon. friend the Home Secretary to consider how far, and by what means, it will be possible so to readjust the conditions of employment in connexion with the distributing trades as to release a larger number of men of military age for voluntary service with the colours. The committee, I need not say, have been in the closest touch with the principal trade organizations, organizations representing both the employers and the employed, and, as my hon. friend has said, it has already received from them, from all classes, cordial and useful cooperation. He has pointed out to you, and I need not repeat, the number and the importance of the various organizations which are represented here this afternoon. They include trade organizations, trade journals, representatives of the cooperative movement, and a very large number of the best known individual firms in the whole of the country.

Now, I wish in addressing you to remove, so far as they exist, two possible misapprehensions. The first is that the o appeal which we day, implies tha appeal for the tributing trades.
apart from the
is going on every classes, inquiries regard to the manufacturers, forms of industry
The other mi much more seric
It is that the reflection of any and what is be Already they ha
they employ, n warehousemen, number of men
I will trouble you
Investigations h changes Departn into the number and retail trade joined the Colou reason to doub
calculations—th proportionately been actually an the number of sh
the forces up to ing, 260,000.
men fit for mi include clerks, c cellaneous empl
these figures wil who have joined an age for milit
These are very l

W

Well, then, t plementary, but of the matter so service for wome been initiated a result of an ap women of Grea services to the being to find labour, trained
if need should arise, and to translate that into concrete and practical form. One of the first, if not the most important purpose, that such registers would serve is to find women who can fill the places of men who have enlisted, and, temporarily, at any rate, discharge their functions and do their work. Up to April 24, a little more than a week ago, more than 50,000 women were on the registers. I think that is a very satisfactory number to have accumulated in so short a time after the making of the appeal. A number of those expressed themselves willing to do work as shop assistants, some having had previous experience in that direction, and many would be qualified to do the work with a little training. Let me give you by way of illustration only the fact which was brought to my notice a week or two ago when I was in Newcastle appealing, so far as I could, for a larger number of men and women to take part in the fabrication and supply of munitions for the war. I went over one of the largest—I suppose the largest—of our great engineering works, and I found that in the department which is now engaged in the manufacture of shells the number of employees had increased in the course of the last three months tenfold, and among those—I think there were something like 13,000 in number who were devoting their time and their labour to that particular form of industry—there were, I think—I won't pledge myself to the precise figure—something like 3,000 or 4,000 women. (Cheers.)

Now, prima facie one would think that the manufacture of shells was not exactly the kind of work for which the hands, or the brains, or the special aptitudes of women were peculiarly appropriate; but that is a great mistake. In the making of the fuse, which in some ways is the most important part of the shell, female labour is just as good—I am not sure it is not a little better—than the labour of men. And when I asked, as I naturally did, seeing all these women engaged in this, to most of them absolutely novel, occupation, whence they had been recruited, I was told that some of them had been milliners, some dressmakers, waitresses, barmaids, domestic servants—in fact there was not a single branch of what we may call normal female industry which had not been drawn upon to recruit the making of shells. If that can be done in an industry which at first sight seems so distant from the normal activities of women, it ought to be a far easier task in the particular trades in which you are mainly and directly concerned—viz., the distribution, wholesale and retail, of goods. Therefore I think the employers, if there be any such, who at first sight might feel a doubt as to the practicability of replacing their skilled male assistants by female labour, may take encouragement by the example which has been set them by the great munitions firms of the country. I hope I have disposed of those misapprehensions, if and where they exist.

TWO INTERFERENCES.

Now I want to say a word upon the general question of which that is only a branch, of the replacing of men of military age by other classes of workers. I have mentioned the ammunition trade. The same process has gone on, and is going on, with the lighter metal

GERMAN REPRISALS.

BRITISH OFFICERS IN PRISON.

OFFICIAL VISIT.

We have received the subjoined communications from the Press Bureau. The first is the transcription of a telegram from the American Ambassador in Berlin forwarded to Sir Edward Grey by Mr. Page, the American Ambassador in London, describing the results of a visit to the majority of the British officers imprisoned in Germany in reprisal for our treatment of German submarine prisoners. The second communication is the report of Mr. Lowry on the conditions under which the submarine prisoners are interned, which Mr. Page has furnished to his Government.

(I.)

The American Ambassador presents his compliments to his Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and has the honour to communicate to him the following transcription of a telegram, dated the 29th ultimo, received this morning from the Ambassador at Berlin:—

Pursuant to general arrangement regarding visiting prisoners which is still in force here, I personally visited each of 22 of 39 officers whom you emp we could to ena to carry out th
as a nation, we

"A

You may ask to make this a represent. As I judgment there
tary initiative i community. I think that the w which it has m make, upon the country, is not s bulk of our fell dissent from t Scotsmen, and I voice: "And Welsh when deal
when they are c emergency do n
the incitements recognize, or i (Cheers.) Never of any nation, ha universal, or that selfish. There a crises these who that to commen to minimize, to of expanding an national power.

My message t
Empire would b should say to t magnificent begu aggression, you worthy of the b in the same direc
breach in your li
But there are sti unsuspected res organize to the f myself an optim have ever encou of mine so unde gravity of the s
the unsweeping patience, coura
(Cheers.) I am because I believ
ness of our cau
I am confident and self-sacrifice untried or undre short or long, to

And this is my a man or a wo be able to say could in the gr annals of our c

THE FC

MR. BURR
S

The Rev. E.
The Times on have attracted annual sermon
tion of the Brit
St. Paul's Cath

Mankind, he s own eyes. 'Christ and in those of t though her consc diate causes of t ground for humi discovery, these more remote a imagined, but sti within our gates—selfishness and si us, the one we ha
least willing to f

And with the ger, though some end of the war t would be a case—
a case—of doing
made life worth mutilated lives than had ever b woman of this g ever be able to comfortable self

Had none of hunger, that, ab living on unseen them as they had none of them wo broken hearts and bodies? Was th
the unfeigned and the front under c to realize them, th unbearable? W way in which so ship, they had be

One of the recent years h tribution of the in portions and combatant natio
the men were that in many cas Whatever might national life, one countless individ
"life which is li (though by a sid ples of Christ's la

Leadership, he the moment. Th real leaders or le when your politici
to be inspired, an rank and file felt habemus—we hav of man's wisdom
"foolishness of G that foolishness w
ble in the power o

LORD ROS

"SARDON

Lord Rosebe of the Glasgow which he review

We are seeking our theories, but conspiracy (mino and method, and countries. That o
the academic pu acted by hardene
The deliberate mi cruel and sadist oppression of wo nation's resources national life, are which are causing and other crimes methods and pol stamped by [illegible]

663 II/51 663

The Times, May 5th. 1915.

SHOPMEN FOR THE ARMY.

MR. ASQUITH'S APPEAL.

AN "OPTIMIST" WITH A WARNING.

The Prime Minister addressed a meeting which was held yesterday afternoon at the Westminster Palace Hotel to inaugurate a movement having as its object the facilitating of enlistment by men of service age who are engaged in the distributing trades.

Mr. Asquith was accompanied by Mrs. Asquith, Miss Asquith, and Miss Elizabeth Asquith. Mr. Cecil Harmsworth, M.P., chairman of the Wholesale and Retail Distributing Trades Recruiting Committee, was in the chair, and among those present were:—

Lord Valentia, General Campbell, Sir George Pragnell, Mr. Burbidge, Mr. Bird, M.P., Mr. John Marshall, Dr. Delevigne, Mr. John Hinds, M.P., Lord and Lady Colebrook, Lady Randolph Churchill, Mr. Geoffrey Howard, M.P., Mr. Arthur Peters, Mr. H. J. May, Mr. S. T. Nicholson, Colonel Strachey, Captain Passingham, Captain Tremayne, Mr. Ballantyne, Sir Arthur Whitelegge, and Mr. W. S. Nicholson.

The Prime Minister, who spoke for about 20 minutes, dwelt first upon the provision of women to fill the places of men who have enlisted and will enlist. Roughly speaking the number of shop assistants who had joined the forces up to the middle of April was 260,000; another 220,000 men fit for military service still remained. If clerks, commercial travellers, and other miscellaneous employees were included those figures would be approximately 430,000 and 360,000. Fifty thousand women had registered themselves up to the middle of April. After a reference to what he saw during his visit to Newcastle, Mr. Asquith concluded with an appeal for still more men and further sacrifices, so that "a couple of months hence," or even sooner, they as employers might be able to say that they had contributed everything they could. A magnificent beginning had been made, but we must mobilize and organize to the full. "I am an optimist," was a closing declaration. With this he joined the hope that hereafter no man or woman but would be able to say, "I was not idle, I took such part as I could in the greatest task which in all the storied annals of our country it has ever fallen to the lot of Great Britain to achieve."

In his opening remarks the CHAIRMAN said they were met to consider how the distributing trades could release more men for his Majesty's forces. Every appeal hitherto had met with a generous response, and it was hoped that such meetings would result in a large accession of men to the Colours.

MR. ASQUITH'S SPEECH.

Mr. Asquith said:

We are here this afternoon for a severely practical purpose, and I think that at the outset I ought to remind you, or inform those who are not already aware of it, that our meeting is held under the auspices of a committee appointed by my right hon. friend the Home Secretary to consider how far, and by what means, it will be possible so to readjust the conditions of employment in connexion with the distributing trades as to release a larger number of men of military age for voluntary service with the colours. The committee, I need not say, have been in the closest touch with the principal trade organizations, organizations representing both the employers and the employed, and, as my hon. friend has said, it has already received from them, from all classes, cordial and useful cooperation. He has pointed out to you, and I need not repeat, the number and the importance of the various organizations which are represented here this afternoon. They include trade organizations, trade journals, representatives of the cooperative movement, and a very large number of the best known individual firms in the whole of the country.

Now, I wish in addressing you to remove, so far as they exist, two possible misapprehensions. The first is that the operations of this committee, and the appeal which we are making on their behalf here today, implies that the Government is confining its appeal for the moment, at any rate, to the distributing trades. That is not the case, because, quite apart from the general recruiting movement which is going on everywhere and in all localities and in all classes, inquiries of a special kind are being made with regard to the cotton trade in Lancashire, biscuit manufacturers, the hotels, and to other special forms of industry.

The other misapprehension would seem to be a much more serious one if it really were entertained. It is that the making of this appeal implies any reflection of any sort or kind on what has been done and what is being done in the distributing trades. Already they have contributed by the various persons they employ, not only shop assistants, but clerks, warehousemen, porters, and others, a very large number of men to the forces. The figures, indeed—I will trouble you with two or three—are very striking. Investigations have been made by the Labour Exchanges Department at the Board of Trade in London into the number of men of military age in the wholesale and retail trades who have in one way or another joined the Colours, and assuming—and we have no reason to doubt the substantial accuracy of the calculations—that we can apply to the whole country proportionately the same basis of figures which has been actually and accurately ascertained in London, the number of shop assistants proper who have joined the forces up to the middle of April is, roughly speaking, 260,000. (Cheers.) And another 220,000 of men fit for military service still remain. If you include clerks, commercial travellers, and other miscellaneous employment in connexion with shops, these figures will be—again approximately—of those who have joined the forces 430,000, and of those of an age for military service not yet joined 360,000. These are very large figures.

WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE.

Well, then, to look at another branch, a complementary, but perhaps not less important branch of the matter so far as it concerns you—namely, war service for women—as you know a War Register has been initiated and is being gradually filled up as the result of an appeal by the Board of Trade to the women of Great Britain for women to offer their services to the nation during this war, the object being to find out what reserve forces of women labour, trained and untrained, would be available if need should arise, and to translate that into concrete and practical form. One of the first, if not the most important purpose, that such registers would serve is to find women who can fill the places of men who have enlisted, and, temporarily, at any rate, discharge their functions and do their work. Up to April 24, a little more than a week ago, more than 50,000 women were on the registers. I think that is a very satisfactory number to have accumulated in so short a time after the making of the appeal. A number of those expressed themselves willing to do work as shop assistants, some having had previous experience in that direction, and many would be qualified to do the work with a little training. Let me give you by way of illustration only the fact which was brought to my notice a week or two ago when I was in Newcastle appealing, so far as I could, for a larger number of men and women to take part in the fabrication and supply of munitions for the war. I went over one of the largest—I suppose the largest—of our great engineering works, and I found that in the department which is now engaged in the manufacture of shells the number of employees had increased in the course of the last three months tenfold, and among those—I think there were something like 13,000 in number who were devoting their time and their labour to that particular form of industry—there were, I think—I won't pledge myself to the precise figure—something like 3,000 or 4,000 women. (Cheers.)

Now, prima facie one would think that the manufacture of shells was not exactly the kind of work for which the hands, or the brains, or the special aptitudes of women were peculiarly appropriate; but that is a great mistake. In the making of the fuse, which in some ways is the most important part of the shell, female labour is just as good—I am not sure it is not a little better—than the labour of men. And when I asked, as I naturally did, seeing all these women engaged in this, to most of them absolutely novel, occupation, whence they had been recruited, I was told that some of them had been milliners, some dressmakers, waitresses, barmaids, domestic servants—in fact there was not a single branch of what we may call normal female industry which had not been drawn upon to recruit the making of shells. If that can be done in an industry which at first sight seems so distant from the normal activities of women, it ought to be a far easier task in the particular trades in which you are mainly and directly concerned—viz., the distribution, wholesale and retail, of goods. Therefore I think the employers, if there be any such, who at first sight might feel a doubt as to the practicability of replacing their skilled male assistants by female labour, may take encouragement by the example which has been set them by the great munitions firms of the country. I hope I have disposed of those misapprehensions, if and where they exist.

TWO INFERENCES.

Now I want to say a word upon the general question of which that is only a branch, of the replacing of men of military age by other classes of workers. I have mentioned the ammunition trade. The same process has gone on, and is going on, with the lighter metal trades, with the tailoring trades, in the making of biscuits, of aerated waters, china and earthenware, and stationery, and outside the manufacturing trades, they are being taken on in considerable numbers and with the best results for warehouse processes—packing, if you like—the clerical duties in Government, public, and private offices and banks, and even to a certain extent upon railways, and in other spheres of activity to which they have hitherto been strangers. Therefore, speaking to you as practical men, I hope you will draw from what I have said these two inferences:—In the first place that, well as the distributing trades have already done in the vast number of men whom they have sent to join the Colours, there is still among those whom you employ a very large number, amounting to hundreds of thousands, of men of military age who might, and who in the stress of such an emergency as that with which we are confronted, ought to follow their comrades and take an active part in the defence of their country and in the fortunes of our arms abroad.

In the next place—and this is the second inference I ask you to draw—to a very large extent—I won't say to the whole extent, because we have, all of us, got to sustain inconvenience, loss of profit, to incur sacrifices, if we have to do our part adequately in the prosecution of the war, and I am sure the appeal will not fall on deaf ears in your trade any more than it has done in other trades—there is in female labour a reserve from which, with proper organization and supervision and training, you would very soon be able to draw to fill the gaps which have been left, and to perform the services which the men at the front had previously discharged, and which are essential to the well-being and comfort of the community at large, as well as to your own interests as traders and distributors.

That, broadly speaking, is the nature of the appeal which I am making to you this afternoon. As I have said, I am not complaining in the least degree of anything in the nature of slackness or indifference in the past. Like the other great industries of the country—like railways and many other trades which I might mention—you have shown yourselves willing to part with labour which was very valuable to you, and upon which, as you justly and patriotically recognize, the country had at this moment a prior call.

I only want you to carry that process one step further, so that a couple of months hence, perhaps a shorter distance of time even than that, you as a trade will be able to say, "So far, at any rate, as we employers are concerned" (and I am sure there is no lack of zeal or patriotic desire on the part of those whom you employ) "we have contributed everything we could to enable our country to hold its own, and to carry out the great objects and purposes which, as a nation, we had in view."

"A MAGNIFICENT BEGINNING."

You may ask why I have come here this afternoon to make this appeal to you and those whom you represent. As I have said, it is not because in my judgment there is any lack of spontaneous or voluntary initiative in this or in any other class of the community. I am told that there are people who think that the war, the gravity of its issue, the demand which it has made, and which it will continue to make, upon the energy and the patriotism of the country, is not seriously or adequately realized by the bulk of our fellow-countrymen. (Cheers.) I totally dissent from that view. (Cheers.) Englishmen, Scotsmen, and Irishmen, when they are confronted (a voice: "And Welsh?")—I must not forget the Welsh when dealing with a trade like this (laughter)—when they are confronted with a vast and momentous emergency do not need to be flogged and goaded by the incitements of rhetoric before they can be made to recognize, or induced to obey, the calls of duty. (Cheers.) Never in our history, or I think the history of any nation, has that recognition been more clear or universal, or that obedience more prompt or more unselfish. There are always to be found in times of crises those who are ready to think and to proclaim that to commend what has been and is being done is to minimize, to disparage, the ever-growing urgency of expanding and completing the organization of the national power.

My message this moment to the nation and to the Empire would be pitched in quite a different key. I should say to them one and all, You have made a magnificent beginning, you have stemmed the tide of aggression, you have shown a spirit and strength worthy of the best traditions of your race. Proceed in the same direction and in the same temper. Every breach in your first line has been made good. (Cheers.) But there are still in reserve unused, and, to the enemy, unsuspected resources, which you must mobilize and organize to the full. I am not the least ashamed to call myself an optimist. (Cheers.) Not that I underrate or have ever encouraged my countrymen by any word of mine to underrate the prowess of the enemy, the gravity of the struggle, and the imperious need for the unsleeping exercise of our national qualities of patience, constancy, resolution, and fortitude. (Cheers.) I am an optimist, as I hope you are, because I believe first and foremost in the righteousness of our cause (loud cheers), and next because I am confident that by personal and corporate effort and self-sacrifice there is nothing that we shall leave untried or undone to bring that cause, be the struggle short or long, to a decisive and glorious issue. (Cheers.)

And this is my last word to you: Let there not be a man or a woman among us who would not then be able to say "I was not idle. I took such part as I could in the greatest task which, in all the storied annals of our country, has ever fallen to the lot of Great Britain to achieve." (Loud and prolonged cheers.)

Mr. Asquith resumed his seat after speaking for 25 minutes.

SIR GEORGE PRAGNELL moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Asquith. He said he was sure he could rely upon the business men of the country when he assured the Prime Minister that they would always be at his disposal. There might possibly be the germ in that business meeting of a committee which the Prime Minister would be able to consult at any moment, and if he did so they would only be anxious to be useful to him without being meddlesome. As he looked round that gathering he saw a large number of men who in ordinary times would be riding what he might call their own little hobby-horses—bi-metallism, tariffs, daylight saving, compulsory service—but he wanted to assure the Prime Minister that all business men who had hobbies before had now dismounted them, and were only concerned in helping to push the carriage of State along. (Cheers.)

Mr. BURBIDGE, in seconding the resolution, referred to his visit to Paris after the Franco-Prussian war and seeing the havoc and destruction it caused. He hoped they would never see such a state of things in London, and the best way to ensure this was to encourage their staffs by every means in their power to respond to the nation's needs in its hour of peril.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

The PRIME MINISTER, in reply, said they could not translate their thanks into action in a better way than by following the excellent advice which had been given by Sir George Pragnell and Mr. Burbidge. If all the employers he saw there acted in the spirit they had suggested, he was sure the distributing trades before many weeks were over would have a more splendid record even than they had at present of real patriotic contribution to the needs of their country.

A BIRMINGHAM CONFERENCE.

The Lord Mayor of Birmingham has been requested by the War Office to arrange a conference of heads of the wholesale and retail distributing trades in the city with the view to releasing a further number of assistants as recruits.

Mr. Cecil Harmsworth, in his letter, states that inquiries showed that a considerable number of men of military age are still in employment in the wholesale and retail distributing trades.

The Lord Mayor has passed the letter to the Parliamentary Recruiting Committee, who will convene a conference.

Yorkshire Observer,
May 5th. 1915.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

FIRST AID OPPORTUNITIES IN LEEDS

About three and a-half years ago the voluntary aid detachments comprising the Leeds district of the Territorial branch of the St. John Ambulance Association were formed, Leeds being one of the divisions—No. 7—into which the West Riding was apportioned. Without the influence of pressing need—the scheme was inaugurated in the event of invasion—the organisation maintained its existence until by the time war broke out there were four voluntary aid detachments in the immediate district. No call has been made upon them since the opening of hostilities, and only one detachment has been used as a whole since the war began. An awkward state of affairs arose, for a large number of people desired to be trained for work and particularly for ambulance service, and the War Office stopped the registration of the detachments and closed channels into which many would have liked to have devoted their energies.

The embargo was removed at the beginning of December, and registration was again permitted. There was a great many people in the Leeds district who had attended classes in ambulance work and had taken certificates, but were waiting for "something up." The opening up of the voluntary aid detachments, it was seen, would supply an outlet for all these energies. A need was also experienced for probationer nurses of between 23 and 38 years of age to serve either at home or abroad. It was required of these nurses that they should have the first-aid nursing certificates of the St. John Ambulance Association, or that they should have had practical experience in the medical service, and women possessing these qualifications have been invited to make application, through the commandant of one of the voluntary aid detachments, to the headquarters in London of the St. John Ambulance Association. Those who desire to become probationer nurses, but who have not the necessary qualifications, can obtain them in the voluntary aid detachments, and it is interesting to know that some thirty probationer nurses have been introduced at the military hospital at Beckett's Park, through the scheme. The conditions in regard to examinations have been relaxed in order that nursing aspirants may obtain their certificates at the earliest possible moment, while those who have experience will be examined by the matron of a hospital in their district.

With the object of securing the registration of members of the voluntary aid detachments of the Leeds district a meeting was held in the Friends' Meeting House, Woodhouse Lane, yesterday, under the auspices of the district organisation, and the state of affairs explained by Lady Harewood (the vice-president), Professor Smithells (secretary), and Mr. J. R. Cross (Horsforth). There was a very gratifying attendance of ladies, and a large number of applications had previously been received for membership. It was explained that twenty-three or twenty-four members completes a detachment, but that it is possible to have supernumery members and swell the membership to any desired number. Supernumery members can only be admitted at the discretion of the commandants.

Mr. Cross said he believed that in the future there would be a great call for women, and the object in having a register was that they should know where the skill could be found. He spoke of the indebtedness of the members for the splendid way in which the doctors of the district had quietly given their services for a number of years in training the units, and went on to point a way in which the members could be of use. At Horsforth, where one doctor was fighting in the trenches, another was engaged on ambulance trains, and one of the nurses had gone to the base hospital, they had employed the members of the voluntary aid detachment to assist the district nurses. They had not been ashamed to do any kind of work. There had been and probably would be some friction between the professional and amateur classes of nurses, and he thought it was well to recognise that, and to ask each, and especially the trained nurses, to exercise the greatest forbearance with the women who came forward in an amateur way and were willing to to their level best. It might be that they might have bomb-dropping in some towns, added Mr Cross, and if they had it would be a good thing to have members of detachments listed and know where they had people for first-aid work. Some of the women might train as sanitary inspectors, because there was no doubt that the country would soon be more or less denuded of its manhood, and they ought to prepare for that time.

Glasgow Citizen,
May 8th. 1915.

The Employment of Women.

A protest is being made by members of the Amalgamated Union of Shop Assistants and Warehousemen against the employment of women to take the place of men who have joined the forces. The union has, however, officially taken up the position that since it caters both for men and women in the distributive trades it cannot oppose the introduction of women on account of sex. Information has reached the union from various parts of the country that women are being introduced to firms through the Labour Exchanges without being informed as to the value of their labour, and that many have been engaged at wages from 9s to 12s per week. Should this prove to be correct, the matter will be taken up with Mr Runciman.

Daily News & Leader,
May 10th. 1915.

LONDON WORKERS FOR WAR SERVICE.

Will Women Conductors be Employed?

At to-morrow's meeting of the London County Council a recommendation will be brought up instructing the committees of the Council to take all possible steps to give effect to the views of the Local Government Board in regard to releasing male labour for war service. It is stated at the same time that as many as 5,421 of the Council's servants have already joined the forces, that 91 have fallen, and that the principle of employing only those who are unfit for military service has been rigidly adhered to.

The Local Government Board, however, have now in mind the setting free of municipal employees for work in arsenals, dockyards, and armament factories, as well as on railways, farms, and in the docks. The Council is doing its best to assist the Government in these respects.

Nearly 2,000 men in the tramways department have joined the forces, and one effect of only giving employment to men who are over Army age or physically unfit for service is that the number available for the department has been inadequate. This has meant overtime for many men, and restricted revenue for the trams owing to the impossibility of running a normal service of cars. Arrangements have, however, been made with Woolwich Arsenal to take over a large number of men employed at the tramway central repair depot at Charlton. This has been rendered possible by the willingness of the police to waive the annual renovation of the trams.

The General Purposes Committee point out that it has of late been extremely difficult to maintain a full service of cars, as very few suitable men now apply for situations as motormen.

Representatives of the Vehicle Workers' Unions have been approached as to the employment of women as tramway conductors. But neither union favours the idea. The matter is, however, to be brought to the attention of the Chief Industrial Commissioner by the Director of Labour Exchanges, with a view to his conferring on the subject with the representatives of the men.

663 II/52 663

Derbyshire Courier,
May 8th. 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR WORK.

NEED FOR HELP AT CHESTERFIELD.

Response of the Leisured

NOT AS SATISFACTORY AS IN OTHER TOWNS.

An appeal to the women of Chesterfield to register themselves for war work was made on Monday at a meeting of representatives of various organisations in the town. It was stated that locally the women of leisure have not come forward as satisfactorily as in other towns. The meeting was convened by the Mayor (Ald. E. Shentall), and was held in his parlour at the Stephenson Memorial Hall. Miss Eleanor J. Beardsley, assistant organising officer for the East Midlands district, explained the Government scheme for the employment of more women and girls.

The Mayor, who presided, said that not only would women be doing a patriotic work by taking the place of men during the war but in many instances they would be keeping together the homes and dependents of those men already serving. Their work would also assist to alleviate distress. It had now been realised, as it never was before the war, that many positions in industrial life could be filled by women. In some towns they had already women tram conductors and in Chesterfield they had women porters. Fortunately Chesterfield was in a position at present, with box factories and potteries, to find labour for the majority of its women and girls, but the object of the scheme was to fill up the ranks by registration in case of necessity.

A Chance for Women of Leisure.

Miss Beardsley, explaining the object of the Government scheme, said the appeal was especially directed to the women of leisure, who did not normally follow employment, to register themselves so that in case of emergency there would be a reserve force of female labour for national service. One object was to obtain a census of the women available for part-time or full employment, so as to leave men free to join the colours if they were desirous. The scheme should not be confused with the unemployment register at the Labour Exchange and those women who were in search of ordinary work should not register themselves for war service thinking they would be able to get employment immediately. What was required under the war service for women project was a reserve force upon which they could rely to take up all conditions of labour for such periods as might be necessary. An important feature of the scheme was that it would show to some extent how many men willing to serve their country could be released from their varied occupations.

While Chesterfield was in the fortunate position at present of having plenty of female labour it was possible the time might arrive when more women were required, and those women who were willing for national service could then assist in their own area instead of drafting female labour from another district where they might be required at a later date. It was not intended to attract girls who were already in employment to register themselves, especially if they were engaged on Government contracts. In the agricultural districts there would be many openings for female labour in the feeding and rearing of stock. Training would be taken up by the Government for females registering themselves for special duties, according to the nation's needs. Married women whose husband's were already serving with the colours and were free would assist the object tremendously if they registered themselves.

Problem of Wages.

Instancing the many occupations in which women and girls could be employed, Miss Beardsley mentioned shop assistants, statistical departments of railways, banks clerks, and even porters. In the event of vacancies occurring, the question would be asked of the employers if the vacancy was created by a man enlisting and if his situation was to be kept open for him if he returned. One difficulty was the question of wages, but so far as Government contracts ing these qualifications have been invited to make application, through the commandant of one of the voluntary aid detachments, to the headquarters in London of the St. John Ambulance Association. Those who desire to become probationer nurses, but who have not the necessary qualifications, can obtain them in the voluntary aid detachments, and it is interesting to know that some thirty probationer nurses have been introduced at the military hospital at Beckett's Park, through the scheme. The conditions in regard to examinations have been relaxed in order that nursing aspirants may obtain their certificates at the earliest possible moment, while those who have experience will be examined by the matron of a hospital in their district.

With the object of securing the registration of members of the voluntary aid detachments of the Leeds district a meeting was held in the Friends' Meeting House, Woodhouse Lane, yesterday, under the auspices of the district organisation, and the state of affairs explained by Lady Harewood (the vice-president), Professor Smithells (secretary), and Mr. J. R. Cross (Horsforth). There was a very gratifying attendance of ladies, and a large number of applications had previously been received for membership. It was explained that twenty-three or twenty-four members completes a detachment, but that it is possible to have supernumery members and swell the membership to any desired number. Supernumery members can only be admitted at the discretion of the commandants.

Mr. Cross said he believed that in the future there would be a great call for women, and the object in having a register was that they should know where the skill could be found He spoke of the indebtedness of the members for the splendid way in which the doctors of the district had quietly given their services for a number of years in training the units, and went on to point a way in which the members could be of use. At Horsforth, where one doctor was fighting in the trenches, another was engaged on ambulance trains, and one of the nurses had gone to the base hospital they had employed the members of the voluntary aid detachment to assist the district nurses. They had not been ashamed to do any kind of work. There had been and probably would be some friction between the professional and amateur classes of nurses, and he thought it was well to recognise that, and to ask each, and especially the trained nurses, to exercise the greatest forbearance with the women who came forward in an amateur way and were willing to to their level best. It might be that they might have bomb-dropping in some towns, added Mr Cross, and if they had it would be a good thing to have members of detachments listed and know where they had people for first-aid work. Some of the women might train as sanitary inspectors, because there was no doubt that the country would soon be more or less denuded of its manhood, and they ought to prepare for that time.

Will Women Conductors be Employed?

At to-morrow's meeting of the London County Council a recommendation will be brought up instructing the committees of the Council to take all possible steps to give effect to the views of the Local Government Board in regard to releasing male labour for war service. It is stated at the same time that as many as 5,421 of the Council's servants have already joined the forces, that 91 have fallen, and that the principle of employing only those who are unfit for military service has been rigidly adhered to.

The Local Government Board, however, have now in mind the setting free of municipal employees for work in arsenals, dockyards, and armament factories, as well as on railways, farms, and in the docks. The Council is doing its best to assist the Government in these respects.

Nearly 2,000 men in the tramways department have joined the forces, and one effect of only giving employment to men who are over Army age or physically unfit for service is that the number available for the department has been inadequate. This has meant overtime for many men, and restricted revenue for the trams owing to the impossibility of running a normal service of cars. Arrangements have, however, been made with Woolwich Arsenal to take over a large number of men employed at the tramway central repair depot at Charlton. This has been rendered possible by the willingness of the police to waive the annual renovation of the trams.

The General Purposes Committee point out that it has of late been extremely difficult to maintain a full service of cars, as very few suitable men now apply for situations as motormen.

Representatives of the Vehicle Workers' Unions have been approached as to the employment of women as tramway conductors. But neither union favours the idea. The matter is, however, to be brought to the attention of the Chief Industrial Commissioner by the Director of Labour Exchanges, with a view to his conferring on the subject with the representatives of the men.

---

and was held in his parlour at the Stephenson Memorial Hall. Miss Eleanor J. Beardsley, assistant organising officer for the East Midlands district, explained the Government scheme for the employment of more women and girls.

The Mayor, who presided, said that not only would women be doing a patriotic work by taking the place of men during the war but in many instances they would be keeping together the homes and dependents of those men already serving. Their work would also assist to alleviate distress. It had now been realised, as it never was before the war, that many positions in industrial life could be filled by women. In some towns they had already women tram conductors and in Chesterfield they had women porters. Fortunately Chesterfield was in a position at present, with box factories and potteries, to find labour for the majority of its women and girls, but the object of the scheme was to fill up the ranks by registration in case of necessity.

A Chance for Women of Leisure.

Miss Beardsley, explaining the object of the Government scheme, said the appeal was especially directed to the women of leisure, who did not normally follow employment, to register themselves so that in case of emergency there would be a reserve force of female labour for national service. One object was to obtain a census of the women available for part-time or full employment, so as to leave men free to join the colours if they were desirous. The scheme should not be confused with the unemployment register at the Labour Exchange and those women who were in search of ordinary work should not register themselves for war service thinking they would be able to get employment immediately. What was required under the war service for women project was a reserve force upon which they could rely to take up all conditions of labour for such periods as might be necessary. An important feature of the scheme was that it would show to some extent how many men willing to serve their country could be released from their varied occupations.

While Chesterfield was in the fortunate position at present of having plenty of female labour it was possible the time might arrive when more women were required, and those women who were willing for national service could then assist in their own area instead of drafting female labour from another district where they might be required at a later date. It was not intended to attract girls who were already in employment to register themselves, especially if they were engaged on Government contracts. In the agricultural districts there would be many openings for female labour in the feeding and rearing of stock. Training would be taken up by the Government for females registering themselves for special duties, according to the nation's needs. Married women whose husband's were already serving with the colours and were free would assist the object tremendously if they registered themselves.

Problem of Wages.

Instancing the many occupations in which women and girls could be employed, Miss Beardsley mentioned shop assistants, statistical departments of railways, banks clerks, and even porters. In the event of vacancies occurring, the question would be asked of the employers if the vacancy was created by a man enlisting and if his situation was to be kept open for him if he returned. One difficulty was the question of wages, but as far as Government contracts were concerned the women would be paid the same piece work rates as the men. All along the line they would endeavour to keep up the standard rate of wages. No woman would be compelled to take a situation against her own trade union principles. Arrangements would be made if possible for friends to work together and if necessary buildings would be commandeered for housing accommodation, as in the case of soldiers' billets.

Reverting to the subject of farming, Miss Beardsley said that under a scheme introduced by the Board of Agriculture and the Board of Trade, courses of instruction were being given to women gratis with free board and railway expenses at the various agricultural colleges. Several women from Chesterfield had already taken up training in farming and dairying at the Midland Agricultural and Dairy College and had given every indication of being very capable workers. Up to the time the training scheme had been a success and she appealed to progressive farmers to avail themselves of the women's register.

In conclusion Miss Beardsley said the leisured women of Chesterfield had not come forward as satisfactorily as in other towns and she appealed to those present to make the scheme as widely known as possible and not allow Chesterfield to be behind other towns

On the motion of Councillor Hind, seconded by Mr. H. J. Cook, Miss Beardsley and the Mayor were thanked for their services.

Forms of registration, it was mentioned, may be obtained from the local Labour Exchange.

The Drapers Record, May 8th. 1915.

663 II/53 663

The big West-End stores are experiencing considerable trouble in their dispatch departments by reason of large numbers of the men leaving in order to enlist. As a result, female drivers of delivery vans and female porters have made their appearance. The cause of the partial dislocation of the dispatch departments is one that, speaking generally, reflects little credit on the stores affected.

Daily Graphic, May 7th 1915.

MEN AT WOMEN'S WORK.

STRIKING LIST OF SIGNATORIES TO AN APPEAL.

To the Editor of the Daily Graphic.

Sir,—We cannot help feeling that there is a great inconsistency between the appeals that the Government is constantly making for recruits and its action in employing trained soldiers in work which is totally unmilitary in character.

An immense number of military clerks are employed, not only in Flanders, but over here in England, doing work which women could do equally well. And in military hospitals at home and abroad a large number of active youths may be seen occupying themselves in work which women could do much better.

The hospital units which the Scottish women have been sending to France and Serbia have women orderlies, and they are found to do the work perfectly, yet the British authorities still continue to employ soldiers in these duties.—Yours faithfully,

Winifred Arran; Margaret Ashton; Alice Balfour; Lydia A. Booth; Sybil de V. Brassey; M. E. Buxton; Ivy Chamberlain; Kate Courtney of Penwith; A. Cowdray; Louise Creighton; C. Despard; Maude Banister Fletcher; Caroline Grosvenor; Eldred Horsley; Katherine Price Hughes; Constance Leconfield; Edith H. Lough; Alice Meynell; Madeleine Middleton; Mary Murray; B. Portsmouth; Eleanor F. Rathbone; M. L. Broadley Reid; Maud Selborne; Amy E. Smith; Janet P. Trevelyan; Mary Trevelyan; Mary D. Waldegrave.

Common Cause, May 7th. 1915.

WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE.

Madam,—I see it is reported that at a Mansion House meeting at York on April 10th, Miss Thornton, a Board of Trade representative, quotes Mr. Lloyd George's letter to me as having "amplified" the agreement which resulted from the recent Treasury Conference between Mr. Lloyd George and Labour representatives.

I must protest against the correspondence between Mr. Lloyd George and myself being used to make women believe that women's sweated labour will not be employed to reduce the wages of men. Mr. Lloyd George stated that "women undertaking the work of men would get the same piece work rates as men were receiving before the date of this agreement."

I replied to Mr. Lloyd George's letter, asking for an assurance that if women are employed on time rates to replace men, these rates shall be the same as those that were hitherto paid to men. To this letter, which was sent on March 26th, I have received no reply; but at the Conference of women's societies, which was called at the Board of Trade on April 13th, Mr. Runciman, President of the Board of Trade, said that in regard to Government contracts, whilst it had been decided that the same piece work rates should be paid to women as to men, in regard to time rates no special conditions had been laid down with regard to women's labour. The general safeguard against women being used to displace men was that employers were being asked to take back those of their men who had served in the army.

These words plainly show that there is absolutely no guarantee that women shall not be employed to do men's work at a lower rate. Whether the work of men has hitherto been paid by piece or by time, there is nothing to prevent women being engaged on time rates only, in which case the Government has expressly stated that it will exact no conditions.

From the woman's point of view, it is unjust that women should be employed to do men's work at a lower rate; from the man's point of view, it is disastrous. Guarantees to take men back into employment after the war is over can never be enforced, and if any proof of this were needed, we may find it in the fact that promises by employers to make allowances to the wives of their workmen who are fighting at the front, are already being broken on every hand.

E. Sylvia Pankhurst.

Liverpool Post, May 12th. 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR WORK.

MEETING AT WARRINGTON.

The Mayor of Warrington (Alderman Peter Peacock) presided over a large gathering of ladies in the Parr Hall, held on Monday, with regard to war service for women. Captain Williams, of the Liverpool Dockers' Battalion, pointed out that the country was short of labour of the most vital description. That shortage gave the women a chance of playing a more prominent part in the war. The proposed scheme was to get a census of women who were able and capable of working to come forward should the occasion arise. Any employment offered would be at fair wages, and there would be no question of cheap labour or of under-cutting men's labour. The women of England could do a great deal to assist in the production of munitions of war, and in other spheres of labour the women were in a position of taking the place of men who could be released to go to the front. There was also plenty of scope for women in clerical positions, and there was no reason why they should not do very much more in the future. Women who did take the places of men must be willing at the end of the war to relinquish the positions they had taken if the men came back when the war was over.

Dr. Mary Davies, of Liverpool, another speaker, pointed out that the women of England could do a vast amount of work, and so assist in bringing the war to a successful conclusion.

Daily Telegraph, May 10th. 1915.

The employment of women during the period of the war as a means of releasing able-bodied men required for military duty is proceeding on a scale that must be highly gratifying to those who have organised it. Over sixty thousand women have already registered at the various Labour Exchanges throughout the country, inspired, most of them, by a patriotic resolve to help their country as best they can by undertaking duties which, had conditions remained normal, they would never have attempted. More than ten thousand women have asked for armament work, and almost as many have applied to be engaged as clerks and in other capacities where previous experience is not the first essential. Agriculture is making a great demand for labour, and the urgency of this cannot be too widely recognised. This is a sphere where feminine activity may find scope, and, according to the latest official statistics, seven thousand women are being employed in farm work of one kind or another. An economic danger which the Trade Union leaders are quite justified in anticipating is that the introduction of women into the labour market on a wholesale scale may eventually be made the excuse for cutting wages. It should be remembered, however, that the vast majority of women who are leaving their domestic ties for more serious business have no intention of competing permanently with male labour, and that when the millions of men now under arms return to civil life their sisters who have been deputising for them in their absence will return to their former tasks at home. More women are still needed.

Christian Commonwealth, May 12th. 1915.

The World of Labour.

(By Our Own Correspondent.)

The Menace of Women's Employment.

The Government has so far taken no action to restrain or regulate in any way the entrance of women into trades and occupations hitherto followed by men. The proposals of the Workers' War Emergency Committee have apparently been put aside, and the Advisory Committee suggested by them has not been appointed. The objects of such a committee would have been to ensure that women should not be supplied, at least through sources which the Government could control, at prices lower than those paid to men doing the same work; and, further, it would have been the business of such a committee to consider in what way the available supplies of women's labour might best be adapted to meet the needs of this time of industrial upheaval. It is not generally realised how chaotic is the present position. Women are needed in many industries, and yet only where they are strongly organised are they able to command other than sweated rates. Where firms work on Government jobs it is certainly possible to secure fair rates, but it can only be done in those rare places where a vigilant trade unionist is on the spot to make the conditions known. Again, although many thousands of women are still unemployed, there are factories where excessive overtime is being allowed because, it is claimed, a sufficient supply of labour is not forthcoming! When it is possible to keep a woman employed for twenty-four to twenty-six hours at a time, it is clear that the organisation of industry is seriously at fault. In London a large number of women—e.g., in the printing trades—are unable to get work in their own trade: yet they are an admirable class of workers for adaptation to other trades. A committee such as that suggested, with a strong representation of trade unionists and working women, could do much to improve these conditions, and would also see to it that women were not simply introduced into industries to do the unpleasant and unintelligent work which men find unattractive, and to do it at rates which men would refuse. It is lamentable that the Government is allowing the most reckless exploitation of women to continue unchecked.

The Times,
May 10th. 1915.

WAR WORK FOR WOMEN.

60,000 DEPUTIES REGISTERED.

THE NEW FARM HAND.

Over 60,000 women have already registered for war service in the labour exchanges throughout the British Isles. Of these 11,000 have asked for armament work, 9,000 for clerical, and 7,000 for agricultural employment. About 2,000 have offered to work as shop assistants, 1,200 as tailors and dressmakers, including those prepared to work power machines, and 1,200 as ordinary needleworkers.

The women offering to do armament work are, for the most part, women who have not undertaken work before; those offering themselves as shop assistants, on the other hand, have done other kinds of work, but feel that, as large numbers of young men are employed in the distributing trades, the greatest immediate need for women deputies might be expected from this quarter.

The various schemes of training in agriculture, which have been undertaken by the Board of Trade have been progressing very satisfactorily. At the Harper Adams College, Newport, Shropshire, a second class of 30 students has just finished their course of instruction in farm operations. These women have been drafted from Birmingham and Shrewsbury, and are of varying social status, most of them having received a good general education. The work includes instruction in stock feeding and tending, dairying, poultry keeping, horticulture, and general farm work. The Board of Trade inspector, visiting the class before the conclusion of the course, reports that, without exception, the women appear to be enjoying the work and that they far exceeded expectations in energy, enthusiasm, and capacity. The pupils informed him that they hoped to be able to endure the hard physical labour should they be placed on farms at the completion of their course.

Within the past week about 36 women have been placed on farms mainly in their own counties where farm hands are urgently needed. Negotiations for 14 others are in hand. About 96 are in training or have just finished their course.

Other agricultural colleges which are cooperating in the scheme are Swanley, Garforth (Leeds), Sparsholt (Winchester), the Midland Agricultural Training College (Kingston-on-Soar), and Aberystwith. The course at most of these colleges is of about three weeks and includes the rudiments of milking.

Every effort will be made to use the women in their own counties, and in this way to diminish the housing problem. The women's horticultural societies have cooperated very well, but the fullest advantages of the scheme can only be secured if the farmers will show no diffidence in testing the ability and good will of the women, all of whom are carefully chosen before being sent for training.

Deputies in Other Trades.

In other trades and occupations there is very little change in the nature of the demand for war service. Footmen are being constantly replaced and so are light porters, cleaners, messengers, and liftmen. There is a fair demand for women accountants to replace men, and one training college reports an order for 100 women with statistical training to undertake classifications involving percentages. The banks are employing women in constantly increasing numbers, and in some of the outlying post-offices the same thing is happening. But the higher branches of the Civil Service still show a great reluctance to admit women who, with similar academic training to the men they would replace, would be willing to act as deputies.

The Globe,
May 13th. 1915.

WOMEN AND WORK.

NECESSITY OF NATIONAL SERVICE.

While thousands of women are working ardently, many of them in humble capacities, where their labour is, nevertheless, of the utmost value to the country, there are numbers who do not yet realise that every able-bodied woman and girl, no less than every able-bodied man, is needed for national service, that there is work waiting for all, in one direction or another. To those who understand the gigantic struggle in which we are engaged there is something terrible and ominous in the spectacle of the countless number of well-dressed apparently frivolous and light-hearted young women one sees idling precious time away, window-gazing, standing for hours in the streets watching for the arrival of some Royal or notable person who is to attend a benefit performance, or to officiate at an opening ceremony, or waiting for the doors to open on matinée days at popular theatres.

WASTE OF ENERGY.

Probably most of these girls attend a "working party" once a week or so, and devote other odd moments to sewing or knitting garments for the wounded—often very unsatisfactorily—and thereby imagine they are "doing their bit." Never was there a greater mistake. Such work is necessary, to keep up the immense supply of garments that will be wanted for many months to come, but it is work that should be done by delicate and elderly women, and those whose home duties prevent them taking up outside occupations. Already there is plenty of work which can only be performed by the young, strong and active, and the need for such workers will become urgent in the near future, while now is the time to be training, for desultory, inefficient, and haphazard work is absolutely useless: it represents sheer waste of energy. Hundreds of gently-bred girls realised that, in the early weeks of the war, when, armed with an ambulance class certificate but with no experience, they set out to "nurse" the wounded. They soon found their level, and—all honour to them—turned their hands cheerfully to the house- and scullery-maids' tasks that are the lot of the probationer in her first months, leaving the trained and capable professional nurses free for the important duties on the proper performance of which life or death depends.

HOW TO TRAIN.

In many cases, I am sure, the girls of the well-to-do class remain idle simply because, never having done any useful work in their lives, they do not know how or where to begin. Yet where there's a will there's a way, and if they are in earnest they will soon find out that way. If they can only give a part of their time to regular work the Women's Emergency Corps will set them on the right track, even if it can itself provide no direct opening or training, it is in touch with many organisations that are in need of voluntary workers; or if they are prepared to qualify for War Emergency work on the Government plan they should register at the nearest Labour Bureau for this special department. I know of several well-bred girls who, actuated by pure patriotism, were among the first to register, have now received their preliminary training, and are well and happily at work. One who stated that she was "ready to train for anything, but would prefer agricultural work," was at once put into training at a model dairy farm, and within a month was drafted, with several other girls, to a farm where they are doing the work of men who have joined the Army, and doing it admirably; happy in the knowledge that they, too, are serving their country to the best of their ability. That is the right spirit.

---

663 II/54 663.

Sheffield Telegraph,
May 17th. 1915.

WOMEN'S WAGES.

SHEFFIELD WORKERS AND GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS.

Taking occasion by the hand, the Sheffield Women Workers' Organising Committee held a meeting on Saturday afternoon at the Engineers' Institute, Stanley Street, Sheffield, at which not only the recent Government proposals but the general conditions of employment of women were considered. There was a good attendance of delegates from trade unions and other bodies, the sexes being about equally represented.

Lady Mabel Smith, who presided, welcomed the presence of so many men trade unionists, as showing that the men felt very keenly that the interests of men and women were identical. The registration of women for work if required, as suggested by the Board of Trade, had been largely carried out over the United Kingdom, so that women could take the place of men who had gone to fight or to work on armaments. This might be looked upon as a temporary expedient, but not much more; but it was likely to have a wide influence. The business of the conference was the discussion of the following resolution:—

"That in view of the Government proposals for the special employment of women workers in suitable industries during the continuance of the war, to take the place of men who have enlisted, and the possible menace under the guise of patriotism to the legitimate female worker, this Conference, representative of the trade unions of Sheffield, pledges itself to use every effort to secure equal pay for equal work to all females so employed, irrespective of any particular trade.

"This Conference is further of opinion that more active support from the organised male workers is essential for the furtherance of the principles of trade unionism and the better organisation of the female workers of Sheffield."

In proposing the resolution, Miss Olive Hargreaves said that the Labour movement had today come definitely to a point when it had two methods. The first was that of returning evil for evil, of cultivating class hatred. In so far as trade unionism brought about love for those with whom they were brought into close touch it was good; but the unions were selfish in so far as they had not learned that the working woman was a sister.

This was most emphatically the time for organising, because the war was one for the principle that the individual soul and body were of the greatest importance. This principle was the antithesis of the German system, particularly of that of Treitschke. The great stumbling-block of social progress was low wages. They could only approach the question of women's wages with sorrow and shame. One reason was the unstable position of women in industry; secondly, there was the introduction of women into new industries; and thirdly, the most inadequate wages. Of two million women employed in industry, only 318,000 were in trade unions. In Lancashire the women were admitted to some of the same unions as the men, and they were better paid there than anywhere.

In the staple trades of Sheffield the average wages of women who had had several years' experience worked out at about 8s. She had estimated that a Sheffield woman could not live on less than 15s., without including anything for reasonable pocket-money. Unskilled men were getting 28s. a week, and after a few weeks they got 35s. She hoped women would not be paid less. They would all be proud to work on armaments, but they must not be badly paid.

Councillor Alf Short, in seconding, quoted figures showing the rapid growth in the employment of women in bookbinding, photography, saleshops, and offices since 1851. This growth would probably continue for some time. With the increase of machinery, the delicacy of touch, the intuition of mind, and the reliability of women, as well as the economic question, encouraged the employer in the introduction of women into the labour market. Woman was leaving behind her her sex disability, and consequently was becoming more and more perfect so far as related to her labour. He deprecated the introduction of woman labour into dirty and sordid work. They must determine that if they went into shell factories they should receive proper wages. They must see to it that their daughters who had to go out to work immediately became members of trade unions.

A long discussion took place on the resolution, in which it was generally agreed that women ought to be admitted to the unions on the same basis as men. Miss Airey, who summed up, doubted if there was a shortage of men. There were the older men, and those medically unfit, some of whom could not get work. They must not have any women admitted into the works unless there was a clear understanding as to wages. The resolution was then passed.

The Lady, May 18th. 1915.

It is estimated that up to the present about 50,000 women have registered their names at the various Labour Exchanges in response to the Government's call for war service volunteers. In this connection it should not be forgotten that nearly half the female population of our country is engaged in regular employment, and that a very large proportion of the so-called "leisured" women are busy housekeepers and mothers, as well as indefatigable voluntary workers in some activity or another. Anyway, no less a person than the Prime Minister has announced that he considers the response "eminently satisfactory." It is in outdoor employment that the innovation has attracted chief attention, though so far as agricultural work is concerned, the farmers' demand for women's services is not very brisk as yet. Coachwomen have not yet been seen in London, though girl van drivers are being employed, but there have been applications in Ireland from women who wish to drive horses, with the significant addition, "no objection to uniform."

The Yorkshire Observer, May 18th. 1915.

WORK FOR WOMEN.

The Chairman reported upon an interview which he had had with Miss Thornton, senior organising officer for women's work in connection with labour exchanges, with reference to the finding of employment for women, especially in agriculture, and said the co-operation of the County Council was asked for. He understood that 5,500 women had offered their services in place of men who were going to the front or into training. Of these, 769 had offered themselves for clerical work and 486 for agriculture, most of the others offering for some form of light work and many not specifying any particular kind of work. The principal object, he understood, was to obtain help in farm work, for which 6s. to 9s. a week was offered for those living in and 12s. to 15s. for those living outside. A number of women had already been trained at agricultural colleges, and it was desired that a large number of others should offer themselves throughout the riding. He was sure that the members would do what they could to make the need known in the different parts of the riding which they represented.

Mr. Ben Turner (Batley) said he thought the question was a little bigger than had been suggested. One of the chief calls, he thought, was for assistance in armament works. He regretted to say that women working in some armament factories were not being paid at the rate they ought to be. It was reported, he said, that the wages paid at Newcastle were scandalously low. He did not want to encourage the sweating of women even in these war times. If adequate wages were given he thought the farmers would be able to obtain male labour. Certainly he did not consider 12s. a week a proper wage to pay women for farm labour when living outside.

Major J. W. Dent pointed out that the wages mentioned were those suggested by the labour exchanges and not by the farmers. The farmers would be willing to pay according to the abilities of the women.

Mr. H. Smith (Castleford) said he knew of a case of a woman who received only 1s. 3d. a day for working from 7 o'clock in the morning until 5 at night. If the farmers were ready to pay proper wages they could get workpeople.

Mr. Richard Garnett declared that farm workers were paid better wages than a good many artisans. Wages in agriculture were high in comparison with a good many other occupations in the North of England. If the woman Mr. Smith spoke of was working for 1s. 3d. a day, he would like to know her age and a few other particulars. If she were a capable woman he could find plenty of places for her at double the wage mentioned.

The subject was not further discussed.

663 II/55 (13.

Hampshire Chronicle, May 15th. 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

MEETING AT WINCHESTER.

At the invitation of the Countess of Northbrook, a well-attended meeting of those interested in war service for women was held at the Banqueting Hall of the Guildhall, Winchester, on Monday afternoon, when an interesting address on the subject of war service for women was given by Miss Deane, senior organising officer of the Board of Trade. The chair was occupied by the Mayoress (Mrs. Edmeades), and there were also present on the platform, in addition to Miss Deane, the Countess of Northbrook, the Countess of Portsmouth, and Capt. W. R. Hoare.

The MAYORESS, in opening the proceedings, remarked that it was a great satisfaction to see so many interested in war work for women. She was sure that they all recognised the necessity for work in these days, and she thought she might go so far as to say that they were all most anxious to help wherever it was needed, even though it cost them much inconvenience and self-sacrifice. The Senior Organising Officer of the Board of Trade (Miss Deane) had come to tell them the very best way of doing useful work, and they would afterwards have the pleasure of an address from Capt. Hoare. She had the greatest pleasure in calling upon Miss Deane to address them.

Miss DEANE remarked that it was splendid to see before her so many who were keen about war service work, because she was perfectly certain that if they had any time, all felt prepared to do their very utmost and their best, and that they only wanted it pointed out how best they could help. A good deal had been written and said about war service for women, and she wanted, if she might, to tell them about the Government appeal which had been made to the women of Great Britain. It was recognised that hundreds of women were already doing all they possibly could do, and that most glorious work was being done in hundreds of ways. But it was also recognised that there were certain industries and certain kinds of work which were getting short of workers because the men were going, and it was realised that this would happen more and more. It was also felt desirable that many more men should go—men of military age. If that was so, something would have to be done to fill their places during the war. Certain kinds of work would have to be properly organised if it was to be carried on, to a large extent, and it was felt that a Government appeal would have to be made. It was not quite a month ago that they probably saw a letter which came from the Board of Trade appealing to the women of Great Britain to respond for war service. It came through the Board of Trade because that seemed to be the department which had the machinery for working the organisation. As they had offices all over the country in connection with the Board of Trade, not only in the big towns but in some of the country places, it was possible for people to get registration forms, send them in, and thus get in touch with the central authority, so that the needs of the country, as they grew, might be represented in the districts where there were people ready to offer their services. The response had been very good, but it was nothing like the response which would come. Already 60,000 women had registered for war service. They hoped there would be many more. The need was yet not generally understood; it only required to be understood to ensure a much greater response. That varied very much in different parts of the country, and there was even some misunderstanding regarding it. They really wanted to find out the reserve force—those who were not already engaged in work, and who would, in case of emergency, do some definite kind of work and release a man to fight. But it must be understood that the Government appeal which was being made was not to those who were already working. It was not made to the industrial workers who were doing all they could for the moment, or to the domestic servant, or anyone at present engaged in work. They did not ask anyone to throw up good work. What the country needed was that women should stick to the work they already had, and do it well. There was an idea prevalent that this war service appeal was to persuade women to leave the work they were already engaged in and take up something new and something more exciting. That was not so. She also hoped that people would not put off this call because they were not trained. It was quite possible that they might be called upon at once to do something, and as the war went on she thought that increasing numbers would be called upon. Therefore, while there was time, why not qualify and make up their minds to train themselves for something definite if possible? They had already had a great many applications for an opportunity for training in different kinds of work. The need for certain work had been great. There was, for instance, a need for training for work on the land. In the county of Hampshire that had already been established by the training of women at the Farm Institute at Sparsholt. She believed that they had only had six war students there, whereas in some places there had been a much greater number. Those students had shown themselves very anxious to do work on the land, and it was hoped that they would continue to work on the farms until the end of the war. Some had already begun to work on the farms, and so far the Board of Trade had had very satisfactory reports of the work they were [illegible] of all sorts and conditions, and had become acquainted with employers and employed—women as well as men. Having given a few instances of the admirable way in which men were coming forward, Capt. Hoare said that some of the men were physically unfit, and were therefore prevented from joining. Regarding the need of men, Lord Kitchener had already told them that he was satisfied with the way in which they were, generally speaking, coming forward, but it was not overstating it to say that they required many more men. They were glad to know that men from the Government offices were also coming forward. A register had been opened at Winchester, and it was their aim to co-operate with and supplement the work of the Board of Trade through the Labour Exchanges, and he had been asked to state that every effort would be made to work in co-operation with the Board of Trade. He was perfectly certain that it was the right thing to do (hear, hear), and if he might say so there was wisdom in it because a committee had certain powers. Men were of little use before they had had four months' good training, but in the case of women, he thought one month's training for the work they would have to do would be invaluable, and that was a point he should like to emphasise. There was a demand for women's work on the farms, in the shops, and also in various offices. He could speak for all these, and say that what was most wanted was somebody with a little experience. He would therefore like to join in urging upon them the real importance of being qualified to help, and of doing their best to persuade those with whom they had influence to set to work at once and start training, so that when the time, to which Miss Deane had referred, came, women would be ready to come forward and take the places of the men (applause).

Questions were invited, and one lady suggested that, as a member of the teaching profession, it would possibly be practical for some of them to engage themselves in agricultural work during the holiday season. That season coincided with the period of increased work on the land.

Miss DEANE replied that there was a great deal of part time work which would be possible. Two or three might undertake such work together, and divide the time. They had already had, during the Easter holidays, schoolmistresses who had spent their leisure time training on a farm, and they would be ready, when the summer holidays came, to do more work in that direction. There would be a great deal to do, for instance, in the fruit-picking season. She therefore hoped that they would register for holiday work. She might add that 60,000 women had already registered, and they were being helped in regard to registration by the women's societies, such as the Mothers' Union, the Girls' Friendly Society, and the Suffrage Societies. What was wanted was a complete register.

In reply to further questions, Miss DEANE said that the only Government-paid training was in the agricultural department. There was only a small grant made there, it being only a demonstration, and it was hoped that the counties would take it up more generally if the Board of Agriculture set the lead

Another question asked was as to whether those who lived in large houses could not register their names as being willing to take in war service women?

Miss DEANE replied that the suggestion was a splendid one, and it would be especially valuable in those districts where the need for this help was urgent. In some parts it was very urgent. As to those who were out of work owing to the war, she would point out that there were ways and means already established of dealing with them. The war service register that the State had appealed for was quite separate to the ordinary working register. The ordinary work of the Labour Exchanges would go on, and there were funds for dealing with unemployment caused by the war.

Miss DEANE was next asked whether her experience enabled her to gauge whether work for women indoors was more profitable than outdoor work? Her reply was that indoor work for women showed much better results. Many were qualified to take indoor posts, and already received very good pay. But she thought that the wages that were being paid women engaged in agricultural work were also very good. Farmers realised that they would have to pay decent wages.

After other questions had been asked and answered, the Countess of NORTHBROOK moved a hearty vote of thanks to Miss Deane for her address. The information Miss Deane had given them would be very useful, especially to the Committee which had been formed to organise the work in Winchester, and of which committee her ladyship was the chairman. Several posts had been filled by women, and she believed that they were giving every satisfaction. They had a list of women and girls who were prepared to give their services, and they would be glad to hear from employers of their men who had gone to the war, and they would take the names of the women who wished to register. Miss Margerison was their secretary, and the committee would be glad if the women would give her their names. It was quite impossible for the women to sit still and to nothing to help the country and the men in those terrible times. They might not be able to do very much, but they could try their best, and she could only hope that they would not be found wanting. They were very proud of their men [illegible] kinds of work. The need for certain work had been great. There was, for instance, a need for training for work on the land. In the county of Hampshire that had already been established by the training of women at the Farm Institute at Sparsholt. She believed that they had only had six war students there, whereas in some places there had been a much greater number. Those students had shown themselves very anxious to do work on the land, and it was hoped that they would continue to work on the farms until the end of the war. Some had already begun to work on the farms, and so far the Board of Trade had had very satisfactory reports of the work they were doing. In certain industries there was a great demand for an increased supply of workers, and she thought they would have to face an even greater demand, but that would not come all at once. There was, however, a present demand, and she believed that later on it would be much greater, in regard to work connected with the equipment of the Army, and everything dealing with leather work, uniforms, harness work, &c. These things called for an increased supply of workers—a tremendous increase—and a great many war service people were already engaged in that work. The Government departments realised that there were a very large number of men of military age who should go and fight. In her own divisional offices in the south-west of England they had taken on several women to take the place of men, and that was also happening in other districts. A certain number of women were being taken on in the banks, and also in shops, but there remained a great deal to be done in that direction still, and those who knew some of the big shops in London would be surprised to find what work was being carried on by the women who had taken the place of men. But it was obvious that they could not go straight into it; they had to learn. And they wanted them to train. If they put their hands to this they should do it in earnest. They did not want to play. It must be the real thing. Having referred to instances in which work was already being undertaken in other counties, Miss Deane proceeded to say that they were now able to house the women more comfortably, one reason being because the men had gone. But those who volunteered for war service and work on the farms must realise that the accommodation would not always be of the very best. They must make the best of it. When they were trying to place the war service people in their work they tried to tell them of the conditions there were of housing, and so on, in the neighbourhood. They hoped that there would be no question whatever of under-selling labour: where there was equal work there should be equal pay (applause), and it must also be distinctly understood that this war service work must be given up when the men came back. It would be disastrous if they thought they were going to oust the men. The idea was only to help keep the place for them until they came back again. They already had women ticket collectors, women gardeners, and motor drivers. As the need arose, she thought they would realise that the women of England would fall in just as the women of France had (applause). In France, every woman who was available went at once, and they were carrying on the work in a splendid and business-like way. She felt certain that the women of England would do their part in the same manner, and she hoped they would all combine in this work and help each other, and set aside any petty ideas there might be. Some had looked upon registration as infra dig. But registration was necessary, because it was indispensable that they should have a national clearing house for this work. There they knew what was needed, and where the need was greatest, and they could advise accordingly. So that it was an advantage to have their local office and co-operate with the Board of Trade; otherwise they would not get the benefit of the national service that this was. It, however, did not follow that everyone would be called upon to serve at once. But as the war went on they would find a bit to do; they must not be discouraged if they were not called upon at once. She felt certain that more and more men were going, and that since the last piece of news they had there was not a man who did not want to go (applause). Therefore if they were not called upon at once, they would, by training, be prepared, so that they might be fit when the time came (loud applause).

Capt. W. R. Hoare remarked that, if they thought of it, their ship of State was in very stormy waters, and it was because all of them recognised the stress of weather through which they were going that they had met that day. When in the Acts it was said "they undergirded the ship with ropes that were composed of a great number of strands," they realised how it was in the power of everyone to provide something in the nature of a strand by which their ship could be undergirded. He (Capt. Hoare) came before them as a recruiter. As he went about recruiting on behalf of the Territorial Association for the 4th Hants he came into touch with people who were prepared to give their services, and they would be glad to hear from employers of their men who had gone to the war, and they would take the names of the women who wished to register. Miss Margerison was their secretary, and the committee would be glad if the women would give her their names. It was quite impossible for the women to sit still and do nothing to help the country and the men in these terrible times. They might not be able to do very much, but they could try their best, and she could only hope that they would not be found wanting. They were very proud of their men (applause). She had the greatest pleasure in proposing a hearty vote of thanks to Miss Deane for her address, and would couple with it their thanks also to Capt. Hoare for coming (applause).

Mrs. Fort seconded, and the motion was cordially agreed to.

Mrs. Elkington next proposed, and the Countess of Portsmouth seconded, a hearty vote of thanks to the Mayoress for presiding, and this was also received with hearty acclamation.

Capt. Hoare, responding for those to whom votes of thanks had been accorded, said he hoped that they might see an expression of their good will translated into deeds at no very distant period (applause).

Subsequently the Countess of Northbrook entertained those present at tea.

The Yorkshire Observer
May 15th 1915

Burnley News. May 15th 1915.

663 II/50 663

RELEASING MEN FOR THE FORCES.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

A BRADFORD EFFORT.

At the instance of the Board of Trade inquiries are being conducted in various trades with a view to facilitating the release of a large number of men for military services or for employment in other national services. An effort will be made in this direction in Bradford during next week; indeed, it may be said to begin to-day, when a meeting will be held in the Theatre Royal, organised by the National Union of Women Workers in response to the Government's appeal to women for war service. On Tuesday a conference will be held at the Mechanics' Institute of employers in the wholesale and retail distributing trades to consider measures for "readjusting the conditions of employment in and in connection with shops" in order to release suitable men for service in the Army.

Inquiries made in other towns have shown that where men have left their employment in these trades their places have been filled temporarily, so far as they have been filled at all, by the engagement of men over military age and by the employment of women. As is now well known, the Board of Trade have established a register of women for war service wtih the object of assisting employers to fill vacancies, and that already large numbers of women have been enrolled.

A return of employees of military age is to be compiled in the city in connection with the effort, and a circular has been issued to employers asking for certain particulars—i.e., names, addresses, and ages of male employees, and information as to whether they are married or single, together with a declaration by the employer as to whether he will be prepared to substitute female for male labour and guarantee reinstatement to the employee who accepts national service at the end of the war. The information given on the forms sent to employers will be made available for the use of the local recruiting officer.

CONFERENCE OF EMPLOYERS AT ROTHERHAM.

Mr. J. A. Pease (Minister for Education and Member for Rotherham) yesterday addressed a conference of the heads of wholesale and retail distributing firms called by the Mayor of the town to consider how far, and by what means, it may be possible to readjust conditions of employment in and in connection with shops so as to release larger numbers of men for voluntary service with the colours.

Mr. Pease said at one time he was engaged as a magistrate certifying lunatics. One of the traits always seemed to be that individuals thought everybody was opposed to them. Another common symptom that they had some form of religious mania. The Germans seemed to him to be a nation who collectively had gone mad. They believed that the whole world was against them and that they were a peculiarly selected people by the Almighty to force what they regarded as "culture" upon every other nation. It seemed to him when a nation became insane, as the Germans had become insane, there was only one thing to be done, and that was to place them under restraint, and to see they should be placed in such a position that they could do no further injury to the world.

At the present time (he continued) we all had to do our utmost to secure the victory of our troops. They had all to make sacrifices, and where they found men in their employment of military age ready to sacrifice their lives it was their duty to try and meet their wishes and free them, if even at great sacrifice to themselves. In his own firm he didn't think they had refused to allow one man to go.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

LADY O'HAGAN AND AN IMPORTANT NECESSITY.

Last night, in connection with the Board of Trade War Service Scheme for Women, a largely attended meeting was held in the Mechanics' Institution. The chair was occupied by Lady O'Hagan, and addresses were delivered by Miss Knowles, senior organising officer for women workers (Board of Trade Labour Exchange); Miss Paget Moffatt, of the Harrison Institute, Blackburn; and Miss Leadby Brown, secretary of the Liverpool Women's Industrial Council.

Lady O'Hagan remarked that the subject of war service for women was of vital importance to-day. That fact could not be denied or ignored. A crisis had been reached, and the time had come when everyone must give of their best and of themselves. This was not exactly a war, because every conception of war meant fighting between men with a fair field and no favour. War had degenerated into a general massacre, not of combatants but of non-combatants, not of men, but of women and children. When they knew all this, they knew it was for their own country's safety they were having to fight against murderers with no honour, no mercy, and no principle. It was because of this that every woman must come forward and do her best. This war could not be carried on successfully, their safety could not be ensured, and their honour preserved, unless every single man of fighting age and capacity played his part like a man. It behoved the women, therefore, to take, as far as it lay in their power, the places of those who could go, in order that they might be at liberty to do what was their plainest, highest, and most sacred duty. All branches of work were proposed for women, but they would require to hear more of the conditions under which the work was to be undertaken.

Miss Knowles, Senior Organising Officer for women workers (Board of Trade Labour Exchanges), in the course of an address on the women's war service movement, said the primary idea was to obtain a census of women who would take on paid work with a view to relieving men, or by carrying out the work of those who had gone to the front. The appeal was not made to the unemployed women alone, because it was felt that they would not suffice to meet the needs of the emergency which would very soon be upon them. Two openings were suggested for which women would be required, first the need in connection with the army and navy, and second, the needs in connection with the food supply of the country. They could not afford at the present time to let anything interfere with the food supply. She appealed, therefore, for women to come forward to take up work on the farms. That was the most crying need of the moment. If men knew that the women had organised themselves for war service, many would not be long in answering the call. It should be understood that the women had no wish to displace men by their appointments through the Labour Exchange. If women were found work, it would be for the duration of the war only. There would also be many vacant places at the end of the war which would have to be filled by women, but where men came back to their work the women must retire. The response to the appeal for women had so far been disappointing. The conclusion was that the women had not realised the importance of this movement.

PADIHAM WOMEN'S WORK.

We have before referred to the wonderful energy and enterprise of the women of Padiham in their special war service. Soon after the outbreak of hostilities there was formed in the town a Women's Emergency Association, with branches in the wards and in the districts contiguous to the town. An ambitious scheme of work was formulated, and to the credit of the organisers be it said, this scheme has not failed in fulfilment the richness of its promise. Without wishing to be invidious, one might mention the names of the Hon. R. B Kay-Shuttleworth, Miss Dodgeon, Mrs. Noble, Mrs. Worswick and Mrs. Hargreaves, as those of ladies who have been conspicuously active, but right through the town the women have been prompted by the clarion call to service. The association's meeting on Wednesday night revealed the volume of work that has been accomplished—the provision of clothing and comforts for the soldiers, the mitigating of distress at home, the amounts forwarded to special military hospitals, and kindred service. The work of the Association is not yet completed; the meeting this week was held to take stock of its position, and to consider future conduct. As the result, needles will still click cheerily, and kindly voices advise and warn and invigorate those who are tempted or depressed by reason of the war. Miss Kay-Shuttleworth brought forward the needs of Serbia, the country which has been compelled to engage in three desolating wars during the last four years, and for Serbian soldiers and hospitals she enlisted the sympathies of her colleagues. Through her instrumentality, too, there is to be formed in Padiham a League of Honour to ensure purity and temperance among women. On the subject of temperance, stirring addresses were given by Mrs. Rixon and Mrs. Davy (probation officer.)

Hampshire Independent,
May 15th 1915.

WAR WORK FOR WOMEN.

AN APPEAL TO WINCHESTER.

Some information as to the response made to the Government's appeal for "War Work for Women" was given at a crowded meeting, held on Monday, at Winchester Guildhall, by Miss Deane, the senior organising officer of the Board of Trade, for the South-Western Division. Although the response was good, it was, she said, nothing like what was expected. Sixty thousand people had registered for service, but the response varied in different districts. She thought the urgency of the appeal was not sufficiently understood, and her mission to Winchester was to ascertain what reserve forces of women were available to fill the places of men called, or who might be called, to join the colours. She made an interesting reference to the Government scheme for land service, and to the war students trained at Sparsholt, adding that the reports of their subsequent work had been very satisfactory. The increased employment of women on farm work would be a great help to the country, and much might be said for people first of all helping their own county. Farm workers had, however, to realise that the accommodation was not of the best, but they must make the best of it, and not expect the hot water to be laid on everywhere. Then there must be no question of undercelling men; where there was equal work there must be equal pay; and the places given up immediately the men returned from the war. The speaker mentioned various industries and occupations which would afford employment for women—armaments and equipment, leather work, Government offices, banks, railway work, under-gardeners, etc. But she urged the women at once to begin to train themselves, so as to fill the vacancies as soon as they arose. It was a call to serious work—not play, and there must be no grumbling as to regular hours, hard work, and obedience to superiors. Excellent machinery existed in Winchester for the recognition of lady workers, and the speaker hoped there would be a big response to her appeal.

PICK FRUIT OR LODGE WORKERS.

Her address was supplemented by a speech from Captain W. R. Hoare, of the 4th Hants, who remarked that the strain upon the men would become more severe as time progressed. Hence the need for women to train for some special work at once.

It was suggested, in the subsequent discussion, that lady school teachers should devote their holidays to agricultural work; that offers to pick fruit or to lodge workers should be made.

Miss Deane remarked that the wages to women agriculturists were exceedingly good.

The Countess of Northbrook, in a brief address, said women must be up and doing during the terrible crisis through which we were passing. She believed they would not be found wanting. They were proud of the men who had gone to the front; therefore, said she, let the women be worthy of their manfolk by offering their services to their country in the way pointed out by Miss Deane.

The Countess of Portsmouth was among those present, and the Marchioness of Winchester. Mrs. Johnston presided. The meeting was held in the Guildhall, by the kindness of the Countess of Northbrook, who presided.

The Yorkshire Observer, May 17th 1915.

WAR SERVICE FOR BRADFORD WOMEN.

AN APPEAL BY SIR SWIRE SMITH.

A mass meeting was held in the Theatre Royal, Bradford, on Saturday afternoon in furtherance of the Government's appeal to women for war service. The meeting was promoted by the Bradford branch of the National Union of Women Workers of Great Britain and Ireland, and was largely attended. Sir Swire Smith presided, and was supported by Miss Thornton (representative of the Board of Trade), Miss I. O. Ford, Miss M. I. Wade, the Rev. F. T. Woods (Vicar of Bradford), the Rev. V. T. Pomeroy, and Mr. W. Leach. Apologies were received from Colonel Muller, Major Wright, and Lieutenant John Bland. The choir of the Great Horton Council School attended, and sang the national anthems of the Allies and other patriotic songs under the conductorship of Mr. T. P. Sykes.

Sir Swire Smith, in opening the proceedings, said that the gathering was essentially one of women who were animated by the highest patriotism. Women were to be given the opportunity of sharing in the glory of the men. The manner in which the country was being drained of its manhood created a great shortage of labour, and the question arose as to what the women could do in the crisis. That was the problem they had to solve, and he hoped that the extension of employments for women would continue, not only during the war, but for all time. He had come to the conclusion that a woman was entitled just as much as a man to choose any employment for which she was fitted, and to receive the same wage as a man for the same work. (Applause.) The agricultural districts could not make guns, but women could take lighter employments on farms, in offices, stores, and banks, and they should have facilities for their training. There were a great many occupations confined to men in the textile industry which women could do just as well. Many women who were willing to work had an objection to the factory. There might be prejudice, but was it not worth while at a time like this to consider what might be done to make that work agreeable? Patriotism must overcome prejudice.

Wages for women in factories, continued Sir Swire, were from 50 to 100 per cent. higher than he had known them, and there was no country in the world where factory operatives were better cared for. There was no reason why the comforts should not be increased, and among the reforms he suggested were women overlookers. (Hear, hear.) Many people felt it was a hardship to begin work at 6 a.m., but in America the start was at 7, without a breakfast interval, and the plan worked well. If there was any prejudice against factory work, now was the time in a city like Bradford to remove it. That prejudice was broken in Nottingham, Leicester, and other places, and it was broken in Bradford among sensible people. All trades must be made respectable if respectable people adopted them. The war would not last for ever. There would be work for many years to come, and this country would keep the trades we had got and capture new ones just in proportion as we qualified for them and conducted them with energy and efficiency. (Applause.)

AN APPEAL TO WOMEN OF LEISURE.

Miss Thornton, in stating the reasons why the Government were making an appeal to the country, said that 19 per cent. of the adult male workers had left their work. In spite of that, great demands were made on employers to increase their output, for we had to equip our allies as well as our own Army. This work has had to be done in a short time. There were women who had been employed in the West Riding up to 75 hours per week, on night as well as day shifts, and men were working up to 105 hours. Was there any wonder that the strain was becoming intolerable? The Government were now appealing to women who had not hitherto entered industry, more especially to women of leisure and those who were not "gainfully" employed. Classes of women to work side by side were needed, and they were asked to come forward and register themselves for work of a practical nature. Women could very well do light engineering work, such as capstan, lathe and drilling work, the filling of fuses, and the sorting and packing. Turning to agriculture, she said that the women of France and Russia were taking entire charge of the harvest, and women could render similarly valuable service here. Then there were openings on the trams and the railways, such as cleaning carriages, porters' work, and on the clerical staff. The greatest obstacle they had to face was the conservatism of employers, especially the farmers. It was for the women to come forward to do work which was being done by men for the period of the war only.

Miss Ford moved a resolution welcoming the Government plan for utilising the energies of the women of the Empire, and urging every Bradford woman to do her utmost to further the scheme.

Miss Wade, Mr. Pomeroy, and Mr. Leach spoke on the resolution, the last-named gentleman remarking that it was necessary to take precautions to prevent the scheme developing into a huge plan for securing underpaid labour.

Aberdeen Daily Journal, May 17th. 1915.

NORTHERN WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

TEACHERS AND MUNITIONS.

The women must do their part; this emergency, greater than ever in the history of the nation, calls for spartan sacrifice. Women are needed to help in shop and field and factory; the war demands a constant stream of recruits to strengthen the forces in our far-flung battle line. Therefore men must be released from duties which can be taken up by women till the end of the war. The establishment of a women's war service register by the Labour Exchanges has given women the opportunity of doing their "little bit" in the general obligation.

Interviewing Mr Duncan, manager of the Aberdeen Labour Exchange, a representative of the "Journal" was told that this register is on the whole developing satisfactorily. About 500 women have registered; a large proportion of these being women students and teachers who have enrolled for work during the summer vacation.

"In fact," said Mr Duncan, "so keen is the desire that all the female teachers, I believe, are going to register; many of the male teachers also have expressed their willingness to take up work in munition factories during the vacation. Meetings are being organised throughout Aberdeenshire by various committees and boards with a view of enlisting for special work as many women as possible.

"While the response, so far, has been satisfactory, continued Mr Duncan, "there seems to be a general feeling that many thousands of young women are at present available for Government and other work, and that it is up to them to fall in with the suggestion of the Board of Trade. It is believed that the spirit of women, if properly roused, would help to encourage the nation's manhood in the stern and strenuous work they have been called upon to bear.

WORKERS FROM HEBRIDES.

"Unemployment among women and girls is increasing, but the Exchange has the opportunity of finding work for almost every applicant. Last week about 70 fisher girls and other unemployed women were sent to the jute mills in Dundee, and it is proposed to send another 50 to-morrow morning. There are also contingents of unemployed women and girls going from Peterhead and Fraserburgh.

"Another pleasing feature in the operations of the Women's War Service Register is the fact that over 200 young women in the Western Hebrides have signified their intention of taking up work in Aberdeenshire. The Board of Trade sent an officer to interview these young women and he found that they were all used to milking and baking and ordinary household duties. A little exertion and patience on the part of housewives would soon fit these strong and healthy women for any unfamiliar work they might be called upon to do. Those in want of such labour should make application to the Exchange, when arrangements will be made to bring them here."

With regard to the work taken up by the women for the purpose of releasing men for the war, Mr Duncan desires it to be known that it must be understood this work is only of a temporary nature and until the war finishes. To show the catholicity in employment, market gardeners have expresed a wish to engage women for their particular work.

Just now," said Mr Duncan, "nobody that is at all eligible and who is willing to work need be out of employment. We shall be able to place a large number of men and women when the new munitions of war factory is established. I would like to mention that there is still a number of men wanted for boom defence and for mine-sweeping, as also a very good demand for general labourers. Navvies are, in fact, urgently needed."

Nottingham Guardian, May 17th. 1915.

WAR WORK FOR WOMEN.

300 NOTTINGHAM APPLICATIONS.

AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT SUCCEEDS.

Since the War Service for Women movement was inaugurated in Nottingham a few weeks ago a great many applications have been made at the Labour Exchange for names to be placed on the register. A considerable percentage of the applicants, as events proved, were laceworkers in search of immediate employment, and it was thought advisable to place their names on the ordinary register of work-seekers. From the leisured classes who are willing to lend what assistance is possible in distinctively war work about 300 applications have been received.

The idea of substituting female for male labour as far as is possible on the land is being pushed forward. Small batches of women are being given a short spell of training in milking, the feeding of cattle, light work in the field, and so on. Between 20 and 30 women have passed through the college, and have taken situations on farms in Leicestershire and Notts. They are reported to have shown not only an aptitude but an enthusiasm for the work, and one farmer has expressed his gratitude not only for getting such a good worker but applied for another. There are more applicants for this type of work than can be at present catered for with the allowance made, and the demand among the farmers for women workers is growing.

It is desirable to make it clear that this phase of the work is only intended as a demonstration to farmers that women can do a good deal of the work hitherto performed by men. Having satisfied them on that point, it is hoped that farmers will undertake the training of the girls themselves. The wages paid by farmers to women who live in varies from 7s. to 9s. per week.

Yorkshire Observer, Ogor May 18th. 1915.

AN APPEAL TO HALIFAX TRADERS.

THE QUESTION OF EMPLOYMENT IN THE SHOPS.

A meeting of local distributive traders was held at the Town Hall, Halifax, last night, to discuss the question of freeing shop assistants for military service. The Mayor (Alderman W. H. Ingham) presided, and others present included Mr. F. W. Goldstone, M.P., Sir George Fisher-Smith, and Lieut.-Colonel Parsons. Invitations had been sent to 400 traders, but only about forty attended.

Mr. Goldstone said it was estimated there were still 360,000 men of military age engaged in the distributing trades, and the question was how many could be spared and their places filled. There were the names of 22,000 shop assistants on the householders' recruiting forms who had expressed willingness to enlist but had not done so because they had not been able to get a guarantee of reinstatement after the war. He suggested there must be many women who could fill the places of these men temporarily, and if the women could not do the work efficiently at first, that might very well be one of the sacrifices which was called for from employers at this time. It was not intended that the forms which would be sent to employers to fill up should be made the means of compulsion on assistants to join the Army. No names were asked for. He hoped they would apply the benevolent compulsion of generous encouragement. If that were not successful, he believed we might have to face even more direct means of compulsion, so important was it that we should win this war.

Mr. Denton Walker moved a resolution urging traders to liberate men of military age for service in His Majesty's Forces, to guarantee that their places should be kept open for their return, and to contribute some monetary grant to augment their Army allowance. He said traders had not the slightest objection to employ female labour in place of male assistants who had enlisted, but in establishments where only male labour had been employed there might be difficulty in regard to the provision of separate accommodation. It would be rather a serious thing for such an establishment to have to supply extra accommodation of that kind which would be of only temporary use. Employers used to be inundated with applications by assistants, but now they could not get them. He wondered where the older assistants were. If conscription had to come the Government should say so, instead of singling out one trade.

Mr. R. Hume seconded the resolution, and suggested that in many cases the wives of shopkeepers would be only too pleased to help in this crisis.

Replying to the discussion, Mr. Goldstone said the distributing trade was not the only trade to be mobilised. The percentage of shop assistants who had already enlisted was exceedingly good, and could bear comparison with that of any other industry. The response had been general, but it might be still larger.

The resolution was adopted unanimously.

In moving a vote of thanks to the Mayor, Mr. H. Lightowler said he was ashamed there had not been a better response to the Mayor's invitation to the meeting.

3.

Birmingham Post,
May 18th. 1915.

WOMEN'S WORK IN WAR TIME.

WHAT WILL BE THEIR POSITION AFTER THE CRISIS?

The principal item of interest at the annual meeting of the Birmingham Women's Suffrage Society, at Queen's College, yesterday, was an address on "Women's Work in War Time," by Mrs. Rackham, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies. There was a good attendance of members under the presidency of Mrs. A. C. Osler, of Edgbaston.

War, said Mrs. Rackham, brought men and women together; they felt they all shared in a common patriotism, and nothing brought the people together like common sufferings in a common cause. The work of women in time of war, as Mrs. Fawcett had said, was in every way they could to preserve and sustain life, and to maintain the vital strength and energies of the nation, in view of the tremendous demands that were being made upon it. Having detailed some of the activities of the Union in the way of relief work in the earlier days of the war, Mrs. Rackham said they had now four hospital units at work at the front. They had collected nearly £20,000 for the support of those units, and the more money that came in, the more units would be sent out. As to the registration of women for war service, during the few weeks the scheme had been in operation, about 64,000 women had registered themselves for various kinds of occupations, but only between 400 and 500 had up to the present actually been placed in work. Those figures showed that the intention of the Government in launching the scheme was really to obtain a sort of census indicating what amount of women's labour was available in time of need.

It was important that this patriotic service of women should not be used to bring down wages, or to reduce the standard of living throughout the country. Applause.) If full use was going to be made of the offers of women the Government should take in hand adequately and at once the question of training. The only way in which much had been done in that direction was with regard to training women for dairy work. Another very important safeguard was the question of housing conditions in cases where large numbers of women and girls might be drafted into towns or country districts where, perhaps, there might not be much accommodation available for them at present. And, besides housing, there was the question of general conditions.

Overstrain and Overwork.

There was undoubtedly a very great danger of overstrain and overwork in the long hours that were being worked in many factories. It could not be wise, however great the stress in any particular firm, to exhaust the girls and the young women who were going to be the mothers of the next generation, and there could be no need for it when thousands of women had registered themselves as ready to do armament work.

How much of this work by women was likely to have a permanent effect on industry? Much of it was obviously only temporary, but there must be some permanent effect on the position of women in industry as a result of the present crisis. The tendency would be to retain women in those positions in which they had proved their value and usefulness; and, so long as there was no undercutting of wages, it was, of course, a good thing that work should be done by those who were best fitted to do it, whether men or women. (Applause.) Besides, the terrible loss of life now going on must result in a larger number of women being absolutely thrown upon their own resources for a livelihood in the future, which must again add to the sum of women's labour. There were at least two occupations in which there was a very considerable shortage of men's labour before the war, and the shortage had been tremendously intensified by the war. Therefore, there would be a permanent demand for women in agriculture and medicine.

The report of the society, which was adopted on the motion of the President, seconded by Miss Orange, stated they had a membership of 955. In spite of the suspension of political work, the last eight months had constituted one of the most active and important epochs in the whole history of the National Union. It was quite possible that none of its most impressive achievements in the past had produced such an effect on public opinion as had the demonstration of public spirit and patriotic service by suffragists in this crisis of the country's history. Their readiness and capacity to cope with the numerous and difficult problems which had developed on all sides, had caused their help and guidance to be sought by many who were opposed to the principle of women's suffrage: and the very ministers and politicians who would refuse women recognition as citizens had been glad to avail themselves of their advice and experience.

The union had throughout been watchful over the interests of women, recognising the special danger of their being overlooked in emergency legislation; and it was largely influential in correcting the mistaken attempt to establish police supervision over the wives of soldiers receiving separation allowances.

Mrs. Osler was re-elected president.

Leeds Post,
May 19th. 1915.

WOMEN AND WAR WORK.

Discussion at the Trades Council.

A meeting of the Trades Council was held last evening at the Trades' Hall, Mr. T. Rowland Hill presiding.

Mr. J. H. Baum, the secretary, reported on a conference called by the Mayor, Ald. J. North, which directly referred to the question of war service for women.

Mr. Parbury said he also attended the conference. He had been amazed to find that 500 middle-class women had registered their names for such service as the secretary had mentioned. He had told the Mayor that these women would cause serious discontent.

Mr. testified that the object of the conference had been to prepare for an emergency if it came about.

Councillor Hill thought the women merely wanted to be in the eyes of the public.

Mr. A. J. Hill (Tramway and Vehicle Workers) moved: "That until it is proved to be impossible to obtain male labour, this Council hereby registers its determination to resist by all legitimate means the substitution of male by female labour, and should such a contingency arise that would make it essential in the public interest for women to be employed on work formerly performed by men, then only can we agree to such substitution, in the following conditions—(a) that women employed in the place of men shall be paid the standard rate of wages, as recognised by the men's unions. (b) That a written guarantee be obtained to the effect that when the war is over, and the men return, they shall be placed in the same positions as they held previous to volunteering for service either with the Colours or for Government work, and that in all such cases where the substitution has taken place, all female labour shall be dispensed with."

Councillor F. F. Riley, in seconding, said that with the close of the war a serious problem would have to be faced. He felt that the Council should heartily support the resolution.

Ald. Chaplin moved that the resolution be shortened.

The amendment was lost.

The Chairman strongly recommended the Council to support the resolution, and it was carried with but one dissentient voice.

Yorkshire Observer,
May 18th. 1915.

A CENSUS IN THE DISTRIBUTING TRADES

Acting upon instructions from the Home Office, the Lord Mayor of Bradford (Alderman G. H. Robinson) has called a conference to be held to-day of all in Bradford who are concerned in the wholesale and retail distributing trades to consider measures for so "readjusting the conditions of employment in and in connection with shops as to release a large number of men of military age for voluntary service with the colours." This is to be the beginning of a still more energetic local effort to secure recruits for the forces. Exactly what mode of procedure will be adopted remains for the conference to determine. In the meantime, however, steps have been taken to secure information on the subject. Amongst the national committees set up to deal with the recruiting problems is a Shops Committee appointed to consider the circumstances of the wholesale and retail distributing trades. In the course of a circular issued by the Home Secretary and the President of the Board of Trade it is stated that "these trades have already contributed a very large number of men to the new armies, but the inquiries made by the Shops Committee lead us to believe that a considerable number of employees of military age in these trades is still available for enlistment. The inquiries of the committee show further that where men have left their employment in these trades for service with the colours their places have been filled temporarily, so far as they have been filled at all, by the engagement of men over military age and by the employment of women. The committee advise us that by a wider extension of this process the number of men available for enlistment could be very greatly increased. The Board of Trade has established a register of women for war service with the object of assisting employers in various industries to fill vacancies. Large numbers of women have already been enrolled and classified, and many who have had experience of shop-work are offering their services."

Copies of this circular have been issued among employers, together with a printed form of questions which they are asked to fill up and return to the Labour Exchange in Bridge Street. The questions employers are asked to answer are as to the number of men of military age still employed, the number that could be released, whether substitutes would be required, and if so whether women or men over military age would serve the employers' purpose. Employers are also asked to say if they are willing to guarantee reinstatement, if it is desired, to enlisted men.

How far women substitutes may be procurable in Bradford for experienced shop assistants is an interesting point for discussion. In normal times in Bradford there are so many opportunities for working women to find employment that most of the available female labour is absorbed. At present, of course, the khaki boom has resulted in an unprecedented demand for women workers. Nevertheless there are about four hundred women registered at the Labour Exchange for war service. Among those who have given in their names are women [illegible]

663 II/58

663

Daily Chronicle,
May 20th. 1915.

ARMY'S NEED OF WOMEN COOKS.

BADLY PREPARED FOOD FOR OUR HEROES.

PROTEST AT WOMEN'S LIBERAL ASSOCIATION.

Strong attacks on the methods of Army cooking were made at yesterday's annual meetings of the Women's Liberal Federation, over which Lady Aberconway presided.

Mrs. Alderton, of Colchester, declared that good food was cooked so badly that the soldiers were often unable to eat it, and, if it were not for the fact that, in Colchester and other places, canteens were provided by the public, men who were in huts or tents would literally starve.

She told an amusing story of a soldier who was a blacksmith by trade, but became a cook on joining the Army in order to add to his wages. No one was more amazed than his wife to hear of his new trade, and on Christmas Day the meals provided for a regiment of hungry men were prepared by this man. The soldiers, who bravely struggled through the meals, afterwards made a collection for the cook, "because he had tried so hard."

"It isn't the amount eaten in the camps that is costing the country so much," said Mrs. Alderton, "but the amount wasted. There are many women who have volunteered for war service who could cook for messes of 150 or 200 men, and their employment would prevent waste."

So long as the domestic arrangements of the War Office were in the hands of men, Mrs. Alderton said, she saw no chance of improvement.

Miss Cartwright said that in the Aldershot camps men were given tea boiled in a tin in which stew had been served for dinner, and it was impossible to drink their tea unless they penetrated a surface of mutton grease.

The following resolution was unanimously passed:—

That this Council is of opinion that the feeding of soldiers in camps and barracks would be more efficiently carried out if the co-operation of women were secured throughout the administration of this branch of military service. It also points out that the practice of serving the last meal to private soldiers at 4.30 is a direct incentive to their seeking further refreshment in public-houses.

MOBILISING WOMEN'S LABOUR.

A plea for women cooks in military hospitals was also made, and Lady Norman said that in her hospital in France the cooking was done under the supervision of trained lady cooks with complete success.

The question of war work for women was touched upon by Mrs. Runciman.

"If the country is going to mobilise to the full its industrial resources it cannot afford to leave out the women," she said; "and there are many ways in which women can help. In a little country town, for instance, there is no reason why Mrs. Smith shouldn't take tickets at the station from 8-12, Mrs. Brown from 12-4, and Mrs. Robinson from 4-8.

"Then there is no reason why the gas meters of our houses should be read by men. Already I have noticed a marvellous improvement in the cleanliness of railway carriages since women were employed."

Mrs. Broadley Reid referred to conditions in Scotland, where so much on the land was done by women, and added that sh[illegible] y[illegible] out. As to the registration of women for war service, during the few weeks the scheme had been in operation, about 64,000 women had registered themselves for various kinds of occupations, but only between 400 and 500 had up to the present actually been placed in work. Those figures showed that the intention of the Government in launching the scheme was really to obtain a sort of census indicating what amount of women's labour was available in time of need.

It was important that this patriotic service of women should not be used to bring down wages, or to reduce the standard of living throughout the country. Applause.) If full use was going to be made of the offers of women the Government should take in hand adequately and at once the question of training. The only way in which much had been done in that direction was with regard to training women for dairy work. Another very important safeguard was the question of housing conditions in cases where large numbers of women and girls might be drafted into towns or country districts where, perhaps, there might not be much accommodation available for them at present. And, besides housing, there was the question of general conditions.

Overstrain and Overwork.

There was undoubtedly a very great danger of overstrain and overwork in the long hours that were being worked in many factories. It could not be wise, however great the stress in any particular firm, to exhaust the girls and the young women who were going to be the mothers of the next generation, and there could be no need for it when thousands of women had registered themselves as ready to do armament work.

How much of this work by women was likely to have a permanent effect on industry? Much of it was obviously only temporary, but there must be some permanent effect on the position of women in industry as a result of the present crisis. The tendency would be to retain women in those positions in which they had proved their value and usefulness; and, so long as there was no undercutting of wages, it was, of course, a good thing that work should be done by those who were best fitted to do it, whether men or women. (Applause.) Besides, the terrible loss of life now going on must result in a larger number of women being absolutely thrown upon their own resources for a livelihood in the future, which must again add to the sum of women's labour. There were at least two occupations in which there was a very considerable shortage of men's labour before the war, and the shortage had been tremendously intensified by the war. Therefore, there would be a permanent demand for women in agriculture and medicine.

The report of the society, which was adopted on the motion of the President, seconded by Miss Orange, stated they had a membership of 955. In spite of the suspension of political work, the last eight months had constituted one of the most active and important epochs in the whole history of the National Union. It was quite possible that none of its most impressive achievements in the past had produced such an effect on public opinion as had the demonstration of public spirit and patriotic service by suffragists in this crisis of the country's history. Their readiness and capacity to cope with the numerous and difficult problems which had developed on all sides, had caused their help and guidance to be sought by many who were opposed to the principle of women's suffrage: and the very ministers and politicians who would refuse women recognition as citizens had been glad to avail themselves of their advice and experience.

The union had throughout been watchful over the interests of women, recognising the special danger of their being overlooked in emergency legislation; and it was largely influential in correcting the mistaken attempt to establish police supervision over the wives of soldiers receiving separation allowances.

Mrs. Osler was re-elected president.

to be employed on work formerly performed by men then only can we agree to such substitution, in the following conditions—(a) that women employed in the place of men shall be paid the standard rate of wages, as recognised by the men's unions. (b) That a written guarantee be obtained to the effect that when the war is over, and the men return, they shall be placed in the same positions as they held previous to volunteering for service either with the Colours or for Government work, and that in all such cases where the substitution has taken place, all female labour shall be dispensed with."

Councillor F. F. Riley, in seconding, said that with the close of the war a serious problem would have to be faced. He felt that the Council should heartily support the resolution.

Ald. Chaplin moved that the resolution be shortened.

The amendment was lost.

The Chairman strongly recommended the Council to support the resolution, and it was carried with but one dissentient voice.

Yorkshire Observer,
May 18th. 1915.

A CENSUS IN THE DISTRIBUTING TRADES

Acting upon instructions from the Home Office, the Lord Mayor of Bradford (Alderman G. H. Robinson) has called a conference to be held to-day of all in Bradford who are concerned in the wholesale and retail distributing trades to consider measures for so "readjusting the conditions of employment in and in connection with shops as to release a large number of men of military age for voluntary service with the colours." This is to be the beginning of a still more energetic local effort to secure recruits for the forces. Exactly what mode of procedure will be adopted remains for the conference to determine. In the meantime, however, steps have been taken to secure information on the subject. Amongst the national committees set up to deal with the recruiting problems is a Shops Committee appointed to consider the circumstances of the wholesale and retail distributing trades. In the course of a circular issued by the Home Secretary and the President of the Board of Trade it is stated that "these trades have already contributed a very large number of men to the new armies, but the inquiries made by the Shops Committee lead us to believe that a considerable number of employees of military age in these trades is still available for enlistment. The inquiries of the committee show further that where men have left their employment in these trades for service with the colours their places have been filled temporarily, so far as they have been filled at all, by the engagement of men over military age and by the employment of women. The committee advise us that by a wider extension of this process the number of men available for enlistment could be very greatly increased. The Board of Trade has established a register of women for war service with the object of assisting employers in various industries to fill vacancies. Large numbers of women have already been enrolled and classified, and many who have had experience of shop-work are offering their services."

Copies of this circular have been issued among employers, together with a printed form of questions which they are asked to fill up and return to the Labour Exchange in Bridge Street. The questions employers are asked to answer are as to the number of men of military age still employed, the number that could be released, whether substitutes would be required, and if so whether women or men over military age would serve the employers' purpose. Employers are also asked to say if they are willing to guarantee reinstatement, if it is desired, to enlisted men.

How far women substitutes may be procurable in Bradford for experienced shop assistants is an interesting point for discussion. In normal times in Bradford there are so many opportunities for working women to find employment that most of the available female labour is absorbed. At present, of course, the khaki boom has resulted in an unprecedented demand for women workers. Nevertheless there are about four hundred women registered at the Labour Exchange for war service. Among those who have given in their names are women willing to do farm and dairy work, armament work, motor-driving, tram conducting letter sorting, and messenger work, but there appears to be none who have offered to undertake work in shops, though no doubt there are many who would be willing to attempt the work.

Developments in Bradford as a result of to-day's conference will be very interesting. In Leeds it has been found that employers, on the whole, are favourable to a similar scheme, and seventy-five firms have already furnished information as to the number of men of military age which they at present employ. It is found that these firms have about 350 men of military age, and are willing to release 178. In regard to many of the remainder tentative answers are given, and some of the employers would be prepared to release their men if substitutes could be found for them.

were provided by the public, men who were in huts or tents would literally starve.

She told an amusing story of a soldier who was a blacksmith by trade, but became a cook on joining the Army in order to add to his wages. No one was more amazed than his wife to hear of his new trade, and on Christmas Day the meals provided for a regiment of hungry men were prepared by this man. The soldiers, who bravely struggled through the meals, afterwards made a collection for the cook, "because he had tried so hard."

"It isn't the amount eaten in the camps that is costing the country so much," said Mrs. Alderton, "but the amount wasted. There are many women who have volunteered for war service who could cook for messes of 150 or 200 men, and their employment would prevent waste."

So long as the domestic arrangements of the War Office were in the hands of men, Mrs. Alderton said, she saw no chance of improvement.

Miss Cartwright said that in the Aldershot camps men were given tea boiled in a tin in which stew had been served for dinner, and it was impossible to drink their tea unless they penetrated a surface of mutton grease.

The following resolution was unanimously passed:—

That this Council is of opinion that the feeding of soldiers in camps and barracks would be more efficiently carried out if the co-operation of women were secured throughout the administration of this branch of military service. It also points out that the practice of serving the last meal to private soldiers at 4.30 is a direct incentive to their seeking further refreshment in public-houses.

MOBILISING WOMEN'S LABOUR.

A plea for women cooks in military hospitals was also made, and Lady Norman said that in her hospital in France the cooking was done under the supervision of trained lady cooks with complete success.

The question of war work for women was touched upon by Mrs. Runciman.

"If the country is going to mobilise to the full its industrial resources it cannot afford to leave out the women," she said; "and there are many ways in which women can help. In a little country town, for instance, there is no reason why Mrs. Smith shouldn't take tickets at the station from 8-12, Mrs. Brown from 12-4, and Mrs. Robinson from 4-8.

"Then there is no reason why the gas meters of our houses should be read by men. Already I have noticed a marvellous improvement in the cleanliness of railway carriages since women were employed."

Mrs. Broadley Reid referred to conditions in Scotland, where so much on the land was done by women, and added that she knew of no farms in England where milking, the feeding of the cows, and the cleaning of the byres was done by women. Such work might very well be given to women so that men could be released for active service. So long as the farmers could secure women there was no need for them to cry out for boys to be taken from school at an early age

A resolution pointing out the necessity for safeguarding woman's labour under the new conditions was carried, while the meeting also recorded its "unalterable adherence to the principle of Women's Suffrage."

663 II/59 663

Aberdeen Daily Journal,
May 20th. 1915.

EMPLOYMENT FOR FISHER GIRLS.

BOARD OF TRADE'S SCHEME.

In consequence of the war a very grave outlook faces the fishing industry of the country, and there seems to be no prospect of a herring fishing season on the East Coast of Scotland this summer. As a result there will be a considerable lack of employment among the fisher girls usually engaged in the industry. Many of the fishermen and other workers have enlisted, are employed on mine-sweepers, or are engaged in other work, and are thus provided for, but in Wick, Lybster, Helmsdale, Brora, Golspie, and Embo, says the "John o' Groat's Journal," there are many fisher women and girls who will be deprived of an important source of earning.

On the ground that every woman who by working releases or helps to equip a man for fighting does a national service, the Board of Trade has formed a scheme of registering all women in the country ready and willing to work in place of men, and with a view to extending their scheme have communicated with the Women's Suffrage Societies throughout the country. The National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies has welcomed the proposal and has made arrangements with its branches in all parts of the country to form a register for their respective districts of women willing to work in various occupations. Where skilled labour is needed, arrangements may be made for training.

All unemployed women are earnestly requested to register themselves so that they may be called upon if needed, and fisher girls or others in Caithness and Sutherland should apply to the nearest Labour Exchange or to the secretary of the Suffrage Society in their district.

The Guardian,
May 20th. 1915.

The Guardian,
May 20 th. 1915.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE GUARDIAN."

SIR—May I inform your readers of a practical scheme now at work in Berkshire for helping women to become useful upon farms during the present crisis? Some weeks before the appeal for Women's War Service was issued by the Government, a small number of persons in Berkshire met together to consult as to how best to assist the obvious scarcity of labour upon the land, especially in regard to milking. After careful inquiry as to existing agencies, they concluded that the most practical method would be to offer some form of short free training to girls and women, and to endeavour to merit the employer's confidence by judicious selection of candidates. By means of the generous co-operation of University College, Reading, a scheme was organised, a small fund for necessary expenses guaranteed, and the venture launched. The lines upon which we work are, briefly, as follows:—A fortnight's training in milking and the lighter forms of farm labour is given to selected women candidates, in order that they may learn the rudiments of the work required. Each candidate is asked to interview some members of the Committee before being accepted for training, but is put to no expense in that matter. No wages are given during the training, but the girl is lodged and boarded. Correspondence with employers is carried on by the Hon. Secretary to the Committee, so that during the fortnight's training an engagement may if possible be secured for the candidate. The Committee endeavours to assure itself of the desirability of conditions and probable surroundings offered by each employer, including lodging, accommodation, and wages; and unless reasonably satisfied as to these does not place employer and candidate in correspondence. The task is not easy in a part of the country where custom is against women's labour in the fields, but patience and perseverance can overcome difficulties. The Committee has decided, after much investigation, to give preference to daughters of agricultural labourers, as being familiar with conditions of rural life, which in winter become intolerable to the town-bred girl, and also because it is found that that class of labour is more acceptable to the farmer than the services of the well-to-do women. It is to be remembered that agricultural wages are low compared with the scale in other industries; that the housing of girls is far more difficult to arrange than that of men and boys; that very early rising, strict punctuality, and some Sunday labour is essential upon dairy-farms, and that, in order to eliminate the part of an ordinary agricultural labourer's work which is unsuitable to women—heavy lifting—rearrangement of duties upon the small farm must be made by the employer.

But, in spite of obstacles, the Berkshire Committee has met with unexpected success. Only three girls can be trained at any one time, but from the moment when the scheme was announced to the public to the present no lack of suitable candidates has been experienced, and sixteen girls have been placed in situations. One dairy-farmer who was good enough to take the first two candidates has now engaged five more, so that seven women trained by the Committee are assisting to secure the supply of milk to London from one centre alone. For it should be borne in mind that the depletion of milch cattle spells national calamity. The value of home production of food during the present crisis cannot be over-estimated, and the evil results of a scarcity of our milk supply will fall most heavily upon our children and hospital patients, especially in crowded towns. The Berkshire Committee has reason to hope that voluntary Committees on similar lines to their own will be started in other counties, and would be only too glad to afford any help or information as to their methods and experience to persons interested in the movement. Inquiries should be addressed to their Hon. Secretary, Miss M. Ormerod, St. George's Hostel, Reading.

GLADYS POTT, Hon. Treasurer to Berks Committee on "Woman and Farm Labour."
7, Queensborough-terrace,
Hyde Park, W.

The Times,
May 21st 1915.

WOMEN'S WAR WORK.

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF REGISTRATIONS.

A HUNDRED SHIP CLEANERS.

The latest available figures of women who have registered for war service at the different labour exchanges, up to May 14, is 65,700. There has been a steady average increase of 5,000 a week.

So far the number of women placed, 1,250, bears no relation to the number of women registered, because the need for which they were mobilized, though within a very short time of realization, is not yet imperative, and the ordinary register of the labour exchanges is being used for most of the applications which are received. There has been as yet no canvassing of employers. In spite of this, however, last week 300 women were drawn from the war register for employment. The number asking for ammunition work now stands at 13,700, for clerical work at 10,000, for agriculture 8,000, and for tailoring and allied trades 6,000. Over one hundred women have so far been placed in agriculture, about one-half of whom have gone to dairying; one hundred have been drafted to clerical work—some in Government offices; and another hundred to leather-stitching.

The Glasgow exchanges report a demand for about a hundred women for cleaning work on board a big liner in the docks—work usually done by men—and also a demand for women in forestry. About 20 women gardeners have taken the places of men and the employment of women as porters lift-men, &c., already noticed in The Times, is steadily going on. A large number of women are employed in the War Office, in the Censor's Office, in the Board of Trade, and in clerical work in the House of Commons. The displacement of men in shops is not very great, but will be much increased in a week or so. Many women packers have taken the place of men, but here there is some difficulty owing to the attitude of some men. From Manchester a case is reported in which an employer, being unable to get men, took on four women. The 14 men packers already in his employment immediately struck and in this way lost him a big order.

A new hotel which has just been started is entirely staffed by women. Women commissionaires are to be seen at some of the big houses, and in the North, 50 women have been taken on as motor-drivers.

A resolution was passed by the committee of the Women's Liberal Federation at the annual meeting yesterday, under the chairmanship of Lady Aberconway, pointing out that at a time when war was causing such grievous loss of life it was pre-eminently war work for women to safeguard the conditions and improve the health of the new generation.

It was also unanimously decided to send to the Government a copy of a resolution emphasizing the preventive and protective side of police work and urging the appointment of women police constables, with powers equal to those of men constables, in all county boroughs and metropolitan boroughs of the county of London.

The Standard, May 22nd. 1918:

WAR WORK AT HOME.

13,700 WOMEN "SIGN ON" TO MAKE MUNITIONS.

GOOD SAMARITANS.

IV.

There are very few women in the kingdom, whether of the "leisured" classes, or among the majority who are occupied mainly with household duties or have to earn their own living, who are not actively working to help Britain win in this tremendous war. There are scores of organisations directing their efforts, and many of the most prominent administrators of this vast accumulation of voluntary effort are associated with several societies and enterprises. The suffrage organisations were already, before the war, among the most enthusiastic and best administered of all women's societies. For this reason they have necessarily take a very active and prominent part in the war work that has been done. With few exceptions, suffragists have been willing to suspend all political activities —"the Vote" is never officially discussed now—but under the plea that women opposed to suffrage should not be allowed to subscribe to funds controlled by suffragists "under any false impression," certain sections have insisted on keeping the word suffrage prominent in their war literature, which is a pity.

Actually both men and women who have direct knowledge of the admirable work that has been done by the suffrage organisations throughout the war have no hesitation whatever in supporting funds controlled by them, and only ask that for the present they should refrain from talking about suffrage at all, as being a controversial political topic, however it is treated.

As an illustration of how entirely party politics have given place to the urgent needs of the moment in the case of the principal women's political organisations, other than suffragist, the Liberal Women's Federation has created four ambulances and maintains them, and Mrs. Acland, on the federation's behalf, has been directing admirable maternity work among the Belgians, and will continue to do so all through next winter—probably on Belgian soil, as the Belgians are enabled gradually to return to their reconquered country. Unionist society leaders like Lad[y] Salisbury, Liberal hostesses like Lady Cov[en]dray are devoting their whole time nowada[ys] to guiding, advising, and initiating war wo[rk] of every conceivable kind.

Many people imagine that there have be[en] no fresh arrivals of refugees from Belgiu[m] since the great influx of the late autumn, bu[t] that is quite wrong. Only the other day [a] little party arrived in London from La Panne, including a child nine months old and two others aged two years and three years, the latter deaf and dumb. Those children's shoes were so worn that their bare feet protruded through the soles. Women have come into La Panne this month, allowed by the Germans to leave the territory in their occupation, or actually hounded out, carrying dead children in their arms. The parents of the three children referred to came to London from Roulers six months ago. The children had been sent to their grandmother, near the Belgian coast, who was "captured," with them, by the Germans. The old woman is bedridden. Her two unmarried daughters have now reached England with the children; one daughter will remain here, and the other has a pass from the Germans to return to her grandmother—which obviously she cannot be allowed to use.

The father of the three little ones has work to do, but the family have only 10s. a week to live on after the rent is paid. The War Refugee Committee at Crosby Hall, Chelsea, has dealt with the case. Its woman workers will see that the mother is provided with meat and bread every day and groceries once a week. The War Refugee Clothing Committee at Warwick-square gives clothes for the little ones. Better class refugees who need clothes are furnished with them by the Women's Emergency Corps at Upper Baker-street, W. All these Belgian refugees, and some from France, are looked after by philanthropic ladies, who act as "dames protectresses" and visit them regularly. It is not at all an uncommon thing for a highly born woman who has never before done such work in her life to lay linoleum, wash clothes, and put up curtains for destitute exiles.

WHY FEW "SPECIALS" HAVE BEEN WANTED.

It may be said that helping foreign refugees

663 II/60

663

The Common Cause, May 21st. 1918:

Women and Labour Exchanges.

One of the difficulties in ensuring that women shall receive equal pay for equal work is that many women entering a new industry are ignorant of the standard rate of wages. In this connection the Shop Assistants' Union makes the following announcement: "Information has reached the Union from various parts of the country that women are being introduced to firms through the Labour Exchanges without them being informed in any way as to the value of their labour, and that many of them have been engaged at wages varying from 9s. to 12s. a week. Should this prove to be correct, the matter will be taken up with Mr. Runciman, President of the Board of Trade (who is responsible for the Labour Exchanges) by the organisation."

The Cheshire Observer, May 22nd. 1918:

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

CHESTER'S 75 VOLUNTEERS.

BOARD OF TRADE APPEAL.

On Monday the Mayor (Ald. J. M. Frost) presided over a well-attended meeting of ladies at the Town Hall, for the purpose of explaining the war service which could be rendered by women. He was supported by Miss Knowles, Mrs. Thomas, Mrs. T. Gibbons Frost, Mrs. Campbell, the Town Clerk (Mr. J. H. Dickson), the Rev. R. A. Thomas, and Mr. J. Crossley.

At the outset the Mayor read apologies for absence from Lady Mackinnon, the Mayoress (Mrs. J. M. Frost), the Hon. Mrs. H. N. Gladstone, and Miss Barbour, of Bolesworth Castle.

The Mayor said he had been requested by the Board of Trade to call that meeting. Similar meetings were being held throughout the country to endeavour to put before the people of the land what war services could be rendered by women. Women were requested to give in their names so that if occasion should require they might take the place of men, who could then be liberated from their employment and serve in his Majesty's Forces or in the making of munitions of war. Those occupations were so urgently needed that he was certain they could see the reason of the Government in endeavouring to get women in certain cases to take the place of men. Women who were good enough to take up that work were to be paid. They were not to be asked to work without remuneration, and the remuneration should be of the proper standard. The scheme, he understood, was being worked very largely, through the Labour Exchanges of the country, where women should register their names and shew what occupation would be most suitable. If they felt some training beforehand would be necessary, the Labour Exchange officials would arrange for that training to be given. Already 75 names had been handed in in Chester, and there was no doubt that after that meeting there would be a considerable increase. No one would be compelled to take up any work. It would be a mutual arrangement between employer and employe.

CENSUS TO BE TAKEN.

Miss Knowles said she was present that afternoon as a representative of the Board of Trade, in order to explain the scheme. The Board of Trade had arranged the scheme for women to take up employment in order to release men to join the colours. The first aim and object of the scheme was a census throughout the country, and then the Board of Trade would be in a position to know what bulk of women labour would be obtainable, and how many more men could be released should the need become more acute than it was at present. Any work taken up by women to release men must be paid employment, which must be absolutely insisted upon, for the following reasons: If a number of voluntary workers were introduced into the labour market the men would be placed at a great disadvantage when they returned from the War. It was quite an essential feature of the scheme that the employment should be paid employment at fair wages. As regarded the question of wages, the correct method would seem to be equal pay for equal value of work done. The classes of people to whom the Board of Trade was appealing to take up these war services were two. In the first place, they wished to urge the leisured class of people who did not ordinarily have to work, and in the second place the people who had worked at some period of their lives—married women and women who had retired owing to changed circumstances. They would be wanted very badly in two directions, for the making of munitions of war, and for the supply of clothes. They could be employed filling shells, testing fuses, automatic test work, and in all kinds of light machinery work. All the Government contractors were handicapped by the shortage of workers in the manufacture of uniforms, and extra equipment as essential for the troops. Beyond supplying the men at the front we had [illegible] the continuation of industries at could assure Miss Knowles that the energy and zeal of the women in Chester was very great indeed. The women who had worked in Chester for the Liberal cause, the Conservative cause, or any philanthropic cause, had shewn what they were capable of. All that was necessary was for the women of Chester to understand and realise what was required of them. If Miss Knowles spoke of disappointment in the response she also was a little disappointed at not seeing a larger audience present. She would consider that meeting as a recruiting meeting for women, and all in that room might be regarded as RECRUITING OFFICERS.

She was quite certain that there were still an enormous lot of women in Chester of the working classes who had very little idea of what was really going on outside their own particular street. They could see by that scheme that there would be work for women of all classes, not only the working classes but the leisured classes. Every day the necessity grew. We had now a tremendous and appalling work before us if we were to win this awful War. We must get hold of the whole national resources. Although Cheshire had sent troops they had not been brought much in touch with the terrors of the War. Referring to the leisured classes, she said she had seen young girls cycling and playing in tennis tournaments who were perfectly fit to carry out agricultural work, and use their strength which had been sustained by their outdoor sport. Others who played bridge in stuffy rooms would be much better employed in clerical work in offices.

Mrs. Thomas said she was a tremendous believer in the capabilities of her own sex. They had never failed their men folk yet, and they were not going to do so in the present crisis. She had thought until some little time ago that she was doing her little bit by attending to a son, who in 14 or 15 years would be ready to fight for his King and country, but it had been pointed out to her that she should do some other work, and she had signed one of the forms stating she was willing to undertake war service. Speaking of the farming question, she said she was a Dorset woman and knew what country life was. By using this crisis as an excuse for shortening the educational life of the village child, we were for all we were worth. By and by we should have to fight with brains again, and if we were going to shorten the school life of these children we were taking an overdraft on the true wealth of the nation. If only women would come forward and help in the farm work as far as they possibly could and leave the child at school until he was 14 years of age it would give him a greater chance of doing some little for the good of his country. She did hope that that movement in connection with women on farms would help to solve that difficulty. In conclusion she called upon every woman in that room not to let her application go in alone, but to let it be lost in a budget of white forms.

FIGHTING FOR THE GERMANS

On the motion of the Mayor the speakers were thanked, and Mrs. T. Gibbons Frost replied. The Mayor also was thanked for presiding, on the motion of the Rev. R. A. Thomas.

ones. Better class refugees who need clothes are furnished with them by the Women's Emergency Corps at Upper Baker-street, W. All these Belgian refugees, and some from France, are looked after by philanthropic ladies, who act as "dames protectresses" and visit them regularly. It is not at all an uncommon thing for a highly born woman who has never before done such work in her life to lay linoleum, wash clothes, and put up curtains for destitute exiles.

WHY FEW "SPECIALS" HAVE BEEN WANTED.

It may be said that helping foreign refugees to exist in comfort is a very indirect method of helping Britain to win the war. But that work has to be done by somebody, and the women who are doing it are leaving others free for work to which they are perhaps more suited. The Board of Trade's special register of women enrolled for war service now contains over 65,000 names. Most of these women are pledged to give the whole of the time, if required, to taking up men's place in various industries. About 1250 have actually been placed in employment, including 125 in agricultural work, chiefly dairying, 80 in armament factories, 100 in the leather trade, 100 in clerical work, 20 as gardeners, and 100 in the metal trades. These are all women who are not actually needing work—they would be required to register at the Labour Exchanges if they were. Whenever urgent need of women's assistance is reported the Labour Exchange registers are first sifted. That is why such a small proportion of the 65,000 "specials" have so far been placed. Some of them are being trained for factory work in the Midlands, but obviously women accustomed to factory work are taken first by employers, and so far most of the gaps have been filled by women on the Labour Exchange registers.

One firm in the North of England has offered to train fifty women as motor drivers—though the Chief Commissioner of Police in London will not yet allow women to be licensed as taxi-cab drivers. Two great London firms now employ women as commissionaires, to whistle for cabs, and so on. Last week the Special Register of Women for War Service "placed" more women than in any previous week. A great many women are now working in the War Office. The Bank of England has employed many since the beginning of the war.

Of the 65,000 who have volunteered to do men's work, 13,700 have "signed on" for armament work, 8000 for agriculture, 10,000 for clerical work, and 6000 for shops, dressmaking, and tailoring. Most of these women are of a class who would not entertain the idea of doing work of that kind except for patriotic reasons.

people who did not ordinarily [illegible] in the second place the people who had worked at some period of their lives—married women and women who had retired owing to changed circumstances. They would be wanted very badly in two directions, for the making of munitions of war, and for the supply of clothes. They could be employed filling shells, testing fuses, automatic test work, and in all kinds of light machinery work. All the Government contractors were handicapped by the shortage of workers in the manufacture of uniforms, and extra equipment so essential for the troops. Beyond supplying the men at the front we had got to consider the continuation of industries at home, which was a very acute problem in which women's services were badly needed. There was the farming question.

WOMEN ON FARMS.

Most of them knew that even before the War farmers found great difficulty in getting a sufficient number of men to carry on the various processes of farming, but now many agricultural labourers had enlisted, and still more were expected to do so, and the shortage of workers was becoming extremely serious. It was particularly bad in the south and in Scotland. There had been the greatest difficulty in getting the crops sown this spring. In Cheshire also there was a great shortage. She knew on good authority of a large number of farmers in the Cheshire district who had been compelled to sell their cows owing to the difficulty in obtaining people to milk them. At the present time the price of beef was very good and the shortage of milkers acute, the result being that the cows were being sold and the milk supply of the country was bound to suffer. That was an acute question, and one in which the women were interested. People were wanted to replace the men on the farms, and to take up all kinds of farm work. In addition to these openings which they felt quite confident would arise as more men went to the front, there was the clerical profession. Women could do a great deal of office work at present done by men, and the latter could be released for the Army. Numbers of employers at the present time had replaced the men who had gone to the front by women. The railway companies had taken on women, and a great many of the municipal offices had replaced men by women, the same being also the case in the insurance offices. Women had been engaged to check trains and to act as ticket collectors. They also noticed as they went about women in the newspaper stalls on the railway stations. At Euston the new telegraph office was with a view to replacing men who had gone. In clerical work there was a large field where women labour could be used to great advantage at the present time. There were numbers and numbers of men employed in shops of various kinds where the work could be equally well done by women. In addition to those openings there were also a number of miscellaneous occupations where women could also be employed to replace men. She had been to some towns where the authorities had engaged women to act as school attendance officers because they could not get men. Women had also filled the posts of tram conductors and omnibus conductors because the men were wanted to go to the front, and there were factories with whole departments staffed with women because men were not forthcoming. In Manchester she had seen women acting as carriage cleaners on the railway, and it seemed to her the transition was a distinct advantage.

ENTIRELY STAFFED BY WOMEN

THE QUESTION OF TRAINING.

One essential point was that if women were going to replace men they must face the question of training. None of them said they would be fit to go straight into an occupation carried on by men without training. Already most of the agricultural schools had opened classes for the training of women for work on farms, and already a great number of women had gone through their course of training to fit them to work on farms. Farmers would be much more prepared to take on women who had had some training than if they had had no training. The scheme was full of difficulties. There was the social problem, but she did not think that should trouble them much, for those who were patriotic enough to volunteer for service would not mind whom they worked with. Another thing was that they did not want women to volunteer who would jib afterwards. They should be prepared to do real hard work. Women had not come forward in anything like the numbers expected. They had only had about 50,000 offers of help in the whole country, and in Chester there was rather less than a hundred. She could not think that in a city like Chester there was any lack of enthusiasm or patriotism. She could only conclude that the women of Chester had not understood the appeal. If they did not come forward now they would not be able to send more men to the front, and could not carry on the industries of the country. The women of France had been carrying out war work since the beginning of the War. All the agriculture that was going on in France was being done by women. (Applause.)

Mrs. Gibbons Frost said so far only a hundred women had volunteered from Chester, but she

The Goole Times, May 22nd. 1915.

663 II/61

663.

WAR WORK FOR WOMEN.

BOARD OF TRADE SCHEME ADVOCATED.

LAST NIGHT'S MEETING IN THE MARKET HALL.

APPEALS TO PATRIOTISM OF WOMEN.

Last night, in the Market Hall, Goole, a public meeting was held, the object of which was to urge women to take up work during the war and thus liberate men to go into the fighting line or assist in the manufacture of heavy armaments. Mrs. Burrows, wife of the Bishop of Sheffield presided, and Miss Thornton, organising officer for Yorkshire of the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges, of Doncaster, was the speaker. There was a large attendance, and being a meeting principally appealing to women, it was natural that the sex should largely predominate.

Mrs. Burrows said she felt it was a great privilege to be there that evening. It was a great day in our nation's history, and it seemed to her that it was a very great and good augury that they at Goole should have arranged that patriotic meeting on the very eve of the day when they were reading of the great move that had been made at the head of affairs. It had been decided to constitute a Cabinet which should form a National Government which would organise the nation from the head right down through every rank, so that as one man, should she say, they should stand together in the great war in which we were engaged. We were conducting literally eight wars, and it was high time that the Empire founded itself as an Empire. If only we at home were half as fine as our great men in the trenches there would be a great future ahead of us. (Applause.) No words of hers were needed, and none of them desired to waste time to sing the praises of their fine men at the front, who were laying down their lives for us on the terrible fields of Flanders. She thought of them ceaselessly day and night. She had a terrible feeling at times, and she was going to candidly state it, that the women were not doing half what they might do for their country and that was why she thought it a privilege to be there that night. A thing that grieved her when she heard from her friends and from her own son in France was that the French women thought that the English women were not taking the war as seriously as they ought to. They must do away with that reproach and find out what was their bit of work they could do. She expected they had all done what they could in knitting and sending comforts for their wounded men, and wonderful things had been done throughout the land, but at the same time they must do their utmost now, and they must give their all if we were to rescue the oppressed and send our country victoriously alongside our brave Allies. They were to hear what work the English women could do at the moment. Women desired to have a way pointed out to them what they could do to help, and they would readily respond. (Applause.)

Miss Thornton first of all congratulated Goole upon having such a splendid audience, and then went on to explain why the Board of Trade was making an appeal to women to help in various ways during the war. We were not a military nation in the strict sense of the word; we relied entirely on our Navy. But in August last, when war was declared, circumstances arose which necessitated us having a very large Army, and Lord Kitchener made several appeals for men of military age to come forward and show their patriotism, and help to defend their country against the enemy. This appeal had been responded to very generously, but at the same time those at the War Office, who knew what they were up against, knew that more men were required, and that munitions of war were needed. We had not been told how many men were now in the Army, but at a rough calculation it might be said that one and a half millions of men had been drawn from their ordinary occupations and had either gone out to fight or were preparing to do so. In the last census of 1911 they were told that there were about 8,000,000 male adults, and on this basis it was shown that 19 per cent. of the adult male workers had joined the Forces. Some employers had from 30 to 35 per cent. of their men enlisted, but, generally speaking, 19 per cent. of the male workers were now in the Army. This had meant a considerable dislocation of industry, and had been a serious trouble to the employers. The Government had been pressing them for increased output, especially in the case of feeding, clothing, and equipping of the Army. In some instances the output since last August had been increased as much as 300 per cent., and yet it was not sufficient. Did they realise what a difficulty it would be for employers of the leisured class who had not done work. There were thousands of women who were doing nothing to help their country. Now they had a chance to come forward and show their love and patriotism exactly in the same way that their brothers had done who had enlisted. Going on to speak of how the Government thought these women would be utilised, Miss Thornton said they would not think of sending women into coal mines, though many had asked to do that work. Neither would they think of asking the women to be engineers, drive a railway engine—(laughter)—or to work in the shipbuilding yards or in the ammunition factories. The work was too heavy. The idea was that the men employed in light engineering might be released, and that these should be transferred to the heavier engineering work, and the women put to the lighter kind. This had already been done in some places. Women could work on the lighter kind of ammunition, and were doing so in some cases, and it was estimated that thousands more would be required if the war continued. Then there were men in shops and banks, and the Government departments generally. Women could fill the places of these men. There was no reason why women should not be employed on railways as porters or carriage cleaners. Women could also be engaged as inspectors for gas and electric lighting and tram conductors. There was one great obstacle, and this was the British employer, but they would have to break his conservatism down. The industrial life of France and Russia was carried on entirely by the women, who were also preparing the harvest, and what the women of these countries could do the women of England could do. Where women went away from home the Board of Trade made careful inquiries, and saw to it that they had clean, comfortable lodgings. (Applause.) A system had also been set up where, if training was necessary in any branch of work, it was given, and women were trained for agriculture. Miss Thornton made it clear that wherever a woman replaced a man it had to be for the period of the war only, and she thought all women engaged would take care that they performed their work well and would give it up to the man who returned from the war. No Government would ever advocate that women would take up the work for good. (Applause.)

The Chairwoman having asked if anyone would like to ask Miss Thornton a question, a man in the audience asked if any steps had been taken to ensure that women doing the work of men at the war should be paid the same wages as the men were paid?

Miss Thornton said that in Government contract work it was definitely understood that the same rate of wages must be paid to the women as was paid to the men. (Loud applause.) But there was another sort of work which did not come under Government contract work. In that case the Government attitude would be somewhat of a neutral one. But here the women must be told the standard rate of wages, and it would then be for them to say whether they would take what was offered. She was sure the women would not accept conditions which would make the employment difficult for the men upon their return from the war.

Here a cheery voice from near the side door said, "I am a gateman. I was formerly in Bridge Street—the L. & Y. Railway. Any lady who wants to take my job is welcome to it. It's open. (Loud laughter.)

The Chairwoman: That was a very amusing question, and the speaker has done something for us, for we must keep our spirits up whatever may be our reverses.

The Rev. Edmund Sinker (Vicar of Goole) said he rose with great fear and trepidation, realising that he was speaking at a meeting chiefly for women, entirely organised by women, and ruled by women. (Laughter.) The women of Goole had set a good example to the country in many ways. He wrote in the "Goole Times" only one letter, and already £300 had been contributed towards the Belgian Fund, whilst in the streets last Saturday the women for the same cause raised £61, although the town had been bled almost to death by subscriptions for various things. He knew that the women of this country were willing to take their stand by the men and do their share of the work. The difficulty would be what could they do? They had been told that they must not drive the engines. (Laughter.) They must not go down the mines. But if he were asked what [illegible] encouraged their [illegible] brothers and their sweethearts to be men and to go out and fight the battle of their King and country. Why was it that it was the married men who had done so well in the way of enlistment? He could not understand how any single young man who was not kept from enlistment by some physical defect could expect any nice, good-looking English girl to be his sweetheart. He would urge them to go out and take their stand in the trenches. There was a certain amount of work that women in Goole could do well. They had made sandbags, woollen things, and other comforts, etc., but the older ladies could go on with that. It might be possible for some of the younger ones to go in for some nursing. Their chairwoman had refrained from telling them that not only was her son at the front, but her daughter was acting as a nurse. Then there were to

Daily Telegraph, May 29th. 1915.

WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE.

Speaking at the Women's Institute, yesterday, on "Openings for Women in Government and Municipal Work," Mrs. W. L. Courtney said that most of the women who had registered for war service were feeling disappointed and impatient that the only reply they had received was the usual printed postcard telling them that they would be summoned to the nearest Labour Exchange when they were wanted. She hoped that when the Minister of Munitions found his feet in his new office, he would find some useful service for the 65,000 women who had registered.

Eastern Daily Press, June 1st. 1915.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN

ORGANISATION & TRAINING NEEDED.

MEETING IN NORWICH.

The High School Assembly Room, Theatre Street, Norwich, was filled yesterday afternoon by women and girls, who had assembled, on the invitation of Miss Wise (the head mistress) and the Norwich High School Old Girls' Association, to hear an address by Mrs. Rackham of Cambridge on the Government appeal to women for war service. Miss Wise presided, and among those present were the Lady Mayoress, Mrs. Francis Hornor (wife of the Sheriff), Miss Geldart, Miss Clarkson, and Miss Burgess (clerk at the Labour Exchange).

Miss Wise, in opening the proceedings, said this meeting arose out of her wish to gather together the old girls of the High School to talk about the advisability of them offering themselves to the Government for war service, but when she heard that Mrs. Rackham was coming down to speak she felt it would be selfish to restrict the meeting to so few people. The subject was, of course, of great importance at this time. One heard everywhere of women wishing that they could do something. In the case of many of them that wish had already been translated into action, and hundreds, perhaps thousands, were already engaged as fully as they could possibly be in the work of nursing, but thousands of them had not yet given any definite service, and yet all wished to do something. Efforts to be of the slightest use, must be organised. The Government were alive to this fact, and some months ago issued an appeal to women to register themselves as willing to render war service. During the last few days the urgency of that appeal had increased to an extraordinary extent, and now they had before them the question of national service, which she, for one, devoutly hoped was not only before the country, but before the Government as a real definite thing. She hoped it would soon become an established fact. In any case it seemed to her there was plenty of opportunity for women to serve the country. She believed the British race was capable of the best things possible, but only if we would rise to our full powers, and only if we would use the splendid reserve of effort underlying our national character. She was afraid we were not using our powers to their full extent. We might well copy the Germans in the spirit of self-sacrifice that permeated their nation. Women were not at present sacrificing to any large extent their leisure and the orderly routine of their lives, but these things would yet have to be sacrificed in some measure. Nobody wished women and girls to register themselves unless they really meant to do work. There was a clarion call to women to stir themselves, to shake themselves from the trammels of their rather stereotyped lives. Miss Wise concluded by saying that Miss Burgess, of the Labour Exchange, was present, and would answer any questions and see women and girls at the close of the meeting who desired more detailed information.

Mrs. Rackham said that last March the Government issued a scheme of war service for women, and invited them to register themselves at the local Labour Exchanges, firstly because they wished to know what female labour was available to take the place of men who were called to the colours, secondly because they wanted to know what women were available for making munitions and clothing for soldiers and sailors, and thirdly because they wanted to know what female labour was available for agricultural pursuits. The invitation to register was issued to all women who were able to work, free to work, and not working. The Government did not promise to give work to any, and no woman who registered herself need accept any particular kind of work offered. Six occupations were specified as those in which female labour was most likely to be required, namely, farm work, dairy work, leather work, brush making, clothing factories, and armaments. Those only fit for clerical work were also invited to register. So far 80,000 women had registered throughout the country, of whom 12,000 were fit for making armaments, and clothing, and farm or dairy work, and [illegible] about work. Up to the present only [illegible] those had been given employment, but nobody knew how many others would be required. [illegible]

nun were had n organis women o the small were needed of a small with or under bring home to urgency of the names and qua test, and reject find out in what needed. She move
The motion was Miss Willis, Miss were elected the c
to their number.
Mrs. Hasard, in Mrs. Rackham, s was over Englan ashamed of the Miss Geldart s carried.

had ... risen from their ordinary occupations and had either gone out to fight or were preparing to do so. In the last census of 1911 they were told that there were about 8 000,000 male adults, and on this basis it was shown that 19 per cent. of the adult male workers had joined the Forces. Some employers had from 30 to 35 per cent. of their men enlisted, but, generally speaking, 19 per cent. of the male workers were now in the Army. This had meant a considerable dislocation of industry, and had been a serious trouble to the employers. The Government had been pressing them for increased output, especially in the case of feeding, clothing, and equipping of the Army. In some instances the output since last August had been increased as much as 300 per cent., and yet it was not sufficient. Did they realise what a difficulty it would be for employers to respond to the Government's demand when they could not get sufficient workers? The country, through the Labour Exchanges, had been scoured for workers, skilled and semi-skilled, and no man worthy of being called a man need be out of work at the present time. We had also to be the workshops of our Allies. Belgian subjects had had to be fed and equipped in England, and to a great extent the Russian and French armies looked to us for their clothing and ammunition, etc. In addition to all this the responsibility had to be shouldered for keeping a vast army during the period of training, and this had meant the withdrawing of thousands of men from their occupations in the industrial army to build the thousands of huts required in which to lodge the soldiers. It was up to this country and farmers to produce foodstuffs, to increase the supply all they could. The textile mills had been running night and day, turning out miles of cloth for uniforms, and clothiers had been working night and day making up the uniforms. She had been informed that the average duration of a suit in the firing line was about two weeks, so that they could understand the miles of cloth required. Great quantities of boots were also required, and then they had all the equipment to provide, and the firearms and artillery and shells. In no previous war had there been such an amount of ammunition used as in this war. When the war started no one had any idea of the amount of ammunition that would be required. Men in the ammunition factories had been working 100 hours a week since last August, and women in the textile trades had been working 75 hours a week, and these were beginning to feel the physical strain, and it was necessary for every woman to come forward, and not only help to relieve the strain on those women, but to do the work of the men. The Government were now appealing to the women to come forward and register their names on a reserve register. It was not a new idea that women should work, for there were nearly 6,000,000 women and girls working in the country in normal times. Women had shown their capacity for work in a very active way by making comforts for soldiers at the front. They had also done very well in taking up nursing. The Government were asking that all classes of women, of all grades and politics, should come forward and be willing to show their patriotism and love for their country. Although the appeal was made to all women, there were two classes of women to whom it was not intended to apply, and one of these was married women who had families, because they were doing their duty by looking after their children. (Applause.) The appeal was not for those women who were already occupied in factories, shops, or domestic service, as the Government thought these were doing their duty. She mentioned these because they had had a good response from women who were already employed usefully. The appeal was intended for women

... their brothers and their sweethearts to be men and to go out and fight the battle of their King and country. Why was it that it was the married men who had done so well in the way of enlistment? He could not understand how any single young man who was not kept from enlistment by some physical defect could expect any nice, good-looking English girl to be his sweetheart. He would urge them to go out and take their stand in the trenches. There was a certain amount of work that women in Goole could do well. They had made sandbags, woollen things, and other comforts, etc., but the older ladies could go on with that. It might be possible for some of the younger ones to go in for some nursing. Their chairwoman had refrained from telling them that not only was her son at the front, but her daughter was acting as a nurse. Then there were in Goole many women whose husbands were at the front. Only that afternoon he had buried the body of that brave soldier Priv. Cawson—the first Goole soldier to be wounded and brought home and to have died in England. Good work lay in comforting, advising, and helping those women whose loved ones were at the front. He was glad to have the opportunity of saying that the wives of the soldiers and sailors of Goole were not bringing any shame—except in one or two cases—upon the honour of their loved ones. He was glad to note that the Government scheme exempted two classes of women—one was the married woman with children at home, for he could have no respect for the woman who neglected her home duties to take up Government work. It remained to the rest of the women of the country to take their share of the work; for the people to recognise that it was indeed a life and death struggle. He had pleasure in moving the following resolution:—"That this mass meeting of the people of Goole heartily welcomes the Government scheme for utilising the services of women in this national emergency, and pledges itself to do everything in its power to make it a success."

The Rev. H. G. Allchurch, pastor of the Goole United Methodist Church, said he welcomed very heartily such a meeting as an indication that we in this country were beginning to take the war seriously. Hitherto the mass of the public had been little touched by the grave fact of the war. The great bulk of the people were going on with their ordinary work. If they had lived in the North of France or Belgium they would have taken the war very seriously long ago. There were things more precious than life at stage. They had seen the report of the atrocities committed by the Germans. It would be better for them that they should die at the hands of those who loved them than fall victims to the awful lusts of the fearful German. He was convinced that the victory would not be gained without the co-operation of the women of this country. They were not asking the women to do anything impossible or unreasonable. They were out for national efficiency; they were out for the organisation of the nation's resources. In France this had already been done. All the work that women could do had there been done for some time, and was being done by the women of that country. They must recognise that such a gigantic struggle must disorganise the industries of the country, and the longer the war continued the disorganisation would be the more and more serious. Woman's power was not exhausted when she had knitted some socks for soldiers. All glory to those who had done that, but there were other spheres of usefulness which women must be willing to enter at the cost of sacrifice. He appealed to those who had felt loss of dignity or pride in having to put a hand to toil—he appealed to them to destroy that false dig-

... brothers and sweethearts were doing. ...at great fight they stood or fell to-...r. Let them not say they had never ... their finger; that they had never ...o earn their own living. There was no ... if it were undertaken in the spirit of helpfulness. (Applause.)

Questions having been invited, Miss Thornton was asked if she knew if any labour could be found for school teachers during their vacation. The answer was that it might be found in the harvest field, and that a scheme was in hand for using teachers and undergraduates for the hay, corn, and hop harvests.

In answer to another questioner, Miss Thornton said there was a considerable need for nurses, and the supply was not up to the demand.

The Chairwoman said she would add one word about going into hospital for training for three months. The Vicar had been kind enough to allude to her daughter, who had gone to Manchester Hospital yesterday. It was not yesterday, however, that she had begun her work. She had been nursing since August. She had realised the war. They aught all to feel that the times were critical. With regard to short training in hospitals, she considered it desirable that they should make it quite clear that they were not going to become competitors for positions against trained hospital nurses at the termination of the war, or in any way to hurt their future careers.

The resolution having been passed enthusiastically,

The Chairwoman pointed out that such a resolution entailed a great responsibility, and that forms of registration could be obtained at the Labour Exchange. Having ... the resolution, they must the agricultural pursuits. ... was issued to all women who were able to work, free to work, and not working. The Government did not promise to give work to any, and no woman who registered herself need accept any particular kind of work offered. Six occupations were specified as those in which female labour was most likely to be required, namely, farm work, dairy work, leather work, brush making, clothing factories, and armaments. Those only fit for clerical work were also invited to register. So far 65,700 women had registered throughout the country, of whom 13,000 were fit for making armaments, 6000 clothing, 8000 farm or dairy work, and 10,000 clerical work. Up to the present only 1250 of these had been given employment, but nobody knew how soon many others would be required. Mr. Runciman had stated that he believed in a few months 13,000 women would be required for making armaments. The prejudice that existed in some parts against women doing agricultural work would no doubt decrease, and the number so employed would increase. Many of the persons who had registered were middle class women of leisure, who had not hitherto undertaken paid employment. Some people saw a danger in women working who had not hitherto done so, but there need be no fear that they would be given jobs wanted by the ordinary women workers. The work given to the registered women would be for the period of the war only, and therefore there was less fear of any dislocation of the labour market. The ages of those who had registered varied from 15 to 70, and their capacity, of course, varied greatly. A great many were no doubt quite unfit for work just now, and would have to be trained and maintained for a time. She was anxious for the credit of the women of England that the scheme should be well organised and well worked. A conference had been held at the Board of Trade offices to provide safeguards against the advent of the women lowering the rates of wages of men, and so lowering the standard of hiring of the wage-earning classes. It was most important that women should stand out for the same rate of pay as men. (Hear, hear.) That was not urged in any selfish spirit, but because the women felt that the best service they could render to the men who had gone out to fight their battles was to see that nothing was done that would make the conditions harder for them on their return. (Hear, hear.) The best way women could make sure that they were not under-cutting men was by joining an appropriate trades union. The customary rates of pay could be ascertained at the Labour Exchange. Then came the question of training. One of the excuses offered for paying women lower wages than men was that they were not worth so much as men, and could not do the same amount of work. That was very often due to want of opportunity. It was most important that the females who registered themselves should have adequate opportunities for training under this scheme. Then there were safeguards in the matter of housing, and especially were these necessary in country districts, where the housing problem was more acute than in towns. Then there was the danger of overwork to be guarded against. Excessive overwork was not right, nor necessary, nor economical. At the conference to which she had alluded it was urged that more women inspectors should be appointed. She hoped the Government would give employers a lead in the matter of engaging female labour, for much of the work that was now done by men in their offices could equally well be done by women. If the scheme was to be a great success, there should be a Central Advisory Board of women, who should help to organise the scheme throughout the country, recruit for it, and make women see that their services are really required. Such a change as was now taking place could not fail to have some permanent effect upon women, for after the war the disproportion between them and men would be greater than ever, and that must mean that a larger number of women and girls would be thrown upon their own resources for their livelihood. In a great many ways women were now getting the first chance they had had of making their capacity known and their value felt. Where women made employers see that they had value they would no doubt retain their services, to some extent at any rate, after the war, and in so far as there was no undercutting that would be a good thing, because it was right that work should be done by those who were best able to do it, whether men or women. There were certain occupations in which there was a shortage of labour even before the war, and agriculture and medicine were cases in point. This shortage had been immensely intensified by the war, and there was a fine opportunity for women to do real useful work in these directions. There need be no fear of taking work away from the men; there was need for more workers. The Government had arranged for training women in dairy work, and the Board of Agriculture granted a fee for carefully selected students. That seemed to be opening out a branch of work for women for which they were admirably suited, and which was bound to prove permanent. The medical profession also formed a splendid opening for women.

Miss Burgess said that at the last census there were 54,000 women in Norwich between the ages of 15 and 55, 43,000 of whom followed some occupation. Allowing that 50 per cent. of the others were incapable of work, that left over 5000 who could, if the necessity arose, turn their talents to some account; and yet fewer than 300 women had registered for war service. That was a fact that the women of Norwich would not be very proud of in the future. The Labour Exchange had replaced men by women in various branches of work. She strongly advocated equal pay for equal work, but she hoped women would not insist upon equal pay with innumerable privileges. (Hear, hear.) She implored the women of Norwich not to register unless they were prepared to make very great sacrifices.

Miss Wise thought it would be a good thing if women who had not been accustomed to work could be given short hours.

Miss Clarkson said there were quite a large

the spirit of helpfulness. (Applause.)

Questions having been invited, Miss Thornton was asked if she knew if any labour could be found for school teachers during their vacation. The answer was that it might be found in the harvest field, and that a scheme was in hand for using teachers and undergraduates for the hay, corn, and hop harvests.

In answer to another questioner, Miss Thornton said there was a considerable need for nurses, and the supply was not up to the demand.

The Chairwoman said she would add one word about going into hospital for training for three months. The Vicar had been kind enough to allude to her daughter, who had gone to Manchester Hospital yesterday. It was not yesterday, however, that she had begun her work. She had been nursing since August. She had realised the war. They aught all to feel that the times were critical. With regard to short training in hospitals, she considered it desirable that they should make it quite clear that they were not going to become competitors for positions against trained hospital nurses at the termination of the war, or in any way to hurt their future careers.

The resolution having been passed enthusiastically,

The Chairwoman pointed out that such a resolution entailed a great responsibility, and that forms of registration could be obtained at the Labour Exchange. Having passed the resolution, they must the next day proceed to action.

Col. O'Shee proposed a vote of thanks to the speakers. He was sorry to see so few men present. He must mention that the manhood of the country was not coming forward as it should. It was not a nice thing to have to say, but it was a time for plain and straight talking. I am sorry to say," repeated the Colonel emphatically, "that the manhood of this country is not coming forward as it should. The recruiting at the present moment is not supplying the wastage at the front, and before we are through with this war we shall have to send out another million men, and we shall have to supply the wastage on that million as well. This statement applies to the women as well as to the men. There is a class of young women and young men who like to give excuses. I have heard them saying that they are afraid the women who stay at home will get their jobs from them. Let me tell the men this: that the women who send their brothers and fathers have offered all just as much as the men there themselves. And I can assure you that the man out there has by far the easier task. Out there we have not the time to think of the people at home. Should death happen to strike us, we are not thinking about it; and, anyway, it's all over in a minute. At home it is not done with in a minute—in a day—nor in a life.

"These women are asking you to do this. I can only ask the young men to follow the lead of the women of the country. We all owe a deep debt of gratitude to the women of the country. Now we ask the men to back them up. The Vicar has mentioned what is going on in France. I have seen the work outside the fighting area, and you can hardly see that there's anything wrong with the country. The men are at the war, but the women are doing the work, and there's not a grumble among the lot. The men too young for service, and the men too old for service, are scrambling round asking to go out; but they with the women and children are doing the work. I have seen the women and children doing the work in the fields with a perpetual stream of shells going over their heads, while they have gone on at their work.

"At the present moment," repeated Col. O'Shee, the recruiting is not supplying the wastage at the front. If appeals to self-respect, honour, and love of your country have not the desired effect, let me make an appeal on another ground. You have seen the remarks of Lord Haldane as to conscription. Conscription is bound to come, and the man who comes into the Army on it will not get the same respect; he will not get as good terms, and thirdly, every one of those conscripts will have to serve his full term, and unless the war ends in a very different manner than we intend it to, there will be work to be done in the country, and the men who will be kept there for that service will be the conscripts. If there are any men here who have any doubt as to what they should do they can settle it 'one-time.'"

The speaker then proposed a vote of thanks to the speakers. (Applause.)

Capt. Atkin, R.N.R., in seconding, made an appeal to the young men to clear out to the fight, and make room for the ladies to work.

The resolution was carried, and the Chairwoman responded.

months 15,000 women would [illegible] making armaments. The prejudice that existed in some parts against women doing agricultural work would no doubt decrease, and the number so employed would increase. Many of the persons who had registered were middle class women of leisure, who had not hitherto undertaken paid employment. Some people saw a danger in women working who had not hitherto done so, but there need be no fear that they would be given jobs wanted by the ordinary women workers. The work given to the registered women would be for the period of the war only, and therefore there was less fear of any dislocation of the labour market. The ages of those who had registered varied from 15 to 70, and their capacity, of course, varied greatly. A great many were no doubt quite unfit for work just now, and would have to be trained and maintained for a time. She was anxious for the credit of the women of England that the scheme should be well organised and well worked. A conference had been held at the Board of Trade offices to provide safeguards against the advent of the women lowering the rates of wages of men, and so lowering the standard of hiring of the wage-earning classes. It was most important that women should stand out for the same rate of pay as men. (Hear, hear.) That was not urged in any selfish spirit, but because the women felt that the best service they could render to the men who had gone out to fight their battles was to see that nothing was done that would make the conditions harder for them on their return. (Hear, hear.) The best way women could make sure that they were not under-cutting men was by joining an appropriate trades union. The customary rates of pay could be ascertained at the Labour Exchange. Then came the question of training. One of the excuses offered for paying women lower wages than men was that they were not worth so much as men, and could not do the same amount of work. That was very often due to want of opportunity. It was most important that the females who registered themselves should have adequate opportunities for training under this scheme. Then there were safeguards in the matter of housing, and especially were these necessary in country districts, where the housing problem was more acute than in towns. Then there was the danger of overwork to be guarded against. Excessive overwork was not right, nor necessary, nor economical. At the conference to which she had alluded it was urged that more women inspectors should be appointed. She hoped the Government would give employers a lead in the matter of engaging female labour, for much of the work that was now done by men in their offices could equally well be done by women. If the scheme was to be a great success, there should be a Central Advisory Board of women, who should help to organise the scheme throughout the country, recruit for it, and make women see that their services are really required. Such a change as was now taking place could not fail to have some permanent effect upon women, for after the war the disproportion between them and men would be greater than ever, and that must mean that a larger number of women and girls would be thrown upon their own resources for their livelihood. In a great many ways women were now getting the first chance they had had of making their capacity known and their value felt. Where women made employers see that they had value they would no doubt retain their services, to some extent at any rate, after the war, and in so far as there was no undercutting that would be a good thing, because it was right that work should be done by those who were best able to do it, whether men or women. There were certain occupations in which there was a shortage of labour even before the war, and agriculture and medicine were cases in point. This shortage had been immensely intensified by the war, and there was a fine opportunity for women to do real useful work in these directions. There need be no fear of taking work away from the men; there was need for more workers. The Government had arranged for training women in dairy work, and the Board of Agriculture granted a fee for carefully selected students. That seemed to be opening out a branch of work for women for which they were admirably suited, and which was bound to prove permanent. The medical profession also formed a splendid opening for women.

Miss Burgess said that at the last census there were 54,000 women in Norwich between the ages of 15 and 55, 43,000 of whom followed some occupation. Allowing that 50 per cent. of the others were incapable of work, that left over 5000 who could, if the necessity arose, turn their talents to some account; and yet fewer than 300 women had registered for war service. That was a fact that the women of Norwich would not be very proud of in the future. The Labour Exchange had replaced men by women in various branches of work. She strongly advocated equal pay for equal work, but she hoped women would not insist upon equal pay with innumerable privileges. (Hear, hear.) She implored the women of Norwich not to register unless they were prepared to make very great sacrifices.

Miss Wise thought it would be a good thing if women who had not been accustomed to work could be given short hours.

Miss Clarkson said there were quite a large

The Times
House of Commons
11/6/15.

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

In reply to SIR W. BYLES (Salford, N., L.),

Mr. PRETYMAN said:—The total number of women who have signified their willingness to be placed on the War Service Register up to June 4 was 78,946. The total number of those whose services it has been possible hitherto to make use of is 1,816. It should, however, be borne in mind (1) that numbers of the applicants on the War Service Register placed their names also on the ordinary Labour Exchange registers; (2) that in filling vacancies the supply of suitable labour on the ordinary register is first exhausted before the resources of the War Service Register are drawn upon. In this connexion it may be noted that the placings from the ordinary Labour Exchange registers for the four weeks ended May 14 of this year amounted to 26,159, as compared with 18,757 for the corresponding month of last year—an increase of 39 per cent. I should also like to point out that the main object with which the special War Register was compiled was to ascertain what reserve labour would be available if required to meet emergencies which might arise in the future, rather than to recruit labour for existing vacancies generally. Special steps are, however, about to be taken with a view to bringing to the notice of employers the large reserves of women's labour which have been discovered, and the possibility of obtaining therefrom substitutes for men whom they may be able to release for service with the colours.

The Daily Post
11/6/15.

663

Daily Express
2/7/15.

663 II

WOMEN AND WAR WORK.

The announcement made in the House of Commons yesterday concerning the number of women who have volunteered for service of various kinds during the continuance of the war is satisfactory from one standpoint and disappointing from another. It is good to know that up to a week ago nearly 79,000 names had been entered upon the register, but it is certainly not encouraging to learn that so far it has been found possible to make use of only about 1,800 these willing helpers. It was explained that a certain proportion of the women had also placed their names on the ordinary Labour Exchange register, and many doubtless have gained employment through that source, but when due allowance has been made for that fact there must still remain a very large number whose services have not been utilised, and the danger is that this delay may have the undesirable effect of damping the enthusiasm of these volunteers and perhaps preventing others emulating their good example. Under these circumstances it is to be hoped that the steps which, as Captain Pretyman informed Sir William Byles, are about to be taken with a view to bringing under the notice of employers the large reserve of women's labour which has been discovered will be crowned with success.

As to the anxiety of women to render what assistance they can in this time of crisis there is no room for doubt, and that is true not only of those who sign their names in the war service register but of womankind generally. All that is needed is counsel as to the channels into which their energies and efforts can be directed with most benefit to the community. It would be impossible to praise too highly the devotion and self-sacrificing toil of our women doctors and nurses in hospitals at home and abroad. They are deserving of all the gratitude that can be bestowed upon them, but thanks are also due to those who are helping on the cause in a less prominent capacity by filling in workshops and offices the places of men who have rallied to the colours.

Work for Women.

Captain Pretyman's answer to a question of Mr. Hogge in the House of Commons yesterday is a sufficient proof that the Government is still unable to use the enthusiasm of the people. Eighty-seven thousand two hundred and forty-one women have registered their names for war service, and only 2,332 have been employed! Mr. Hogge may well ask what possible good can come from the registration of all women between the ages of fifteen and sixty-five if only two and a half per cent. of the specially eager and specially equipped can be used. Here again the people lead, and the Government lags behind. "Here am I, send me," says the individual citizen, but, alas, the Government has no sort of notion where to send him (or her). Mrs. Pankhurst and the suffragette leaders demand as a right that women should be allowed to shoulder their share of the nation's burden. We are fighting Germany, and German women are working strenuously for victory for their country. Nearly half the workers in the enemy's munition factories are women. They are making harness and tents, drugs, and surgical instruments. They are tinning provisions and rolling tobacco. The women of England refuse to be ignored.

Organisation is the one thing necessary. The fight between Great Britain and Germany has, until now, been a fight between anarchy and order, between muddle and careful preparation. Mr. Lloyd George has called to his aid a number of experienced business men. He would be well advised to add to them a council of capable women, and give them the task of organising and using the willing labour of their sex. We have said that our success in this war depends on every one of us finding the job we can do best, and then doing it with all our heart. It follows that every man who is employed on work that a woman can do equally well is employed to the loss of the nation.

The Daily Post
11/6/15

663
663 II
63

WOMEN AND WAR WORK.

The announcement made in the House of Commons yesterday concerning the number of women who have volunteered for service of various kinds during the continuance of the war is satisfactory from one standpoint and disappointing from another. It is good to know that up to a week ago nearly 79,000 names had been entered upon the register, but it is certainly not encouraging to learn that so far it has been found possible to make use of only about 1,800 these willing helpers. It was explained that a certain proportion of the women had also placed their names on the ordinary Labour Exchange register, and many doubtless have gained employment through that source, but when due allowance has been made for that fact there must still remain a very large number whose services have not been utilised, and the danger is that this delay may have the undesirable effect of damping the enthusiasm of these volunteers and perhaps preventing others emulating their good example. Under these circumstances it is to be hoped that the steps which, as Captain Pretyman informed Sir William Byles, are about to be taken with a view to bringing under the notice of employers the large reserve of women's labour which has been discovered will be crowned with success.

As to the anxiety of women to render what assistance they can in this time of crisis there is no room for doubt, and that is true not only of those who sign their names in the war service register but of womankind generally. All that is needed is counsel as to the channels into which their energies and efforts can be directed with most benefit to the community. It would be impossible to praise too highly the devotion and self-sacrificing toil of our women doctors and nurses in hospitals at home and abroad. They are deserving of all the gratitude that can be bestowed upon them, but thanks are also due to those who are helping on the cause in a less prominent capacity by filling in workshops and offices the places of men who have rallied to the colours.

Work for Women.

Captain Pretyman's answer to a question of Mr. Hogge in the House of Commons yesterday is a sufficient proof that the Government is still unable to use the enthusiasm of the people. Eighty-seven thousand two hundred and forty-one women have registered their names for war service, and only 2,332 have been employed! Mr. Hogge may well ask what possible good can come from the registration of all women between the ages of fifteen and sixty-five if only two and a half per cent. of the specially eager and specially equipped can be used. Here again the people lead, and the Government lags behind. "Here am I, send me," says the individual citizen, but, alas, the Government has no sort of notion where to send him (or her). Mrs. Pankhurst and the suffragette leaders demand as a right that women should be allowed to shoulder their share of the nation's burden. We are fighting Germany, and German women are working strenuously for victory for their country. Nearly half the workers in the enemy's munition factories are women. They are making harness and tents, drugs, and surgical instruments. They are tinning provisions and rolling tobacco. The women of England refuse to be ignored.

Organisation is the one thing necessary. The fight between Great Britain and Germany has, until now, been a fight between anarchy and order, between muddle and careful preparation. Mr. Lloyd George has called to his aid a number of experienced business men. He would be well advised to add to them a council of capable women, and give them the task of organising and using the willing labour of their sex. We have said that our success in this war depends on every one of us finding the job we can do best, and then doing it with all our heart. It follows that every man who is employed on work that a woman can do equally well is employed to the loss of the nation.

22 6 15

Daily Mail

THE MUDDLE OF WOMEN WORKERS.

To the Editor of The Daily Mail.

Sir,—When mistakes are being made the truth is often unpalatable but generally useful, as you have lately demonstrated. May I therefore point out a very minor mistake, and give a few facts concerning the employment of women volunteers?

Close on eighty thousand have responded to the Board of Trade appeal; under two thousand, it was said in Parliament last week, have been employed up to date, the excuse given being that some women "might have also" registered and been employed in the ordinary way.

Now no confirmatory evidence of this was adduced, and my own experience makes me disinclined to accept it as true, the truth being that the ordinary labour organisations are incapable of dealing with the situation. The labour to be employed does not fit into the ordinary labour conditions. To begin with, it is not fluid, and much of it must be casual.

An instance of what has actually occurred through a particularly good exchange may be cited to show what is going on at present. On June 1 it was said that sixty fruit-pickers would be required in one place by June 20. Application was immediately made for permission to inspect the housing and for particulars as to wages and railway fares. The former was refused until the labour was forthcoming, the latter not given. Despite this, in three days some seven hundred women had volunteered. To each of these applicants temporising replies detailing ignorance were sent at personal expense. On Saturday, June 12, after ten days' delay, a letter comes from the Labour Exchange saying that the employment of thirty (not sixty) women will be "favourably considered," and asking the unpaid organiser to travel over 100 miles, on Monday, at her own expense, to inspect the housing and, it is presumed, clinch the bargain, as the work must be begun "that day week."

Is it any wonder that the women of England should feel disheartened? Many of the applications received are sorry reading. I quote one from a soldier's wife: "I want work to stop me from thinking, and I have asked for to help in so many places and never an answer."

FLORA ANNIE STEEL.

Court o' Hill, Tenbury.

9. I. 15

Daily Mail

663

663 II

164

85,000 WOMEN EAGER FOR WAR WORK.

REGISTERED BUT IDLE.

GERMANY'S EXAMPLE.

At least 87,000 women have enrolled themselves for war work of any kind: 2,332 have been given work to do. Eighty-five thousand are still idle. Some figures illustrating the employment of women in Germany are worth repeating:

	Women Employed.		Women Employed.
Munitions	40%	Tobacco	70%
Leather trades	15%	Drugs	33%
Tent-makers	50%	Tinned goods	75%

In every direction the women of Great Britain are taking things seriously and putting themselves at the disposal of the country. They hope that a huge procession which is being organised to accompany a deputation to Mr. Lloyd George on July 17 may secure some adequate recognition of their efforts.

"We are preparing the greatest demonstration of women that the world has ever seen," said Mrs. Dacre Fox to a representative of The Daily Mail yesterday. Every woman will be welcome. It is a call to the women of the country to show their readiness to serve in any capacity.

It is officially announced that all women who are willing to do anything at all will greatly facilitate the organisation of this huge procession by sending in their names without delay to Miss Birch, Lincoln's Inn House, Kingsway, W.C. All will be registered, and the enrolment at the offices of the Women's Social and Political Union will in no way conflict with the work of the Labour Bureaux, who are co-operating in many ways with the union.

20,000 UNSKILLED WOMEN.

Inquiry at the Central Labour Exchange, where the register of these 87,000 women is kept, shows that roughly speaking 20,000 applicants entered their names without stating any previous occupation. These are apparently not now skilled in any technical trade or profession, but it is felt that at least a great part of them are capable of training.

The register gives the following figures of the 60,000 women with experience of men's work:—

Boot and shoe trade	203
Printing and allied trades	1,485
Restaurants and hotels	1,324
Dairy workers	837
Gardeners	203
General agricultural	1,117

No fewer than 11,393 domestic servants desiring war work registered.

WOMEN AND AGRICULTURE.

The National Political Union has about 2,500 women upon its books who have applied for agricultural work of various kinds. Many have already been sent to harvest work. The secretary reports that applications have been received from women students of all the universities, and that many are well qualified already. Unqualified women desiring agricultural work are either entered at various colleges for a two years' course or are employed, free of charge to themselves, upon the estates of landowners who have agreed to find places for volunteers.

WOMEN GASMEN.

The South Metropolitan Gas Company, about 1,800 of whose employees have joined the forces, are experimenting with the employment of twenty-four women as meter inspectors. Women have also been introduced in the showrooms in several suburban districts.

663 II
65

WOMEN AND WAR

"NOT MEN ALONE."

A PLEA FOR FULL NATIONAL SERVICE.

(By Christabel Pankhurst.)

Where would England have been without Elizabeth? Where would France have been without Joan of Arc? How dangerous it is, then, not to utilise women's powers of work and thought in the present great national emergency!

In the matter of women's war service the country is, in a sense, more backward than it was in the Crimean War, when a woman, Florence Nightingale, was entrusted by the Government of that day with a supremely important and responsible piece of war service.

In this year of 1915, the nation being engaged in a struggle for its life, there might at least be a woman in charge of a special Government scheme for preventing the excessive infant mortality which during the war has competed with the mortality of our armies in the field.

In these critical times one would be silent on such matters were it not a fact, proven by all that has happened before and since the outbreak of war, that there is imperative need of women's work and thought to reinforce the work and thought already at the service of the nation.

WOMEN AND SHELL-MAKING.

Mr. Lloyd George's speech last Wednesday, so admirable and so really great—especially had it been made on August 5—is nevertheless disappointing to women, because it calls only to men to enrol themselves for service in munition factories. Yet, as Mr. Lloyd George said in that same speech, there is nothing in shell-making that a fairly intelligent person cannot learn in a very short time; it is not highly skilled work. Then why should women not learn to do this work of shell-making, leaving men of more training and experience free to do other work more difficult?

Undoubtedly Mr. Lloyd George sees far more clearly than some others the necessity of employing large numbers of women in munition-making, and women look to him to set them to work. They cannot forget that while they are idle half a million German women, and perhaps more by this time, are making munitions of war!

Again, we are told that this country is becoming heavily indebted to America through the falling off of exports to pay for imports. In other words, the work of women's hands is indispensable if we are to produce goods sufficient to counterbalance the enormous supplies of war munitions and other matters which America is sending to this country.

And in future, when the war is safely over, women's work will still be needed to maintain and to increase our national wealth production. Hitherto women, especially of the industrial classes, have worked hard enough, but under conditions so primitive, and with so little skill (this being due to want of training) that the result has been unduly small.

From now onwards, if our country is to be economically stronger and more independent, the work of women and men alike must be conducted on more progressive lines. And, so far as the training and organising of women workers is concerned, now is the time to begin—since a beginning was not made long ago.

SPIRITUAL FORCE.

More important still is it that women's thinking power, women's intelligence, women's moral and spiritual force shall now be put directly at the service of the nation.

History shows that men can gain an Empire, but cannot keep it. That is because they do not possess the creative and the conservative force especially and by Nature appertaining to women. An undeveloped nation, in the first exuberance of its youth, or a nation deliberately barbarous, can for a time exist by its masculine strength alone. But as the nation ages and progresses in civilisation it must be revivified by women's mental and moral force, because otherwise there is an end in sterility and death.

women, whose trouble is that they are ready to serve the country and help to save it, but that they are not called upon!

There were women ready at the beginning of last September to agitate for universal and obligatory war service, the system which, adopted by the French, has so far saved their country—and our own. But the subject seemed to be a forbidden one in the estimation of men having knowledge which was not vouchsafed to the generality of people, and especially not to women! Under the circumstances it was hardly for women, as political outsiders, to take the initiative, especially as so many men were still in the A B C stage of "Why the war had to be fought," instead of in the stage of how it could be won! It is now evident that had universal service for men and women been adopted at that time the position to-day would have been totally different. We should at least have equalled the French output of munitions and should have been on the way to having an army as large as theirs.

HATRED OF COMPROMISE.

Women's inborn hatred of compromise on vital points would also be a great national strength at the present time. With some of the men of this country compromise is veritably a political religion. This the Germans know, and it has encouraged them to greater audacity.

Compromise has, since the war broke out, worked grave mischief to the national cause, one of its results being that not only from the United States, but also from Egypt, cotton has found its way to Germany instead of being purchased at an equitable price by the British Government.

The time has now come when compromise must cease, because compromise, which serves the enemy, apart from being injurious to the fundamental interests even of the neutral nations, would mean national suicide, and would mean the betrayal of the cause of our Allies.

And there is yet another quality that women can bring to the service of the nation—namely, their intuition, their insight—call it what you will. Many a man has cause to be thankful that before entering into business relations with a given individual he asked his wife to express an opinion and was guided by her: "Don't have anything to do with that man." How many other men there are who regret that they did not take their wife's advice on such a point!

Now if a woman without experience or any great knowledge of the facts can so often divine the truth concerning a human personality or a business situation, it is obvious that women with training and experience who were thoroughly informed in regard to facts could be invaluable advisers in public affairs. And are not such advisers needed? Let us call Mr. Lloyd George as witness that they are! He tells:—

> "Germany has been preparing for years; she had been piling up the material, and until she was ready she was on the best of terms with everybody. . . . We really thought the era of peace and goodwill had dawned. At that moment Germany was forging and hoarding up immense accumulations of war stores to take her neighbours unaware and murder them in their sleep."

WOMAN'S INSIGHT.

One may venture to say that women of equal intelligence being in possession of the same facts and having the same opportunities of observation would have seen through this German treachery and intrigue. It would seem that most men cannot, as women can, combine the gentleness of the dove and the wisdom of the serpent. Why is it that in proportion as a man is honest and peaceable in his intentions he is more easily taken in by the evilly disposed? Women are most certainly needed to cope with German intrigue, now and henceforward.

This we know: when womanhood in the person of Queen Elizabeth ruled here not only was a foreign enemy who sought to overthrow us by force quickly routed, but also the hordes of "peaceful" Germans who were exploiting and devouring our substance were turned out neck and crop, and the nation thus regained possession of its body and its soul.

What Elizabeth did more than three centuries ago to save British liberty and civilisation we women can at least help to do now. We must get back something of the England of Elizabeth. In other words, we must find ourselves by getting down to the bedrock of our character as British people. There we shall find our true national strength.

Our soldiers gallantly pitting their flesh and blood against the enemy's mechanical superiority have shown what British character is worth. Their bodies make the living barricade that stands between the nation and a fate unthinkable, and while they offer themselves to destruction that the nation may be preserved, it is our duty to be so organising and mobilising that every woman may do her share of war service at home, while every man not absolutely needed for other work makes ready to take his place in the battlefield by the side of those who have been holding out until his coming.

This is for our country a war of victory or death. We must organise and train ourselves for victory.

taining to women. An undeveloped nation, in the first exuberance of its youth, or a nation deliberately barbarous, can for a time exist by its masculine strength alone. But as the nation ages and progresses in civilisation it must be revivified by women's mental and moral force, because otherwise there is an end in sterility and death.

Looking to the primal facts of nature, we know that a nation of men alone would have no second generation; and in the history of nations the feminine element plays a part analogous to that played in human reproduction. Indeed, the women's movement of the past 40 years, and especially of the past 10 years, has been an evolutionary process—the feminine principle in our national life trying to find expression and to work national regeneration.

If the men who tried by appealing to their fellow-men to guard against the German peril had but known it, women in general and the Suffragettes in particular were their natural allies in this work of protecting the nation, which is the child of the woman just as the individual citizen is her child.

But the appeal was made to men, while the very women who would have been quickest to hear and most certain to act were wearing away strength and life in fighting for their weapon of national service. And until they had secured it, to ask them to strengthen the country against Germany would have been the same thing as asking the soldiers now fighting in Flanders to take Achi Baba at one and the same time.

However, things must and will be managed better in future, now that experience has made plain that the effort of the British people as a whole—not of one sex only—is needed to keep the British Empire alive and strong.

LACK OF FORESIGHT.

Everybody can now see that lack of foresight is the main cause of our present difficulties. But foresight impelling its possessor to prepare for the future is the special attribute of woman, rather than of man. Looking again at elemental physical facts we see sufficient explanation of this. Consider how the woman's share in parentage differs from that of the man; how she must wait and foresee for nine long months, and afterwards for years more think and foresee in the interests of the child! Whereas the man lives in the present rather than in the future, woman lives essentially in, for, and with the future.

Before and also, with even less excuse, since the war began, we have lived from hand to mouth. Consequently, after eleven months of warfare we are in the humiliating position of still being seriously unprepared for war. We must put an end to this condition of affairs. Our national prestige has suffered very greatly and our position as a people is indeed humiliating when contrasted with that of our Allies. If our pride needed chastening it is certainly chastened now! But it is not enough to wear sackcloth and ashes. Now or never we must rally and put forth our real and very great strength.

Universal war service for men and for women is needed not only as a sign of our earnestness and determination. It is needed to make our full strength available to save the country—as Mr. Lloyd George expresses it. To think that we should have allowed our defences to be and remain so relatively weak that the question of "saving the country" should arise in this serious form!

If men fight shy of universal war service, then the Government had better begin with the needed for other work makes ready to take his place in the battlefield by the side of those who have been holding out until his coming.

This is for our country a war of victory or death. We must organise and train ourselves for victory.

Daily Express
2.7.15

87,241 WOMEN WANT WAR WORK.

EMPLOYMENT FOUND FOR ONLY 2,332.

DEPUTATION TO VISIT MR. LLOYD GEORGE.

The number of women who had placed their names on the war service register up to June 18 was 87,241. Of these 2,332 had been placed in employment.

A statement to this effect was made in the House of Commons yesterday by Captain Pretyman, Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade in reply to a question by Mr. Hogge.

Mr. Hogge asked what was the use of obtaining the names of all women between the ages of fifteen and sixty-five if out of 87,241 the Government could only utilise the services of 2,332. Captain Pretyman replied:—

"That 2,332 does not include those who have been also on the ordinary register as well as on the war register, and we do not know how many have been employed by that means."

Mrs. Pankhurst, speaking at the London Pavilion yesterday, said that the Minister of Munitions had been asked to receive a deputation of women who had agreed to serve their country by joining in the work of munition making.

"I am glad to be able to tell you," she added, "that Mr. Lloyd George has consented to receive this deputation, and has fixed July 17 as a suitable date. We have decided to organise a great deputation and procession, in which we want all the women to join."

GERMAN WOMEN.

Mrs. Pankhurst said that 40 per cent. of the munition workers in Germany were women. The percentages of women engaged in other work were as follows:—

	Per cent.
Harness and leather goods	15
Tents and general equipment	50
Drugs	33
Surgical instruments	15
Field glasses	20
Tinned provisions	75
Textile workers	75
Tobacco works	70

"We know that comparatively few women are engaged in this way in Great Britain," added Mrs. Pankhurst, "and we know perfectly well that if we had the same number of women engaged in this practical work of warfare there would be released for war purposes an overwhelming number of men."

Lord Selborne, President of the Board of Agriculture, in an interview yesterday, said:—

"I wish to appeal to the women of England and Wales of every class who live in the country to assist the farmer with their labour during the war.

"It looks as if the farmers will be able to get through their harvest operations this year, but with difficulty. The reports received vary according to different counties and districts. In some the want of labour does not seem yet to be acutely felt; in others it is already acutely felt.

"The appeal I would make to the women is not to go to work because they want the money which they would earn, but because it is the special contribution they can make to the success of our arms in the present war. I would base my appeal to them to do this war work only on the highest grounds of patriotism. They can render great assistance in the harvest, and in many other ways in the ordinary course of the agricultural year.

"They can give great help in milking, in hoeing the roots, and in fruit-picking. The woman who helps to keep the farm going by milking or hoeing will be contributing to the defeat of Germany as surely as her husband or son who is guarding the North Sea or fighting in the trenches."

The Times
2/7/15
House of Commons

WOMEN AND WAR WORK.

Mr. PRETYMAN (Essex, Chelmsford, U.), answering a question by Mr. HOGGE (Edinburgh, E., L.), said the total number of women who had registered under the special registration scheme at the Labour Bureaux up to June 18 was 87,241, of whom 2,332 had been placed in employment in various trades, including armaments, textiles, and chemicals.

Mr. HOGGE.—What is the use of getting the names of any further women between 15 and 65 if out of 87,000 only 2,000 have been utilized?

Mr. PRETYMAN.—The 2,000 does not include those who have been on the ordinary register as well as on the war register, and we do not know how many have been employed by that means.

The Daily Telegraph
29/7/15

WOMEN AND WAR-WORK.

28, Church Row, Hampstead, London, N.,
July 23rd, 1915.

Sir,—Mr. Lloyd George's recent statement that a minimum wage will be paid to women engaged in war service, will be universally welcome. But it is to be regretted that this statement was not made earlier to the industrial women's organisations, which several months ago were in communication with the Government as regards the conditions under which women should work when their services were required.

The immediate question is not so much that of securing numbers of women for war service. Their willingness to be employed was shown when the voluntary register of women was compiled. In addition to the 43,000 unemployed women registered at Labour Exchanges, 85,000 have registered on the special war register.

The real problem is twofold: How to ensure, in the present dislocation of industry leading to the replacement of men by women, that the health and physique of the future mothers of the race should not be injured, and that men's wages should not be undermined, nor their future employment be endangered.

Already the effect of the extra pressure now being put on women workers is reported to be showing itself in the woollen and worsted districts of Yorkshire in largely increased sickness claims under the Insurance Act. It is essential to the productivity of labour that the efficiency of women should be maintained, and also that unrest among men should be prevented.

The following proposals for dealing with these problems were put forward by the women's industrial organisations:—

(1) That an expert advisory committee should be formed, largely composed of industrial women;

(2) That women replacing men should join a trade union;

(3) That the principle of equal pay for equal work should be insisted on; and

(4) That sweating conditions should be prevented and an adequate minimum wage enforced.

The employment of women on war work and the replacement of men by women in other industries is going on in all parts of the country, under the most varying conditions. It is most important that conditions of wages and hours should be standardised, and that the minimum wage fixed should be a real living wage. If some provisions of the Factory Acts are to be in abeyance for war work, it is all the more essential that questions of hours and proper provision for food (e.g., during night work) should be carefully considered in connection with efficiency, if for no other reason.

In reorganising women's employment on this vast scale, it is, above all things, necessary to act in close consultation with women's and joint men's and women's trade unions, as in no other way could a satisfactory and practical system be worked out.

The passing of Mr. Long's Act for extending the national care of maternity shows that the nation is alive to the importance of motherhood. But care at the time of maternity cannot undo the evil results of underfeeding and overworking the young women of our country.

On behalf of 32,000 married working women, the Central Committee of the Women's Co-operative Guild appeals to the Government to act boldly and strongly for the protection of England's future mothers.—Yours, etc.,

MARGARET LLEWELLYN DAVIES.

663 II/67 603
Manchester Guardian
6/7/15
House of Commons

WOMEN FOR WAR WORK.

In reply to Mr. P. Snowden (Lab.—Blackburn) and Mr. J. King (L—North Somerset),

Mr. RUNCIMAN said that up to 25th June the total number of women who had placed their names on the War Service Register, exclusive of 2,708 who subsequently cancelled their applications, was 87,861, and of these 2,616 had been placed in employment from this Register. During the period from the 13th March-12th June, which corresponded approximately to the period during which the War Service Register had been open, the number of women placed from the ordinary register was 81,005. The number of women remaining on the ordinary register on 25th June was 43,058.

The Manchester Guardian
31/7/15

The Women and the Register.

The various representative women with whom I have discussed the national registration scheme are not yet disposed to take it seriously, and certainly do not dream that the woman at home has much chance of being called out. Should the Government, which has ignored 68,000 of those already registered, want women for munitions there is still much unemployment among working women who are accustomed to long hours, order, and discipline and the difficulty of transferring and lodging women workers in new neighbourhoods remains a formidable one. The increased demand for qualified women clerks will make them unwilling to accept Government work at the poor pay offered, but any offer would be eagerly accepted by the girls enamoured of the title "clerk," who ought to be drafted into the industrial world, and who certainly will not register for munition work. Thousands of the women who registered in April as willing for service will hesitate now since their eagerness was so effectively damped, and this refers especially to such women as the daughter of a famous writer, who, in answer to an urgent appeal for fruit-pickers, collected 60 women, and was then informed that as the work lay 100 miles away she must make a journey at her own expense to see what lodgings were available. Besides, she was told, only 40 women after all were wanted. A leading professional woman is most impressed by the fact that the thrift campaign cannot run with a scheme of national industrial service for women, because only by looking carefully after their own homes and paying rigid attention to details can housewives contrive to live economically. That, she thinks, at present, is her highest national service.

WOMEN'S DEMAND FOR WAR WORK.

PROCESSION TO CONVINCE THE MEN.

The great war service procession of women to take place in London to-morrow week was the theme of speeches by Mrs. Pankhurst and Miss Annie Kenney at the Women's War Service meeting yesterday at the London Pavilion. The Women's Social and Political Union (Lincoln's Inn House, Kingsway, W.C.) is organising the procession, and women of every class are invited to join in it to show their readiness to do war work. After the procession Mr. Lloyd George, as Minister of Munitions, will receive a deputation of women.

In her address yesterday Mrs. Pankhurst said: "No thoughtful man or woman can study the military position without realising that we have come to a very grave point in our national fortunes; that there is no time to be lost, no effort to be wasted, if we are to win this war. Belgium has sacrificed all material things in upholding the great ideal of national honour. We British women do not want to be one step behind Belgium in the noble stand she has made.

CUTTING RED TAPE

"The procession we are organising is to convince men that women are ready to serve; that women are not wanting to make bargains, but only want to serve their country, and are determined, as their French sisters are doing, to provide for their men in the trenches the necessary munitions of war.

"There are people who say the war will be over before the National Register takes effect. That depends on us. We know the deliberate ways of men. We know their 'wait and see' policies. But women are not like that. We are people of 'push and go.' (Laughter.) We have the habit of cutting red tape and getting to work.

M. Emile Cammaerts, the Belgian poet, spoke of the German requisitions in Belgium, and thanked the English people, especially English women, for all they had done to help the Belgians. He concluded by reciting one of his war poems.

The next weekly war service meeting will take place at the London Pavilion, Piccadilly-circus, W., on Thursday, at 3 p.m., when the speakers will include Miss Constance Collier and Miss Annie Kenney. Mrs. Pankhurst will preside. Admission is free. Reserved seats at 2s. 6d. and 1s. can be obtained from the Ticket Secretary, Lincoln's Inn House, Kingsway, W.C.

The Liverpool Daily Post & Mercury. 12/7/15

SOUTHPORT WOMEN AND WAR WORK.

At the Southport bureau for war work, in Lord-street, about 190 women have offered their services up to the present either to do women's work or to release men for service with the forces. The number registered at other bureaux in the town for similar purposes is approximately 400. Many of them have volunteered for work in connection with munitions, but so far there is little or nothing for them to do in this capacity in Southport. Others have been sent to the County Council farm at Hutton, near Preston, to undertake a course in agriculture or dairying. Gardening and poultry farming are practical subjects which the bureau have in contemplation.

Common Cause
16/7/15

Women and the National Register.

The inclusion of women in the National Register is a measure of the plainest common-sense. If the register is to be used to any purpose at all in the organisation of our national resources, it cannot afford to ignore the only part of the strength of the nation which remains undiminished by war, and we are glad that Parliament has at last recognised this fact, even though it may still be far from acting upon it.

Mr. Long truly recognised that women would have been both injured and humiliated had they been excluded from the register, but the justification for their inclusion is wider than this; it is as wide as the nation's needs. Indeed, we think it would have been the nation itself, and not only its women, who would have been humiliated, if Parliament had thought and proclaimed that of all the women that the nation contains, none by any possible arrangement would be allowed to be of any use at all in the national crisis.

Lord Lansdowne's Disappointment.

It is rather curious to turn from Mr. Long's speech to Lord Lansdowne's, on moving the second reading of the Bill in the House of Lords. For the motive he puts forward for including women in the Register is entirely different. It was done, not to spare women the humiliation of being left out; but, apparently, because women were not coming forward in sufficient numbers to undertake the work of men. "An attempt was made," Lord Lansdowne said, "to set up a voluntary register for women with rather disappointing results. The Board of Trade Circular was received by 13,000,000 women, but only 90,000 placed their names on the register. We came, therefore, to the conclusion that we should include women." Lord Lansdowne might have added that only about 3,000 of those that registered themselves received work through the channels through which they were asked to apply. This was hardly an inducement to others to sign on. Further, from private inquiries, we find that the great majority of women never seem to have had a Board of Trade Circular at all, and we think Lord Lansdowne must have assumed, without sufficient proof, that it had been in the hands of every woman.

Lord Kitchener on Women's Service.

Speaking at the Guildhall last Friday, Lord Kitchener urged on all employers the duty of releasing men for service with the Colours, and replacing them by men unfit for active military duties, "or by women, as has already been found feasible in so many cases." Lord Kitchener went on to say, "And here I cannot refrain from a tribute of grateful recognition to the large number of women, drawn from every class and phase of life, who have come forward and placed their services unreservedly at their country's disposal." The words of the Secretary of State for War will echo through all women's hearts. Perhaps the thought may follow, Can we release more women for their country's service?

"Women's Work in the War."

This is the title of the forty-sixth number of the Times' History of the War. It gives an extraordinarily wide survey of the field of women's work from that first day of August, 1914, when "a quiet group of matrons of the nursing service spent the Sunday waiting, in the electric atmosphere of the War Office," for the news which was to summon together and then scatter abroad all the hundreds of trained women who knew exactly what to do when the call came. The marvellous swiftness of their response was as wonderful in its way as the mobilisation of the Expeditionary Force. The women who were not ready organised for war service, lost no time in following the example. The women's voluntary medical units were not long behind the military organisation, and got to work under the auspices of the French Government. The Times' History of the War gives a full account of how it was all done. How the hospitals founded by the Scottish Federation, on a scheme initiated by Dr. Elsie Inglis, grew until the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies have equipped and are maintaining 1,150 beds for the French and Serbian wounded; and how the splendid success of Royaumont, staffed as it is entirely by women, led the French military authorities to send a special request that Royaumont should take the most serious cases, and to ask for repeated extensions of the Scottish Hospitals' work—is all related in this chapter of women's efforts. A short summary of the work of the vast and complex organisation set in motion by the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies is given on page 273. Altogether, when our friends in the Dominions, and the United States, write to ask us what we are doing, we must remember to send them copies of this excellently illustrated number, which gives an immense amount of information in a handy form.

Common Cause
16/7/15

The Waste of Woman-Power.

The demand lately made by the Government for economy in the household was put forth in the name of national efficiency. The Government look to women to see to it that there is no waste in their homes; no waste of food, nor of coal, nor of water and lighting (which mean coal), nor of woollen materials; and we are told to think very carefully before we spend money on imported goods, or indeed upon anything that we can do without; for all the money is wanted as fast as we can save it; and on our savings, our ingenuity and capacity for "going without," the whole national future may turn. Women, on their side, have not been able to press any demand for national economy upon the Government, for they lack the one and only means of getting attention from politicians; but they have done their best for many months to urge the greatest and most necessary economy of all—economy of labour.

The great displacements in the labour market, which followed the outbreak of war, revealed two things; first, that much work hitherto done by men must for the future (or, at any rate, for a time) be done by women; and, secondly, that large numbers of men were (and are still) doing what may be called women's work—work for which women are particularly fitted. For work of both kinds, some 87,000 women registered their names in the spring, and about 3,000 have found employment. The remainder are still waiting for work or training. And as the demand for more men, men for the army or for work that only men can do, steadily continues, it seems more necessary than ever that women who are ready to learn should begin their training at once, before the depletion makes the whole re-adjustment of labour still more difficult. As for the trained workers, the appeal met with an instant response from them. So much so, that numbers of women were actually preparing to throw up good positions so that they might take up their share of the national burden in war-time; and for a time, while the appeal was taken seriously, there was a good deal of unrest. The National Registration Bill seems likely to create another wave of unrest, and to reveal still larger "reserves of labour," for which neither training nor employment are seriously contemplated. The nation is not by any means making full use of its woman-power. And this is particularly striking in the case of the women of academic training and experience of various forms of social work, who would be of great value in departmental administration. From this, hitherto, they have been as far as possible excluded. "The higher branches of the Civil Service in particular show a great reluctance to admit women of academic training, who could quite well, during the war, replace men of similar qualifications," says Mr. James Haslam in The Englishwoman.

It would have been surprising if there had not been "reluctance." Where men are accustomed to work with men only (or where women work only with women), they can attain in working a degree of mechanical smoothness which is easily mistaken for real efficiency, because it enables a great deal of business to be dispatched—too often the only right word for the process. So it is to be expected that a male staff should see and urge objections to any interruption of this mechanical smoothness, and the strongest objections may naturally be expected from the older men who have spent their lives in perfecting the machinery. But much more necessary than smoothness in the working of a department are the qualities of adaptability, of elasticity, of quickness to recognise a slightly different point of view, and the faculty of re-adjustment to new needs and ideas; that vitality, in short, which so mysteriously deserts the Government Department that the "deadening influence of official routine" is a by-word. Getting through the work for the sake of getting through the work is the ideal of the official mind all the world over. The man makes the departmental machine, and in revenge, it turns men into machines. It does this so much the more easily because the new recruits are often fresh from the university, and bring knowledge but no experience with them. Such distant entities as "women and children" and the "working classes," are concepts which they learn to deal with on traditional lines laid down by the department. The intelligent lad soon becomes a diligent, laborious official, capable of getting through any amount of "work."

But do we need "officials"? Would it not be more wholesome for us all, even if we are public servants, to be pulled up short occasionally by the need to re-adjust ourselves, to take a look at our work and aims from a new angle, and to consider whether we are going forward or backward? So long as men and women sedulously work apart they neglect the most valuable natural method of keeping fresh, of avoiding the dangers of routine. We all know what happens in every-day life.

"If we could but get two or three business men on to this committee we might get this thing done," means a secretary. The two or three men are found. Something is done, "thanks to that energetic Mr. Smith and that business-like Mr. Jones!" But was it really all done by them? Was not part of the credit due to the new atmosphere they brought, the different points of view, the re-presentment of the old difficulty in the light of another sort of experience? We can't possibly deal with this! Let us accept two or three women on to the Board, and see what they make of it. And the business-like Mr. Jones and the energetic Mr. Smith have, along with their colleagues, and their Mr. Jones's knowledge of business, and Mr. Smith's vast experience on the Account[illegible] begin their training at once, before the depletion makes the whole re-adjustment of labour still more difficult. As for the trained workers, the appeal met with an instant response from them. So much so, that numbers of women were actually preparing to throw up good positions so that they might take up their share of the national burden in war-time; and for a time, while the appeal was taken seriously, there was a good deal of unrest. The National Registration Bill seems likely to create another wave of unrest, and to reveal still larger "reserves of labour," for which neither training nor employment are seriously contemplated. The nation is not by any means making full use of its woman-power. And this is particularly striking in the case of the women of academic training and experience of various forms of social work, who would be of great value in departmental administration. From this, hitherto, they have been as far as possible excluded. "The higher branches of the Civil Service in particular show a great reluctance to admit women of academic training, who could quite well, during the war, replace men of similar qualifications," says Mr. James Haslam in The Englishwoman.

It would have been surprising if there had not been "reluctance." Where men are accustomed to work with men only (or where women work only with women), they can attain in working a degree of mechanical smoothness which is easily mistaken for real efficiency, because it enables a great deal of business to be dispatched—too often the only right word for the process. So it is to be expected that a male staff should see and urge objections to any interruption of this mechanical smoothness, and the strongest objections may naturally be expected from the older men who have spent their lives in perfecting the machinery. But much more necessary than smoothness in the working of a department are the qualities of adaptability, of elasticity, of quickness to recognise a slightly different point of view, and the faculty of re-adjustment to new needs and ideas; that vitality, in short, which so mysteriously deserts the Government Department that the "deadening influence of official routine" is a by-word. Getting through the work for the sake of getting through the work is the ideal of the official mind all the world over. The man makes the departmental machine, and in revenge, it turns men into machines. It does this so much the more easily because the new recruits are often fresh from the university, and bring knowledge but no experience with them. Such distant entities as "women and children" and the "working classes," are concepts which they learn to deal with on traditional lines laid down by the department. The intelligent lad soon becomes a diligent, laborious official, capable of getting through any amount of "work."

But do we need "officials"? Would it not be more wholesome for us all, even if we are public servants, to be pulled up short occasionally by the need to re-adjust ourselves, to take a look at our work and aims from a new angle, and to consider whether we are going forward or backward? So long as men and women sedulously work apart they neglect the most valuable natural method of keeping fresh, of avoiding the dangers of routine. We all know what happens in every-day life.

"If we could but get two or three business men on to this committee we might get this thing done," moans a secretary. The two or three men are found. Something is done, "thanks to that energetic Mr. Smith and that business-like Mr. Jones!" But was it really all done by them? Was not part of the credit due to the new atmosphere they brought, the different points of view, the re-presentment of the old difficulty in the light of another sort of experience. "We can't possibly deal with this! Let us co-opt two or three women on to the Board, and see what they make of it." And the business-like Mrs. Jones and the energetic Miss Smith bring along with them something over and above Mrs. Jones's knowledge of boarding out school children, and Miss Smith's vast experience on the Asylums' Committee. They see the matter from another angle. They "complete" the power already at work. But no body of men, or of women, has or can have "full power" to deal with any serious matter, so long as the other sex is deliberately excluded, and no amount of Acts of Parliament can endow them with it. And since this is so, why allow the nation's woman-power to run to waste?

Yorkshire Post.
19.7.10

REGISTERED WOMEN VOLUNTEERS.

To the Editor of The Yorkshire Post.

Sir,—As one of the 85,000 women who registered at various Labour Exchanges earlier in the [illegible] I feel that I must protest against the offensive [illegible] you have taken in the second of your leading [illegible] day. The whole article suggests that women [illegible] and are not prepared to do their part in [illegible] men's work at the present time. I wonder [illegible] have considered with anything like the amount [illegible] which the matter deserves the number of women who have done their very utmost to obtain work which would free men. Many of us are fully qualified, and yet we remain idle because we cannot obtain work. Numbers of women, like myself, have just completed their University career, and yet have no work, and have their card of registration as the only communication they have received as a result of their quite enthusiastic registration months ago.

This letter may be dismissed by you as being in the "ordinary theatrical manner," but at least it has the merit of being true, and scarcely so biassed as the view of the critic at his desk.—Yours, etc.,

MARY STABLER.

Conishead Priory Hydro., Ulverston, July 19, 1915.

* * We are well aware that out of the 85,000 women * who registered at the Labour Bureaux not 3,000 have been employed. Miss Stabler forgets that the passing through a University does not in itself qualify for many employments; it is a mark of intelligence, studentship, and application. In most of the berths vacated, experience and some degree of maturity also are required; and we have no doubt that the Labour Bureaux have less difficulty in finding posts for working girls than for graduates. This is not the fault of the latter. Probably it is inherent in mercantile and industrial conditions. There are especial training schools for typists and women secretaries.—Ed. Y.P.

Yorkshire Post.

There is considerable controversy in the women's movement over the inclusion of women in the national register. The Women's Social and Political Union, which has been almost moribund during the war, has come to life again, hailing the inclusion of women as a step nearer the compulsory war service of men and women, for which it is now agitating. Other sections of the Suffragist movement are critical on various grounds. The United Suffragists protest against "new compulsions" for women before granting them the vote. Down in the East End, Miss Sylvia Pankhurst and her Federation are organising a deputation to the House of Commons on July 20. The National Register Bill, in the opinion of these women, is calculated to defeat the object it professes to serve, and the deputation will urge instead "equal pay for men and women, the vote for women, and the limitation of profits on food and fuel," in order that the value of wages, separation allowances, and pensions may not be undermined. Meanwhile, many active Suffragist workers are temporarily placing on one side the war emergency work which has occupied them during the last few months, in order to press forward a Lobby and letter-writing campaign against registration. Very few of them seem inclined to separate the questions of the vote and of war services of any kind.

Yorkshire Post

WOMEN AND THE NATIONAL REGISTER.

To the Editor of The Yorkshire Post.

Sir,—I would urge the Local Authorities in the West Riding, who have been entrusted with the compilation of the National Register, to arrange for women to have an honourable share in this important work.

I will at once dissociate my plea from any pro or anti suffrage point of view—the claim of women to take part in the distribution and classification of the forms is based entirely on their ability to assist and their right to do so. The returns will obviously show a great preponderance of women. The country is full of patriotic women, who, unable to fight, are simply aching to serve their Empire in this hour of destiny. "Men must fight and women must work" is the new order in England to-day. Mothers, wives, and sisters have their dear ones in the trenches, and it would be a real God-send to many of them if they could find some relief for their pent-up feelings in definite helpful work for their country.

This is their chance, and I suggest that wherever possible the services of educated women should be utilised in this national undertaking. Let all such at once volunteer, in their own neighbourhood, and press for acceptance, and who shall withstand their claim?—Yours, etc.,

AGNES CROSS.

New Laithes Hall, Horsforth, 21st July, 1915.

PUBLIC WORK AND WOMEN'S EMPLOYMENT.

RULES FOR THIS DEPARTMENT.

1. Letters of enquiry should be accompanied by the Public Work and Women's Employment Coupon, which will be found in the advertisement pages. The coupon must be duly filled up, and the letter addressed to the Public Work and Women's Employment Editor, Queen Office, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C.

2. The Editor does not undertake to forward letters from one correspondent to another, but will endeavour to do so when the letter to be forwarded is sufficiently stamped, bears the pseudonym or initials of the addressee, and is enclosed under a separate cover addressed to the Public Work and Women's Employment Editor. Letters cannot be forwarded when more than a fortnight has elapsed since the publication of the Queen containing the pseudonym or initials of the addressee. An exception to this rule is only made on behalf of correspondents living at places more than a week's journey by post from London.

3. The Editor of this department does not send addresses or engage (save under circumstances which the Editor may deem exceptional) in private correspondence.

4. Difficulties which may be solved by advertising cannot be dealt with. The Editor, however, will gladly advise in all other matters connected with the subject in which guidance may be desired—such, e.g., as general education, special profession or technical training, conditions of tuition, and apprenticeship, openings for particular kinds of work, and where and how to set up in business.

5. Correspondents who forward trustworthy information respecting opportunities for women's public and voluntary work or remunerative employment will confer a benefit upon applicants to this department, for which the Editor will be much obliged.

THE PROGRESS OF EVENTS.

Pegs and Holes.

TO WATCH how the National Registration Act is worked in different places will probably be interesting, amusing, or annoying according to the temperament of the watcher and the manner of the bodies who try to administer the Act. For we shall all find ourselves ranged in one of two camps; we shall either be in the small and select camp of the persons who arrange what other people ought to do for the national weal, or we shall be in the big crowd of persons who are to be told off to do things. And if we are among the latter we shall almost certainly think that our powers are not rated at their real (and, of course, high) value.

Paid or Unpaid Help?

Some of the town councils seem likely to hand over to their Town Clerk and General Purposes Committee the task of considering the way in which the register is to be formed. Among the members of these committees there will probably be great differences of opinion with regard to the amount of help which should be gratuitous. In towns where the war has caused much pecuniary difficulty to the inhabitants, the formation of the register may be thought to present a suitable chance for some of the paid. It is true that if the offer of the unpaid services of teachers is accepted, the uncertainty may never manifest itself. The worker may labour as steadily as if he or she were paid. But the uncertainty is there all the same; it lurks even in the volunteer's consciousness of being independent of the employing body or individual. It is necessary to say again how extremely important it is that women of education and experience [Sport and General Press Agency Ltd.

THE ROSE-BEARERS. MAIDS DRESSED IN WHITE CARRIED ROSES TIED TO STICKS AT THE HEAD OF THE PAGEANT ON SATURDAY LAST WEEK IN THE WOMEN'S MARCH THROUGH LONDON.

should be employed in classifying and considering the offers of work made by the women registered. For it is on this side of our national mobilisation that the absence of organisation and of the right kind of recruiting power has been so much felt.

Where is Women's Work most Wanted?

It would be a help if the Local Government Board would publish some suggestions of the departments of work in which women's services are most seriously needed. Such suggestions would help women in filling up the registration forms. At present there is much perplexity in the minds of women, and especially perhaps of middle-class and citizens to earn money. The citizens who are not likely to be employed in this service may take another view and will put forward the grievances of the taxpayer and "consumer" who can ill afford to shoulder any new burden. If a general principle can be found for settling the problem it would appear to be that unpaid workers should be employed for all the business of an advisory administrative nature, such as that of serving on any committees that may be formed for considering the work which the people on the register should do. But any work which demands persistent routine or clerical labour must be done by paid workers. Even if a beginning is made by engaging non-salaried volunteers, the end must be the employment of a paid staff. For there is of necessity an element of uncertainty in the service of those who are not professional women. There are thousands of women who are prepared to state that they could do "some[illegible] secretarial," although most of them would go wro[illegible] the spelling of consensus or accommodation. If [illegible] that they have not enough knowledge of the [illegible] from which English has been created to [illegible] to say they know English, then [illegible] say what they can do.

[L.N.A.

SOME OF THE BANNER-BEARERS WHO MADE AN EFFECTIVE APPEAL IN THE WOMEN'S PROCESSION THROUGH LONDON.

It would very much increase [illegible] if the Local Government Board [illegible] women are specially wanted i[illegible] for example, as letter carriers, [illegible] railway ticket sellers and col[illegible] drivers, motor drivers, cyclists, [illegible] as this no British woman sur[illegible] showy work that is not wanted when she might turn her powers to some humble but really useful duty.

Night and Day Work.

A good many women will probably put themselves down as would-be munition workers or as factory workers for war contracts. In either of these cases they may eventually have to do night work if the need for ammunition continues to increase. Where expensive plant and machinery have been constructed on purpose to meet the war emergency, it is necessary that the night work should go on at the same pressure as the day work. And to make things fair, the workers must take day and night work in weekly shifts.

One of the immediate problems is how to enable the workers to get a proper amount of rest during the day. In private houses and cottages where there are children and where there is much noise from road traffic, it is a much more difficult matter to ensure that some one inmate shall get eight or nine hours of uninterrupted sleep than it is in a well-managed hospital. The munition worker undergoes on the whole much greater fatigue than does the hospital night nurse, and many men break down under the strain. The nurse who is on duty at night has less to do than the day nurse, and she can sit down from time to time. If it were possible for the owners of large armament works, without too much cost, to run up simple wooden cubicle dormitories for the use of those who must sleep by day, the boon would be great. It would, of course, be needful to secure that the light should be obscured as much as possible; the windows, which should have thick dark blinds, should look north. Were some such scheme as this carried out, the difficulties and strain of night work would be very much reduced.

A Home for Professional Women.

Now that many women are coming up to London in order to take part in what may be generally described as social service, it may be worth while to draw the attention of some of the older ones among them to a home in London where they can live economically and also feel that their presence is of use. This place is the Boarding House for Ladies at 19, Danvers-street, Chelsea, which is in immediate connection with the Day-servants' Hostel in the two adjoining houses. The object of inviting some ladies to live in the boarding house is to enable the servants to improve in their domestic duties and to make themselves more competent for wage-earning purposes. A lady can occupy a nice bed-sitting-room in the boarding house at an inclusive charge of twenty-eight shillings a week. For anyone who is engaged in social work the surroundings would probably have a special human interest such as an ordinary students' home might hardly possess. And the position, near the river in an old-world part of London, has considerable attractions. Also, it may be added, the boarder need not fear that she will be the victim of prentice-hands, for the cooking is under the direction of a permanent cook-housekeeper. A lady superintendent with experience of mission work is at the head.

M. H.

For

From The General Press Cutting Association, Ltd,
Lennox House, Norfolk St. London, W.C.
Telegrams: Bretwalda, Estrand, London. Telephone: No 5520 Central

NEWS FROM ALL PARTS OF THE WORLD SUPPLIED WITH EFFICIENCY AND SPEED. . .

Cutting from the Englishwoman

Address of Publication

Issue dated July 1915

113

633 II/76

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN

I

IN March last a scheme for utilising the work of women in time of war was launched by the Government. At the beginning of the war, women's societies had urged that steps should be taken on a large scale to train women to take up the duties of men who left their work for the Army or the Navy. No official action was taken at the time, nor, indeed, until the war had actually been in progress for nearly eight months. The scheme of the Government is to prepare a Register of Women for War Service: women are invited to register at the Labour Exchanges, and the invitation is extended to all women who are able to work and free to work, but not working; even those who can only work half of each day are asked to register. It is stated that women will be wanted to take the place of men, to equip men for military service by making arms and clothing, and to increase the food supply of the country by working on farms.

Six occupations are specified in which women are wanted at once: farm work, dairy work, leather stitching, brush making, clothing machining, and machining for armament; but previous experience in any of these is not necessary before registration, and it is stated that women may also be required in other occupations than these six. The registration form contains a series of questions to which answers must be filled in as to the previous work of the applicant, &c. It is made clear to those who register that no promise whatever of work is made to them by the Government, and also that no woman, when she registers, pledges herself that she will take any work that may be offered to her.

The number of women who had registered themselves for War Service up to June 4th was 78,000; of these.

633 II/7

16,000 had applied for armament work, 11,000 for clerical, and 7000 for agricultural employment. About 3000 have offered to work as shop assistants, and 3000 in the conveyance of men and goods. Up to the present, about 1800 of those who have registered themselves have actually been placed in work. Of the placings, the largest numbers have been in armament work; commercial and clerical work; agricultural work; domestic and laundry work; chemicals, oils, and grease; leather work; and conveyance of men and goods. During the week ending June 4th nearly one hundred women from the War Service Register were placed under the last heading. It must not be assumed from the smallness of the number placed that the other women are not required; the scheme is really in the nature of an inquiry or census, so that the Government may know what is the reserve of women's labour available in the country to be called upon in time of need. It has been officially stated that as many as 13,000 women may be required for armament works alone in the course of the next few months.

There is, as might be expected, very great variety of age and experience among the women who have registered: a large number are married women who did factory work before marriage, and are now willing to return to it; others, and especially those offering to do armament work, are women who have not hitherto undertaken paid work; others are women ordinarily employed, but temporarily free for War Service; others, again, are actually now in work, but would prefer to change their present occupation for what seems to them the more exciting task of making bullets or acting as a ticket-collector. The ages vary from 15 to 70, and the type varies from the University-trained woman to the poorest class of workgirl—ill-clad and physically unfit for hard work. It is obvious that many of these applicants are, as they stand, no more fit for War Service than is many a ragged. half-starved recruit fit, as he stands, to face the enemy in Flanders, and that 'maintenance under training,' together with suitable equipment, is as necessary in one case as in the other. Among the applicants for War Service are many who do not 'need' work, and surprise, and even resentment, has been expressed in some quarters that the Government should have thought it necessary to appeal to these when there are thousands of 'out of work' women and girls already registered at the Labour Exchanges in the ordinary way. It has, however, been clearly stated that in every case where application is made to a Labour Exchange for a woman worker, no use must be made of the War Service Register until it has been ascertained that there is no woman available on the ordinary list.

633 II/78

As a matter of fact, the publicity given to the whole question of the need for women's labour, and to the work of the Labour Exchanges, by this scheme of War Service, has resulted in an enormous increase of ordinary Labour Exchange work. During the month ending May 14th the placings showed an increase of 40 per cent. as compared with the corresponding month last year, and unquestionably the general extension of women's employment is largely responsible for this increase. It must be remembered, also, that War Service for Women is for the period of the war only, and that a woman who takes work now in place of a man or in an armament factory does so with the knowledge that her services will probably not be required after the conclusion of the war, and there will be less suffering and dislocation where the women taken on for War Service are not those ordinarily dependent upon themselves for a livelihood.

Very great interest was taken by women's societies generally in the scheme for War Service as soon as it was placed before the public. It was instantly seen that certain dangers were present, and that the scheme needed careful safeguarding. With a view of urging these safeguards, and also pressing certain suggestions, a Conference was held in April at the Board of Trade between the President and a large number of representatives of women's organizations. The general opinion expressed by those present was that they were anxious to do what they could to help the scheme forward, and it is indeed important—apart from patriotic reasons—that for the credit of women themselves Women's War Service should be a success, and a real strength to the country at this time. But there are precautions which must be observed, the most important being to see that advantage is not taken of this crisis and of the entry of new women workers into industry to lower the customary standard of life or of wages. The safest method of securing this is that every woman who undertakes War Service should join the appropriate Trade Union in the trade in which she is working, so that she may know she is helping to maintain the standard of living for the workers, and not to depress it. This insistence by women on equal wages for equal work is not, as some seem to imagine, something narrow and selfish, and slightly unpatriotic: it is, to look at it from one point of view only, the best service that women can render to the men who have gone to the war —to see to it that nothing is done in their absence which will make industrial conditions harder for them when they return.

633 II/7

Closely connected with the question of wages is that of training. Unskilled and untrained women can never demand a good wage; it is women's want of skill which is often made an excuse for their low wages, and their lack of skill is often due entirely to their lack of training. For some of the occupations for which women are asked to register it is clear that no previous training is possible: there is, for example, no way in which women can be trained to make armaments except by being set to work in an armament factory itself. But for farm and dairy and gardening work, for clerical work, and for some kinds of machine work, training can be obtained apart from the actual place in which the work is to be done. Such training needs to be organized, and girls and young women who have registered for War Service should be advised as to the best methods of obtaining it. Definite steps to provide training have so far only been taken in dairy and farm work. In this direction schemes of training have been undertaken by the Board of Trade, and are progressing satisfactorily. A short course lasting two or three weeks of instruction in dairy work and milking is given at various Agricultural Colleges and other centres; a grant of three pounds per head to cover the course of training is given by the Board of Agriculture to carefully selected students, and so far there has been no difficulty in placing out the women who have been trained. In some parts of the country, farmers, fearing a shortage of labour, are reducing their herds of cows, and it is obvious how disastrous this policy will be to the milk supply of the country. About one hundred women appear to have been already sent out under this scheme, and it is to be hoped that it will be greatly extended in the near future.

633 11/80

Other important matters to be borne in mind are the housing of the newly-employed women, and the conditions under which they work. As far as possible women trained for farm work are to be employed in their own counties so as to diminish the housing problem; in some places the women farm-hands can be taken as lodgers in cottages from which the menfolk have gone to the war. It is urged that in both town and country districts into which women workers are imported, committees of representative women should be appointed to supervise the housing conditions. It is also important to guard against overworking the women employees in factories, especially the younger women: a very startling case was recently reported in the press in which a girl worked for an engineering firm for twenty-five hours at a stretch, at the end of which time she met with an accident. Even in a time of stress it cannot be wise or economical so to overstrain those who will be the mothers of the next generation; and it cannot, indeed, be necessary in face of the fact that thousands of women have registered themselves for armament work, and have not yet been employed. The present would seem to be a particularly appropriate time for increasing the staff of women factory inspectors in view of the fact that the number of women factory employees is increasing, and the likelihood of overwork was never so great as it is now.

633 II/81

One great difficulty in the scheme for War Service for women will be the reluctance of employers to substitute the untried labour of women for the work of the men to whom they have grown accustomed. There may be lists of available and even suitable women at the Labour Exchanges, but this will not in itself effect the employment of women nor the release of men for military service. It is very important that the Government, if it intends this scheme to be a success, should give a strong lead to the country in this respect, and refrain from engaging men of military age to do work which could be done by women. The higher branches of the Civil Service especially still show a great reluctance to admit women who, with similar academic training to the men they would replace, would be willing to act as deputies for them until the end of the war.

One essential to the success of War Service for Women, which was urged by many of the members at the recent Conference at the Board of Trade, is that an Advisory Committee of women should be appointed to assist in the thorough organization of the scheme. Such a Committee should consist of women representing women's organizations, and also the various industries and professions in which women are asked to give War Service; it is certain that such a Committee would be an invaluable assistance in recruiting women for War Service, in sorting and sifting the applications, in arranging training schemes, and in supervising the conditions under which women and girls were employed. Mr. Runciman stated recently that many women's organizations had offered their co-operation in the scheme of War Service for Women, and that he hoped to make full use of these offers which he valued much; it is much to be desired that the Government should make at this time the fullest use of the organizing and administrative powers of experienced women.

There is one danger in this scheme which was not probably foreseen by the Government, and that is that girls should register in the expectation that an offer of work would immediately follow; as the weeks pass they become disappointed and perhaps slightly embittered as they realise how differently the applications of their brothers for 'War Service' of another kind are received by their country. But they still hope, and are tempted to wait on in idleness, not training definitely for some occupation, for they do not know how or where to train, or they cannot afford to pay for training, and possibly not making much effort to find ordinary employment because of the chance that some more romantic kind of War Service may be offered to them. It is fair to say that the Government made it quite clear at the outset that no work was promised, but at the same time the danger that hopes may be raised in vain is obvious. It could be prevented if arrangements were made, by such an Advisory Committee as has been suggested above, for applicants to be seen and advised as to what is the next step which they should take.

6551/82

A very considerable amount of displacement of men's labour by women is undoubtedly going on quite apart from the register of women for War Service. It is taking place in banks, offices, railways, shops, and factories of many kinds. Besides the actual displacement, large numbers of women are being employed on army work in making clothing and the munitions of war. Mr. Asquith lately commented on the thousands of girls and women he had seen engaged in making shells in the great engineering works in the north of England. Much of this new women's labour is of necessity temporary in character; in some cases the women will give place to the men when the latter return from the war; in other cases the work will cease with the cessation of the war. But there will result some changes in women's position in industry which will be permanent: women will prove their value in certain occupations in which they have previously had no opportunity of testing their powers, and they will not altogether lose their footing at the close of the war. It must be remembered, too, that the terrible loss of men now going on must increase the disproportion between the sexes in the future, and an even larger number of women than in the past must rely upon their own resources for a livelihood. And there is no doubt that even before the war there was the likelihood of a shortage of labour in the industry of agriculture and the profession of medicine. This shortage has been greatly intensified by the war, and the new opportunities for women's work in these two spheres will emphatically not be 'for the period of the war only.'

633 II/83

Those who have the opportunity of advising girls and young women at this time will do well to put these facts before them, and to insist on the importance of their doing all in their power to fit and prepare themselves for the new demands which the future will make upon them.

C. D. RACKHAM.

633 II/84

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN

II

IT is impossible at this moment to say what will be the result of the reorganization of labour which has been made necessary by the War, but the withdrawal of young men from industrial occupations to serve as soldiers and sailors must be made good either by a transference of male labour from trades not producing material of war or by an extension of female labour. Probably both sources will be drawn upon. It would be a mistake to suppose that the employment of women in the manufacture of munitions is a new thing. For many years past women and girls have been employed in the metal-work and engineering trades; the chain and nail makers of Cradley Heath have been much before the public eye, and I have seen women making nuts and bolts, screws, small arms, and tin-plates ever since I was a boy. In 1911 there were 25,076 girls and women employed in the iron and steel works of England and Wales; from 1901, their increase had been 19·4 per cent. compared to the 11·9 per cent. increase of males. In general engineering and machine-making, there were 4439 females compared to 1552 in 1901. Thousands and thousands of women are employed in the manufacture of rivets, gas-fittings, textile machinery fittings; and in 1911 nearly 13,000 females were actually at work in the making of machine tools. From 1901 to 1911, the increase of women employed in the manufacture of gas-fittings was 170·8 per cent., and men 145·1 per cent. In the making of tin-plate goods, women increased in numbers by 81·6 per cent., and men decreased by 10·5 per cent. In white-plated ware there was a decrease of men by 1·2 per cent., and an increase of women by 31·2 per cent. Even in brass-founding and finishing, men declined to the extent of 12·9 per cent. in contrast to the increase of women by 20·3 per cent.

633 II/85

The requirements of the War are greatly widening the scope of female employment, and carrying us more rapidly than we might have anticipated towards the ascendency of female labour, which has been the tendency in industrial occupations during the past half-century. Skill in male occupations has decreased as mechanical operations have increased. Nobody speaks of skill in the engineering trades as they once did. Automatic motions have superseded human intelligence. Years of hand-training are not now as necessary as formerly; in many instances, women can be as readily adapted to the work as men can. The proceedings of the Munitions Committee will remove most of the restrictions that have prevented females taking up the work in the past. The immediate future is full of possibilities for women workers. We are being told that these possibilities will only exist for the duration of the War. But I do not believe that: the world is changing in favour of industrial women.

As regards the manufacture of munitions, women can be adapted to the work to a far greater degree than most people would think. Now that trade union rules are suspended, we shall find that out. However, what we want to know at present is, to what length have the industrial occupations of females been extended, and to what extent departures have been made with regard to the employment of them. It is not possible to give even an approximate idea yet of the development in either one direction or the other. At the time of writing, the situation cannot be summed up. There is considerable talk about the extended employment of women in munition factories, but the work has not been organized. One can write of it, therefore, only in general terms. I have spoken on the subject to many presumably authoritative persons, but I have not been able to get any definite information; they have had no full realisation of what is taking place. By letter, I have approached

633 II/86

Government departments, but all the reply I have had up to now is that my questions are receiving attention.

I do know, however, that women are being employed in the manufacture of munitions in a way in which they have not been employed hitherto, and to a much greater extent in other occupations than has been the case heretofore. Take the making of military saddles and general leather requirements in the Midlands. It is difficult to secure the requisite number of women stitchers. For this work, women are being drawn from domestic service, and from general home service (as wives or daughters). Special training centres have been organized for them. When efficient, they can earn high wages on Government contracts. The earnings of female stitchers in the saddlery trade in ordinary times is calculated by the average, 11*s.* to 12*s.* 6*d.* a week; on war work, sharp female workers earn 20*s.*, 30*s.*, 35*s.*, and even over 40*s.* per week! The increase in female employment has been tremendous. The point is, what will happen when the War is over? How much of the increment of female employment in all trades will be permanent? I feel sure myself that much of it will be permanent. Even the shortage of male labour in industries not largely engaged in war contracts is increasing the use of female labour. In the cotton industry (always employing more females than males), women are taking up the work usually done exclusively, or almost exclusively, by men. We have women tramway conductors, railway porters, taxi-drivers, railway booking clerks, hotel porters, lift attendants, commissionaires, motor-van drivers, insurance clerks and canvassers; everywhere, women are replacing men in shops, offices, warehouses, schools, and factories.

The only official figures that seem to have been published regarding the war employment of women were quoted by Mr. Pretyman in the House of Commons on June 10th. He said that 78,946 women had then signified their willingness to be placed on the War Service Register. Of this number only 1816 had been utilised. But there can be no doubt that women are entering War Service in all parts of the country who have not registered—except, in some instances, through the Labour Exchanges. And many women on the War Service Register have been provided with employment since the middle of June. The returns of Labour Exchanges show that there has been a great increase in the number of women anxious to undertake industrial work during the present crisis. There was an increase of 39 per cent. in April, and of 10 per cent. in May. But women are securing employment through other sources. In some instances, women have travelled thirty and forty miles to seek work in munition factories in Lancashire. In works of this description, there are at present from 300 to 400 females in Manchester, about 500 in Sheffield, and several hundred in Barrow. The number is increasing daily, as the work of employment is better organized. In some cases the women work ordinary hours of labour, as well as overtime, whilst in centres like Barrow and Sheffield they are employed in three shifts of eight hours each per day. Their work is as exacting as that of the men. I do not hear of any of them being engaged in the actual turning of shells, as the shells now being manufactured are of the heavy and high-explosive type, and require strong men to handle them. For many years, however, women have manipulated lathes in engineering shops, which has given them the necessary training for 'turning' light shells. They are now making parts of shells, such as fuses, caps, and grub screws; they are also employed in testing fuses and in filling shells with ammunition, and in making small parts of guns and rifles, as well as a variety of chains for road transport waggons, now so extensively used for military purposes. Women are being put in sole control of special lathes and machines, and in many instances they are to be employed as assistants to skilled men.

There would appear to be no regularity in the way that women are being treated in the munitions works. The cry for equal wages with men is being responded to in some instances, but in other cases the earnings of the females fall much below those of males. There are a large number of women now doing what is called men's work in the great engineering and armament establishments in and around Sheffield. Many of the women are shell-polishing and shell-filling, and their wages vary from 8*s*. to 18*s*. per week. The variation arises from the difference in ages, in the length of training and in skill, though this is not true in all cases. A woman social worker of Sheffield tells me that not many of the women earn 18*s*. per week; the bulk of them come out at the week-end with 14*s*. to 16*s*. A bonus of 1*s*. per week is added if no time has been lost. But most of the women need no great inducement to maintain punctuality or speed. The fear is that some of them, in their fervour to be of practical service to their brothers and husbands in the trenches, may overstrain their physical endurance. The hours of labour at the chief munitions work are eight per day, inclusive of meal-time. The women work in three shifts. One batch begins at 6 a.m. and works till 2 p.m.; the next set commences at 2 and goes on till 10 o'clock; the night shift goes on at 10 o'clock and works till 6 o'clock in the morning.

633 II/88

At another large concern, women have been organized for performing the work of filing shells; it is a machine operation, and has been done recently by men. Here we have an instance of the power of organization upon the earnings and conditions of women workers. The women machine filers are accustomed to metal work, and have been previously employed in a cheaper process than that they are now carrying out. However, as a result of having been fairly well organized, they have been successful in commanding men's wages for what they now call men's work. Of course, this is not the only instance by any means where women in connection with war emergency labour are paid at the same rates as men. There are a few female tram-conductors in Sheffield employed at men's rates; this is also true of Salford, which was the first municipality to make the departure of training female tram-guards. However, the authoritative information I have before me shows that several engineering firms in the busy steel and iron city of Sheffield are now making use of women for the filing, polishing, and filling of shells, and the number of female munition employées is being extended from day to day. Their interests are being looked after by male trade-unionists and female social workers. Public discussion has already had the good effect of improving labour conditions which, in the first place, were not satisfactory.

633 II. /89

There seems to be no hope of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers admitting women as members, although the men are inclined to demand for the women rates of pay equal to those of males doing the same class of work. According to statements made at a meeting in Manchester, this is to be the rule. Perhaps it would be as well to record here the remarks of Captain Williams, of the Board of Trade, in respect to the work which women are expected to do, and the terms on which they are to be employed. He said that > at present there was a serious shortage of labour in certain trades that were vital for the proper prosecution of the War. It was a situation in which women could undoubtedly play a very large part. The first step necessary was to get a register of all women who were able and willing to undertake some sort of service. Women were wanted for two purposes—to release men who could go to fight and to augment certain classes of male labour. 'Let me say at once,' said Captain Williams, 'the underlying principle is that women should get equal pay with men for equal results. The intention is not to engage a cheap substitute for men's labour.' (Cheers.) Speaking about the kinds of work open to women, Captain Williams said they might be engaged on the actual work of armament production—testing fuses and making shells, for example—or they might be engaged in making uniforms, the leather work for equipment, &c. Then there was work in connection with the food supply, for there was a great shortage of dairy workers, &c. These were cases in which women's work would supplement men's. Then there were the cases in which women's labour could replace men's—as clerks in banks or on the railways, as shop assistants, school attendance officers, wire workers, railway carriage cleaners, light porters, telegraph messengers, and in some parts of the textile industries. In order that women might follow these occupations competently, training schools had been established in various parts of the country, and Lord and Lady Derby had offered to receive pupils on their home farm.

633 II/90

It is to be hoped that the standard of equal pay set by Captain Williams will be adopted. But that has not been the case so far ; nor will it be unless the cause of the women munition workers is taken up by some influential organization. There are unions which the women could join, such as the General Labourers' Union, or the Women's Trade Union League. That their interests should be safeguarded is shown by the tendency to start female munition workers on cheap rates of pay. This was so at Sheffield at first, but I understand that there is now an arrangement to pay wages at the rate of sixpence per hour to women who have proved themselves efficient. There ought to be no attempt to exploit females engaged in munition production. But I have before me the case of a girl, aged seventeen years, who was employed at an ordnance factory in the Midlands. She began war work at the rate of twopence per hour, with a small bonus in addition. The practice at this particular works was two shifts per day for females. One week, they began work at 6 a.m., and finished at 6 p.m. ; next week, work commenced at 6 p.m., and finished at 6 a.m. Those on night shift start the week at 6 p.m. on Sundays. It will be seen that the Factory Act, as it affects women, has been thrown altogether aside. A woman employed in this ordnance works told me that some of the women made good wages and some bad wages. Many of our women workers are being over-worked for war purposes. I have heard it stated that women working overtime are not making the same wages they can earn on the shorter hours. Why ? They are too exhausted to maintain their usual capacity and quality of production. There is no sense in this. Nor is there much sense in urging women to go into munition factories without inquiring into the conditions of labour. I learn that women are being persuaded to take up industrial work, and pay no heed whatever to the pay or hours of labour, but to think only of serving the country during a grave national crisis. That is all very well in a way. But in the anxiety to perform a service to the country, women need not necessarily do a disservice to their own sex, or to the male workers of the nation. They should first of all demand payment equal to that of men for the same quality and quantity of work. I believe that the men would be willing to help the women to secure a universal minimum wage high enough to provide a decent income for all females who take up ammunition work.

633 H/91

When the men come back from the war, their sisters who have taken their industrial places will withdraw from them. But all the men will not come back. And, whether they come back or not, a fair percentage of the changes now taking place will be permanent. Female secretaries of trade unions are sure of that. There is an idea abroad that what is now occurring will give a new impetus to female industrial labour. Women will prove their industrial (and professional) adaptability, and realise that through their growing industrial power they may obtain social and political privileges that have been denied to them heretofore. The War will create many new conditions in life, and not the least of these will arise from the demonstration of women's practical ability in connection with the real work of the world.

A very useful investigation is being made by the Manchester, Salford, and District Women's War Interests Committee. This Committee has instituted an inquiry to discover to what extent, and under what conditions, women are replacing men in industry; also, what is the attitude of trade unions to this replacement, and whether it is likely to be permanent. These are some of the questions being asked: Has employment of women in your trade increased owing to the War? Have women been introduced into work hitherto only done by men? Are they doing the same work as men they have replaced, or have conditions or processes been adjusted to suit them? Do you think the women are likely to be permanently employed in your trade where they were not employed before the War? And so on. There are questions asked about married women, and about wages. There are also questions about the trade-unionism of women, one being: Does your union propose to accept women as members, or are they catered for by any other union? It would puzzle the wit of man to answer some of these queries accurately. No one can yet say what will be the place of women in the industrial world after the War. I am positive myself that the outlook of the women will be very much widened. What this may mean both to women and men is a matter that could be discussed later on. But it will force problems upon us that will call for the experience and judgment of women in a way that we have not realised in the past. Women and men will be working side by side more than they have been doing even hitherto, and they should be found marching side by side towards the social, economic, and political achievements essential to each other's welfare.

633 II/92

JAMES HASLAM.

663 II/93

663

Glasgow Record,

September 18th 1915.

WOMEN WILLING FOR WAR WORK.

THOUSANDS WAITING TO BE EMPLOYED.

LACK OF MACHINERY.

Mr. Asquith's statement in the House of Commons that "if women will step in . . . we ought to make, and I believe we shall make, a gigantic, and at the same time a rapid, stride in the solution of one of our most pressing problems," has raised the question—What more can women do than they are already doing to increase our output of munitions?

Inquiries seem to show that women have already "stepped in" in immense numbers, and that the "if" now applies only to the Government's ability to employ them.

Miss Strachey, speaking for the London Society of Women's Suffrage, who are devoting the whole of their energies to this question of war work for women, said that every statement such as that made by the Premier brings a vast number of offers of service.

Many letters run on these lines: "I see that at last the Government has really decided to employ women, as they said they would. I am coming up to London at once and have already taken rooms. Please let me know by return exactly how I can help."

WAITING FOR MACHINERY.

The only advice that can be given to such inquiries is that they must put down their names at a Labour Exchange and then wait. It may also be wise to inform them that unskilled female labour is often paid for at the rate of 3d an hour, and that under war conditions the working hours may run to 12 in the day. Does the volunteer think that her physique will stand the strain?

"So far," said Miss Strachey, "the Government has got the women, both unskilled and semi-skilled; but it has not got the machinery for dealing with them. We are waiting patiently for it to be treated."

Very similar views were expressed by Miss Mary Macarthur, the women's Labour leader.

"I have no hesitation in declaring," said Miss Macarthur, "that there is an abundance of unskilled women who are eager to do munitions work, but many thousands more skilled workers are needed to direct and control them. There may be local shortages of women workers, but there is certainly no national shortage.

"One of the things that are standing in the way of the employment of women is the reluctance of employers to lose a temporary advantage in the fulfilment of contracts by taking skilled men off a job in order that they may superintend the work of unskilled women. Of course, it would pay them in the long run, but they are short-sighted."

THE UNION QUESTION.

The matter of war wages for women is a difficult problem, with which the Women's Trade Union League, of which Miss Macarthur is secretary, is attempting to deal. Can women be freely used to take the place of men without lowering the standard of life of the men they replace?

Only, in the view of the League, if women are guaranteed a minimum wage from the commencement. With this end in view, an agreement has been entered into with the Amalgamated Society of Engineers to press for a starting wage in engineering shops of 20s a week, the wage to be raised to the sum a man would receive for the same work as soon as the woman is efficient.

"There is no opposition on the part of the unions to the introduction of female labour, whatever individual members may think," Miss Macarthur stated; "but it is essential that women should not be used to cut down the labour bill. The Government must see to that."

The Observer,

Sept. 19th 1915.

"YOUNG WOMEN SLACKERS."

Dear Sir,—I venture to point out, in reply to Mr. Samson Clark's letter on this subject in your issue of yesterday's date, that, assuming that it is right to apply the term "Slacker" to anybody, it should certainly not be applied to the women of this country. In his last paragraph, Mr. Clark suggests in general that able young women exist who are doing nothing. That is true, but it is only just to say that everything has been done by public and semi-public authorities to discourage the women who have come forward. You will recall that in the early part of this year a war register was opened for women; that they were asked to state what work they could do—armament, agricultural, etc., 33,000 put down their names at once, and by June the total had reached 70,000. War work was found for 3,000, and 25,000 were so disgusted that they took their names off the books. It, therefore, follows that the services of 67,000 women were found unnecessary, or, alternatively, that 67,000 women out of 70,000 were considered incompetent. The latter is an absurd suggestion, and I venture to conclude that the women have not been used because the authorities did not know how to use them, and not because they did not put themselves forward.

But Mr. Clark refers more particularly to the demand for women in business, and suggests that they are not coming forward as they should. This surprises me, as there has been of late years a great rush of women into business, a rush not likely to decrease when more posts are open. But it may very well be that women have not come forward as they should, and I would venture to suggest that this is largely due to employers having made up their minds to sweat the women-workers. The Government has, indeed, undertaken to pay women the same wages as men for the same work, but it has declared itself in the House of Commons powerless to impose this equitable condition upon its contractors. As there is such a thing as a fair wage clause which can be inserted in Government contracts I conclude that the Government has not the wish to impose fair wages in the case of women.

In occupations unconnected with the Government the same crying evil exists; in the face of rising prices the wages of women have been cut, and there is at least one case within my knowledge of a firm who has replaced its enlisted liftmen by women. It paid the men 23s. a week; it pays the girls 15s. I think, Sir, that a condition such as this should go a long way towards explaining why women do not make a rush for commercial firms (assuming that they do not), and I submit that this state of things should be provocative of masculine blushes rather than of masculine censure.

Yours truly,

W. L. George.

3, Pembridge-crescent, W., Sept. 13, 1915.

P.S.—After writing this letter I am informed by my secretary that a friend of hers, an educated woman, who wished to relieve a ticket-collector, was told that she "needed influence" to obtain the job.

Sir,—With all due deference to your correspondent, Mr. Samson Clark, I challenge absolutely the general accuracy or correctness of the statement that "businesses are being sorely handicapped for want of labour." There is plenty of available labour wherever and whenever reasonable remuneration is offered. There are people engaged in business, who regard a time of war as an "honest and lawful" opportunity for the exploitation of labour, and it is from such that one hears so much about "labour shortage." My name and address are herewith, and you are at liberty to supply the same to Mr. Samson Clark should he desire them.

Respectfully yours,

G. L. B.

Sept. 13, 1915.

3.

The Times, September 22nd. 1915.

THE EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.

Mr. RUNCIMAN (Dewsbury), replying to SIR C. KINLOCH-COOKE (Devonport, U.), said:—The total number of women whose names had been entered on the War Service Register up to September 10 was 110,714. This, however, included a large number whose offers of service were ineffective for various reasons, and the total number of effective entries on September 10 was 59,214. Employment had been found for 5,511 of those registered. In addition to these, employment had been found for, roughly, 145,000 women from the ordinary register.

Cornish Post. 21.10.15.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

MEETING OF THE CORNISH COMMITTEE.

MR. W. HAWK AND THE WORK IN VIEW.

A meeting of Lady Valletort's Committee on War Service for Women was held at Truro on Wednesday, when, in the absence of her ladyship through indisposition, the chair was occupied by Ingeborg, Lady Molesworth St. Aubyn.

Reference was made by the Chairman to the great loss which many Cornish families had suffered in the coufse of the war. Their sympathy would go out to their vice-president, Lady Margaret Boscawen, in the death of her son-in-law, Lord Petre.—It was decided to send a vote of sympathy to Lady Margaret Boscawen.

The Chairman said that war service organisation provided workers for munition factories, hospitals, etc., and it provided training for those who were unable to fight to take the many vacant posts that were open owing to the war, thereby keeping the business of the country going.

Mr. W. Hawk said attention should be directed to showing how they could replace men by women or boys. That was really the great work they had in view not only in rural, but in the urban districts as well. Their registration should be of such a nature that if they went to a farm of elsewhere, and asked that another eligible should be released, they might be in a position to say they had a woman or boy ready as a substitute. The men had to be obtained, and it was their obvious duty to prepare for the inevitable. Men must be taken from the land and from the town, whether they liked it or not, and they hoped that the needs would be met by voluntary effort.

Mr. Hawk, in a reference to cheese-making, said it was the very strong desire of the Government that cheese-making should be carried on as far as practicable. A circular had recently been sent down from the Government, in which they were asked as far as possible to drop butter-making for cheese-making. The reason was that, should there be a great scarcity of food, which they hoped and believed would not be the case, cheese and potatoes would make an excellent food upon which people could live for a very long time. It was impossible for the nation to jump hastily from butter to cheese-making. They must have people who could make cheese, so that in case of emergency they could go out as teachers of cheese-making.

Miss Deane, of the Board of Trade, said the progress of the work in the county had been splendid and was most encouraging.

Mrs. Pendarves said the county had been divided into districts as working depots, to which the different Red Cross Societies sent their work. The articles were sent up either to the headquarters of the Red Cross Society or to the hospitals at Plymouth. Some things had, of course, been sent to the county regiment.

Miss Deane said Lord Mount Edgcumbe was prepared to form a County Association to join all the working societies together, but he first wanted information concerning them.

On the suggestion of Lady Valletort, a small executive committee was appointed to deal with matters connected with war service work.

Mrs. Kingsley Tarney, chairman of the Central Committee of Toy Industries, Ltd., gave an address, in which she referred to the importance of additional interest being devoted to toy-making.

663.

663/1/94

Daily Mail, 22.10.15.

15,000 WOMEN WAR ENGINEERS.

Women on the War Service Register on October 8 (exclusive of those whose offers of service were ineffective for various reasons) numbered 58,735, distributed as follows under the trades in which they desired to give their services:

Trade.	No.	Trade.	No.
Engineering	15,412	Conveyance	4,336
Dress	3,664	Professional	2,724
Agriculture	5,632	Commercial	7,471
Chemicals	767	Shop assistants ...	2,386
Food	476	All others.....	13,771
Domestic	2,096

Those placed in employment up to October 8 from the War Service Register numbered 6,175, exclusive of those placed in employment from the ordinary registers of the Labour Exchanges.

The Common Cause.
Sept 24 1915

WOMEN IN THE WORKSHOP.

The following letter was sent to the Prime Minister and to the Press :—

September 16th, 1915.

SIR,—The Executive Committee of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies feels that it cannot allow the Prime Minister's speech of last night to pass without comment.

He said that at this moment if the women of this country would step in, and if no hindrance were put in their way either by the employers or by the men, the country would make gigantic and rapid strides.

All the Societies which represent and direct great numbers of women know well how passionate and widespread is their desire to help in any way possible, and how many times they have already stepped forward, and how constantly their offers of service have been ignored or refused. It is not women who are lacking, but work for the women to do.

The Prime Minister's words will raise anew the hopes of thousands that their repeated offers will at last be utilised. Once before, when the War Register was first started, women came forward in great numbers to answer the Government's call only to find that registration led to nothing further, and that the Government had no prepared or practical scheme for placing the labour it had called for.

If now again Mr. Asquith is summoning women to the workshops, let him see to it that some properly organised scheme is prepared, so that they may know how to get the work and how to prepare for it.

We have constantly urged since the outbreak of the war that this matter should receive the serious consideration of the Government; we have urged the formation of Advisory Committees, and the drafting of training schemes, and the crying need for attention to this all important subject. We wish to urge it now once again.

Signed on behalf of the Executive Committee of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies.

EVELYN M. L. ATKINSON, Honorary Secretary.
RAY STRACHEY, Honorary Parliamentary Secretary.

Daily News & Leader.

14. 12. 15.

"MIDDLE-CLASS WOMEN IN FACTORIES."

(To the Editor.)

Sir,—I read Miss MacArthur's "Word of Friendly Counsel" with much interest. But I want to add something to what she has so admirably said about the way in which one can "fully learn what the life and labour of the average working-girl are like."

When the middle-class woman has finished her 12 hours' shift in a munition factory she goes home to a comfortable house, and if she has been on a night shift, to a comfortable, aired bed in a quiet bedroom.

When the working-girl comes back in the early morning she finds in most cases an unaired bed, which the day-worker has only just left—for in houses containing three very small bedrooms (sometimes only two), with families of seven, eight, or nine persons in them, there is no room for single beds—and in a close, stuffy room. If the window is kept open the street smells, all worse since so many street-sweepers have enlisted, and the smells from factories fill the room, and the continual noise outside, the ceaseless crying of someone's baby somewhere near, the jolting of heavy lorries and waggons, the monotonous cries of the street sellers with little rattling carts, the perpetual sound of machinery, all these noises hinder sleep. Besides, the girl must, more often than not, help in the house work as well as sleep.

Hundreds of streets in one Yorkshire city, now making munitions, consist entirely of back-to-back houses. If anyone really wishes to understand industrial life, and be one with the workers, and not merely an outsider, they must sleep in a back-to-back house. They will never forget the haunting smell of closeness, nor how every sound in the house is heard everywhere in it. There is no quiet and no privacy possible in such dwellings.

As for the food—when tea has to be bought in small quantities it has an entirely different taste from tea bought in large quantities in a middle-class house. The milk!—well, one wonders what it is made of! But the well-to-do woman will seldom, if ever, experience these things; for if she goes into these houses she will be given the best of everything (only the poor understand the highest courtesy, I sometimes think), and a wall of politeness will cut her off from obtaining this priceless valuable knowledge. Unless she goes feeling within her that there is not one shadow of difference between her and her hosts, except that they know infinitely more about life and its teachings than she has ever known, and perhaps ever will know; and that they often in ordinary daily life have to rise, and do rise, to heights of courage, devotion, and self-sacrifice that she in her prosperous sheltered home may never realise or understand in the least. Then they will treat her as a friend and comrade.

But these things must be seen from the inside.

ISABELLA O. FORD.

Dec. 13.

Daily Telegraph.
15. I. 16.

WOMEN'S SERVICE BUREAU.

SIR—The extremely interesting article you published to-day on the organisation of the country's resources emphasises the great need there is for a central bureau to direct the mass of persons who wish that their services may be made use of into the proper channels.

May I draw the attention of your readers to the fact that such a bureau for directing the applications of women for war service is now in existence at 58, Victoria-street, and has been in full working order since August, 1914? Its services have been utilised by over 6,000 applicants (the larger number of whom have been personally interviewed), mostly educated women, and those who do not readily apply to the Labour Exchanges for the posts they are anxious to fill. The Women's Service Bureau has been made use of in various directions by different Government departments. Large numbers of applicants for salaried posts are continually put in touch with those who need competent workers.

Many hundreds are interviewed weekly at our offices, and employers seeking suitable women to replace men called to the colours and capable women requiring information with regard to war service cannot do better than make application at 58, Victoria-street, between the hours of eleven and four.—I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

P. STRACHEY.

Women's Service, 58, Victoria-street, Westminster, S.W., Jan. 14.

Daily News & Leader
24-5-16.

TOO OLD AT 40.

The Cry of the Middle-aged Woman Worker.

To the Editor of "The Daily News."

Sir,—I fully endorse "An Old Fogey's" letter with reference to the treatment of middle-aged women in their vain search for employment at this crisis, when the whole Press of the country is calling out for women workers.

I am a victim. I am very capable, all-round, with perhaps the exception of typewriting and shorthand; quite healthy and energetic. I have tried unsuccessfully for over a year at more than one Labour Exchange; went through the farce of going before the Civil Service "Commission," only to be turned down, although at the time, before the time and since the time, incompetent people (younger), with scarcely a qualification and no experience were freely taken, and are still being taken.

Apart from qualifications which I feel I possess, I think my case would commend itself for even other reasons. As the mother of two sons who have joined the Army (the remaining two, in all probability, will be called on to go within a couple of months), I have been absolutely dependent for many years on their small salaries. What is to happen to those placed as I am? That I am only one of many is certain. There is no one less cared-for than the middle-aged or elderly educated woman; there is no place on this earth for her—the woman of small or no means, through no fault of her own.

MIDDLE-AGED.

The Age Limit.

Sir,—It is deplorable and most disheartening to the woman of forty to be seeking employment. An educated woman usually spends the first twenty years of her life preparing for her work and the next fifteen or twenty gaining experience; and just when her observation and capacity should have rendered her valuable, she finds she is too old.

A couple of weeks ago a woman of rich experience and character, a born leader and organiser among girls, applied to the Labour Bureau for Government work. She was told that no applications were accepted where the applicants were over thirty-five. She is the principal breadwinner in the home since the only son and brother has gone to the front. Does experience and character go for nothing? Such a woman would be invaluable in any industry where the welfare of girls is considered, and sympathy, tact and firmness required. I know another of thirty-six.

Why need there be an age limit? Should not the age for employment vary to the question of an old age pension, which [illegible]

Morning Post.
14.2.16.

WORKS OF RELIEF.

THE QUEEN'S FUND.

The Queen's Work for Women Fund has now reached a total of £168,436. Recent subscriptions include: Miss Stancomb Wills (monthly donation), £50; contribution sent through Mr. Harold Begbie's "Queen's Net" Fund (further instalment), £37 5s.

The Cry of the Middle-aged Woman Worker.

To the Editor of "The Daily News."

Sir,—I fully endorse "An Old Fogey's" letter with reference to the treatment of middle-aged women in their vain search for employment at this crisis, when the whole Press of the country is calling out for women workers.

I am a victim. I am very capable, all-round, with perhaps the exception of typewriting and shorthand; quite healthy and energetic. I have tried unsuccessfully for over a year at more than one Labour Exchange; went through the farce of going before the Civil Service "Commission," only to be turned down, although at the time, before the time and since the time, incompetent people (younger), with scarcely a qualification and no experience were freely taken, and are still being taken.

Apart from qualifications which I feel I possess, I think my case would commend itself for even other reasons. As the mother of two sons who have joined the Army (the remaining two, in all probability, will be called on to go within a couple of months), I have been absolutely dependent for many years on their small salaries. What is to happen to those placed as I am? That I am only one of many is certain. There is no one less cared-for than the middle-aged or elderly educated woman; there is no place on this earth for her—the woman of small or no means, through no fault of her own.

MIDDLE-AGED.

The Age Limit.

Sir,—It is deplorable and most disheartening to the woman of forty to be seeking employment. An educated woman usually spends the first twenty years of her life preparing for her work and the next fifteen or twenty gaining experience; and just when her observation and capacity should have rendered her valuable, she finds she is too old.

A couple of weeks ago a woman of rich experience and character, a born leader and organiser among girls, applied to the Labour Bureau for Government work. She was told that no applications were accepted where the applicants were over thirty-five. She is the principal breadwinner in the home since the only son and brother has gone to the front. Does experience and character go for nothing? Such a woman would be invaluable in any industry where the welfare of girls is considered, and sympathy, tact and firmness required. I know another of thirty-six.

Why need there be an age limit? Should not the age for Government work be the reception of an old age pension? Unfortunately, between that time and forty, if one wishes to live, one must work.

A MINISTER'S WIFE.

The Fallacy of Age Selection.

Sir,—I can endorse the letter of your correspondent as to the difficulty found by women of 40 in obtaining employment. I can quote the case of an experienced and highly-qualified nurse who, even with the present demand for skilled nurses, experienced great difficulty in obtaining a post owing to her age being just over 40.

Youth has its advantages in vigour and enthusiasm, but its grave disadvantages in lack of experience and sympathy. The administrative work of all conditions of life must always be done by men and women of mature brain. Nothing is more erroneous than the age method of selection. The truth of this meets us on every side when we see hale and vigorous men of 45 to 50 debarred from taking an active part in the war.

It is a well-known fact that nations mature at different rates; but it still has to be realised that individuals do so also. One man or woman of 40 may in physical and mental development be at the same stage as another of 30; while an individual of 50 who has lived an outdoor, healthy life may compare favourably with another ten years his junior.

Surely some physical test can be found which will do away with this fallacious method of classification.

M. JANE REANEY, B.Sc.

Morning Post
14.2.16

WORKS OF RELIEF.

THE QUEEN'S FUND.

The Queen's Work for Women Fund has now reached a total of £168,436. Recent subscriptions include: Miss Stancomb Wills (monthly donation), £50; contribution sent through Mr. Harold Begbie's "Queen's Net" Fund (further instalment), £37 5s.

Manchester Guardian
21·2·16

Miss Violet Markham, in the Women's Trade Union Review, insists on the desirability of properly organising women's work in the war. "It is clear to-day," she writes, "that if the war is to be won, women will have to play an unprecedented part in industry by setting free men in various directions—not only for service in the field, but for expediting the manufacture of munitions of war too heavy for women personally to undertake." National organisation will be necessary if full advantage is to be taken of the ability of the women, and that organisation must safeguard the conditions under which women toil. The workers themselves must keep a tight hand upon all the arrangements made. For ourselves we agree both with the necessity of utilising women and the wisdom of doing so on lines which will not lead to vast industrial disturbance after the war. The chief contribution to the strength of Germany to-day we believe to lie in the fact that it is making far more use of its women in industry, and if we in this country are to release large numbers of men beyond those already taken for the war, the only way is to call upon the women for work they have not hitherto undertaken.

Edinburgh Evening News

THE INDUSTRIAL BOADICEA.

HOW WOMEN ARE EMPLOYED.

(BY J. M. HOGGE, M.P.)

Parliament rose on Tuesday, the 16th. On Thursday, the 18th, the Board of Trade issued a scheme to organise women labour. It certainly strikes one as very cavalier treatment of the House of Commons to launch so far-reaching a scheme without any intimation, for it cannot be pretended that the Government made up its mind between the Tuesday and the Thursday. But let that pass. We are growing hardened to the despotism of the Cabinet and its arbitrary methods.

Coming Into Her Own.

Boadicea is coming into her own. The monument on the Embankment facing the House of Commons represents her in a chariot charging Westminster. The figure has at length, like Galatea, come to life, and she has driven her chariot through the prejudices of years right up to the counters of Labour Exchanges. Up to now, save for the Women's Co-operative movement and later the Suffragist and Suffragette movements, women have been strangely silent as a class.

They have been roped in in census returns. The census for 1911 shows that above the age of 10 there are

5,854,036	women engaged in occupations for gain in England and Wales.
593,210	in Scotland.
430,092	in Ireland.
6,877,338

One-Sixth of the Population.

Roughly, that is one-sixth of the entire population. It is possible to arrive at an approximate idea of their occupations. They divide themselves in three classes: Head, Hand workers, and Domestic Servants.

Taking Head workers first we find that in England and Wales in 1911 there were:

Teachers	211,183
Local Government	176,450
Medical (including Nursing) ...	87,699
Art, Music, Drama	49,998
National Government...	34,089
	559,419

The Hand workers are the largest separate class:

Cotton Manufacture	372,834
Dressmaking	333,129
Laundry	167,052
Wool and Worsted	127,637
Tailoring	127,527
Drapery	110,955
Metal Trades	101,050
Agriculture	94,841
Printing and Allied Trades ...	87,609
Grocery	58,935
Boots and Shoes	45,986
	1,627,555

Domestic and kindred occupations are made up of:

Indoor Servants	1,260,673
Charwomen	126,061
Hotels, Inns, &c	110,506
	1,497,240

The above classification accounts for nearly two-thirds of the whole, and gives a general conspectus of women's field of industry.

Women's Average Earnings.

Mr Sidney Webb, of the Fabian Society, has estimated women's earnings for the year 1912. Here are his conclusions in tabular form:

Women in situations:

Below 12s.	1,000,000	average earnings, say,	9s 0d
12s to 15s.	1,500,000	" "	13s 0d
Over 15s.	500,000	" "	17s 0d
Casuals.	100,000	" "	5s 6d
Girls.	1,000,000	" "	7s 6d
	4,000,000

On these premises we obtain an average weekly wages bill of £2,400,000, or yearly £124,800,000.

Mr Webb in his totals allows for five weeks' [illegible]

Women in situations:

Below 12s,	1,000,000	average earnings,	say,	9s 0d
12s to 15s,	1,500,000	,,	,,	13s 0d
Over 15s,	500,000	,,	,,	17s 0d
Casuals,	100,000	,,	,,	3s 6d
Girls,	1,500,000	,,	,,	7s 6d
	4,600,000

On those premises we obtain an average weekly wages bill of £2,430,000, or yearly £126,360,000. Mr Webb in his totals allows for five weeks short time, sickness, involuntary holidays, and unemployment. This would knock off £12,000,000, and on this total the average wage of adult women would be 10s 10½d per week, not a princely total.

The Number Married.

So much for the women classified in the census as above. But observe that in 1911 there were 23,273,782 females counted. I have not the figures for marriage for the whole country handy, but out of 34,043,076 persons in England, 13,126,070 were returned as married. On that basis there must be 17 millions for the United Kingdom. That is to say, there are roughly 8,500,000 married women in the United Kingdom. There are 23,273,282 females, which leaves 15 millions unmarried women and female children. Of those two-fifths are probably under 10 years of age, which leaves nine millions as possible workers on the basis of "above the age of 10."

(I am not to be taken as advocating that any girl of 10 should be called upon to work. I am only taking the census division because I must.) The census got information from 6,877,338 of those, leaving 2,000,000 unaccounted for, so far as any specific task was undertaken by them. The figures, it must be borne in mind, are subject to such deductions as must be made for married women. Also recorded as "occupied for gain," e.g. in Lancashire towns, or towns like Galashiels, Hawick, etc., which would increase the total number of women workers available.

Seeing Where We Are.

Now we can see where we are. The Board of Trade's appeal is made to something like 9,000,000 women, of whom probably 1,000,000 are unemployed or under-employed at the moment, and one and a half to two millions have never done any particular work. That is a minimum of 2,500,000, or, if we make an allowance for age at both ends of the scale, of 1,000,000, a minimum of 1,500,000 women who could, if need be, be organised for industrial needs.

The Board of Trade is asking particularly for:

Farm work.
Dairy work.
Leather stitching.
Brush-making.
Clothing machining.
Light machining for armaments.

They want agricultural help and industrial help. Probably among domestic servants there is plenty material already familiar with the first, and some readjustments are all that are necessary in that case. For both classes, however, apparently the Board of Trade contemplates training workers.

Maintenance During Training.

If they do, it is to be hoped that they will deal with unemployed women before piling up a big list at the Exchanges. Training, with maintenance while training, is the best expedient for unemployment. The provision of technical education in this country for girls is practically negligible. It is a trifle ironical that we require a war for life to teach us how to conduct one of living. But the occasion has arisen. It ought not to be either lost or misused. By that, I mean, don't let us have a rush of people who want something to do or who feel that they ought to offer. Let all women who have no need to work stand absolutely aside and allow those whom the war has thrown into unemployment or under-employment get the first chance of being trained. By all means register in the ranks of those who will serve if called upon, but primarily let the woman who must earn get on her way first.

All this organisation of men and guns, women and machines, is reshaping old ideas, uprooting prejudices, breaking down class distinctions. The German Emperor has done us that signal service. From a supposed decadent nation to factories run by women to allow men to fight in eight months' time is good business for us, but bad, and, I hope, still worse than bad, for the Kaiser.

War Emergency Workers' National Ctee 663
Caxton Hall. Conference. 16 Ap. 15.

663a/1

Globe. 16 Ap. 15.

WOMEN'S WAR WORK.

PLAIN SPEAKING AT NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

FORCING CONSCRIPTION.

A large number of societies interested in women's work were represented at a conference held at Caxton Hall to-day, to discuss the question of war service for women. The conference was under the auspices of the War Emergency Workers National Committee.

Miss Mary Macarthur, who presided, said the committee responsible for calling the conference, represented through its delegates between four and five million workers, men and women. When the Government appeal to women was first issued, some of them were rather at a loss to understand the reason of it. Some of them had at that time been organising plans for dealing with unemployment among women, and they knew that many thousands of women, who were normal wage earners, were unemployed throughout the country at the time the appeal was issued.

Between 30,000 and 40,000 women and girls were on registers of the labour exchanges alone, and a large number were on half-time. They knew also that the armament factories, instead of complaining of a shortage of women labour, stated that there was no scarcity whatever. A personal investigation proved this to be the case. Since the Government appeal had been made, however, Mr. Runciman had announced that the need for women was more protective than immediate. It was one thing for women to fill the places of men who had voluntarily enlisted for service, but it was quite another thing for them to allow themselves to be used as instruments to force economic conscription upon men.

It was essential that safeguards should be laid down to prevent women being used as instruments to degrade the general standard of living.

"If women were to accept the advice freely given and work for nothing or without conditions for this national emergency," concluded Miss Macarthur, "they would be assisting not the country; they would be helping the profit-making interests which have already, in many cases, so shamefully exploited the national emergency."

Eastern Daily Press 17 Ap. 15.

The attitude of the conference of representatives of women's industrial and political organisations at Caxton Hall to-day may be summed up in regard to the employment of women in emergency work during the war in the succinct phrase used by Dr. Marion Phillips, that "if the nation requires the women's work it must see that that work is carried out under conditions which will do as little harm as possible to the women." There were many effective and convincing speeches in support of the various resolutions, Miss Margaret Bondfield urging with eloquence and with vigour the broad demand that no emergency action should be allowed unnecessarily to depress the standard of living or of working conditions. An official resolution, calling upon the Government for a definite assurance that at the earliest possible moment the long-overdue reform of universal suffrage will be dealt with, produced several amendments, one of them, urged with considerable warmth, calling specifically for women's suffrage. Miss Mary MacArthur wisely guided the conference along the lines for which it was called, however, and the majority were content to limit their detailed demands to the industrial field. "At least," remarked Miss Sylvia Pankhurst with caustic air, "seeing that the reformers of 1832 talked universal suffrage, we can scarcely be called revolutionary."

Newcastle Chronicle. 17 Ap. 15.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.

A Fair Field and No Favour.

A conference of the Workers National Committee was held, yesterday, at Caxton Hall, Westminster, to consider the question of the employment of women arising out of the necessities of the war.

Miss Mary MacArthur, who presided, said men had never objected to the employment of women on equal terms. What they did object to was the employment of women for the cheapening of labour. She felt sure no woman worthy of the name would lend herself to such an object. What they wanted for women was a fair field and no favour, but women would not allow themselves to be sacrificed for the exploitation of the employers. This was a time, not for the consideration of petty differences, but for the putting aside all such differences for the common good.

Miss Margaret Bonfield moved the first resolution, which urged that all women who register for war service should join the appropriate trade union for which she is volunteering, and that where a woman is doing the same work as a man she should receive equal pay. The resolution further advocated that in no case should a woman be employed at less than a living wage, and that sweating conditions must at all costs be avoided. The resolution demanded further that preference in employment should be given to the normal woman wage earner. The final clause of the resolution advocated that priority of employment should be given to workmen whose places had been filled by women.

The resolution, in a slightly altered form, after considerable discussion, was adopted.

The afternoon session was devoted to the consideration of other resolutions, dealing with the various aspect of women's work and the war.

The resolutions passed insisted upon the Government recognising the important part now being played by women in the output of Government work, and insisting upon a due recognition of women as trade union workers.

A further resolution called upon the Government to recognise full rights of citizenship demanded by women by granting them equal electoral rights with men at the earliest moment

A War Emergency Workers National Committee. 663. A.
Conference. Caxton Hall. 16 ap. 15.

Daily News. 17 ap. 15.

WOMEN WORKERS IN WAR TIME.

Conference Demands Pay Equal to Men.

Animated discussion took place at the Caxton Hall, Westminster, yesterday, at a National Conference on War Service for Women. Fifty organisations, including many of the trade unions, were represented.

The conference was held under the auspices of the War Emergency Workers' National Committee, and Miss Mary Macarthur, who presided, said that between four and five million men and women workers were represented.

The main point of the agenda was the principle involved in the question of equal pay for women undertaking men's work, and the following preamble was adopted:

> That this conference representing the Women's Trade Union, Labour, Socialist, Co-operative, Suffrage, and kindred organisations, declares that as it is imperative in the interests of the highest patriotism no emergency action should be allowed unnecessarily to depress the standard of living of the workers or the standard of working conditions, adequate safeguards must be laid down for any necessary transference or substitution of labour.

A resolution was moved urging that women who register for war service should immediately join an appropriate trade union, and that membership of such an organisation should be the condition of her employment for war service. This was passed with an addition to the effect that the men's trade unions who now exclude women should be urged to admit them.

Miss Sylvia Pankhurst, in the course of the discussion, said that the great danger was that women should be sweated, ill-paid, and exploited.

The following motion was carried:

> That where a woman is doing the same work as a man she should receive the same rate of pay, and that the principle of equal pay for equal work should be rigidly maintained.

Dr. Marian Phillips moved a resolution demanding that the advisory committee of workers appointed by the Government for facilitating the carrying out of the proposals for the acceleration of output on Government work should include representatives of organised women workers.

The resolution was carried, with an addition to the effect that in any court of arbitration which might be set up for dealing with trade disputes during the war a representative of the women workers should be appointed.

THE TRADE UNION QUESTION.

At the national conference on the subject of war service for women, held under the auspices of the War Emergency Workers' National Committee, in Westminster yesterday—Miss Mary Macarthur presiding—a resolution was passed declaring it imperative, in the interest of the highest patriotism, that no emergency action should be allowed unnecessarily to depress the standard of living of the worker, or of working conditions, and urging, among other things, that all women registering for war service should immediately join an appropriate trade union in the trade for which she is volunteering service, that men's trade unions now excluding women should be requested to admit them as members, that a woman doing the same work as a man should receive the same rate of pay, that in no case should any women be drafted from the war register to employment at less than an adequate living wage, and that in any staff readjustments after the war priority of employment should be given to workmen whose places had been filled by women. In the preceding speech Miss Macarthur deprecated women being used as instruments to force economic conscription upon men. A national form of conscription would be much better than that. No woman worthy of the name would wish to be used to force men to the front.

Aberdeen Free Press. 17 ap. 15

Liverpool Post. ap. 14. 15

663a/2

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

NEW CLAIM FOR THE VOTE.

A conference of delegates from women's trade societies, labour, socialist, co-operative, suffrage, and kindred organisations was opened yesterday, under the presidency of Miss Mary M'Arthur, at Caxton Hall, London. The objects of the conference were the consideration of the proposals for the utilisation of female labour on war emergency work, the insistance of adequate safeguards and rates of wages for workers so employed, and in view of women's co-operation, to urge upon the Government the need for dealing with the question of universal suffrage.

Miss Mary M'Arthur, in opening the conference, said it was quite a worthy object that women should be employed to fill the places of men who had joined the Army, but it was quite another thing that women shoudl give their services to put economic pressure on men to join the Army. It would be better to have national conscription altogether than an insidious form of it like that. They had heard of women being reday to give their services for nothing in ammunition factories. It was a poor sort of patriotism which justified that kind of thing, and it was the duty of the women themselves to see that they were not exploited in the national emergency.

COMPREHENSIVE RESOLUTIONS.

Resolutions were passed declaring it imperative in the interest of the highest patriotism that no emergency action should be allowed unnecessarily to depress the standard of living of the worker or of working conditions, and urging among other things that all women registering for war servce should immediately join the appropriate trade union in the trade for which she is volunteering service; that men's trade unions now excluding women should be requested to admit them as members; that woman doing the same work as a man should receive the same rate of pay; that in no case should any woman be drafted from the war register to employment at less than an adequate living wage; and that in any staff readjustments after war priority of employment should be given to workmen whose places had been filled by women.

Evening Standard. 16 ap. 15.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

OFFER OF GRATUITOUS SERVICES IN AMMUNITION FACTORIES.

War service for women was the question discussed to-day at a conference held at Caxton Hall under the auspices of the War Emergency Workers' National Committee.

Among the industries which it is proposed women should enter, as announced by the Board of Trade, are farm and dairy work, leather-stitching, brushmaking, clothing, machining, and light machining for armaments.

The societies represented at the conference included women's trade unions, Labour, Socialist, co-operative, Suffrage, and kindred organisations.

Miss Mary Macarthur, who presided, said they had heard of women being ready to give their services for nothing in ammunition factories. It was a poor sort of patriotism which justified that kind of thing, and it was the duty of the nation, as it was the duty of the women themselves, to see that they were not exploited in the national emergency.

In the series of resolutions passed by the Conference, it was urged that women doing the same work as men should receive the same rate of pay, that sweated labour conditions must be avoided at all costs, and that, after the war, priority of employment should be given to workmen whose places had been filled by women.

Daily Citizen, April 17th. 1918.

663a/3

663a

WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE.

NATIONAL DEMAND FOR SAFEGUARDS.

GREAT CONFERENCE IN LONDON.

MEN'S PAY WANTED FOR MEN'S WORK.

Organised by the War Emergency Workers' National Committee, which is representative of nearly five million workers, an important conference was held at the Caxton Hall, Westminster, London, yesterday on the much-discussed question of war service for women.

Delegates attended from women's trade unionist, Labour, Socialist, co-operative, suffrage, and kindred societies, while trade unions which include both men and women in their memberships were also represented, as well as other unions closely concerned with industries such as farm and dairy work, leather-stitching, brushmaking, clothing machining, and light machining for armaments, which have been officially announced as the trades which it is proposed the women should enter.

A NATIONAL QUESTION.

The conference opened with a valuable introductory speech from Miss Mary Macarthur, who presided. The appeal that had been issued by the Government, she said, involved many serious questions and fundamental issues. It constituted not merely a women's question, but a national question, affecting men as well as women, and children most of all. The appeal affected women as wage-earners, as possible wage-earners, and as the mothers and wives of workers.

"When the appeal was issued," said Miss Macarthur, "some of us were at a loss to understand the reason of it. We knew that there were many thousands of normal wage-earning women who were unemployed. We knew that there were between 30,000 and 40,000 on the registers of the Labour Exchange, and we also knew that many thousands of women were employed on part time. The armaments factories, instead of complaining of shortage of women's labour, state that there is no scarcity whatever."

The speaker added that she recently paid a visit to one of the largest armament works, where she was shown a large crowd of women waiting at three o'clock in the afternoon on the off-chance of getting work. "That particular factory," she said, "is working on 12-hour shifts night and day and Sundays and weekdays—('Shame')—and yet some of the women I saw told me that they had been coming to the factory for three weeks in the hope of getting work."

Miss Macarthur spoke of a request for improved working conditions which had been sent to Vickers'. Besides giving other reasons for refusing an advance of wages, they said that competition for work in the factory was greater now than it had ever been.

Prospective Need.

With those facts before them they were at a loss to understand the appeal of the Government, but since then Mr. Runciman had announced that the need was more prospective than immediate.

Dealing with the general question, Miss MacArthur said it was one thing for women to take the places of men who had enlitsed, but it was quite another thing for women to allow themselves to be used as instruments for forcing economic conscription on men. The men did not and never had objected to women workers as such, but what they di dobject to was cehap labour, whether it was labour of men or women.

"There should be only two main tests of employment," said Miss Macarthur, "suitability for the work to be done and capacity to perform it.

"At a time like this, which is pregnant with possibilities for the future development of industries, it is absolutely essential that the men and women should get together, and that safeguards should be laid down to prevent women being used as instruments to lower the standard of life."

The speaker reminded the conference that some women's societies had declared that they were prepared to help without laying down conditions. "That statement," she said, "measures their responsibility and the responsibility they have to the people they represent. We who represent wage-earning women could not for a moment give our help without conditions."

To do that, she edded, would not be to assist the country but to assist profit-making, which in many cases had so shamefully exploited the national emergency. And, she said, following up the point, the country would lose in the long run.

Safeguards Essential.

The chief resolution, which was moved by Miss Margaret Bondfield, was as follows :—

That this conference, epresenting the women's trade union, Labour, Socialist, Co-operative, suffrage, and kindred organisations, declares that as it is imperative in the interests of the highest patriotism that no emergency action should be allowed unneccssarily to depress the standard of living of the workers or the standard of working conditions, adequate safeguards must be laid down for any necessary transference or substitution of labour, and it therefore urges:—

(a) That all women who register for war service should immediately join the appropriate trade union for which they are volunteering service; and that membership of such organisation should be the condition of employment for war service;

(b) That where a woman is doing the same work as a man she should receive the same rate of pay, and that the principal of equal pay for equal work should be rigidly maintained;

(c) That in no case should any woman be drafted from the war register to employment at less than an adequate living wage, and that the stereotyping of sweated conditions must at all costs be avoided;

(d) That adequate training with maintenance should be provided for suitable women whom it is proposed to place in employment under the foregoing conditions, and that in choosing candidates for such training preference should be given, where suitability is equal, to the normal woman wage earner now unemployed;

(e) That in any readjustment of staffs which may have to be effected after the war priority of employment shall be given to workmen whose places have been filled by women.

Referring to the question of equal pay for equal work, Miss Bondfield said that if a tramwayman had been getting 30s. a week it was not enough to say that a tramwaywoman should get 30s. unless the woman was going to do precisely the same work.

As an illustration she mentioned the grocery trade, which, she said, was being invaded by women. The Shop Assistants' Union had already fixe da standard which was a rough and ready guide. The man grocery assistant had to do both warehouse and counter work, but the new woman assistant would do only counter work. Therefore the union had consented to a four-fifths rate being paid. That meant that, in the grcery trade, a woman of 21 would get 24s. a week, and cases had already been reported where women were getting 35s.

Dealing with Clause (c), Miss Bondfield urged that it would need every ounce of public opinion to fight employers, the easy-going public, and the apathetic among the unorganised workers (apathetic through poverty and mal-nutrition) to prevent the stereotyping of sweated conditions. As to the last clause, she said they recognised the justice of the claim that women who had taken the places of men who had enlisted should give up their places when the men came back to them.

Daily Chronicle, April 17th. 1918.

WAR SERVICE BY WOMEN.

DEMAND FOR TRADE UNION TICKETS.

"EQUAL PAY FOR EQUAL WORK" AND "NO EXPLOITATION."

"That all women who register for war service should immediately join the appropriate trade union in the trade for which she i' volunteering service; and that the membership of such organisation should be the condition of her employment for war service."

This was the resolution unanimously carried at a conference on war service for women at the Caxton Hall yesterday. Miss Mary Macarthur presided, and delegates representing most of the women's societies and many of the men's trade unions were present.

Miss Macarthur said that the Government's appeal for women for war service had been anxiously viewed by the War Emergency Committee, who felt that it involved many serious problems and certain great fundamental issues.

Some of them were at a loss to understand the Government appeal. There were, when it was made, between 30,000 and 40,000 unemployed women on the registers of the Labour Exchanges, and many thousands of women were only employed part time. The armament factories, instead of complaining of a shortage of women labour said there was no scarcity whatsoever. One firm recently gave as a reason for declining an advance of wages that competition for work in factories was greater now than it had ever been.

It was one thing for women to take the place of men who had voluntarily enlisted, but it was quite another thing for women to allow themselves to be used as instruments to force economic conscription on them. It would be better to have national conscription altogether than such a form of conscription.

In the trade union movement men had never objected to women labour, but to cheap labour. It had been said that women ought to give their help unconditionally, and they were told that soldiers did not lay down conditions. But the man was giving himself to his country, while the woman was asked to give herself to her employer. If she were to work for nothing, who was she helping? Not the country, but the profit-making interests so shamefully exploited in the national emergency.

"EQUAL PAY FOR EQUAL WORK."

Miss Margaret Bondfield said women only asked for equal pay if they really did equal work. In the grocery trade, for example, the union has agreed that women should have four-fifths of the men's rate because while men had to work behind the counter and in the warehouse women had only to serve behind the counter.

Miss Nina Boyle complained of threats that men would strike if women were employed on war service. What guarantee had they that if women were allowed in the unions it would not be on humiliating terms?

Mr. Turner (Secretary of Shop Assistants' Union) objected to the attitude of the women's suffrage organisations. Sometimes the unions had found the women they had admitted so difficult and troublesome that they had ended by excluding them.

Mr. Smith (Agricultural Labourers' Union) denied that there was a shortage of male labour on the land. He was convinced that the attempt to introduce woman labour would keep the wages of men down.

Dr. Marion Philips emphasised the necessity for proper working conditions for women, especially in factories where women had not previously been employed.

Among the resolutions passed were the following:

That where a woman is doing the same work as a man she should receive the same rate of pay, and that the principle of equal cussed question of war service for women.

Delegates attended from women's trade unionist, Labour, Socialist, co-operative, suffrage, and kindred societies, while trade unions which include both men and women in their memberships were also represented, as well as other unions closely concerned with industries such as farm and dairy work, leather-stitching, brushmaking, clothing machining, and light machining for armaments, which have been officially announced as the trades which it is proposed the women should enter.

A NATIONAL QUESTION.

The conference opened with a valuable introductory speech from Miss Mary Macarthur, who presided. The appeal that had been issued by the Government, she said, involved many serious questions and fundamental issues. It constituted not merely a women's question, but a national question, affecting men as well as women, and children most of all. The appeal affected women as wage-earners, as possible wage-earners, and as the mothers and wives of workers.

"When the appeal was issued," said Miss Macarthur, "some of us were at a loss to understand the reason of it. We knew that there were many thousands of normal wage-earning women who were unemployed. We knew that there were between 30,000 and 40,000 on the registers of the Labour Exchange, and we also knew that many thousands of women were employed on part time. The armaments factories, instead of complaining of shortage of women's labour, state that there is no scarcity whatever."

The speaker added that she recently paid a visit to one of the largest armament works, where she was shown a large crowd of women waiting at three o'clock in the afternoon on the off-chance of getting work. "That particular factory," she said, "is working on 12-hour shifts night and day and Sundays and weekdays—('Shame')—and yet some of the women I saw told me that they had been coming to the factory for three weeks in the hope of getting work."

Miss Macarthur spoke of a request for improved working conditions which had been sent to Vickers'. Besides giving other reasons for refusing an advance of wages, they said that competition for work in the factory was greater now than it had ever been.

responsibility and the responsibility they have to the people they represent. We who represent wage-earning women could not for a moment give our help without conditions."

To do that, she edded, would not be to assist the country but to assist profit-making, which in many cases had so shamefully exploited the national emergency. And, she said, following up the point, the country would lose in the long run.

Safeguards Essential.

The chief resolution, which was moved by Miss Margaret Bondfield, was as follows :—

That this conference, representing the women's trade union, Labour, Socialist, Co-operative, suffrage, and kindred organisations, declares that as it is imperative in the interests of the highest patriotism that no emergency action should be allowed unnecessarily to depress the standard of living of the workers or the standard of working conditions, adequate safeguards must be laid down for any necessary transference or substitution of labour, and it therefore urges:—

(a) That all women who register for war service should immediately join the appropriate trade union for which they are volunteering service; and that membership of such organisation should be the condition of employment for war service;

(b) That where a woman is doing the same work as a man she should receive the same rate of pay, and that the principal of equal pay for equal work should be rigidly maintained;

(c) That in no case should any woman be drafted from the war register to employment at less than an adequate living wage, and that the stereotyping of sweated conditions must at all costs be avoided;

(d) That adequate training with maintenance should be provided for suitable women whom it is proposed to place in employment under the foregoing conditions, and that in choosing candidates for such training preference should be given, where suitability is equal, to the normal woman wage earner now unemployed;

(e) That in any readjustment of staffs which may have to be effected after the war priority of employment shall be given to workmen whose places have been filled by women.

Referring to the question of equal pay for equal work, Miss Bondfield said that if a tramwayman had been getting 30s. a week it was not enough to say that a tramwaywoman should get 30s. unless the woman was going to do precisely the same work.

As an illustration she mentioned the grocery trade, which, she said, was being invaded by women. The Shop Assistants' Union had already fixe da standard which was a rough and ready guide. The man grocery assistant had to do both warehouse and counter work, but the new woman assistant would do only counter work. Therefore the union had consented to a four-fifths rate being paid. That meant that, in the grcery trade, a woman of 21 would get 24s. a week, and cases had already been reported where women were getting 35s.

Dealing with Clause (c), Miss Bondfield urged that it would need every ounce of public opinion to fight employers, the easy-going public, and the apathetic among the unorganised workers (apathetic through poverty and mal-nutrition) to prevent the stereotyping of sweated conditions. As to the last clause, she said they recognised the justice of the claim that women who had taken the places of men who had enlisted should give up their places when the men came back to them.

war service."

This was the resolution unanimously carried at a conference on war service for women at the Caxton Hall yesterday. Miss Mary Macarthur presided, and delegates representing most of the women's societies and many of the men's trade unions were present.

Miss Macarthur said that the Government's appeal for women for war service had been anxiously viewed by the War Emergency Committee, who felt that it involved many serious problems and certain great fundamental issues.

Some of them were at a loss to understand the Government appeal. There were, when it was made, between 30,000 and 40,000 unemployed women on the registers of the Labour Exchanges, and many thousands of women were only employed part time. The armament factories, instead of complaining of a shortage of women labour said there was no scarcity whatsoever. One firm recently gave as a reason for declining an advance of wages that competition for work in factories was greater now than it had ever been.

It was one thing for women to take the place of men who had voluntarily enlisted, but it was quite another thing for women to allow themselves to be used as instruments to force economic conscription on them. It would be better to have national conscription altogether than such a form of conscription.

In the trade union movement men had never objected to women labour, but to cheap labour. It had been said that women ought to give their help unconditionally, and they were told that soldiers did not lay down conditions. But the man was giving himself to his country, while the woman was asked to give herself to her employer. If she were to work for nothing, who was she helping? Not the country, but the profit-making interests so shamefully exploited in the national emergency.

"EQUAL PAY FOR EQUAL WORK."

Miss Margaret Bondfield said women only asked for equal pay if they really did equal work. In the grocery trade, for example, the union has agreed that women should have four-fifths of the men's rate because while men had to work behind the counter and in the warehouse women had only to serve behind the counter.

Miss Nina Boyle complained of threats that men would strike if women were employed on war service. What guarantee had they that if women were allowed in the unions it would not be on humiliating terms?

Mr. Turner (Secretary of Shop Assistants' Union) objected to the attitude of the women's suffrage organisations. Sometimes the unions had found the women they had admitted so difficult and troublesome that they had ended by excluding them.

Mr. Smith (Agricultural Labourers' Union) denied that there was a shortage of male labour on the land. He was convinced that the attempt to introduce woman labour would keep the wages of men down.

Dr. Marion Philips emphasised the necessity for proper working conditions for women, especially in factories where women had not previously been employed.

Among the resolutions passed were the following:

That where a woman is doing the same work as a man she should receive the same rate of pay, and that the principle of equal pay for equal work should be rigidly maintained;

That in no case should any woman be drafted from the War Register to employment at less than an adequate living wage, and that the stereotyping of sweated conditions must at all costs be avoided.

A demand was also made for universal adult suffrage.

The Daily Telegraph, April 17th. 1915.

663a/4

663a

WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

CONDITIONS AND SAFEGUARDS.

Convoked by the War Emergency Committee, a conference of women's trade unionist, Labour, Socialist, co-operative, Suffrage, and kindred societies was held yesterday at the Caxton Hall, Westminster, for the purpose of considering the conditions upon which women should accept service during the war in response to the Government's appeal. Among the trade unions represented were some which do not admit women to membership.

Miss MARY MACARTHUR presided, and in opening the proceedings, said when the Government appeal was issued some of them were at a loss to understand the reason of it, because there were then many thousands of women—normal wage-earners—who were unemployed throughout the country, some 40,000 of them being registered at the Labour Exchanges, while thousands more were employed only part time. However, since then they had learnt from Mr. Runciman that the need was "more prospective than immediate."

There were some who urged that at such a crisis women should undertake work without making conditions; but that would be poor patriotism indeed. To work without making conditions would be to help, not the country, but the profitmaking interests, which had already in many cases shamefully exploited the national needs. One condition women ought to make was that their employment should not be used to force men to the front. Much as she disliked it, she would rather have conscription than a system under which women were made use of to thrust men out of employment in order that they might be compelled to go to the front.

CONDITIONS OF EMPLOYMENT.

Miss MARGARET BONDFIELD (Women's Emergency Committee) moved a resolution declaring that it was imperative in the interests of the highest patriotism that no emergency action should be allowed unnecessarily to depress the standard of living of the workers or the standard of working conditions, and that the conference therefore urged:

(a) That all women who register for war service should immediately join the appropriate trade union, and that membership of such organisation should be the condition of her employment for war service;

(b) That where a woman is doing the same work as a man she should receive the same rate of pay, and that the principle of equal pay for equal work should be rigidly maintained;

(c) That in no case should any woman be drafted from the War Register to employment at less than an adequate living wage, and that the stereotyping of sweated conditions must at all costs be avoided;

(d) That adequate training, with maintenance, should be provided for suitable women whom it is proposed to place in employment under the foregoing conditions, and that in choosing candidates for such training, preference should be given, where suitability is equal, to the normal woman wage-earner now unemployed;

(e) That in any readjustment of staffs which may have to be effected after the war, priority of employment shall be given to workmen whose places have been filled by women.

She said that to depress the standard of living would be the most unpatriotic thing that they could do. With regard to the training of women, Government subsidies were spoken of, but the ordinary working woman had never received that kind of assistance to make her efficient, and they should ask that in such schemes of training preference should be given to those women who had to be entirely self-supporting, and who were normal working-class women.

Mr HUGHES (National Union of Clerks) seconded the motion. He said that of the 33,000 women who had registered themselves, about 5,000 had indicated a preference for clerical employment. He knew of employers who, having urged their male clerks to go to the front, and taken on women clerks at lower wages, now said that clerical work was not the proper thing for men, and that they would continue to employ women clerks after the war. That, whatever its merits, was a question which should be decided quite apart from the present national crisis.

Mrs. DRAKE (East London Federation of the Suffragettes) moved to add to the first clause the words: "and that those trade unions which exclude women be urged to admit women as members."

Miss NINA BOYLE (National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies) opposed the proposal that membership of a trade union should be obligatory. She expressed herself strongly on the subject of the way in which women had been treated by trade unions, and asked what guarantee there was that the trade unions would not impose humiliating conditions on women's membership, and penalise their labour.

After considerable discussion, the clause with regard to membership of a trade union, together with Mrs. Drake's addition, was agreed to, with a very few dissentients.

AGRICULTURAL WORK FOR WOMEN.

In the course of the discussion on the second clause, in favour of equal pay for men and women, Mr. SMITH (National Agricultural Labourers' Union) said his society was opposed to the general introduction of woman labour into agriculture. They were willing that it should be introduced if there was a shortage of labour, provided that there was adequate protection for the women who went into the fields; but he had circularised the branches of the union, and out of 150 from which replies had been received only one showed any shortage of labour so far as farms were concerned. The cry of child labour and of woman labour was due to an attempt on the part of employers to keep the wages of men down, although poverty in the rural districts was very great, owing to the increase in the cost of living, while wages had not increased. A case had been reported to him in which an agricultural labourer had been dismissed for asking for a rise from 14s to 15s a week.

On a motion made by Miss Sylvia Pankhurst on behalf of the East London Federation of the Suffragettes, it was resolved that the maintenance to be provided for women in training should be at the rate of not less than £1 a week.

Miss NEALE (Domestic Workers' Union of Great Britain) moved the addition of a proviso that women who were displaced at the end of the war by the return of workers at the front should be guaranteed employment thereafter.

This was accepted by Miss Macarthur on behalf of the National Emergency Committee, and the resolution as thus amended was agreed to.

Dr. MARY PHILLIPS moved a resolution demanding that organised women workers should be appointed to serve on the Advisory Committee of Workers appointed by the Government for the purpose of accelerating the output of Government work.

This was carried unanimously, with the addition, moved at the instance of the East London Federation of the Suffragettes, that in any court of arbitration set up for dealing with trade disputes during the war a representative of the women workers should be appointed, and that in the case of women's disputes the sole arbitrator should be a woman.

THE SUFFRAGE.

Mrs. GASSON (Women's Co-operative Guild) moved a resolution expressing the conviction that in view of the frankness with which the Government had publicly announced the co-operation of women to be essential to the protection and defence of the country, it was illogical and unjust to delay unnecessarily the full rights of citizenship to women, and calling upon the Government for a definite assurance that universal suffrage would be dealt with at the earliest possible moment.

Mrs. TANNER, on behalf of the Women's Freedom League and the United Suffragists, moved as an amendment the substitution of the word "women's" for "universal."

The amendment was rejected by a considerable majority, and the resolution was adopted almost unanimously.

Daily Call,
April 17th. 1915.

WOMEN USED TO FORCE MEN TO FRONT?

MILLIONS PROTEST.

WAIT FOR WEEKS OUTSIDE ARMS FACTORY.

A large number of societies interested in women's work were represented at a conference held at Caxton Hall yesterday to discuss the question of war service for women, under the auspices of the War Emergency Workers National Committee.

The industries in which it is proposed women should enter, as announced by the Board of Trade, are farm and dairy work, leather-stitching, brush-making, clothing, machining, and light machining for armaments.

The societies represented at the conference included women's trade unions, Labour and Socialist organisations.

Miss Mary Macarthur, who presided, said the committee represented through its delegates between four and five million workers, men and women.

When the Government appeal to women was first issued some of them were rather at a loss to understand the reason of it.

She had visited one of the largest armament factories, and asked whether the directors found any difficulty in getting suitable women for the work.

She was shown a large crowd of women waiting outside on the chance of getting work at 3 p.m.

That particular factory was working at the present time on twelve-hour shifts—night and day—and on Sundays as well as weekdays.

She afterwards spoke to some of the women waiting, and found that some of them had come there for over three weeks on the chance of being taken on.

It was one thing for women to fill the places of men who had voluntarily enlisted for service, but it was quite another thing for them to allow themselves to be used as instruments to force economic conscription upon men.

She thought that no woman would wish to be used as an instrument to force men to go to the front. It seemed to her much better to have what some of them dislike very much, a national system of conscription, than such a form of conscription.

663a/5

663a

The Evening Mail,
April 17th. 1915.

WORKERS' STANDARD.

Women Volunteers Urged to Join Trade Unions.

The subject of war service for women was discussed at a national conference under the auspices of the War Emergency Workers' National Committee in Westminster yesterday.

A resolution was passed declaring it imperative in the interest of the highest patriotism that no emergency action should be allowed unnecessarily to depress the standard of living of the worker or of working conditions, and urging among other things that all women registering for war service should immediately join the appropriate trade union in the trade for which she is volunteering service.

It was also resolved that men's trade unions now excluding women should be requested to admit them as members, that a woman doing the same work as a man should receive the same rate of pay, that in no case should any woman be drafted from the war register to employment at less than an adequate living wage, and that in any staff readjustments after the war priority of employment should be given to workmen whose places had been filled by women.

In a preceding speech, Miss Mary Macarthur, who presided, deprecated women being used as instruments to force economic conscription upon men. A national form of conscription would be much better than that. No woman worthy of the name would wish to be used to force men to the front.

Up to date 350 women have registered themselves at the South Shields Labour Exchange for war service.

Belfast News Letter,
April 17th. 1915.

WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

Resolution by Emergency Workers' Conference.

MISS MACARTHUR AND "ECONOMIC CONSCRIPTION."

At the National Conference on the subject of war service for women, held under the auspices of the War Emergency Workers' National Committee in Westminster yesterday—Miss Mary MacArthur presiding—a resolution was passed declaring it imperative in the interest of highest patriotism that no emergency action should be allowed unnecessarily to depress the standard of living of the worker or of working conditions, and urging, among other things, that all women registering for war service should immediately join the appropriate trade union in the trade for which she is volunteering service, that men's trade unions now excluding women should be requested to admit them as members, that women doing the same work as a man should receive the same rate of pay, that in no case should any woman be drafted from the war register to employment at less than an adequate living wage, and that in any staff readjustments after the war priority of employment should be given to workmen whose places had been filled by women.

Miss MacArthur deprecated women being used as instruments to force economic conscription upon men. A national form of conscription would be much better than that. No woman worthy of the name would wish to be used to force men to the front.

Emergency Workers' National Committee 663a
Conference. April 16. 1915.

663a/6

Western Morning News. 17 ap. 15.

WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE.

DEMAND FOR THE SAME PAY AND CONDITIONS AS MEN.

A large number of societies interested in women's work were represented at a conference held at Westminster yesterday to discuss the question of war service for women. The conference was under the auspices of the War Emergency Workers' National Committee.

Miss Mary Macarthur, who presided, said it was one thing for women to fill the places of men who had voluntarily enlisted for service, but it was quite another thing for them to allow themselves to be used as instruments to force economic conscription upon men. It seemed to her much better to have what some of them disliked very much, a national system of conscription, than such a form of conscription. It was essential that safeguards should be laid down to prevent women being used as instruments to degrade the general standard of living. If women were to accept the advice freely given and work for nothing or without conditions for this national emergency, they would be assisting not the country, but the profit-making interests which had already in many cases so shamefully exploited the national emergency.

Miss Margaret Bondfield moved the first resolution, which declared that it was imperative, in the interest of the highest patriotism, that no emergency action should be allowed unnecessarily to depress the standard of living of the worker or of working conditions, and urging among other things that all women registering for war service should immediately join an appropriate trade union in the trade for which she is volunteering service, that men's trade unions now excluding women should be requested to admit them as members, that a woman doing the same work as a man should receive the same rate of pay, that in no case should any woman be drafted from the war register to employment at less than an adequate living wage, and that in any staff readjustments after the war priority of employment should be given to workmen whose places had been filled by women.

Dr. Marian Phillips submitted a resolution demanding that the Advisory Committee of Workers appointed by the Government for facilitating the carrying out of the proposals for the acceleration of output on Government work should include representatives of organized women workers. This was carried with an addition to the effect that in any court of arbitration which might be set up for dealing with trade disputes during the war a representative of the women workers should be appointed.

In another resolution the conference expressed the opinion that it would be "illogical, inconsistent, and most unjust to delay unnecessarily the full rights of citizenship to women," and called upon the Government for a definite assurance that at the earliest possible moment the reform of universal suffrage would be dealt with.

Yorkshire Observer 17 ap. 15.

Women and War Service.

The proposed employment of such industrial resources as women volunteers may be able to furnish has aroused some fears and misconceptions as to both object and method. The Government's appeal to women was certainly not issued in order to find cheap labour. It was partly the result of pressure from women themselves, who felt that they would like to have as direct a share as possible in the national service. There is the best reason for saying that the Government have already taken precautions to prevent any lowering of the wage standard. Mr. Lloyd George's assurance that women who were employed would be paid at the same rate as men for the same work done ought to be enough. The suspicions expressed at the conference of women's organisations held in London to-day do less than justice to this straightforwardness of intention. It is in any case unlikely that most of the volunteers will need to be used. There is not an overwhelming demand for labour of that kind that women can supply, and I understand that the offers received for many trades in answer to the official appeal furnish evidence rather of willingness than of skill or experience. The advantage of the scheme is that whatever is of value in the offers is so much positively to the good, being quite new labour.

Justice. 22 ap. 15.

THE CONFERENCE ON WAR SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

Two or three weeks ago the Government made another of its singular, ill-considered, and one might say almost hysterical, appeals to the people of this country for assistance. Briefly, our rulers have called upon women generally, including those of the leisured classes, to place themselves at their disposal for "War Service"—that is, to undertake all sorts of employment, skilled and unskilled, whereby men may be set free to join the Army voluntarily, or be forced to enlist through lack of work. Nothing has been said about the payment of these women, but, since the Government has appealed to their patriotism, it seems likely that the devisers of this scheme expected to draw upon a rich source of cheap or even unpaid labour.

The Workers' National Committee called a conference at Caxton Hall on Friday, April 16, to consider the matter. Mrs. Glasson presided.

In a few telling words Miss McArthur exposed the situation; or rather, she stated the facts, and left us to draw conclusions for ourselves. It was well known, she said, that many women on the "live labour register" were already unemployed or on short time. The armament factories stated that there was no shortage of women's labour whatever: at Elswick they were working 12-hour shifts, and all the week. Notwithstanding there was a crowd of unemployed women at the doors, and there had been such crowds for three weeks or more. Vickers's had refused to improve the condition of their women workers because the competition for employment was greater than it had ever been.

It was one thing, as Miss McArthur said, for women to fill the place of men on service; quite another thing for them to become the instruments of economic conscription. The speakers who followed made it clear that just now is, from the workers' point of view, a singularly bad time to flood the labour market with competitive cheap labour—for the women workers of to-day are practically without the protection of the Factory Acts. Employers (and not only in the armament trades) do just as they choose, and make the war an excuse for all kinds of encroachments. For instance, in every belligerent country in Europe women are being employed on night work—night work, which was forbidden to them by universal international agreement. In short, if the hall had followed the obvious but unspoken conclusions of the speakers presiding at the table, they would have risen in a body and declined, in the interests of the workers, the women and the future generation to have anything to do with "war service."

Some well-intentioned resolutions were passed. The principle of "equal pay for equal work" was unanimously maintained; and all women who register for war service were urged to join some sort of trade union. (The National Union of Women Suffrage Societies were unable to vote upon this last.) Preference was to be given to the normal woman wage-earner now employed, and a proposal for excluding women from heavy and injurious trades was rejected. Finally the Conference passed a mild and reasonable request that the Government would deal with the reform of universal suffrage, now long overdue, and dispersed. R. T. H.

War Emergency Workers National Committee 663:-
Conference. 16 April 1915.

663a/7

In Parliament.

Army Clothing Contracts.

Wednesday, April 14th.

Mr. Booth (Pontefract, L.) asked if any firms purporting to be manufacturers of clothing have taken contracts for Army clothing and then passed on the work to other firms connected with the Government by other contracts.

Mr. Baker (Financial Secretary to the War Office) replied that all tenderers for Service dress clothing contracts are now required to give an undertaking that the work will be carried out on their own premises.

Imperial Conference.

The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Harcourt), in reply to a request by Sir Gilbert Parker for information as to the postponement of the Imperial Conference, stated that though the ordinary Conference was considered by the Government to be unsuited to present conditions, he had, when intimating its postponement to the various Dominions, telegraphed to each of the Governors-General :—

"Will you at the same time inform your Prime Minister that it is the intention of his Majesty's Government to consult him most fully and, if possible, personally, when the time arrives to discuss possible terms of peace."

He hardly needed to add that his Majesty's Government intended to observe the spirit as well as the letter of this declaration, which he believed had given complete satisfaction to the Governments of the Dominions.

Freedom of Discussion.

Thursday, April 15th.

In the debate on the Motion for Adjournment till Tuesday several members protested against the curtailment of opportunities for discussion and criticism, which would be entailed if this motion was the preliminary to taking all Mondays away.

Mr. James Hope (Sheffield, U.) said that it was impossible to prophesy, but there were indications that this would not be such an exceptionally light session from the point of view of legislation. Business was likely to accumulate, and at the same time there might be matters of great importance which would require discussion.

Sir Henry Dalziel (Kirkcaldy Burghs, L.) maintained that members ought not to give up all their right and deprive themselves of the opportunity of raising matters which might be unpalatable to the Government, which hon. members considered it their duty to raise.

Lord Robert Cecil said that he did not believe there was anything to be gained by freeing the Ministry, even at a time of great crisis, from criticism and discussion of their proposals.

Mr. Bonar Law (Lancs., Bootle, U.) asked the Prime Minister to consider what was the best means which could be arrived at for giving a larger amount of opportunity for discussion of important matters.

The Prime Minister assured Mr. Bonar Law that the Government would always be ready to give facilities for such discussions, if they received intimation beforehand.

The Drink Question.

Tuesday, April 20th.

A motion by Mr. Wing (Houghton-le-Spring, L.), that no alcoholic liquors should be sold in the refreshment rooms or bars attached to the House of Commons during the war was adjourned until the Government's proposals with regard to the drink question have been put before the House, as there was a considerable divergency of opinion among members. Mr. McKenna stated that he was unable now to say what the Government's proposals would be, or when they would be made, but measures dealing with the whole subject would shortly be brought forward.

No War Bonus for Postal Employees.

Mr. Hobhouse, in reply to Mr. Anderson (Attercliffe, Lab.), said : "The Government have given very careful consideration to the request of the National Joint Committee of Postal and Telegraph Associations that a war bonus should be granted to employees with salaries below £210 per annum in order to meet the abnormal cost of living produced by the war. The Government have decided that the rise in the cost of living is not by itself a sufficient reason at the present time for increasing the wages of their employees. They regard this rise as a burden which must be shared in common by all classes in the country. Compliance with this request from postal servants would entail corresponding grants to all Civil Servants of a similar status, and would therefore impose at a time of great financial pressure a charge so great upon the Exchequer that the Government do not consider they would be justified in doing it."

The Notification of Births Act.

In answer to Sir W. Byles (Salford, N., Min.) and others, Mr. Herbert Lewis (Flintshire, Min.) said : "The Notification of Births Act imposes no duty on a local authority to follow up notifications made under it, and unless this work is undertaken the chief value of the Act is not secured. The department have generally considered that it is preferable to persuade local authorities to adopt the Act and carry out health visiting and other measures for the benefit of persons whose cases are brought to their notice in pursuance of the Act, rather than simply to put the Act in force compulsorily. I may add that the Act is now in force in respect of about 75 per cent. of the total population of England and Wales, and that the question of the adoption of the Act is now under consideration in several areas."

War Service for Women.

On April 16th a Conference convoked by the War Emergency Workers' National Committee was held at Caxton Hall, to consider the conditions upon which women should accept service during the war in response to the Government's appeal. Representatives of the Women's Trade Union, Labour, Suffrage, Co-operative, Socialist, and other organisations were present, and also some representatives of Unions which do not admit women to membership.

Miss Mary Macarthur, who took the chair, in opening the proceedings, said that it was felt by the Committee that the Government's appeal involved certain great issues, and constituted not merely a woman's question, but a national question, which affected the men as much as the women, and the children as much as, or more than, either. At the time when the appeal was issued, some of them were at a loss to understand the reason of it, because there were then many thousands of women —normal wage-earners—who were unemployed throughout the country, some 40,000 of them being registered at the Labour Exchanges, while thousands more were employed only half-time. The armament factories declare that there is no shortage of suitable women. Outside the works of Messrs. Armstrong there were crowds waiting on the chance of getting work, although this firm was working twelve-hour shifts night and day. Some of the women had come for over three weeks, on the chance of something turning up. In response to an appeal for certain improvements in wages and conditions, Messrs. Vickers had replied that competition for work in their factory was greater now than it had ever been. This did not look as if there were any dearth of women workers, but Mr. Runciman had now explained that the need was more prospective than immediate.

There were some who urged that at such a crisis women should undertake work without making conditions; but this would be but poor patriotism. At a time like this, which is pregnant with possibilities for future industrial development, it was absolutely essential that safeguards should be established to prevent women from reducing the standard of living. To work without making conditions would be to help, not the country, but the profit-making interests, which had already in many cases shamefully exploited the national emergency. The country would lose in the long run from any depression of the industrial standard, and it was the truest patriotism to consider what conditions and safeguards should be laid down with regard to the introduction of women into fresh trades.

Conditions of Employment.

Miss Margaret Bondfield (Women's Emergency Committee) moved a resolution declaring that it was imperative in the interests of the highest patriotism that no emergency action should be allowed unnecessarily to depress the standard of living of the workers or the standard of working conditions, and that the conference therefore urged :—

(a) That all women who register for war service should immediately join the appropriate trade union, and that membership of such organisation should be the condition of her employment for war service;

(b) That where a woman is doing the same work as a man she should receive the same rate of pay, and that the principle of equal pay for equal work should be rigidly maintained;

(c) That in no case should any woman be drafted from the War Register

(d) Th… …uld b… …ovided for suitable wo… …employment under the foregoing co… …candidates for such training, preference sh… …ty is equal, to the normal woman wage-ear…

(e) That in a… …ta… …may have to be effected after the war, pric… …ymen… …giv…n to workmen whose places have been fi… …nen.

It would need … …ounce of … …lic opinion to fight the stereotyping of sw…tin… condition… …d she called upon the trade unions to help the …reated women workers.

Mr. Hughes (Nat…nal Union of Clerks) seconded the motion. He said that of the 33,000 women who had registered themselves, about 5,000 had indicated a preference for clerical employment. He knew of employers who, having urged their male clerks to go to the front, and taken on women clerks at lower wages—in some cases half wages—now said that clerical work was not the proper thing for men, and that they would continue to employ women clerks after the war. That, whatever its merits, was a question which should be decided quite apart from the present national crisis.

Mrs. Drake (East London Federation of the Suffragettes) moved to add to the first clause the words: "and that those trade unions which exclude women be urged to admit women as members."

Mrs. Deane Streatfeild (National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies) said that as the society which she represented consisted of members of every variety of political opinion, she could not vote on the clause relating to Trade Unions, with which some of its members might, perhaps, not be in agreement, but the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies heartily supported the rest of the resolution.

Miss Nina Boyle (Women's Freedom League) opposed the proposal that membership of a trade union should be obligatory. She expressed herself strongly on the subject of the way in which women had been treated by trade unions.

After considerable discussion, the clause with regard to membership of a trade union, together with Mrs. Drake's addition, was agreed to, with a very few dissentients.

In the course of the discussion on the second clause, in favour of equal pay for men and women, Mr. Smith (National Agricultural Labourers' Union) said his society was opposed to the general introduction of woman labour into agriculture. They were willing that it should be introduced if there was a shortage of labour, provided that there was adequate protection for the women who went into the fields.

On a motion made by Miss Sylvia Pankhurst on behalf of the East London Federation of the Suffragettes, it was resolved that the maintenance to be provided for women in training should be at the rate of not less than £1 a week.

Miss Neale (Domestic Workers' Union of Great Britain) moved the addition of a proviso that women who were displaced at the end of the war by the return of workers from the front should be guaranteed employment thereafter.

This was accepted by Miss Macarthur on behalf of the National Emergency Committee, and the resolution as thus amended was agreed to.

Dr. Mary Phillips moved a resolution demanding that organised women workers should be appointed to serve on the advisory committee of workers appointed by the Government for the purpose of accelerating the output of Government work.

This was carried unanimously, with the addition, moved at the instance of the East London Federation of the Suffragettes, that in any court of arbitration set up for dealing with trade disputes during the war, a representative of the women workers should be appointed, and that in the case of women's disputes the sole arbitrator should be a woman.

The Suffrage.

Mrs. Gasson (Women's Co-operative Guild) moved a resolution expressing the conviction that, in view of the frankness with which the Government had publicly announced the co-operation of women to be essential to the protection and defence of the country, it was illogical and unjust to delay unnecessarily the full rights of citizenship to women.

Miss Helen Ward (London Society) said that although the London Society was fully in sympathy with the resolution, it did not wish to take part in it, as it had suspended its political activities during the war.

Mrs. Tanner, on behalf of the Women's Freedom League and the United Suffragists, moved as an amendment the substitution of the word "women's" for "universal."

The amendment was rejected by a considerable majority, and the resolution was adopted almost unanimously.

The National Conference of Women.

A very successful women's conference to discuss the basis of a permanent peace settlement was held in the Central Hall, Westminster, on April 14th. Mrs. Rackham was in the chair, and opened the proceedings by explaining that the Conference had been summoned at the suggestion of the Union of Democratic Control, so that women who were in general sympathy with the objects of the Union might have an opportunity of discussing its programme. Nine resolutions in all were moved and carried—for the most part unanimously; the only one which aroused any serious criticism being that urging the Government to declare without delay the terms upon which the Allies would be willing to make peace. This was proposed by Miss C. E. Marshall, and seconded by Mrs. Bonwick. Some considerations on the other side were put forward by Miss E. F. Rathbone, but after a prolonged discussion, the resolution was carried by a very large majority.

The first resolution on the agenda was to express the opinion that the time was now ripe for British women to help to form public opinion as to the principles which should underlie the settlement after the war. This was moved by Lady Courtney, seconded by Miss Margaret Bondfield, and carried without any further discussion. Mrs. Swanwick made a powerful and well-informed speech in moving a resolution urging the more democratic control of foreign policy and the reform of the diplomatic service. She dwelt upon the recent report of the Commission on the Civil Service in reference to the diplomatic service, and urged the enlargement of the field from which our diplomatists are drawn. She was seconded by Mrs. Strickland in an eloquent speech, and supported by Lady Horsley, among others.

A resolution on which there could not conceivably be two views at such a Conference was one urging that no system was democratic which did not provide for the equal representation of men and women, but the fact that they were preaching to the converted did not deter Mrs. Barton, the mover, and Miss Margaret Ashton, the seconder, from making two admirable and stirring speeches. The Rev. Hatty Baker also made a short speech in support. Mrs. Despard moved a resolution demanding that the claims of small nations should be respected, and the wishes of the inhabitants considered in any re-arrangements which might be made after the war. In the absence of Miss Barbara Mackenzie, Miss K. D. Courtney seconded the resolution in a thoughtful speech, in which she urged the necessity of close and careful study if the complicated issues involved in the question of nationality were ever to be straightened out. In moving a resolution urging that Belgium should be restored to its place among the nations, Mrs. George Cadbury read a carefully-prepared paper on the history of Belgium and its position among the nations, together with an account of its recent sufferings and its claim to reparation in the future. Miss I. O. Ford, in seconding, put before the Conference some of the views which had been expressed to her by Belgian people on the recent invasion of their country. Miss S. Sanger moved, and Miss Royden seconded, a resolution asking for the setting-up of an International Council in place of the old system of Alliances created for the purpose of maintaining the Balance of Power in Europe. The resolution on armaments was to have been moved by Dr. Marion Phillips, and seconded by Miss Clementina Black, but, unfortunately, neither of these was able to be present, on account of illness. Their places were taken at very short notice by Mrs. Salter and Mrs. Swanwick, who urged an international reduction of armaments—pending the possibility of disarmament—and the nationalisation of their manufacture. Mrs. Salter dwelt upon the terrible drain on a nation's resources which was caused by the strain of huge armaments, and the consequent loss to many social reforms, which were hindered from want of money.

The final resolution was framed with the object of securing a practical outcome of the proceedings, and urged those present to become members of the Union of Democratic Control. This was moved by Mrs. Lound, and seconded by Miss I. O. Ford. They explained that the committee which organised the Conference was formed for that purpose alone, and was not a permanent organisation, and it was felt desirable that the interest aroused in those present at the Conference should be turned into an effective channel for the formation of public opinion.

The Conference was attended by nearly 400 women, some of them present as individuals, but the majority representing some society or organisation. The attendance was well maintained throughout the day, and the proceedings were orderly and united.

Yorkshire Evening Post 12-7-15

663 B.

663b/1

Sunderland Echo. 15-7-15

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

The Press Secretary of the Sunderland Society for Women's Suffrage sends us the following notes:—

I understand that the National Union has been approached in connection with work for the above department of the War Office. Women are required to inspect stacks of hay, to see to trussing, packing, and despatching, and in general to be responsible for this branch of Army work. A large number are wanted, and the question is: Can Sunderland provide such a woman—a woman who knows something of the qualities of hay [though this knowledge need not be profound since skilled assistance on this point would be attainable], but more particularly a woman who could drive or cycle, or both, and who has had experience which would enable her to deal with the practical questions involved.

A band of fruit-pickers for work in Scotland was organised some time ago by the Labour Exchange in Sunderland and district. Amongst the number were several Sunderland schoolmistresses. It appears now, however, much to the disappointment of the volunteers, that the employers intend to engage local workers. The conditions are as to hours, from 6 a.m. to 4 p.m., with two hours interval, and the rate earned per day is generally 3s, at the rate of ½d a pound for small fruit, larger fruit in proportion. This means heavy work, and the strenuous young people who wished to give up a month's holiday to this, even though balked in their plan, deserve our hearty commendation.

Some weeks ago a letter was issued by certain members of King Edward's School in Birmingham relating to teachers' holiday work. They now state that at this date it has become evident that there is no demand for temporary work in the munitions trades; secondly, that farmers have so far not responded to the suggestion that they should employ teachers for harvesting, but that urgency might later bring them to do this, and that therefore teachers willing to do this work should enter their names at the nearest Labour Exchange; and, thirdly, that it seems as if teachers could be most usefully employed in connection with the National Register.

Meanwhile we hear of the great pressure nd strain put upon the employees in the abour Exchanges. We are informed at he same time that of the 90,000 women who have registered for war-work some ,000 are now employed. We wonder largely when we think of the remaining 87,000. Surely a few of these would be useful in he Labour Exchanges!

Representations have previously been nade to the responsible authorities with egard to the arbitrary shutting out of women from many branches of the Civil Service. Seeing that many of the younger men in the Service are denied the right to enlist it seems the right occasion for pressing the above point home. The National Union is not missing its opportunity, and is about to present a memorial to the Prime Minister urging that women be allowed to compete in examinations so far closed to them. Many young men quite recently taken into the ranks of the Civil Service would then be set free for military service.

A writer in last week's "Common Cause" points out that though appeals are constantly being made in this paper for more women medical students no solution is given of what is often the bar to a woman taking up the medical profession, viz., lack of funds. In reply the "Common Cause" gives two agencies which have funds at their disposal for this particular purpose, viz.,the Central Bureau for the Employment of Women, 5, Princes Street, Cavendish Square, and the Society for Promoting the Employment of Women, 23, Berners Street, Oxford Street West.

This society, which has been in existence for 16 years, and has therefore some practical experience to go upon, at a recent meeting placed on record its conviction that women with even small capitals run a chance of making about 10 per cent. on their investments, if they have sufficient capacity and training.

COLONY OF LADY FARMERS IN YORKSHIRE.

GIRLS' PLUCKY EFFORT.

HOPING SOON TO EARN HIGHER WAGES.

It is no uncommon thing to see women at work in the fields in normal times, and this coming harvest it will be commoner still. But it is a little unusual to find a dozen Yorkshire young ladies, comfortably circumstanced, leaving home and friends to devote themselves to agricultural pursuits. A little colony of them has settled near the village of Aldborough, near Boroughbridge, and they are known locally as the lady farmers. Some of them are Leeds girls; most of the others come from South Yorkshire. Fond of an outdoor life, they registered themselves for war service (as so many other Yorkshire women have done), and like them again, heard nothing for a long time. Then came the offer of farm work, and they jumped at the idea.

When the party left home they cherished no illusions. To live the simple life in a cottage was as much as they dared to hope for; but when Lady Tancred met them at the little station with her motor-car and told them she had been able to obtain Heaton House for them rent free—the owner having gone to the front—they were more than pleased. The house is scantily furnished, but the young ladies have managed to make themselves comfortable.

"For the first few days," said one of them to a friend,

HEATON HOUSE, ALDBOROUGH.

"we were busy with a potato pie. All the roots had to be taken off and the potatoes put into a sack. To-day, as you will see, we are busy hoeing and singling turnips. The first week seemed like a month, but now that we are more skilful with the hoe time passes quickly."

"I suppose you all rise with the lark?" our correspondent ventured.

"No, we were agreeably surprised," came the reply, "because we thought we should start early. As a matter of fact, we commence at eight in the morning and leave at five, with an interval of an hour for dinner."

Then as to wages. "We get 10d. a day for the first week, and 1s. 6d. a day the second. Of course, we have had no preliminary training, but we are hoping, as we become more proficient, to earn 2s. to 2s. 6d. a day. We hope by harvest time to be of real assistance to the farmers. Later on we hope to make it pay, but at present our expenses are 7s. a week for board, 1s. a week for hire of furniture, and 6d. postage for washing, which we send home. We share the coal bill; so you see there is not a large margin for extras."

The Times.

16. 7. 15.

6631.

6636/2

WOMEN MUNITION WORKERS.

A PRACTICAL SCHEME AT ERITH.

In order that working women at present employed in munition factories may not be over-taxed, a scheme has been devised to ensure the week-end rest for them by training educated women of the leisured class in munition factories, and for forming out of this specially trained band of workers a relieving body who will take Saturday and Sunday overtime work.

Arrangements have been made with Messrs. Vickers to train at Erith the first of these volunteer bands. These volunteers, after about three weeks' training, will undertake regular week-end relief work, and so serve the double purpose of helping to keep the factory hands efficient without competing against them, and providing for the much-needed Saturday and Sunday "off" while at the same time maintaining the output of ammunition essential to victory.

As the first step towards the realization of this scheme, a large house has been taken at Erith, and is being furnished and fitted up as a hostel, with accommodation for 30 women.

Work is to begin next Monday, July 19, and the first batch of workers must arrive at Lesney House, Avenue-road, Erith, on Sunday, July 18, not later than 6 p.m.

It is proposed to work these employees on shell making, in three periods of eight hours each, the first from 6.30 a.m. to 2.30 p.m.; second, 2.30 p.m. to 10.30 p.m.; third, 10.30 p.m. to 6.30 a.m., with intervals for meals during each shift. During training no night shift is necessary, only morning and afternoon shifts. The rate of pay will vary from 15s. 6d. to 19s. per week of six shifts, 54 hours, the night shift being the highest paid. These rates, however, will be increased by means of bonus earnings as the workers become proficient during their training time. Saturday and Sunday rates of pay are on the basis of 15s. 6d. for 54 hours' work.

The workers will be asked to pay their factory wage of 15s. 6d. into a common fund for the necessary expenses at Lesney House. Applications should be addressed "The Secretary, Lesney House, Avenue-road, Erith."

Common Cause.
27.8.15.

663.B.

FIRST-HAND EXPERIENCES.

I.—RASPBERRIES AND RAIN.

"There are three classes of people here," remarked one man to another, as he watched the stream of over two hundred women proceed along the road to the Raspberry Farm, "students, teachers, and genteel ladies." Which was which we neither knew nor cared, and if a preference remained in the mind of any, a few days' work soon dispelled the illusion, and revealed the fact that to ourselves, and to the world, we were simply berry-pickers, or, as the Missionary's notices had it, "Farm Workers."

In the absence of the usual pickers from causes more or less closely connected with the war, an appeal had been made for other workers, and we had responded.

Gaffer (standing) and Picker.

Our day's work began at 4.45 a.m., when the policeman startled us from sleep by a resounding bang on the side of the corrugated iron huts, each of which served thirty-two of us as bedroom and sitting-room combined. Then followed a walk to the pump for cold water, and a hasty wash, either outside or in a barn dignified by the name of "toilet-room." A cup of tea and a biscuit made us forget the cold, and by 6 a.m. we were ready to set out. The garments worn were varied, and became more and more wonderful as the days went by. Some wore bright-coloured sun-bonnets, others sou'westers; some had sacking tunics and puttees, others overalls or oilskins; some had bare legs, others wore high boots; but the note of uniformity was struck by the two galvanised-iron buckets which were carried by each and all. The party was divided into squads, and the couples forming each squad were led to the field by their "gaffer" or overseer, two of whom were appointed from our number. To each couple was allotted one "drill" or row of raspberry canes, with the never-failing instruction to "pick ut oot, and pick ut clean." Nine o'clock was breakfast time, but before the welcome bowl of porridge and milk was secured the fruit had to be weighed, and the amount noted on the pink cards which we all possessed. Great was the rivalry here, and the question, "How much did you score this time?" was repeated a thousand times daily.

Work continued from 10 to 1, and again in the afternoon from 2 till 5, or even later. The gaffers directed operations, cheering the depressed with the constant assurance of better berries in the next field, or further up the drill, as the case might be. Those who found it hard to be generous when working for a halfpenny a pound were duly rebuked, for, as "Mac," one of the gaffers, was heard to remark one day: "Hoots, lassie, it's by obleegin' ye live."

The catering department was strained to the uttermost to satisfy our appetites, which increased daily to an alarming extent, and even the "doorsteps," as we scornfully named the thick slices of bread and butter, disappeared with astonishing rapidity. Each person's ration was handed to her through a grille, and it was a matter which demanded no little self-control to stand in the queue and wait one's turn, knowing that the precious moments when halfpennies might be earned were rapidly slipping away. Each person provided her own cup, plate, spoon, &c., and these had to be washed by the owner after use. The dormitories had to be swept out daily, boots brushed, and beds made, so that little daylight remained when the day's work came to an end. The beds resembled large packing-cases, provided with straw-mattresses, a bolster, and two blankets. Grumbles as to their hardness there were none. To berry-pickers who had to be up by 5 a.m. a bed of any kind was a place of bliss!

We had been engaged to work at the rate of a halfpenny per pound, which we were assured was the standard rate of pay. Visions of fabulous wealth floated before the eyes of many of us, supported by more or less imaginary tales of what had been earned in former years by the genuine article. Readers may picture the sad shock with which we came to earth, when, towards the end of the first week, it became evident to us that not only would our wages be represented by coppers, but that, in the majority of cases, the balance would be on the wrong side, owing to an arrangement made by the farm that the cost of our board was to be compulsorily deducted before any payment was made. An indignation meeting was held one morning and a committee formed to consider grievances. It appeared that we had been put to work on a farm of only two years growth, on which the bushes were not fully matured, and that, consequently, a living wage could not be made on the first and second pickings. Each field is usually picked six times in the season, the third picking being the best. For the fifth picking ¾d. per pound is generally given, and, for the last, 1d. per pound. We found also that the berry-picker would state his day's earnings to be a certain sum, and, on further inquiry, we learnt that he had been assisted by four or five children, whose earnings he would count as his own. The system of compulsorily deducting from the wage earned a fixed amount per head for board, met also with strenuous opposition. The objections were reinforced by the fact that no such proposal had ever been laid before us. We had been told that we should be paid at the weighing place on presenting our buckets of fruit, and that food would be provided which we might buy or not, as we pleased. It was finally agreed that the committee should meet the employer, and should endeavour to secure a rise in wage and an alteration in the system of payment and catering.

With regard to the question of payment, we received unexpected support from the two clerks, who objected also from their point of view. They, too, had been told that payment was to be made at the end of each shift at the weights. The method of weekly payment involved a great deal of clerical work and book-keeping, for which they had not been engaged. They had already made representations to this effect on their own account, and it was reported that the employer refused to alter his system "merely to suit the clerks." They had been told that we wished to be paid weekly, the head of the catering department had been told that we wished to pay a level rate per head per week, while we were informed that these arrangements were made to suit the clerks and caterer respectively!

Weighing Place, Dining Room, and Dormitories in Background.

No sooner had these facts been elicited than we determined to make common cause to force a change. Accordingly, the committee demanded an interview with our employer. This was granted. The first point to be discussed was that of the rate of pay. He and we discussed that little matter for about four hours. At the end of that period we secured a written and signed statement to the effect, first, that no one who stayed at the farm the minimum time allowed, viz., three weeks, should be out of pocket on the catering—if any deficit occurred the firm agreed to make it good; secondly, the employer admitted that the farm on which we were working was not fully matured, and agreed to put four of our number to work on full-grown bushes for two days. If it was found that they picked more than on our farm the wages of the whole party were to be raised proportionately. This proposal was, however, not carried out, owing to various difficulties which intervened. But a day or two after our interview a message was sent us by the head of the firm agreeing to our demand, and promising that the wage should be raised to ¾d. per pound from the following day.

Having thus been successful in securing our first point, we took courage, and proceeded to the more difficult task of altering the systems of payment and catering. Our case was further strengthened by the fact that, not only had more than one week gone by and no money was forthcoming, but that notices had been posted up stating that payment was not to be made on the coming Saturday either, but was delayed till the middle of the week following, viz., nearly three weeks after our arrival.

On this occasion the employer himself did not appear, but sent a representative, to whom we stated our case, which we backed up by the assertion that if the money due to us was not forthcoming by the next morning, neither we nor the clerks would go out to work. A day was spent in negotiation. In the evening, after we had sent word round to all the workers that they might enjoy a prolonged sleep the next morning, the head of the firm sent a message to say that the arrears of pay due would be paid the next day, and, in future, at the end of each shift; and, further, that we might pay our board daily at the rate of 1s. per head—a considerably lower rate than that enforced for the first week.

Thus, by organised co-operation and determination, we were able to secure from the firm a complete concession to our demands. On a neighbouring farm, where similar grievances existed, no such organisation had taken place. The employer met the whole company of pickers, who, being disorganised, and at variance amongst themselves as to what they wanted, failed to secure anything at all. As one of the men remarked: "I hear they've had an awful row up yonder; but he's got the committee to deal with here."

During the first week Nature did her best to smile upon our amateur efforts at manual labour. Each morning the sun shone brightly upon us, and the glow of its setting lighted us to rest at night. The price paid for her favours was a heavy one, for the following week the floods descended, and our work was carried on to the music of thunder and lightning. Then we were confronted by a new set of problems. It was unpleasantly borne in upon us that our huts were absolutely undrained, and were built in such a way that the rain poured in at our doors, and drenched not only ourselves but all our belongings. As we did not wish to be entirely washed away, on our return from the fields at breakfast-time one morning, we procured pickaxes and spades and proceeded, all dripping and hungry as we were, to dig trenches to carry off the water, while the men of the place stood round admiring or jeering, but not offering any assistance. This device was successful, but the following day we found that our trenches had been filled up with earth again, as "the employer did not like them." Neither did we like them. They were necessary, nevertheless. There being no means of drying our clothes we spent the following days in wringing out the water and in trying to select the least wet garments to wear. It speaks eloquently for the spirit in which the entire company cheerfully accepted what at the best was a very damping situation, that colds, chills, and bad temper were comparatively rare. As the trenches which we had made had been filled up, and the rain continued to pour, there were soon pools of water all around, and, in some cases, alas! within.

Some days later, when matters were going from bad to worse, and the mud was thick upon us, we made another attempt to remake the drain. On this occasion we were commanded to stop. We finished the work, and sent for the sanitary inspector, mentioning at the same time that we had done so. The effect was magical, and the activity of those supposed to be in charge of the scavenging was unparalleled in our experience. When the inspector arrived we were amused to find that he had been told that the scavenger had been ill, and therefore had not been able to do his usual work! We derived much pleasure from explaining the true facts of the case, whereupon he expressed sympathy, and promised to see what could be done. He defended the absence of a drying-room for clothes on the ground that the usual berry pickers possessed but one set of garments, and usually retired to bed when these were soaked. On our representing that the need was on that account more and not less urgent, he agreed, remarking that that point of view had not occurred to him! He promised to suggest to those in authority that a large stove should be put in the "toilet-room," with wires upon which to hang the clothes. After carefully inspecting the whole place, he interviewed the officials, with the result that the drain was once more dug out, but not by us, and various other necessary reforms were made. The comment of the manager is instructive: "What do the women want coming down here and kicking up a fuss? Do they expect to find it a paradise? It's not women they are, but political agitators."

We think we have done good work, and, for ourselves, we should have to travel far to find a happier, healthier, harder-working and more public-spirited band of women. It is only necessary to add that many of our number have volunteered to help with the potato and other harvests when the raspberry-picking comes to an end. This is the day of summer schools and educational campaigns, but it is no exaggeration to say that the education and enlightenment acquired by our little band of women during three weeks' manual labour as farm servants was greater than schools and campaigns could ever accomplish. As one of them said: "We will work for the country, but we will not line the owners' pockets. We know now that there is a striker's point of view."

M. A. Pressley-Smith.

The Daily Chronicle
91-8-15

FRUIT PICKING AS WOMEN'S WORK.

DEARTH OF LABOUR IN THE ORCHARDS.

BY A CORRESPONDENT.

The appearance of Worcestershire orchards to-day seems to suggest that Nature is trying to compensate for the war's possible curtailment of other good supplies by bountifully clothing with mellow fruitfulness our plum trees and apple trees.

But without human collaboration, Nature's foresight will avail nothing. For the want of hands to gather it, masses of delicious fruit are likely only to become good for wasps or to drop to the ground, and there rot or be trodden underfoot. This fruit-picking and fruit-packing is work eminently fitted for the dainty fingers of educated women.

If townswomen would come down and help in Worcestershire they would find awaiting them here a novel, healthy, and picturesque existence. At first, farmers were inclined to scorn the idea of lady fruit-pickers. Fortunately, however, one was found bold enough to try the experiment of employing them; and his courage was rewarded: after a fortnight's experience of a band of women workers sent to him from Westfield College, London, this farmer declared he had never had his fruit picked with such care and rapidity.

And gradually his verdict undermined the prejudices of his neighbours.

After a cup of cocoa with bread and marmalade, the workers are in their orchard at 6, clad in simple costume, a silken scarf wound tightly round the head to prevent the hair catching in the tree branches, short cotton or serge skirt, covered by a large blue linen apron, doubled and tied round the waist so as to form a capacious pocket for the gathered fruit, high leggings and goloshes to guard against the heavy dews and mists of this lovely autumn.

QUEER ABODES.

Already the orchard, when they reach it, is a buzz of life and activity; busily at work are fathers, mothers and children, accompanied by numerous babies in prams; these are families from the neighbouring towns, who take their summer holidays fruit picking. For their night abodes they make use of every possible shelter; sometimes a mere tarpaulin stretched over two trees, like a wigwam, suffices. One family was actually established in two pig-styes, thoroughly cleaned for the occasion, and presenting quite a sanitary aspect. Gypsies of course abound, and their caravans appear some of the least uncomfortable of the dwellings. The pay for fruit picking is 3d. an hour.

At a time when thrift seems to be one of the conditions of our national existence it is appalling to see throughout this fruit-growing neighbourhood the terrible waste of good nutritive food. In the orchards the ground is carpeted with rotting fruit. At the same time farmers are complaining that tons are left unsold at the markets.

Cannot something be done to save the produce of our orchards' food and to preserve it for a time when it may be sorely needed? Cannot the Board of Agriculture or the Board of Trade or those other authorities which enjoin thrift on the people set an example themselves? Can they not buy up the fruit which would otherwise be wasted and bottle it?

And if they cannot obtain labour, let them appeal to those admirably organised bodies, the Salvation Army and the Women's Social and Political Union. They would not, I am sure, appeal in vain.

Educated women who are willing to pick fruit should apply for work to Westfield College, Hampstead.

Common Cause.
10.9.15.

66

III.—CHECKING THE DESPATCH OF HAY.

An enjoyable and by no means arduous occupation lately opened up to women is that of supervising the packing, weighing, and expediting of hay and straw. It was to take up these duties that I set out one glorious August morning from Paddington with all the feeling of a pioneer, and found, on arrival at my destination in South Wales, that work was to be carried on amid ideal surroundings—fields of meadow, corn, and green upland, with the Bristol Channel in the distance, and, on the opposite side, the Somerset hills, with a glimpse of Devon shores. Equally delightful were the picturesque old-world quarters in which we were housed. From a dainty bedroom, with roses innumerable clustering round its large bay-window, we descended to a breakfast-parlour which reminded one of some old Flemish interior, with its grandfather-clock and treasures of old china and burnished copper. Only the rush and whistle of a not-far-distant train reminded us of modern times.

Our duties, which began at 8 a.m., were few, but had to be performed with the greatest exactitude. Our instructions were to see the hay duly weighed and recorded, noting down whether it was baled, that is to say, wired, or trussed—that is corded. Then, again, we had to note whether the baled hay had two wires or three. If two, it was meadow hay—fine, sweet-scented stuff from the uplands, fit for pedigree horses; if three, then it was seed hay, a coarser kind, sometmes mixed with clover and other flowers, used for feeding cattle or for bedding.

Also, if it had two trusses or cords, it was to be sent to one destination, and, if three trusses, to another. On no account whatever must the baled and the trussed hay be sent together. Each truss or bale had a label to say whence it came, giving both the name of the dealer and the farmer, and the trucks in which they were finally packed had also a special label. Of all these things we had to make a careful note, the consignment order having to be in duplicate, while we kept a third copy ourselves.

It is a liberal education to watch a team of two or three splendid Welsh horses drawing a waggon-load of hay to the weigh-bridge. They know the way blindfold, and stop of their own accord at a given point, for so much tare must be allowed for each waggon. The weigh-bridge is an iron plate set in the ground, on which the waggon stands while the lever recording the weight is in a small slated house containing a desk and book of records. So, the first waggon is weighed, and passes on to the railway-truck, where, the trucks being duly swept and garnished, the bales or trusses are counted and labelled and put in one by one, all this needing careful supervision lest the bales should be mixed up and dire confusion arise. The bales are loaded up over the ridge of the waggon three deep, but not more, for there is a gauge, or archway of iron, beneath which each truck must pass to ensure that it is not too high or overloaded.

The firm dispatching our particular hay, being one of the highest standing, was extremely particular about neatness and cleanliness, so there was a general overhauling and sweeping of trucks before the hay was put in, for trucks which had harboured bricks or coal, or such unsavoury things as sheepskins, were not considered suitable for hay which was to feed such important animals as officers' steeds. In some cases, not only were the trucks well swept out but a layer of coarse hay was put at the bottom lest the smell of its last cargo should be absorbed and offend the fastidious nose of some delicately-nurtured charger.

And, indeed, it would be a shame to spoil the delicious fragrance of such hay. How we revelled in it! Where we worked we were within a few yards of the meadow in which a machine was still mowing, and the scent of the fresh-cut grass, mingled with that of the seasoned hay in bales upon the waggons and that of the clover among the seed hay, redolent of summer. It was for us a blissful existence, and we were sorry when it came to an end.

When the weather was fine the teams continued to arrive at the station from before 8 a.m. until the same hour or later in the evening. Care must be taken that each truck, as soon as filled, is sheeted with a large tarpaulin and corded, for if a thunderstorm came on during the night, and the hay were uncovered, speedy deterioration would be the result.

Daily Mail
13. 9. 15

LADY SCOTT'S DAY.

11 HOURS' WAR WORK.

LEAVING HOME AT 6 A.M.

As the result of Mr. Lloyd George's telegram to the Women's National Service meeting at the Surrey Theatre on Friday, in which he pointed out that there was room for many more women workers in munition factories, the Women's Branch of National Service, 89-90, Temple-chambers, has received a number of applications from women anxious to help the country by doing war work.

It is evident that hundreds, perhaps thousands, of women want to do war work but do not know how or where to apply. They are not so fortunate as Lady Scott, the widow of the heroic explorer, who by way of excusing herself from taking part in the Women's National Service meetings telegraphed:

"Exceeding sorry; quite impossible; working from 7 a.m. to 6 p.m., sometimes till 8.30; please accept my apologies."

SAME HOURS AS MEN.

Lady Scott completed three months of labour on Saturday evening in the munition works at Erith. She leaves her home in Buckingham Palace-road every morning at six o'clock to be on duty at seven. There she remains till six o'clock at night.

"I am simply helping," she told a Daily Mail representative, "because I want to be of service in some way. I am in the electrical department, and have to wind electric foils. I am the only woman in my department, where there are forty workers, and of course I take the same hours as they. We have half an hour for breakfast, from half-past eight till nine, and we knock off again from one till two for dinner. We have been on on Sunday hitherto, but I understand that we shall soon be at work on Sundays also. Even so," she added, "I would not miss my work now for the world."

All applications for women's war work received by the Women's Branch of National Service are forwarded at once to the authorities at the Ministry of Munitions, where they will receive immediate attention.

WOMEN'S BADGES.

While the Women's Branch is glad to assist women in obtaining war work in Mr. Lloyd George's new Department of State, its main object is to assist those women who desire to see a fair, just system of National Service replace the present unjust, haphazard voluntary system.

Those who wish to join the Women's Branch should send one shilling for the badge of membership given to all who have, or have had, relatives serving, and should write for a copy of the Women's Manifesto which members are circulating everywhere for signature. All letters should be addressed "Women's Branch," 89-90, Temple-chambers, London, E.C.

From the same address can be obtained full reports of the speeches at the Queen's Hall meeting (2d. post free), and the new National Service marching song, "We must all fall in" (price 7d. post free), sung with great success at the Surrey Theatre on Friday by Mr. George Baker. The speeches at the Surrey Theatre will be ready for sale in a few days.

The Common Cause,

Sept. 26th 1915.

Where the Educated Woman-Worker Stepped In.

"A munition factory has been started at Coventry which is unique," says a writer in the Birmingham Daily Post, "for it employs women only, and the number of women is only limited by the number of machines available for their use. The firm feel that, by proving it is practicable for a factory of this sort to be worked successfully by women they have made a real contribution to the solution of the pressing difficulty of increasing the supply of shells, and their hope is that their example will be widely followed by other towns." It is matter of interest that the workers are all of a well-educated type, and their employers were astonished to find how rapidly they learn the work. "You find them every now and then hitting upon some plan for doing the work more efficiently that you only see the experienced mechanic doing," reported the supervisor. "Moreover, I don't think a single error has been made yet." They are engaged in turning out shells, working in two shifts—from 9 a.m to 1 p.m., and from 2 p.m to 6 p.m.

Waiting only for the Machinery.

The work is only limited by the need of machinery. The firm is experiencing the difficulty that affects all munition producers. And here they have a suggestion to make. "If the Government, instead of concentrating so much upon what they are doing now and putting down so-called arsenals for the manufacture of shells, were to put down big factories for making shell-producing machines, it would have an immense effect on the output. With one or two men to direct the operations of the women, the Government could get all the shells they want. They would get millions. . . . If anyone is prepared to follow my example I am prepared to show him that women can make these things and make them properly."

"Odd Job" Classes.

Last year the London County Council started classes at ten of the women's institutes for teaching women how to do the odd jobs about a house which their husbands are generally supposed to do. The classes proved such a success that they are being formed all over London this autumn. A fee of 2s. is charged for the course, though some women are allowed to attend free, if they cannot afford even this sum. Fitting washers to taps, stopping escapes of gas, cleaning gas fittings, painting, varnishing, and French polishing are among the arts taught, and even recharging electric batteries, and repairing locks and door-fastenings. Nearly 200 women followed the classes last year; this year, wherever twelve students present themselves, a class will be opened at the end of September, if applications are made in the course of this week.

"War Work."

In the poorer parishes of London there is a great danger that the girls' clubs and other organisations, which are needed more than ever now in war-time, may have to close down for lack of workers. There used to be hundreds of volunteers for this social service, every autumn; now, the voluntary workers all seem to have found something else to do; they are nursing in hospitals, or busy with Red Cross work, or making shells. The appeal of the London Society (on p. 306) comes just at the right moment to remind us of the claims of working girls, and of the special need in war-time for the clubs that provide recreation and fresh interests, and, more important still, give the members a sense of esprit de corps.

664
36
The Common Cause. 8.10.15.
663b/9

First-Hand Experiences.

VII.—UNIVERSITY WOMEN AS FRUIT AND PEA PICKERS.

The great shortage of agricultural labourers, which has been caused by the fact that men from the rural districts have joined the Army in their thousands, has opened a new field of work for women of all classes. It would be more correct, perhaps, to say that it has reopened an old field of work, for after all agricultural work was originally the task for the women, and not the men of the household. The summer of 1915 offered prospects both good and bad to farmers and fruit-growers all over England. The crops were good, the trees were heavily laden, but there was a lamentable shortage of labour to remove the produce from the plants and trees, and pack it ready for the market. This difficulty has been met and overcome by the wives and daughters of the labourers in the various districts, assisted by women of the professional class.

The students of Birmingham University felt that the long vacation of 1915 should be put to some practical use. A register was therefore compiled by the Guild of Undergraduates of all those who were willing to devote part of the vacation to "war-work." Originally, the idea was that the students should be imported into the munition factories of Birmingham to help in the making of shells and other war material, but this for the most part was found to be impracticable, for the manufacturers could make use of the services only of skilled men, the engineers. The women, therefore, had to substitute the idea of agricultural work for that of munitions-making.

Our greatest difficulty at the beginning of the summer was the reluctance of farmers to employ women, and particularly women of the professional class. Not only the farmers, but the villagers in general, were firmly convinced that educated people had a strong objection to soiled hands and hard manual work, and therefore they were afraid to make the experiment. This difficulty, however, need never again be faced, at any rate in the districts where University women have been working this summer.

At the end for a little time the Guild was able to arrange two centres in Worcestershire to which the women students could be sent. One was at Tardebigge, on a large fruit farm belonging to Mr. Dixon, and the other at Elmley Castle, in the employ of Mr. Hiatt. Our next difficulty was the question of accommodation, and in this matter the organising committee was very largely assisted by several lady members of the Staff. The Elmley people were provided with a cottage belonging to Mr. Hiatt, who allowed them the use of it rent free for a period of some ten weeks. At Tardebigge there were no convenient cottages, but the Engineering Department of the University came to the rescue and lent their commodious tents which are used for the annual surveying camp. Moreover, the Professor of Engineering superintended the setting up of the camp, and ensured the efficiency of the sanitary arrangements. In the Tardebigge party there were about thirty women who worked in the fields during the month of July.

The general camp arrangements were undertaken by a committee elected from the women themselves, under the supervision of a lady, who kindly offered to go as housekeeper to the party, and the students in turn stayed in the camp to act as orderlies for the day. Most of the time the women were working on the strawberry plantation; they also picked a few currants and raspberries. In this class of work the rate of pay is, of course, very low. It was necessary to spend a long day in the fields, usually from about 4 a.m (sometimes earlier) until sunset, and even then the wage was only about two or three shillings a day. The wages of individual people differed very considerably, as they were paid for piecework, and had no settled weekly amount. Unfortunately, the weather was very bad during the whole time, and work was often prevented by the fact that the field was almost under water. However, by dint of great economy the workers were able to live very cheaply. Food and running expenses for the camp cost only about seven shillings a head per week, so that most were able to cover their expenses for the month and have a few shillings over to go towards the purchase of a new wardrobe! One's clothing was, of course, entirely spoiled, for it was necessary to grovel in the mud to find the fruit. A mackintosh skirt was found to be a useful possession in wet weather, but it was unbearably hot in the short intervals of bright sunshine.

On the whole the people of Elmley Castle were perhaps more fortunate than those at Tardebigge. They went in relays of eight, who stayed for periods varying from a fortnight to seven weeks. The cottage, with its thatched roof and the outline of Bredon Hill in the background, looked very picturesque from the outside, and was comfortable enough inside, furnished only with absolute necessities which had been lent by friends in Elmley, Pershore, and Birmingham.

Mr. Hiatt had not sufficient work to keep eight people employed the whole time, therefore the time was spent partly on his land and partly on a farm belonging to Mr. Haines, of Wick, four miles away from Elmley, and there the students either walked or cycled when there was no work nearer home. This set of people picked peas, beans, and plums. Peas are by far the easiest and most profitable of the three. They can be picked quickly, because the plants are pulled up before they are stripped, and, moreover, they are much less tiring than beans, because there is not so much stooping required: 6d. and 8d. per pot (40 lbs.) was the price paid for peas. By working hard from about 7 a.m. to 5 p.m. we could pick five or six pots, the record wage earned by any one of our people in a day being 5s. 4d.

There were about twelve women who had been working regularly on the farm since Christmas, and these were very quick pickers. They could pick from seven to fifteen pots in a day, but they were renowned throughout the district for their speed. We found the beans much harder than peas because of the continual stooping, but on fairly good days we could earn about 2s. or 3s.

Although there were only a few of us we were able to live very cheaply, notwithstanding the enormous appetites developed by the fresh air and the manual work. This was only made possible by the fact that the farmers allowed us to take as many vegetables as we cared to have. Fuel cost very little, as Mr. Hiatt placed his wood-stack at our disposal. (Oh! the struggles we had with our stick fires when the wood was damp!) Food and running expenses were about 5s. 6d. a head per week; on an average we earned perhaps 2s. or 3s. a week beyond that sum.

Daily Graphic.

Oct. 26th. 1915.

FEMININE WAR FACTORY.

PUBLIC SCHOOL AND SOCIETY WOMEN AS OVERLOOKERS.

The first of the new munitions factories in the London area to be staffed by women, in accordance with the pledge given by Mr. Lloyd George, was set up yesterday. With the exception of skilled fitters to attend to the machines when they break down, a few temporary men to instruct the women, and the skilled staff of the auxiliary shops, the factory is entirely "manned" by women.

A large staff of public-school and society women volunteers have been undergoing a course of training to fit themselves for overlookers in the various departments, and they will assume full responsibility for supervising the work of the girls who are to feed the machines. On the day shifts the factory will work the same hours as the men, but the women and girls will not be expected to work on night shifts, boys and men being provided for that purpose. The factory is intended as an experiment in the possibilities of women's labour for munitions-making. If it succeeds the trained staff will be used for setting up other factories on similar lines as soon as they have completed the training of the present available labour.

The Nation - Oct 23rd 1915

6636.

6636/11

respective numbers and capacities may win for them. The parallel may be applied to Europe. There is the broad economic question, which breaks out now in Morocco and again at Bagdad, over trade and investment, spheres of influence and the open door. There is also the question of nationality, which raged its hottest round Serbia. If these two issues were settled in principle, whether by fighting or by conference, if the future for even a brief space of years seemed clear of fundamental issues of conflict, the disturbing motives which resist internationalism might be overcome. We are aware of a possible answer. "You never," it may be said, "will get the atmosphere in which these questions can be settled, until you have first abolished the appeal to force." It is not necessary for the moment to decide between these positions. Let our task be, when the moment for settlement comes, to remove as many of these questions as we can and as fairly as we can, in the spirit of men who would rather win a people for European unity than press a resentment against a foe.

THE COMPETENCE OF WOMEN WORKERS.

No class will emerge unchanged from this war. It may, as a distinguished writer suggested, "create a revolution of all society." Certainly the fundamental conditions will be changed. The condition of all construction and reconstruction is fluidity, even a certain chaos. It is this that the war has wrought, and out of the débris of the old world we may hope to see a new and a finer creation. In many directions, old conditions which had fixed and hardened have been broken as by magic. There has even been a drawing together of the ends of the social scale at the moment when the cleavage between capitalism and labor has been moving towards an acute stage. But to no one has war brought so great a change of thought and work and atmosphere as to women. Until the eve of the war they were still to a large extent cloistered. Now the enclosure has been broken, and a few weeks have won what a decade or two might not have achieved. It has never been privilege that woman sought and seeks so much as that pathetic shibboleth of a bygone phase, the "right to work"; and in the act of withdrawing necessary workers from so many fields, the war has given women their opportunity to show, not so much their zeal, as their remarkable efficiency.

There is little, if any, need to enumerate the ways in which women have done their "bit" since the war called them from civilian pursuits. Not to Britain alone, nor even to France and Russia, are their extraordinary services limited. If they have been largely responsible for the health and comfort of the soldiers in Russia and in the countries of our Allies, we need not doubt that they have done as much in the countries of our enemies. Women had shown in peace-time that they could run a temperance public-house or administer a college, or do most other work to which they set their hands, and their service during the war has differed rather in extent though also perhaps a little in kind. One of the most characteristic evidences of this is the register compiled (at 6, Strathray Gardens, Hampstead) by a band of voluntary workers under the presidency of Miss Sargant. The register alone is an achievement. It contains some 9,000 names of English and Welsh University women. It is too late now to enlarge upon the almost violent zeal of women to help in any way possible; but this register is a new testament. These are women of a class and education corresponding to the professional class generally, and everyone seems anxious

P.T.C.

The Queen. 30.10.15.

Middle-class Women in Factories.

In view of the excellent education which many women are now receiving, it is matter for regret that so many difficulties are placed in the way of the employment in factories of high school and college girls. It is said, for example, that middle-class girls are not desired in the ammunition works and that ordinary factory girls are greatly preferred. Yet the present writer also learns that the number of women employed in these factories could be much increased were there more women of skill who could be placed in positions of superintendence. Might it not be easier to train as superintendents women who had received better educational and other advantages in early life than those which usually fall to the lot of the factory girl? Cases are not unknown in which girls of the middle class are doing good work in shell factories by disguising the fact that they belong to this unpopular social grade.

The Equal Work Question.

The equal wage question we know. In munition works it seems to be in a fair way to be solved, since women are promised an equal time as well as piece rate with men, and a weekly minimum of £1. But it is often said that the work is not equal. And this is sometimes true. Only the other day a lady happening to enter a London restaurant found that men waiters had been displaced by women, and that the service had become much quicker and more (shall we say?) sympathetic. Commenting on the fact, she was met by the reply, "Oh, I am glad you are satisfied, but each of us waitresses has to look after three tables, the men had only two."

Low Paid Industries.

The effect of the increasing employment of women in many kinds of well-paid work cannot fail to raise the rates of wages in some of the other occupations. But the training process, it must be confessed, is slow. In some of the needlework and clothing trades a girl may be compelled to work for many years at a wage of a very few shillings a week, and is all the time regarded as a learner. When she is out of an apprenticeship during which she may have been taught but one branch of her work, she has some years of better paid employment, and then, if she loses her post, she is too old to be engaged by another firm. On the land also the rates of payment are still low—low, that is to say by comparison with some other trades which do not have longer hours of labour and probably hardly require so much bodily vigour. In this connection a good deal may be hoped for from the development of the intensive system of production which makes skill "tell." The Belgian system is now being taught with much success in some places, and the course which has been arranged for this winter at Cambridge is likely to be followed by a good many students.

The Nation - Oct 23rd 1915

to be engaged in something which will be useful for the war. Even those who are engaged the whole day are eager to assist, though the organizers have wisely refused to count such women among the available levies. There are, when these have been counted off, still some 1,200 who have time to spare and the will to engage in war work. And these, it is worth repeating, make no restrictions or limitations as to their offer. Fully qualified in one branch, they have no objection to doing any, even menial, work in another. Some who are quite competent for chemical research are perfectly willing to release a man by acting as a laboratory assistant, and undertaking the drudging work that it entails. The willingness to do anything is so universal that it is now taken for granted.

The women were asked to fill up a form, giving their qualifications and the sort of work they would prefer to undertake. The register is thus a unique and most interesting sidelight upon the mentality of a significant class of women. The vast majority of women seem to lean to secondary school teaching. Another large class prefers secretarial work. There are fewer students of science than might have been expected. There are others who would have been invaluable at the Tower of Babel. One or two have even seven languages at their command, and one at least could slang a native of the Punjab. Quite a number are competent to act as interpreters, and some are so employed. Some have been lecturers in Universities. Others have drifted into odd corners of the world at one call or another, and have returned with such varied accomplishments as big game shooting and horse breaking. The latter, oddly enough, has a fair sprinkling of disciples, and the Dianas who prefer this sort of work include mathematicians and linguists. Stable management has a secret though restricted cult. Some of the women are married, and have already undertaken various pursuits in order to allow their husbands to join the Army. Naturally, there are many gardeners. There are specialists in gardening of various sorts. Some can pursue bee-keeping. Several understand dairying and poultry farming. There are draughtsmen, and women for all sorts of social work. Few, if any, women doctors are disengaged.

Many of the women have taken to war work. At least one member of an Oxford college has been in charge of a factory, working long hours and supervising the making of certain engines of warfare. But the register is not designed to fill such positions, though, of course, it covers employments which call for merely the care and thoroughness which come from wide education. The true rôle of the register is to supply candidates who have special qualifications for the positions—qualifications, that is to say, of the same order as those of the former holder. Or if the work be a new one, the register will supply a woman with the qualifications which would in any case ensure her selection. Certain researches on drugs are now necessary. The register supplies a number of women, competent to do the work, and willing to do it voluntarily.

On quite a number of occasions the Government has applied to the register for help, and there will be more applications as it becomes better known. Each of the women registered is competent to take the place of a man of the class which has an exceptional value for the provision of officers. The register bears witness to organizing ability of no mean degree. A simple system enables the seeker to see at a glance the available material in any given line, and applications can thus be dealt with at the utmost speed. It is no mean fact that a generation should have produced so great a body of women who have undergone a training similar to that of men of the professional classes, with at least as good a result. The late Mrs. Craigie once said that the university woman had yet to justify her existence. Even then it was a superficial remark, for when she made it there was in being a vast number of university women in secondary schools, training colleges, universities, research laboratories, and libraries. To-day the register which has just been formed in itself silences such a criticism. Given the chance, it is clear that women can achieve equally with men, that they have the will and the competence to do men's work even in the academic fields which have been men's sacred preserve.

Shrewsbury Chronicle.

6. 11. 15.

Women Workers and the War.

Reinforcements of women doctors and nurses left England last week end for the unit of the Scottish Women's Hospitals established at Salonika, under the direction of the French Army Medical Authorities. Dr. Louise McIlroy is the surgeon in charge of the unit, and Mrs. Harley, sister of Sir John French, is the administrator. The unit was formerly in France, and was transferred to Salonika at the request of the French Government a fortnight ago. The Scottish Women's Hospitals, whose headquarters are in Edinburgh, and whose London office is at 58, Victoria Street, Westminster, are maintained by public subscriptions, and are entirely staffed by women. There are five units in Serbia, and no news has been received from them for several days past, but there is no serious anxiety concerning them at the London office, as the difficulty of getting messages through under present conditions is fully recognised.

Among the well-known women doctors serving in the Serbian units are Miss Elsie Inglis, M.B., Ch.M., of Edinburgh, one of the promoters of the Burntisfield Hospital for Women at Edinburgh, and the initiator of the Scottish Women's Hospitals for Foreign Service, and Miss Alice Hutchinson, M.D., who is chief medical officer of the Scottish Women's Hospitals camp at Valjevo. Miss Helen Porter, M.D., a distinguished bacteriologist, has been conducting research work for the S.W.H. unit at Valjevo. Miss Beatrice McGregor, M.B., Ch.B., has been in charge of the unit at Mladanovatz, and Miss Edith Hollway, M.B., Lond., who was for a time chief surgeon of the unit at Kragujevatz, has latterly been in charge of a Serbian military hospital at Lazaravatz.

The number of beds in the unit at Salonika has now been increased to 300, and if the staffs of the units in Serbia are able to retire to the coast that unit will probably be still further greatly augmented.

One of the many women workers at the present time in the great and humane cause of tending the wounded is Mrs. Plowden, of Strachus, who has just returned from France, and is now ready to begin work as the commandant of a hospital for convalescent wounded in Argyllshire. It is her desire that Scottish wounded men should receive attention at her hospital, which is Letters Lodge, Strathlachlan, lent for this purpose by Maclachlan of Maclachlan, for she believes that the homesick Scotsman will gather strength more rapidly when in his own beloved Highlands.

Mrs. Plowden, whose husband, Mr. Roger Plowden, was a cousin of the well-known magistrate, has just been authorised by the Scottish Branch of the Red Cross Society to equip and staff the lodge, and this she has now done, even to the lady chauffeur, who will drive an ambulance car to the coast to bring the men directly to the hospital.

Mrs. Plowden is an American, and sister of the sculptor, Herbert Haseltine, whose model of the winning polo team was shown at last year's Salon in Paris. For a year Mr. Haseltine acted as an attache at the American Embassy in London, but he has now gone back to his beloved work. One of his best pieces is the model of King Edward's favourite charger.

Mr. and Mrs. Plowden have five sons, and their eldest, Captain Plowden, is with the 17th Lancers at the front.

Miss Maclachlan of Maclachlan will act as quartermaster at the hospital, while the staff will include Miss MacDonald, of Glen[illegible]nter, and Mr. Burnley Campbell, of Ormidale.

Sheffield Telegraph 4-12-15

WOMEN SHELL MAKERS.

SHEFFIELD LADY'S ACCOUNT OF THEIR WORK.

We were talking this week to a Sheffield lady who has just returned from a visit to Newcastle, where she had an opportunity of going over a shop at Messrs. Armstrong, Whitworth's, devoted to women workers.

"They all seem so keen on their work," said our informant, "and all look so nice in their blue overalls and caps. There are three shifts of eight hours each, including Sundays, and there are 70 girls on each shift. There is a mess room leading from the shop, and the girls are allowed half-an-hour in the eight hours for a meal, and they can bring their own meals and have them cooked. The experiment of employing these women has proved a success."

With regard to the question of pay we were told:

"They are paid by piece work and the average wage is 25s. with a standard wage of 14s. and extra for Sundays and night shifts. One girl I spoke to had made 35s. that week, but very much depends on the machine. If it goes wrong you have to wait until someone comes to put it right. It is considered that the rate of pay for piece work is not high enough and the firm has been approached on the subject and has promised to raise it."

A very interesting point in connection with these shops is that about half-a-dozen ladies are employed. A school fellow of this Sheffield lady visitor was appointed forewoman after being at the works for a month. She said she would rather be at work, but it was pointed out to her that she could be of more use in her present position. She has to keep a record of the work done, and cheers the girls by going round and telling them the output.

The firm are very anxious to get more well-educated women into the shops as they find that they encourage the girls in a spirit of patriotism which helps to raise their standard of efficiency. The lady who is the forewoman has two brothers at the front, and a younger brother who is going through the shops in some engineering works, and spends his spare time in making shells, so she is a member of a truly patriotic family. Another lady who has recently come is the widow of an officer killed at the front.

When the King visited Messrs. Armstrong, Whitworth's he specially asked to be shown this particular shop, and was greatly interested in the work.

Pall Mall Gazette 28-12-15

65

To the Editor.

WOMEN AND THE LABOUR MARKET

SIR,—Yesterday, at Birmingham, a man working in a munition factory applied for his discharge on the grounds that he "objected to work with women."

On the same day Messrs. Vickers applied at Barrow for a summons against certain workmen who "lost valuable time in working-hours by playing cards, pitch-and-toss, and sleeping."

If men realise the gravity and obligation resting upon them at the present time such cases could not be, but do they? It is recognised that women's work must replace men's where possible. Hundreds of capable and experienced women, intelligent, educated workers having experience of desk, office, and shop, are sent from labour exchange to labour exchange, their repeated applications treated with contempt and insult, whilst young girls of the secondary board school type are engaged to fill posts at a few shillings a week, such posts being quite beyond their capabilities or education, as is well known.

Commercial firms are allowed to retain in their service men who ought to be at the front, on the plea that they cannot be replaced—when the facts of the case are that in almost every case man labour could be replaced by woman labour, as in France, if an equal wage were paid for equal work.

It is absurd to suppose a man earning a wage of from two to three pounds a week can be replaced by a woman at 12s. 6d.—women want to be paid a wage in accordance with their experience and ability: but this the Government and labour circles refuse to recognise.

The pity is that so many idle and fashionable women have seen fit to take the bread out of their sisters' mouths by their evil voluntary service. Such women, for the sake of amusement and advertisement, have undertaken work which ought to be in the hands of the worker and paid for at market value. Under the guise of "work" these women are only seeking increased means of self-indulgence and a parasitic success; but they are acting the part of a Judas towards the real working women, by lowering the standard of wages.

ANTONIA MOSER.

885, Fulham-road, S.W.

4-12-15.

663b | 14

WHERE EVERY LITTLE HELPS.

WOMEN WORKERS AT THE WAR HOSPITAL SUPPLY DEPOT.

"Journal" Photo.]

AT THE SUPPLY DEPOT.

THERE is good reason to congratulate ourselves on the accomplished fact that "The War Hospital Supply Depot" is to-day "something we have got in Bolton." Its happy inauguration, due to the efforts and businesslike management of Mrs. C. Ernest Walker and the Committee of the Women's Defence Relief Corps, marks another step in the general movement by which the town comes into line with the rest of the country in the many and varied labours of love which the war, with its hardships and horrors, entails upon us all. We don't like to feel that any branch of useful war-work is unrepresented in our midst; and we are therefore thankful to the ladies who have brought the Hospital Supply Depot into being for thus opening up another sphere of useful work for willing hands and leisure time.

It is astonishing to find how much is possible when people unite to serve a common cause; how it is found that the humblest worker is of value, and how enormous is the cumulative effect of love's labour and how world-wide are its ramifications. The quality of all voluntary service is two-fold: it helps the server and the served: and the number of ladies who have seized the chance of doing some real work at the Supply Depot shows very plainly how sad: many more are anxious; all feel comforted and strengthened by the knowledge that they can give some useful service to the nation and to those who suffer from wounds or sickness.

The War Hospital Supply Depot at Kensington is the parent of the local depot, which is now making a gallant start at the upper story of the Tramways Offices in Bradshawgate, and in the rooms over the tram-sheds in Salop-st., near by.

The rooms have undergone a remarkable transformation. In Bradshawgate flannel and cotton garments are cut out and made up, and here also is the office, where donations in money and kind are received and duly acknowledged. The Salop-st. work-rooms—one room, to be exact, divided in three, with shelves and canvas partitions—are given up to the making of "swabs" and the rolling of bandages.

Already over a hundred workers are enrolled for this voluntary service; and a visitor at any hour of the day when the rooms are open will find the tables occupied with rows of earnest workers. It should be made very clear that these rooms are work-rooms pure and simple. Quiet is observed, because everybody is too busy to chatter or gossip. There is a sweet, sanitary, hospital atmosphere about; something of peace and devotion to duty that is further carried out by well-regulated War Hospital Supply Depots. Each worker, besides giving her services, also contributes an initial fee of one shilling, and pays a moiety each week into a collecting-box on the table. Hours are from 9 to noon, and 2 to 5; and it is eloquent of the seriousness with which the work is taken up that the opening hour generally finds a good number at their posts. Sewing-machines are humming all day long; here shirts and pyjamas for soldiers are going through the final stages; here dressing-gowns are being fashioned from a bale of roller-flannel; over in Salop-st., keen learners are finding out how to roll a bandage or fashion a cotton-wool swab "just so"

There is nothing haphazard about this kind of war-service work. Every garment is made from standard patterns; every bandage or swab is treated with meticulous care, and subject to the most searching inspection. Before opening the depot one of the ladies of the Committee spent some time at the Kensington Supply Depot, and received a thorough grounding in the workings of its many-sided activities. They received incidentally a profound impression of the endless need of supplies for the needs of the many hospitals. They saw vast stores of hospital supplies, the unceasing work of 4,000 voluntary workers, piled up on was plenty without the trifling contribution that could be levied from Bolton's few leisured workers. And then, hey presto, came an order from some outpost of the war, from Serbia, perhaps, or Montenegro or Gallipoli; and every shelf was emptied to fill the demand. Then, of course, was seen the value of every little item that could be drawn in from the provinces to help to build up a stock against the next call for aid; then was felt the shame of having to confess: "Bolton sends nothing." Bolton is sending something now; not very much so far; very much greater the output will be when the usefulness of the work comes to be fully realized. You cannot make bricks without straw; and to keep the many willing hands at work, generous support in money and kind will be required.

There has existed hitherto a good deal of confusion as to what was needed and who needed it; and out of the confusion, with some reports of overlapping, had arisen the absurd idea that "comforts" were no longer necessary. Comforts! The very word is a misnomer; a ridiculous word dug up from the limbo of the language of early-Victorian days: "comforts" that are bare necessities and urgent demands; "comforts" that can mitigate suffering or modify pain; "comforts" without which our soldiers might fight barefoot, or soldiers' grim wounds go un-

"Journal" Photo.]

AT THE SUPPLY DEPOT.

THERE is good reason to congratulate ourselves on the accomplished fact that "The War Hospital Supply Depot" is to-day "something we have got in Bolton." Its happy inauguration, due to the efforts and businesslike management of Mrs. C. Ernest Walker and the Committee of the Women's Defence Relief Corps, marks another step in the general movement by which the town comes into line with the rest of the country in the many and varied labours of love which the war, with its hardships and horrors, entails upon us all. We don't like to feel that any branch of useful war-work is unrepresented in our midst; and we are therefore thankful to the ladies who have brought the Hospital Supply Depot into being for thus opening up another sphere of useful work for willing hands and leisure time.

It is astonishing to find how much is possible when people unite to serve a common cause; how it is found that the humblest worker is of value, and how enormous is the cumulative effect of love's labour and how world-wide are its ramifications. The quality of all voluntary service is two-fold: it helps the server and the served: and the number of ladies who have seized the chance of doing some real work at the Supply Depot shows very plainly how much the need of some such coming together in work was felt. Many are sad: many more are anxious; all feel comforted and strengthened by the knowledge that they can give some useful service to the nation and to those who suffer from wounds or sickness.

The War Hospital Supply Depot at Kensington is the parent of the local depot, which is now making a gallant start at the upper story of the Tramways Offices in Bradshawgate, and in the rooms over the tram-sheds in Salop-st., near by.

The rooms have undergone a remarkable transformation. In Bradshawgate flannel and cotton garments are cut out and made up, and here also is the office, where donations in money and kind are received and duly acknowledged. The Salop-st. work-rooms—one room, to be exact, divided in three, with shelves and canvas partitions—are given up to the making of "swabs" and the rolling of bandages.

Already over a hundred workers are enrolled for this voluntary service; and a visitor at any hour of the day when the rooms are open will find the tables occupied with rows of earnest workers. It should be made very clear that these rooms are work-rooms pure and simple. Quiet is observed, because everybody is too busy to chatter or gossip. There is a sweet, sanitary, hospital atmosphere about; something of peace and devotion to duty that is further carried out by the snowy linen head-squares and aprons that are "de rigueur" in all well-regulated War Hospital Supply Depots. Each worker, besides giving her services, also contributes an initial fee of one shilling, and pays a moiety each week into a collecting-box on the table. Hours are from 9 to noon, and 2 to 5; and it is eloquent of the seriousness with which the work is taken up that the opening hour generally finds a good number at their posts. Sewing-machines are humming all day long; here shirts and pyjamas for soldiers are going through the final stages; here dressing-gowns are being fashioned from a bale of roller-flannel; over in Salop-st., keen learners are finding out how to roll a bandage or fashion a cotton-wool swab "just so".

There is nothing haphazard about this kind of war-service work. Every garment is made from standard patterns; every bandage or swab is treated with metriculous care, and subject to the most searching inspection. Before opening the depot one of the ladies of the Committee spent some time at the Kensington Supply Depot, and received a thorough grounding in the workings of its many-sided activities. They received incidentally a profound impression of the endless need of supplies for the needs of the many hospitals. They saw vast stores of hospital supplies, the unceasing work of 4,000 voluntary workers, piled up on the shelves and tables; and no doubt thought with misgivings that surely here was plenty without the trifling contribution that could be levied from Bolton's few leisured workers. And then, hey presto, came an order from some outpost of the war, from Serbia, perhaps, or Montenegro or Gallipoli; and every shelf was emptied to fill the demand. Then, of course, was seen the value of every little item that could be drawn in from the provinces to help to build up a stock against the next call for aid; then was felt the shame of having to confess: "Bolton sends nothing." Bolton is sending something now; not very much so far; very much greater the output will be when the usefulness of the work comes to be fully realized. You cannot make bricks without straw; and to keep the many willing hands at work, generous support in money and kind will be required.

There has existed hitherto a good deal of confusion as to what was needed and who needed it; and out of the confusion, with some reports of overlapping, had arisen the absurd idea that "comforts" were no longer necessary. Comforts! The very word is a misnomer; a ridiculous word dug up from the limbo of the language of early-Victorian days: "comforts" that are bare necessities and urgent demands; "comforts" that can mitigate suffering or modify pain; "comforts" without which our soldiers might fight barefoot, or soldiers' grim wounds go untended.

M.S.S.

"Journal" Photo.]

MAKING BANDAGES FOR HOSPITALS.

Daily News & Leader
10-12-15

663
663b/15

MIDDLE-CLASS WOMEN IN FACTORIES.

A WORD OF FRIENDLY COUNSEL.

By MARY R. MACARTHUR.

A few days ago I received a long letter from a middle-class woman who, impelled by a sense of duty and a desire to be of service, has taken up work in a munition factory. She is employed at shell-turning, working sometimes from ten at night till six in the morning, sometimes from six in the morning till well into the afternoon. She describes vividly her experiences and impressions, and it is illuminating to read her complaints about her difficulties in being able to draw the full money she has earned, and about the taste and quality of the canteen tea. But the most interesting part of her letter deals with the attitude toward her of the working women of the factory. "Individually they are friendly enough," she writes, "but I cannot help feeling that collectively there is a wall of hostility and suspicion which so far I have not been able to get over or break down. All the same, I am very glad I came here. I have seen life from a new point of view, and I have learned many things that I can never forget."

The position of a well-to-do woman who acts as a temporary worker in a factory will often be a little invidious and uncertain. She may easily find herself placed in a false and uncomfortable relationship toward the more permanent workers. A few words of advice and friendly warning may not be without purpose.

If a woman, whose life has hitherto swum on the calm sea of leisured enjoyment, decides she has the capacity and strength to undertake the hard toil of a factory, and feels her best service lies in that direction, in what spirit should she approach her new task? That is a more important matter than may appear on the surface. The women and girls whose lives have been practically one long unending round of work will watch rather narrowly the middle-class woman when she arrives. Her demeanour toward them, and the way in which she tackles her new duties, will make a deal of difference. Is she going to throw off social pretensions and become a worker among workers, or will she bring with her the atmosphere of class distinctions? It is no secret that many women whose bodies have been hardened by years of labour are inclined to look askance at the newcomers. Do these ladies who are coming amongst them really mean business, or are they merely hunting a fresh experience and sensation.

A New Point of View.

Now a woman, whatever her circumstances, who enters a workshop or a factory will be well advised, if she really wishes to be of use, to study the point of view of the women who have been working there for years, and to establish, if possible, something in the nature of a friendly comradeship with them. To do this she must cast aside even the appearance of condescension and superior airs, otherwise she will make a wrong beginning, and will rear up between herself and the other women a barrier that will never be broken down. Yet, if she is to get on with the work, she will require, especially at the start, the help and advice of the others who have much wider experience of the various processes, and have acquired a much greater manual dexterity. Inside a factory there is among the women workers a certain feeling of equality and companionship—they have built for themselves a sort of rude republic—and anyone who violates that feeling is laying up for herself a store of future trouble.

If the middle-class women who enter factories get over the initial difficulties and pitfalls, and if they have the grit to stick to it even after they discover that the work is exhausting, dirty, and monotonous, they will gain an experience that may be of even greater permanent benefit to themselves than to the country. The only way one can fully learn what the life and labour of the average working girl are like is by living, if only for a time, the same kind of life, and enduring the same kind of toil. In the trenches there is between men drawn from all classes, between all sorts and conditions of men, a common sharing of hardship and fatigue and danger. If women drawn from all classes could bear together the strain and weariness of the factories, the long hours of overtime in stuffy workrooms, the scales would fall from many eyes We might then give more attention than we have yet done to questions affecting the health and happiness of industrial women, and our future tackling of social problems would probably be charged with keener insight and sympathy.

Details that Matter.

The working woman, though fully resolved to help the country to the best of her power, is also anxious even in wartime that a certain standard of conditions should be maintained. To the middle-class woman all that may seem a matter of small moment, and she will probably ask impatiently: "What do wages matter when the country is at war?" But wages do matter at all times to the woman who is wholly dependent on them. The difference between a fair wage and a sweated wage may determine whether her baby is to get sufficient milk to drink, or whether her little boy is to have the new pair of boots that he sorely needs for the wet streets and wintry weather. And the woman believes she will have to live and work after the war, and that if all standards are broken down now it will not be very easy to rebuild them again. If a leisured woman, eager to be of service, is to be a success in a factory, she must become, for the time being, as one of the other women there. She must not ask or expect special privileges and concessions. She must work the same hours as the rest, and she must do her share of the hard and disagreeable tasks. She will make a great mistake if she assumes a hostile or unsympathetic attitude towards the grievances and trade organisations of her work-mates. Just as she is able to fit herself in as an integral part of the human mechanism of the factory, just as she is able to join with the others and see their life through new eyes, will she be of service to the nation and to herself.

And if this can be done, the consequences will outlast even the war itself. It is a commonplace to say that life after the war, will be very different for us all, and we might do worse than begin to prepare for that new time by each trying to understand something of the life and point of view of the other. The nation, at present, it is sometimes urged, is a family, its members bound together by common ties and dangers, all artificial barriers and class divisions thrown down; that, I think, is far truer of life in the trenches than of social and industrial life at home. But surely at all times the family idea ought to prevail inside the nation, every member performing some phase of national service, all doing the work they are best fitted to do. No woman, whatever her position, should deem it a mean and degrading thing to work, and to work hard. In the stern and sombre times ahead of us, the only menial and ignoble thing will be to remain idle when the call comes for service, and to live easy and sheltered lives at the expense of the toil and hardship of others.

B.

Daily News & Leader
10-12-15

5

MIDDLE-CLASS WOMEN IN FACTORIES.

A WORD OF FRIENDLY COUNSEL.

By MARY R. MACARTHUR.

A few days ago I received a long letter from a middle-class woman who, impelled by a sense of duty and a desire to be of service, has taken up work in a munition factory. She is employed at shell-turning, working sometimes from ten at night till six in the morning, sometimes from six in the morning till well into the afternoon. She describes vividly her experiences and impressions, and it is illuminating to read her complaints about her difficulties in being able to draw the full money she has earned, and about the taste and quality of the canteen tea. But the most interesting part of her letter deals with the attitude toward her of the working women of the factory. "Individually they are friendly enough," she writes, "but I cannot help feeling that collectively there is a wall of hostility and suspicion which so far I have not been able to get over or break down. All the same, I am very glad I came here. I have seen life from a new point of view, and I have learned many things that I can never forget."

The position of a well-to-do woman who acts as a temporary worker in a factory will often be a little invidious and uncertain. She may easily find herself placed in a false and uncomfortable relationship toward the more permanent workers. A few words of advice and friendly warning may not be without purpose.

If a woman, whose life has hitherto swum on the calm sea of leisured enjoyment, decides she has the capacity and strength to undertake the hard toil of a factory, and feels her best service lies in that direction, in what spirit should she approach her new task? That is a more important matter than may appear on the surface. The women and girls whose lives have been practically one long unending round of work will watch rather narrowly the middle-class woman when she arrives. Her demeanour toward them, and the way in which she tackles her new duties, will make a deal of difference. Is she going to throw off social pretensions and become a worker among workers, or will she bring with her the atmosphere of class distinctions? It is no secret that many women whose bodies have been hardened by years of labour are inclined to look askance at the newcomers. Do these ladies who are coming amongst them really mean business, or are they merely hunting a fresh experience and sensation.

A New Point of View.

Now a woman, whatever her circumstances, who enters a workshop or a factory will be well advised, if she really wishes to be of use, to study the point of view of the women who have been working there for years, and to establish, if possible, something in the nature of a friendly comradeship with them. To do this she must cast aside even the appearance of condescension and superior airs, otherwise she will make a wrong beginning, and will rear up between herself and the other women a barrier that will never be broken down. Yet, if she is to get on with the work, she will require, especially at the start, the help and advice of the others who have much wider experience of the various processes, and have acquired a much greater manual dexterity. Inside a factory there is among the women workers a certain feeling of equality and companionship—they have built for themselves a sort of rude republic—and anyone who violates that feeling is laying up for herself a store of future trouble.

If the middle-class women who enter factories get over the initial difficulties and pitfalls, and if they have the grit to stick to it even after they discover that the work is exhausting, dirty, and monotonous, they will gain an experience that may be of even greater permanent benefit to themselves than to the country. The only way one can fully learn what the life and labour of the average working girl are like is by living, if only for a time, the same kind of life, and enduring the same kind of toil. In the trenches there is between men drawn from all classes, between all sorts and conditions of men, a common sharing of hardship and fatigue and danger. If women drawn from all classes could bear together the strain and weariness of the factories, the long hours of overtime in stuffy workrooms, the scales would fall from many eyes We might then give more attention than we have yet done to questions affecting the health and happiness of industrial women, and our future tackling of social problems would probably be charged with keener insight and sympathy.

Details that Matter.

The working woman, though fully resolved to help the country to the best of her power, is also anxious even in wartime that a certain standard of conditions should be maintained. To the middle-class woman all that may seem a matter of small moment, and she will probably ask impatiently: "What do wages matter when the country is at war?" But wages do matter at all times to the woman who is wholly dependent on them. The difference between a fair wage and a sweated wage may determine whether her baby is to get sufficient milk to drink, or whether her little boy is to have the new pair of boots that he sorely needs for the wet streets and wintry weather. And the woman believes she will have to live and work after the war, and that if all standards are broken down now it will not be very easy to rebuild them again. If a leisured woman, eager to be of service, is to be a success in a factory, she must become, for the time being, as one of the other women there. She must not ask or expect special privileges and concessions. She must work the same hours as the rest, and she must do her share of the hard and disagreeable tasks. She will make a great mistake if she assumes a hostile or unsympathetic attitude towards the grievances and trade organisations of her work-mates. Just as she is able to fit herself in as an integral part of the human mechanism of the factory, just as she is able to join with the others and see their life through new eyes, will she be of service to the nation and to herself.

And if this can be done, the consequences will outlast even the war itself. It is a commonplace to say that life after the war, will be very different for us all, and we might do worse than begin to prepare for that new time by each trying to understand something of the life and point of view of the other. The nation, at present, it is sometimes urged, is a family, its members bound together by common ties and dangers, all artificial barriers and class divisions thrown down; that, I think, is far truer of life in the trenches than of social and industrial life at home. But surely at all times the family idea ought to prevail inside the nation, every member performing some phase of national service, all doing the work they are best fitted to do. No woman, whatever her position, should deem it a mean and degrading thing to work, and to work hard. In the stern and sombre times ahead of us, the only menial and ignoble thing will be to remain idle when the call comes for service, and to live easy and sheltered lives at the expense of the toil and hardship of others

Daily News & Leader
10-12-15

MIDDLE-CLASS WOMEN IN FACTORIES.

A WORD OF FRIENDLY COUNSEL.

By MARY R. MACARTHUR.

A few days ago I received a long letter from a middle-class woman who, impelled by a sense of duty and a desire to be of service, has taken up work in a munition factory. She is employed at shell-turning, working sometimes from ten at night till six in the morning, sometimes from six in the morning till well into the afternoon. She describes vividly her experiences and impressions, and it is illuminating to read her complaints about her difficulties in being able to draw the full money she has earned, and about the taste and quality of the canteen tea. But the most interesting part of her letter deals with the attitude toward her of the working women of the factory. "Individually they are friendly enough," she writes, "but I cannot help feeling that collectively there is a wall of hostility and suspicion which so far I have not been able to get over or break down. All the same, I am very glad I came here. I have seen life from a new point of view, and I have learned many things that I can never forget."

The position of a well-to-do woman who acts as a temporary worker in a factory will often be a little invidious and uncertain. She may easily find herself placed in a false and uncomfortable relationship toward the more permanent workers. A few words of advice and friendly warning may not be without purpose.

If a woman, whose life has hitherto swum on the calm sea of leisured enjoyment, decides she has the capacity and strength to undertake the hard toil of a factory, and feels her best service lies in that direction, in what spirit should she approach her new task? That is a more important matter than may appear on the surface. The women and girls whose lives have been practically one long unending round of work will watch rather narrowly the middle-class woman when she arrives. Her demeanour toward them, and the way in which she tackles her new duties, will make a deal of difference. Is she going to throw off social pretensions and become a worker among workers, or will she bring with her the atmosphere of class distinctions? It is no secret that many women whose bodies have been hardened by years of labour are inclined to look askance at the newcomers. Do these ladies who are coming amongst them really mean business, or are they merely hunting a fresh experience and sensation.

A New Point of View.

Now a woman, whatever her circumstances, who enters a workshop or a factory will be well advised, if she really wishes to be of use, to study the point of view of the women who have been working there for years, and to establish, if possible, something in the nature of a friendly comradeship with them. To do this she must cast aside even the appearance of condescension and superior airs, otherwise she will make a wrong beginning, and will rear up between herself and the other women a barrier that will never be broken down. Yet, if she is to get on with the work, she will require, especially at the start, the help and advice of the others who have much wider experience of the various processes, and have acquired a much greater manual dexterity. Inside a factory there is among the women workers a certain feeling of equality and companionship—they have built for themselves a sort of rude republic—and anyone who violates that feeling is laying up for herself a store of future trouble.

If the middle-class women who enter factories get over the initial difficulties and pitfalls, and if they have the grit to stick to it even after they discover that the work is exhausting, dirty, and monotonous, they will gain an experience that may be of even greater permanent benefit to themselves than to the country. The only way one can fully learn what the life and labour of the average working girl are like is by living, if only for a time, the same kind of life, and enduring the same kind of toil. In the trenches there is between men drawn from all classes, between all sorts and conditions of men, a common sharing of hardship and fatigue and danger. If women drawn from all classes could bear together the strain and weariness of the factories, the long hours of overtime in stuffy workrooms, the scales would fall from many eyes We might then give more attention than we have yet done to questions affecting the health and happiness of industrial women, and our future tackling of social problems would probably be charged with keener insight and sympathy.

Details that Matter.

The working woman, though fully resolved to help the country to the best of her power, is also anxious even in wartime that a certain standard of conditions should be maintained. To the middle-class woman all that may seem a matter of small moment, and she will probably ask impatiently: "What do wages matter when the country is at war?" But wages do matter at all times to the woman who is wholly dependent on them. The difference between a fair wage and a sweated wage may determine whether her baby is to get sufficient milk to drink, or whether her little boy is to have the new pair of boots that he sorely needs for the wet streets and wintry weather. And the woman believes she will have to live and work after the war, and that if all standards are broken down now it will not be very easy to rebuild them again. If a leisured woman, eager to be of service, is to be a success in a factory, she must become, for the time being, as one of the other women there. She must not ask or expect special privileges and concessions. She must work the same hours as the rest, and she must do her share of the hard and disagreeable tasks. She will make a great mistake if she assumes a hostile or unsympathetic attitude towards the grievances and trade organisations of her work-mates. Just as she is able to fit herself in as an integral part of the human mechanism of the factory, just as she is able to join with the others and see their life through new eyes, will she be of service to the nation and to herself.

And if this can be done, the consequences will outlast even the war itself. It is a commonplace to say that life after the war, will be very different for us all, and we might do worse than begin to prepare for that new time by each trying to understand something of the life and point of view of the other. The nation, at present, it is sometimes urged, is a family, its members bound together by common ties and dangers, all artificial barriers and class divisions thrown down; that, I think, is far truer of life in the trenches than of social and industrial life at home. But surely at all times the family idea ought to prevail inside the nation, every member performing some phase of national service, all doing the work they are best fitted to do. No woman, whatever her position, should deem it a mean and degrading thing to work, and to work hard. In the stern and sombre times ahead of us, the only menial and ignoble thing will be to remain idle when the call comes for service, and to live easy and sheltered lives at the expense of the toil and hardship of others.

Daily News
13/12/15

"MIDDLE-CLASS WOMEN IN FACTORIES."

(To the Editor.)

Sir,—I read Miss MacArthur's "Word of Friendly Counsel" with much interest. But I want to add something to what she has so admirably said about the way in which one can "fully learn what the life and labour of the average working-girl are like."

When the middle-class woman has finished her 12 hours' shift in a munition factory she goes home to a comfortable house, and if she has been on a night shift, to a comfortable, aired bed in a quiet bedroom.

When the working-girl comes back in the early morning she finds in most cases an unaired bed, which the day-worker has only just left—for in houses containing three very small bedrooms (sometimes only two), with families of seven, eight, or nine persons in them, there is no room for single beds—and in a close, stuffy room. If the window is kept open the street smells, all worse since so many street-sweepers have enlisted, and the smells from factories fill the room, and the continual noise outside, the ceaseless crying of someone's baby somewhere near, the jolting of heavy lorries and waggons, the monotonous cries of the street sellers with little rattling carts, the perpetual sound of machinery, all these noises hinder sleep. Besides, the girl must, more often than not, help in the house work as well as sleep.

Hundreds of streets in one Yorkshire city, now making munitions, consist entirely of back-to-back houses. If anyone really wishes to understand industrial life, and be one with the workers, and not merely an outsider, they must sleep in a back-to-back house. They will never forget the haunting smell of closeness, nor how every sound in the house is heard everywhere in it. There is no quiet and no privacy possible in such dwellings.

As for the food—when tea has to be bought in small quantities it has an entirely different taste from tea bought in large quantities in a middle-class house. The milk!—well, one wonders what it is made of! But the well-to-do woman will seldom, if ever, experience these things; for if she goes into these houses she will be given the best of everything (only the poor understand the highest courtesy, I sometimes think), and a wall of politeness will cut her off from obtaining this priceless valuable knowledge. Unless she goes feeling within her that there is not one shadow of difference between her and her hosts, except that they know infinitely more about life and its teachings than she has ever known, and perhaps ever will know; and that they often in ordinary daily life have to rise, and do rise, to heights of courage, devotion, and self-sacrifice that she in her prosperous sheltered home may never realise or understand in the least. Then they will treat her as a friend and comrade.

But these things must be seen from the inside.

ISABELLA O. FORD.

Dec. 13.

The Daily Chronicle

30-12-15

WOMEN'S WORK FOR WOMEN.

THE NEEDS OF THE HOSPITALS.

By ELIZABETH SLOAN CHESSER, M.B.

The first aim of every woman interested in the great national questions of to-day is how best to serve the men who are fighting for us at the front. To nurse and cook and even scrub for the soldiers, every woman, whatever her social status, is ready to do her part. The soldier is first served, the first considered. But there is another aspect of the question. Ask the man at the front what his chief thought and anxiety are to-day, and he will assuredly answer, the welfare of his womenfolk. He will fight better and do his bit of work for the country with the zest and spirit we need just now, if he is assured that his wife and his mother, his "womenfolk," are cared for at home.

Women of all classes are giving voluntary service to the Red Cross hospitals and offering themselves as probationers to local and provincial infirmaries all over the country. Thousands of women are training themselves so that they may be efficient assistants in the months to come. There is no fear that the soldiers and sailors will suffer for lack of service or lack of money. But what of the womenfolk of the men who are fighting for us at the front? They are being visited and befriended, it is true. They are given sympathy and service. But we are apt to neglect them in one respect. There is always a certain number of suffering women, a small army who fill our dispensaries and hospitals for women's diseases, women who are the victims of neglect at childbirth, overwork, lack of care. They come to our women's wards in the hospitals, and if they can be ensured treatment 70 per cent. of them are "cured." At the least they are happier women for their time in hospital, and they are given a chance of motherhood as a result of improved health.

Women Who Can Help Women.

The war has caused many people to curtail, and in some instances to cancel, their subscriptions to the hospitals. At such a crisis as this it is natural that the sufferings of the soldiers should elicit the readiest response, but the women of the country must also have our serious consideration. Those of us who are alive to the importance of safeguarding the new generation of citizens realise that money spent on suffering women will have a far-reaching effect in the future. There are thousands of women with no chance of motherhood for lack of medical and surgical treatment in hospital. And at this time there is a special call for women to help in the upkeep of wards for women in the great hospitals, because women's elemental duty is the preservation, the conservation of life.

The London Hospital especially should have our sympathies. For years past it has provided treatment for approximately eight thousand women every year. The average cost per case is £5. And money given to assist these wards is war money in a sense—because our soldiers have left in our charge their women and their children. The London Hospital during the first six months of the war provided treatment for two thousand wounded soldiers besides facilities for operations and dental treatment to hundreds of men to fit them for enlistment. But the staff realises that, whatever else is being done, the relief of suffering women ought not to be neglected. A special effort has been made by Lord Knutsford to enlist women's interest and women's sympathy for the wards for women in the hospital. There is a spirit of solidarity amongst women just now, which makes it certain that all who are brought to understand that there is real need of assistance will respond by sending something to the women's wards of the hospital. Money is needed most of all, and shillings as well as pounds are gratefully received, but gifts of clothing suitable for the patients when they leave hospital are also welcome. Some of the workrooms started by women for women should be able to help the hospital in this respect. We help our soldiers if we safeguard the health and lives of their womenfolk. We help the country if we ensure better health to the women who are to be the mothers of the new generation. For these reasons alone, apart from the larger question of altruism, sympathy for the women who must depend upon charity for a chance of health, let women help the women's wards of the London Hospital.

Common Cause.
15.9.16

663b/20 · 63.B.
Nottingham Express

First-Hand Experiences.

XV.—WEEK-END MUNITION WORK.

I had always been very eager to do some war work in my spare time, although I could not give my whole time to it. The opportunity came one day when I heard that Sunday munition workers were wanted to give the regular hands a rest. They must be at the factory at ten o'clock on Sunday morning, with lunch, a munition frock, cap, and gloves, and be prepared to work until six o'clock in the evening, having an hour for lunch and a quarter of an hour for tea.

Sunday happened to be a very brilliant day, and on the way to the factory I almost regretted that I was not free to go into the country and enjoy the sunshine and flowers; but I put these thoughts behind me, and, telling myself what patriotism really means, and how the regular munition workers stuck to their work under all conditions, I plodded along the hot street.

It happened that I did not know the exact whereabouts of the factory, but I soon lighted on it, because there were little bits of metal all round the door, and at a pair of large gates a heap of metal shavings; and just as the clock struck ten I stepped very gingerly through a small door cut in a pair of large ones and walked into the timekeeper's office. As I gave my name and address my heart began to beat. There was a roar of heavy machinery, which rather frightened me. I knew nothing whatever of machinery, and had thought that probably as I was an amateur I should have to pack bullets, or do something equally simple. The idea of having to work a large machine had never occurred to me.

After taking off my hat and coat and putting my munition frock, cap and gloves on, I went into the workshop. This was a very large shop, with rows of machines, like those one sees in pictures, with straps running from the machine on the floor to an affair of wheels and rollers near the ceiling. The noise of the machines made it almost impossible to hear yourself speak, and when you were spoken to you had to watch the speaker's mouth very closely, so that you could understand without hearing properly. On entering the workshop I found several other women arrayed similarly to myself standing in a little group. These I joined, and one of them asked me what "turning" I had done. I was mystified. I did not even know what she meant by "turning," so I explained to her that I had never worked on munitions before, and she was rather surprised, but comforted me by saying that I should very soon learn. As we were standing waiting, the men that were already working looked at us as though we were some special species of humanity, and that they were very much interested in the species was quite evident. After a while the foreman came and took some of us off, and placed us under the care of a Belgian, saying, "He will teach you all you want to know." After instructing two other women he came to me and said in French, "Do you speak French?" I told him I did. Then he explained everything about the machine: how to place the shell into it, how to set it revolving, how to stop the revolving, and how to release it, how to gauge the shell, and how to bring the machine to the starting point again.

I was now thoroughly awake to the fact that I had to do finishing turning to 4.5 shells. My idea about packing bullets was quite put aside, and I blushed to remember that I had thought I should have such easy work to do.

The first shell I did came out too small because the machine was not regulated properly. I was very much concerned about this, but the Belgian assured me that I was not to grieve, I should do much better next time. After that I was very careful not to get another shell too small, so about every few minutes I stopped to measure it, and although it took a longer time to finish it was better in the long run, because it was the exact measurement. I continued to do turning until one o'clock, when all machines were stopped working and everyone went to lunch.

All the women had their lunch in a quaint room just above the workshop. It was a low room, and one saw the rafters above one's head. It reminded me very much of "My Room Beneath the Rafters," only one had to imagine one was in a farmhouse instead of a munition factory.

At two o'clock the whistle blew, and all machines were again set in motion, and we all recommenced work. After lunch I was told I could do some filing. The man near me heard this and said, "That's a rotten job; I'm sure you won't like it." I told him one had to do a great many things that were distasteful in war time, and I made up my mind that I would like it whatever kind of job it was. It was not really a bad job: true it was a bit dusty, and the afternoon was hot, but I did my best not to let the man see that I thought it "a rotten job."

Through an open door opposite me I could see a yellowy-green bank edging what looked like a stream. The sun was shining radiantly; I never admired a little bit of green so much as that. I have no doubt that it was the fact of my being in a factory among so many machines that made the grass look so inviting, for I know now that that bit of green is a very dank, weedy marsh, and the lively stream an East-end wharf. At half-past four the whistle blew again, and we all hurried off to tea. Tea was taken in the same room as lunch, and we partook of bread and butter, not thin, and tea in cups that were also not thin. That tea was the most hurried one I had ever taken. The tea itself was very hot; we had only a quarter of an hour in which to drink it; but we had great fun all trying to get finished first.

We went down again to the workshop at a quarter to five, and worked steadily on until nearly six. Then a man came round and said would we call for our money on our way to the dressing-room. This surprised me greatly, for I certainly did not think that I had earned enough to be called for. However, I was paid 2s. 7½d., which was really very good considering what I had done. The Belgian was very profuse in his praises, but I am afraid he was not sincere, because I had to ask him so many times how to release the shell, and then could not turn the bolt, so that he always had to do it for me. On the whole, I quite enjoyed my day's work on munitions, but for a long time after my arms felt quite twice their original length, and I could still hear the din of machinery in my ears.

The Duke of Portland, in declaring the ward open, paid a high tribute to the war work of our women. In viewing a hospital of that kind, he said, they saw a splendid example of one very large and very important section of the work that was being done by women—work, indeed, of a most essential and indispensable character, and work for the successful accomplishment of which women were instinctively gifted and peculiarly adapted. (Hear, hear.) Taking a broad survey of the war-work that was being done by women, his Grace emphasised that they were simply splendid; they had risen to the occasion and to the height of the nation's need. (Hear, hear.) It fell to their lot to nurse back to health and strength those who had been disabled in this stern, strenuous, and stupendous struggle, in the prosecution of which the nation, he was convinced, would not falter until victory had been achieved. (Applause.) His Grace also warmly eulogised the task the men of the country were accomplishing. Nobly had our manhood responded to the call of duty; men and women, in fact, were being inspired to an amount of willing service such as had never before been concentrated in one united national purpose. (Applause.)

Women had freely given themselves to service surrendering their time, their amusements, and their comfort. (Hear, hear.) They had undergone courses of training and had fitted themselves for hospital work in a manner and with a cheerful alacrity worthy of all praise. (Applause.)

Notts. Women's Response.

He did not think the women of Notts. had been surpassed by the women of any other county in the devoted and energetic earnestness with which they had discharged the multifarious duties which they had so willingly and eagerly undertaken. (Hear, hear). Whatever had been the nature of the necessity or requirement, the women of Notts. had made quick and adequate response. In fact, like Queen Elizabeth in the days of the Armada, though "possessing the body of a weak and feeble woman, they had the heart and stomach of a king, and of a King of England too." (Applause.)

Wherever a hospital had been required it had been provided, and when, as in that case, it had been found necessary to enlarge one, the commandant and her staff of assistants had been equal to the occasion. (Hear, hear.) Heartily did he congratulate Mrs. Birkin on the success of her efforts, and he was proud to think she and her efficient staff were doing such excellent work.

Concluding, his Grace said all knew from innumerable testimonies how brave and gallant our soldiers had proved in the field, and when he visited a Red Cross hospital he was always impressed with the wonderfully courageous, cheerful, and hopeful spirit in which the men bore their sufferings. All honour to them and the devoted women who attended them. (Applause.) He had much pleasure in declaring the new ward open, and was confident that the wounded and sick soldiers who came there would speedily realise they could not possibly be in better hands. (Applause.

Tribute to Medical Men.

Colonel Ashwell proposed a vote of thanks to the Duke, and in seconding, Dr. Francis said they all knew his Grace was just now a very busy man but the greatness of his heart was equally well known. (Applause.)

Acknowledging the compliment, his Grace paid a well-merited tribute to the medical staff of the hospital. These gentlemen gave unstintingly of their time and abilities; in fact he did not know what the wounded would do without them. (Hear, hear.)

Thanks were also accorded the chairman, on the motion of the Duke of Portland, seconded by Mrs. Birkin, the latter expressing the opinion that they had in Colonel Seely and his late father two of their very best friends.

This concluded the ceremony, and a brief in-

Common Cause.
15.9.16

663b/20

63.13.

same, the corvée that presses very heavily on women is an evil and a real social danger. Like the French peasant's corvée, it is a relic of a past age; and in its beginnings, it was not an evil, taken as part of an older social system, which in our day is rapidly being abolished. Old divisions of labour in France, not necessarily oppressive in the ninth century, left it open to the seigneur to have certain payments made in work rather than in money, which was scarce. Old divisions of labour in Great Britain, and in all old societies, assign work within the house to the woman as her share of the day's labour. The peasant-woman all the world over, works at certain seasons in the fields, and she prepares the meals, rears the children, and waits upon the menfolk. The old divisions persist under industrial conditions, and for reasons which we shall presently examine, the woman-worker is unable to readjust her day's work. She works "double-tides," and the second day's work in the twenty-four hours takes a heavy toll of her strength. At first sight this may seem a piece of bad management, or perversity, or "a woman's way" of setting about her job. The second discovery quickly follows that her wages are almost invariably too scanty to permit her to pay or support another woman to "do for" her; as the wage-earning man supports the wife or pays the housekeeper who takes these cares off his shoulders. Some pseudo-economists have managed to discover that the man's wages are higher becau has a wife and family to keep, forgetting that, if a man rem a bachelor his wages are just as high—because he is a man.

The British

amateur I should have ...
simple. The idea of having to work a large machine ... occurred to me.

After taking off my hat and coat and putting my munition frock, cap and gloves on, I went into the workshop. This was a very large shop, with rows of machines, like those one sees in pictures, with straps running from the machine on the floor to an affair of wheels and rollers near the ceiling. The noise of the machines made it almost impossible to hear yourself speak, and when you were spoken to you had to watch the speaker's mouth very closely, so that you could understand without hearing properly. On entering the workshop I found several other women arrayed similarly to myself standing in a little group. These I joined, and one of them asked me what "turning" I had done. I was mystified. I did not even know what she meant by "turning," so I explained to her that I had never worked on munitions before, and she was rather surprised, but comforted me by saying that I should very soon learn. As we were standing waiting, the men that were already working looked at us as though we were some special species of humanity, and that they were very much interested in the species was quite evident. After a while the foreman came and took some of us off, and placed us under the care of a Belgian, saying, "He will teach you all you want to know." After instructing two other women he came to me and said in French, "Do you speak French?" I told him I did. Then he explained everything about the machine: how to place the shell into it, how to set it revolving, how to stop the revolving, and how to release it, how to gauge the shell, and how to bring the machine to the starting point again.

I was now thoroughly awake to the fact that I had to do finishing turning to 4.5 shells. My idea about packing bullets was quite put aside, and I blushed to remember that I had thought I should have such easy work to do.

The first shell I did came out too small because the machine was not regulated properly. I was very much concerned about this, but the Belgian assured me that I was not to grieve, I should do much better next time. After that I was very careful not to get another shell too small, so about every few minutes I stopped to measure it, and although it took a longer time to finish it was better in the long run, because it was the exact measurement. I continued to do turning until one o'clock, when all machines were stopped working and everyone went to lunch.

All the women had their lunch in a quaint room just above the workshop. It was a low room, and one saw the rafters above one's head. It reminded me very much of "My Room Beneath the Rafters," only one had to imagine one was in a farmhouse instead of a munition factory.

At two o'clock the whistle blew, and all machines were again set in motion, and we all recommenced work. After lunch I was told I could do some filing. The man near me heard this and said, "That's a rotten job; I'm sure you won't like it." I told him one had to do a great many things that were distasteful in war time, and I made up my mind that I would like it whatever kind of job it was. It was not really a bad job; true

Nottingham Express
22/4/16

WOMEN AND WAR WORK.

Duke of Portland's Great Tribute to Their Achievements.

ARNOT HILL HOSPITAL EXTENDED.

Arnot Hill Hospital, Arnold—which, though only established a year ago, holds the unique distinction of being the first local auxiliary hospital to receive British wounded—having outgrown its accommodation, a new ward was yesterday formally opened by the Duke of Portland in the presence of a numerous and representative assembly. Up to date no fewer than 506 wounded soldiers have found shelter beneath its sympathetic roof, and now the original 40 beds are being augmented by 22, with two bedrooms for the surgical nurses who are in attendance. The Hon. Mrs. Birkin is the energetic and zealous commandant-in-charge. She gave the project a splendid "send-off." Substantial donations were received from numerous friends, and a special grant came from the Notts. Branch of the British Red Cross Society, and the outcome now seen, for the handsome new ward measures 70 feet long and 20 feet broad, and is replete in every respect.

Colonel F. E. Seely presided at the opening function, supported by the Duke of Portland, Colonel Ashwell, Colonel Battersby, Dr. Francis (Arnold), Mrs. Birkin, Miss Ida Birkin, &c.

Women's Splendid Work.

The Duke of Portland, in declaring the ward open, paid a high tribute to the war work of our women. In viewing a hospital of that kind, he said, they saw a splendid example of one very large and very important section of the work that was being done by women—work, indeed, of a most essential and indispensable character, and work for the successful accomplishment of which women were instinctively gifted and peculiarly adapted. (Hear, hear.) Taking a broad survey of the war-work that was being done by women, his Grace emphasised that they were simply splendid; they had risen to the occasion and to the height of the nation's need. (Hear, hear.) It fell to their lot to nurse back to health and strength those who had been disabled in this stern, strenuous, and stupendous struggle, in the prosecution of which the nation, he was convinced, would not falter until victory had been achieved. (Applause.) His Grace also warmly eulogised the task the men of the country were accomplishing. Nobly had our manhood responded to the call of duty; men and women, in fact, were being inspired to an amount of willing service such as had never before been concentrated in one united national purpose. (Applause.)

Women had freely given themselves to service surrendering their time, their amusements, and their comfort. (Hear, hear.) They had undergone courses of training and had fitted themselves for hospital work in a manner and with a cheerful alacrity worthy of all praise. (Applause.)

Notts. Women's Response.

He did not think the women of Notts. had been surpassed by the women of any other county in the devoted and energetic earnestness with which they had discharged the multifarious duties which they had so willingly and eagerly undertaken. (Hear, hear). Whatever had been the nature of the necessity or requirement, the women of Notts. had made quick and adequate response. In fact, like Queen Elizabeth in the days of the Armada, though "possessing the body of a weak and feeble woman, they had the heart and stomach of a king, and of a King of England too." (Applause.)

Wherever a hospital had been required it had been provided, and when, as in that case, it had been found necessary to enlarge one, the commandant and her staff of assistants had been equal to the occasion. (Hear, hear.) Heartily did he congratulate Mrs. Birkin on the success of her efforts, and he was proud to think she and her efficient staff were doing such excellent work.

Concluding, his Grace said all knew from innumerable testimonies how brave and gallant our soldiers had proved in the field, and when he visited a Red Cross hospital he was always impressed with the wonderfully courageous, cheerful, and hopeful spirit in which the men bore their sufferings. All honour to them and the devoted women who attended them. (Applause.) He had much pleasure in declaring the new ward open, and was confident that the wounded and sick soldiers who came there would speedily realise they could not possibly be in better hands. (Applause.

Tribute to Medical Men.

Colonel Ashwell proposed a vote of thanks to the Duke, and in seconding, Dr. Francis said they all knew his Grace was just now a very busy man but the greatness of his heart was equally well known. (Applause.)

Acknowledging the compliment, his Grace paid a well-merited tribute to the medical staff of the hospital. These gentlemen gave unstintingly of their time and abilities; in fact he did not know what the wounded would do without them. (Hear, hear.)

Thanks were also accorded the chairman, on the motion of the Duke of Portland, seconded by Mrs. Birkin, the latter expressing the opinion that they had in Colonel Seely and his late father two of their very best friends.

This concluded the ceremony, and a brief inspection was then made of the new wards of the same, the corvée that presses very heavily on women is an evil and a real social danger. Like the French peasant's corvée, it is a relic of a past age; and in its beginnings, it was not an evil, taken as part of an older social system, which in our day is rapidly being abolished. Old divisions of labour in France, not necessarily oppressive in the ninth century, left it open to the seigneur to have certain payments made in work rather than in money, which was scarce. Old divisions of labour in Great Britain, and in all old societies, assign work within the house to the woman as her share of the day's labour. The peasant-woman all the world over, works at certain seasons in the fields, and she prepares the meals, rears the children, and waits upon the men-folk. The old divisions persist under industrial conditions, and for reasons which we shall presently examine, the woman-worker is unable to readjust her day's work. She works "double-tides," and the second day's work in the twenty-four hours takes a heavy toll of her strength. At first sight this may seem a piece of bad management, or perversity, or "a woman's way" of setting about her job. The second discovery quickly follows that her wages are almost invariably too scanty to permit her to pay or support another woman to "do for" her; as the wage-earning man supports the wife or pays the housekeeper who takes these cares off his shoulders. Some pseudo-economists have managed to discover that the man's wages are higher becau has a wife and family to keep, forgetting that, if a man ren a bachelor his wages are just as high—because he is a man.

The British

amateur I should have ... simple. The idea of having to work a large machine ... occurred to me.

After taking off my hat and coat and putting my munition frock, cap and gloves on, I went into the workshop. This was a very large shop, with rows of machines, like those one sees in pictures, with straps running from the machine on the floor to an affair of wheels and rollers near the ceiling. The noise of the machines made it almost impossible to hear yourself speak, and when you were spoken to you had to watch the speaker's mouth very closely, so that you could understand without hearing properly. On entering the workshop I found several other women arrayed similarly to myself standing in a little group. These I joined, and one of them asked me what "turning" I had done. I was mystified. I did not even know what she meant by "turning," so I explained to her that I had never worked on munitions before, and she was rather surprised, but comforted me by saying that I should very soon learn. As we were standing waiting, the men that were already working looked at us as though we were some special species of humanity, and that they were very much interested in the species was quite evident. After a while the foreman came and took some of us off, and placed us under the care of a Belgian, saying, "He will teach you all you want to know." After instructing two other women he came to me and said in French, "Do you speak French?" I told him I did. Then he explained everything about the machine: how to place the shell into it, how to set it revolving, how to stop the revolving, and how to release it, how to gauge the shell, and how to bring the machine to the starting point again.

I was now thoroughly awake to the fact that I had to do finishing turning to 4.5 shells. My idea about packing bullets was quite put aside, and I blushed to remember that I had thought I should have such easy work to do.

The first shell I did came out too small because the machine was not regulated properly. I was very much concerned about this, but the Belgian assured me that I was not to grieve, I should do much better next time. After that I was very careful not to get another shell too small, so about every few minutes I stopped to measure it, and although it took a longer time to finish it was better in the long run, because it was the exact measurement. I continued to do turning until one o'clock, when all machines were stopped working and everyone went to lunch.

All the women had their lunch in a quaint room just above the workshop. It was a low room, and one saw the rafters above one's head. It reminded me very much of "My Room Beneath the Rafters," only one had to imagine one was in a farmhouse instead of a munition factory.

At two o'clock the whistle blew, and all machines were again set in motion, and we all recommenced work. After lunch I was told I could do some filing. The man near me heard this and said, "That's a rotten job; I'm sure you won't like it." I told him one had to do a great many things that were distasteful in war time, and I made up my mind that I would like it whatever kind of job it was. It was not really a bad job; true

22/4/16

WOMEN AND WAR WORK.

Duke of Portland's Great Tribute to Their Achievements.

ARNOT HILL HOSPITAL EXTENDED.

Arnot Hill Hospital, Arnold—which, though only established a year ago, holds the unique distinction of being the first local auxiliary hospital to receive British wounded—having outgrown its accommodation, a new ward was yesterday formally opened by the Duke of Portland in the presence of a numerous and representative assembly. Up to date no fewer than 506 wounded soldiers have found shelter beneath its sympathetic roof, and now the original 40 beds are being augmented by 22, with two bedrooms for the surgical nurses who are in attendance. The Hon. Mrs. Birkin is the energetic and zealous commandant-in-charge. She gave the project a splendid "send-off." Substantial donations were received from numerous friends, and a special grant came from the Notts. Branch of the British Red Cross Society, and the outcome now seen, for the handsome new ward measures 70 feet long and 20 feet broad, and is replete in every respect.

Colonel F. E. Seely presided at the opening function, supported by the Duke of Portland, Colonel Ashwell, Colonel Battersby, Dr. Francis (Arnold), Mrs. Birkin, Miss Ida Birkin, &c.

Women's Splendid Work.

The Duke of Portland, in declaring the ward open, paid a high tribute to the war work of our women. In viewing a hospital of that kind, he said, they saw a splendid example of one very large and very important section of the work that was being done by women—work, indeed, of a most essential and indispensable character, and work for the successful accomplishment of which women were instinctively gifted and peculiarly adapted. (Hear, hear.) Taking a broad survey of the war-work that was being done by women, his Grace emphasised that they were simply splendid; they had risen to the occasion and to the height of the nation's need. (Hear, hear.) It fell to their lot to nurse back to health and strength those who had been disabled in this stern, strenuous, and stupendous struggle, in the prosecution of which the nation, he was convinced, would not falter until victory had been achieved. (Applause.) His Grace also warmly eulogised the task the men of the country were accomplishing. Nobly had our manhood responded to the call of duty; men and women, in fact, were being inspired to an amount of willing service such as had never before been concentrated in one united national purpose. (Applause.)

Women had freely given themselves to service surrendering their time, their amusements, and their comfort. (Hear, hear.) They had undergone courses of training and had fitted themselves for hospital work in a manner and with a cheerful alacrity worthy of all praise. (Applause.)

Notts. Women's Response.

He did not think the women of Notts. had been surpassed by the women of any other county in the devoted and energetic earnestness with which they had discharged the multifarious duties which they had so willingly and eagerly undertaken. (Hear, hear). Whatever had been the nature of the necessity or requirement, the women of Notts. had made quick and adequate response. In fact, like Queen Elizabeth in the days of the Armada, though "possessing the body of a weak and feeble woman, they had the heart and stomach of a king, and of a King of England too." (Applause.)

Wherever a hospital had been required it had been provided, and when, as in that case, it had been found necessary to enlarge one, the commandant and her staff of assistants had been equal to the occasion. (Hear, hear.) Heartily did he congratulate Mrs. Birkin on the success of her efforts, and he was proud to think she and her efficient staff were doing such excellent work.

Concluding, his Grace said all knew from innumerable testimonies how brave and gallant our soldiers had proved in the field, and when he visited a Red Cross hospital he was always impressed with the wonderfully courageous, cheerful, and hopeful spirit in which the men bore their sufferings. All honour to them and the devoted women who attended them. (Applause.) He had much pleasure in declaring the new ward open, and was confident that the wounded and sick soldiers who came there would speedily realise they could not possibly be in better hands. (Applause.

Tribute to Medical Men.

Colonel Ashwell proposed a vote of thanks to the Duke, and in seconding, Dr. Francis said they all knew his Grace was just now a very busy man but the greatness of his heart was equally well known. (Applause.)

Acknowledging the compliment, his Grace paid a well-merited tribute to the medical staff of the hospital. Those gentlemen gave unstintingly of their time and abilities; in fact he did not know what the wounded would do without them. (Hear, hear.)

Thanks were also accorded the chairman, on the motion of the Duke of Portland, seconded by Mrs. Birkin, the latter expressing the opinion that they had in Colonel Seely and his late father two of their very best friends.

This concluded the ceremony, and a brief inspection was then made of the new wards of the hospital.

Presentations to Nurses.

The Duchess of Portland subsequently visited the institution and presented some of the nurses with certificates they had recently gained.

Daily News & Leader
15-7-16.

NEWNHAM GIRLS ON THE LAND.

To the Editor of "The Daily News."

Sir,—Allow me to thank Miss Lindsell for her letter of July 13. Her last paragraph is the honourable explanation I expected from a student of Newnham (of which college I know more perhaps than she is aware), and explodes her assertion that "we think the facts important, because the 12s. estimate may discourage other women volunteers for land work who must live within their wages."

It was to draw the confession from Miss Lindsell that 12s. a week on the land is by no means a living wage (though unconsciously to her, her letter of the 5th gradually leads one to believe she thinks otherwise), that I issued my challenge. It will evidently surprise Miss Lindsell to learn that 12s. a week is considered a good living wage for single, and 19s. for married labourers. It is to the everlasting disgrace of employers who believe this, that extreme poverty is due. The belief is rife amongst those from whom we expect greater intelligence. When nurse on Lord ——'s estate, I had occasion to approach "My Lady" (a Conservative) on behalf of the widow of one of their own labourers who had died suddenly. Her reply was: "What has he done with his money? He had 19s. a week, nurse!" I did not answer. He also had brought up ten children.

My best wishes are with the Newnham girls, who, I hope, some day, will take an active part in land-labour reform, since I now know they are not viewless towards "the large questions raised."

DISTRICT NURSE.

Daily News
13/12/15

"MIDDLE-CLASS WOMEN IN FACTORIES."

(To the Editor.)

Sir,—I read Miss MacArthur's "Word of Friendly Counsel" with much interest. But I want to add something to what she has so admirably said about the way in which one can "fully learn what the life and labour of the average working-girl are like."

When the middle-class woman has finished her 12 hours' shift in a munition factory she goes home to a comfortable house, and if she has been on a night shift, to a comfortable, aired bed in a quiet bedroom.

When the working-girl comes back in the early morning she finds in most cases an unaired bed, which the day-worker has only just left—for in houses containing three very small bedrooms (sometimes only two), with families of seven, eight, or nine persons in them, there is no room for single beds—and in a close, stuffy room. If the window is kept open the street smells, all worse since so many street-sweepers have enlisted, and the smells from factories fill the room, and the continual noise outside, the ceaseless crying of someone's baby somewhere near, the jolting of heavy lorries and waggons, the monotonous cries of the street sellers with little rattling carts, the perpetual sound of machinery, all these noises hinder sleep. Besides, the girl must, more often than not, help in the house work as well as sleep.

Hundreds of streets in one Yorkshire city, now making munitions, consist entirely of back-to-back houses. If anyone really wishes to understand industrial life, and be one with the workers, and not merely an outsider, they must sleep in a back-to-back house. They will never forget the haunting smell of closeness, nor how every sound in the house is heard everywhere in it. There is no quiet and no privacy possible in such dwellings.

As for the food—when tea has to be bought in small quantities it has an entirely different taste from tea bought in large quantities in a middle-class house. The milk!—well, one wonders what it is made of! But the well-to-do woman will seldom, if ever, experience these things; for if she goes into these houses she will be given the best of everything (only the poor understand the highest courtesy, I sometimes think), and a wall of politeness will cut her off from obtaining this priceless valuable knowledge. Unless she goes feeling within her that there is not one shadow of difference between her and her hosts, except that they know infinitely more about life and its teachings than she has ever known, and perhaps ever will know; and that they often in ordinary daily life have to rise, and do rise, to heights of courage, devotion, and self-sacrifice that she in her prosperous sheltered home may never realise or understand in the least. Then they will treat her as a friend and comrade.

But these things must be seen from the inside.

ISABELLA O. FORD.

Dec. 13.

Weekly Dispatch
19/-12-15

663

MY EXPERIENCES AS A MUNITION WORKER.

A Woman Volunteer's Own Story of Hardships That Could Be Obviated.

In the following article a woman volunteer who left London to work in a munition factory in the north of England gives a vivid picture of the experiences she underwent. The writer, who is an elderly woman but strong and enthusiastic, was compelled to give up the work because of the hardships imposed by living a long distance from the factory and the long walks in bitter winter weather which that necessitated.

Blinding snow was falling when I reached my destination. There were no taxi-cabs about, so leaving my luggage at the station I wandered about the streets trying to find a room in an hotel. The first was full, but I managed to find accommodation in another.

"Don't you want a fire this bitter night?" asked the chambermaid. I shook my head and said bravely, "I've come to do munitions work."

"You ought to have gone to the Girls' Friendly Society," said the maid severely. "They will take you in for 14s. a week."

I went into the lounge and found half a dozen men making a tight semi-circle in front of the fire. They took no notice of me, and I stood outside the fire zone thinking: "Some of you are of military age, and I have come a long way to set one of you free to fight for your country, and you won't let me warm my toes before going to bed."

A BEDROOM FOR 16S.

I was told the next morning that the Army would shortly commandeer my room as the town was full of soldiers. At the registry office I was told that the householders were having the time of their lives and asking fancy prices for rooms. Several addresses were given me, but I was told that the two shillings charged for the information would probably be wasted. I tried twenty houses in vain, and it was snowing hard and freezing all the time. There were signs of great prosperity. Everybody looked well fed and well dressed. The shopkeepers were very independent.

"Rooms!" People laughed at the idea. The officers in the hotels wanted rooms, and they paid the best. In despair I stopped a clergyman, but he said he was looking for rooms himself, and advised me to go to a local vicar who was "doing lathe work."

At midday I found a landlady who was willing to make a bargain. Her husband was doing munition work, and if I made it worth her while she would move with him up to the attic and let me have the bedroom for 16s. The price was absurd but I took the room.

"My husband will call you," she said, "but you must get your own breakfast. I'll give you sandwiches overnight and dinner when you come back, but please don't make a noise, and don't use the bathroom because my lodgers wouldn't like it."

THE INSURANCE "TAX."

At 6 a.m. I left my lodgings and groped my way along the cold, dark streets to the factory. It took half an hour. I followed some girls up and down some steps and through yards and outhouses to a small room where girls and women were putting on blue caps and overalls.

"Come and get your time marked," said a girl. "You will lose a quarter of an hour if you're a minute late." In another room noisy with machinery a girl clerk took down my name. The girls were nice-looking, bright, clever, and were doing all sorts of lathe work easily and with no sign of weariness and fatigue. "It's easier than a sewing machine and not so hard as scrubbing," said one girl to me.

They were all eager to work, and some grumbled because for the moment they were doing nothing—only "making time," when they wanted to make "time and a half." They talked about the "progress man" and the "bonus man," and advised me not to "go on shells," which they said were turned at 1¼d. and 1½d. each. The supply, they said, was irregular and only "ladies" could afford to do such work.

The forewoman came up and asked me if I had been to the labour exchange. I hadn't, and she said I would have to go and register myself there although I was a voluntary worker.

Two of the girls took me round to the labour exchange. They seemed to have a whimsical idea about the Insurance Act. One of them said, "The Government knew there was war coming on, so they got Lloyd George to obtain the money for it by taking threepence or fourpence from your pay. You never see it again but you mustn't grumble, because it helps to pay for the war!"

At the labour exchange I was given a brown card and promised an unemployment book. The next day I was given a lathe and shown by a mechanic how to work it. He had been in the trenches in France but had been fetched back to follow his trade. He was very keen and pleasant about it. I found the work fairly simple and not exhausting. The girls all about me were constantly calculating how many hours they had been actually at work and the value of their bonuses.

WEARY MIDNIGHT TRUDGE.

During the shift I was working on I noticed their several slights mishaps—cuts and bruises, steel dust in the eyes, shells dropped on the feet, fainting, and shocks, but the girls took these troubles philosophically and said that a serious accident was a very rare occurrence. They were all very anxious to work on Sunday because then they received double pay. They said the night shift made them sick—beginning as it did at 11 p.m., just the time when they generally went to bed. They preferred the afternoon shift, 3 to 11, and I liked it very much more than the 7 a.m. to 3 and the 11 p.m. to 7 a.m. shifts.

A policeman would watch the girls off the premises at 11 p.m. and his curiosity was excited by a large suit case that I carried. One night he conducted me to the lodging house. "What's in that box?" he asked.

I explained that in the rush things were apt to be lost and that I wished to guard against certain creeping and crawling creatures that unfortunately had not remained in Noah's Ark. How he laughed!

Soon afterwards I was put on shells. I found that I could turn forty to fifty in a shift if the supply proved constant. But the girls did not make much money by shell work, so the ladies were given it. They (the ladies) were convinced it was because of their superior skill and not because of the length of their purse! All the workers agreed that the work was not difficult and that if accommodation could be found near the munitions area the greatest part of the hardship would vanish. But the long walks at midnight and in the early morning in snow and rain and bitter wind broke some of them up. Among them were officers' widows. Some said frankly that they were working in order to add to their small incomes. Others said it was pure patriotism and nothing else and that is what I think really inspired us all.

The voluntary workers said that after three or four months of lathe work they were earning 25s. a week and that the average weekly wage of the girls was 20s. I think that the highest wages earned in this factory was £2.

It struck me that 20s. was not adequate pay—even for unskilled workers.

The Daily Chronicle

30-12-15

WOMEN'S WORK FOR WOMEN.

THE NEEDS OF THE HOSPITALS.

By ELIZABETH SLOAN CHESSER, M.B.

The first aim of every woman interested in the great national questions of to-day is how best to serve the men who are fighting for us at the front. To nurse and cook and even scrub for the soldiers, every woman, whatever her social status, is ready to do her part. The soldier is first served, the first considered. But there is another aspect of the question. Ask the man at the front what his chief thought and anxiety are to-day, and he will assuredly answer, the welfare of his womenfolk. He will fight better and do his bit of work for the country with the zest and spirit we need just now, if he is assured that his wife and his mother, his "womenfolk," are cared for at home.

Women of all classes are giving voluntary service to the Red Cross hospitals and offering themselves as probationers to local and provincial infirmaries all over the country. Thousands of women are training themselves so that they may be efficient assistants in the months to come. There is no fear that the soldiers and sailors will suffer for lack of service or lack of money. But what of the womenfolk of the men who are fighting for us at the front? They are being visited and befriended, it is true. They are given sympathy and service. But we are apt to neglect them in one respect. There is always a certain number of suffering women, a small army who fill our dispensaries and hospitals for women's diseases, women who are the victims of neglect at childbirth, overwork, lack of care. They come to our women's wards in the hospitals, and if they can be ensured treatment 70 per cent. of them are "cured." At the least they are happier women for their time in hospital, and they are given a chance of motherhood as a result of improved health.

Women Who Can Help Women.

The war has caused many people to curtail, and in some instances to cancel, their subscriptions to the hospitals. At such a crisis as this it is natural that the sufferings of the soldiers should elicit the readiest response, but the women of the country must also have our serious consideration. Those of us who are alive to the importance of safeguarding the new generation of citizens realise that money spent on suffering women will have a far-reaching effect in the future. There are thousands of women with no chance of motherhood for lack of medical and surgical treatment in hospital. And at this time there is a special call for women to help in the upkeep of wards for women in the great hospitals, because women's elemental duty is the preservation, the conservation of life.

The London Hospital especially should have our sympathies. For years past it has provided treatment for approximately eight thousand women every year. The average cost per case is £5. And money given to assist these wards is war money in a sense—because our soldiers have left in our charge their women and their children. The London Hospital during the first six months of the war provided treatment for two thousand wounded soldiers besides facilities for operations and dental treatment to hundreds of men to fit them for enlistment. But the staff realises that, whatever else is being done, the relief of suffering women ought not to be neglected. A special effort has been made by Lord Knutsford to enlist women's interest and women's sympathy for the wards for women in the hospital. There is a spirit of solidarity amongst women just now, which makes it certain that all who are brought to understand that there is real need of assistance will respond by sending something to the women's wards of the hospital. Money is needed most of all, and shillings as well as pounds are gratefully received, but gifts of clothing suitable for the patients when they leave hospital are also welcome. Some of the workrooms started by women for women should be able to help the hospital in this respect. We help our soldiers if we safeguard the health and lives of their womenfolk. We help the country if we ensure better health to the women who are to be the mothers of the new generation. For these reasons alone, apart from the larger question of altruism, sympathy for the women who must depend upon charity for a chance of health, let women help the women's wards of the London Hospital.

Common Cause.
15.9.16

663b/20 .63.B.

Nottingham Express.
22/4/16

same, the corvée that presses very heavily on women is an evil and a real social danger. Like the French peasant's corvée, it is a relic of a past age; and in its beginnings, it was not an evil, taken as part of an older social system, which in our day is rapidly being abolished. Old divisions of labour in France, not necessarily oppressive in the ninth century, left it open to the seigneur to have certain payments made in work rather than in money, which was scarce. Old divisions of labour in Great Britain, and in all old societies, assign work within the house to the woman as her share of the day's labour. The peasant-woman all the world over, works at certain seasons in the fields, and she prepares the meals, rears the children, and waits upon the men-folk. The old divisions persist under industrial conditions, and for reasons which we shall presently examine, the woman-worker is unable to readjust her day's work. She works "double-tides," and the second day's work in the twenty-four hours takes a heavy toll of her strength. At first sight this may seem a piece of bad management, or perversity, or "a woman's way" of setting about her job. The second discovery quickly follows that her wages are almost invariably too scanty to permit her to pay or support another woman to "do for" her; as the wage-earning man supports the wife or pays the housekeeper who takes these cares off his shoulders. Some pseudo-economists have managed to discover that the man's wages are higher becau has a wife and family to keep, forgetting that, if a man ren a bachelor his wages are just as high—because he is a man.

The British

amateur I should have [illegible] simple. The idea of having to work a large machine [illegible] occurred to me.

After taking off my hat and coat and putting my munition frock, cap and gloves on, I went into the workshop. This was a very large shop, with rows of machines, like those one sees in pictures, with straps running from the machine on the floor to an affair of wheels and rollers near the ceiling. The noise of the machines made it almost impossible to hear yourself speak, and when you were spoken to you had to watch the speaker's mouth very closely, so that you could understand without hearing properly. On entering the workshop I found several other women arrayed similarly to myself standing in a little group. These I joined, and one of them asked me what "turning" I had done. I was mystified. I did not even know what she meant by "turning," so I explained to her that I had never worked on munitions before, and she was rather surprised, but comforted me by saying that I should very soon learn. As we were standing waiting, the men that were already working looked at us as though we were some special species of humanity, and that they were very much interested in the species was quite evident. After a while the foreman came and took some of us off, and placed us under the care of a Belgian, saying, "He will teach you all you want to know." After instructing two other women he came to me and said in French, "Do you speak French?" I told him I did. Then he explained everything about the machine: how to place the shell into it, how to set it revolving, how to stop the revolving, and how to release it, how to gauge the shell, and how to bring the machine to the starting point again.

I was now thoroughly awake to the fact that I had to do finishing turning to 4.5 shells. My idea about packing bullets was quite put aside, and I blushed to remember that I had thought I should have such easy work to do.

The first shell I did came out too small because the machine was not regulated properly. I was very much concerned about this, but the Belgian assured me that I was not to grieve, I should do much better next time. After that I was very careful not to get another shell too small, so about every few minutes I stopped to measure it, and although it took a longer time to finish it was better in the long run, because it was the exact measurement. I continued to do turning until one o'clock, when all machines were stopped working and everyone went to lunch.

All the women had their lunch in a quaint room just above the workshop. It was a low room, and one saw the rafters above one's head. It reminded me very much of "My Room Beneath the Rafters," only one had to imagine one was in a farmhouse instead of a munition factory.

At two o'clock the whistle blew, and all machines were again set in motion, and we all recommenced work. After lunch I was told I could do some filing. The man near me heard this and said, "That's a rotten job; I'm sure you won't like it." I told him one had to do a great many things that were distasteful in war time, and I made up my mind that I would like it whatever kind of job it was. It was not really a bad job; true

WOMEN AND WAR WORK.

Duke of Portland's Great Tribute to Their Achievements.

ARNOT HILL HOSPITAL EXTENDED.

Arnot Hill Hospital, Arnold—which, though only established a year ago, holds the unique distinction of being the first local auxiliary hospital to receive British wounded—having outgrown its accommodation, a new ward was yesterday formally opened by the Duke of Portland in the presence of a numerous and representative assembly. Up to date no fewer than 506 wounded soldiers have found shelter beneath its sympathetic roof, and now the original 40 beds are being augmented by 22, with two bedrooms for the surgical nurses who are in attendance. The Hon. Mrs. Birkin is the energetic and zealous commandant-in-charge. She gave the project a splendid "send-off." Substantial donations were received from numerous friends, and a special grant came from the Notts. Branch of the British Red Cross Society, and the outcome now seen, for the handsome new ward measures 70 feet long and 20 feet broad, and is replete in every respect.

Colonel F. E. Seely presided at the opening function, supported by the Duke of Portland, Colonel Ashwell, Colonel Battersby, Dr. Francis (Arnold), Mrs. Birkin, Miss Ida Birkin, &c.

Women's Splendid Work.

The Duke of Portland, in declaring the ward open, paid a high tribute to the war work of our women. In viewing a hospital of that kind, he said, they saw a splendid example of one very large and very important section of the work that was being done by women—work, indeed, of a most essential and indispensable character, and work for the successful accomplishment of which women were instinctively gifted and peculiarly adapted. (Hear, hear.) Taking a broad survey of the war-work that was being done by women, his Grace emphasised that they were simply splendid; they had risen to the occasion and to the height of the nation's need. (Hear, hear.) It fell to their lot to nurse back to health and strength those who had been disabled in this stern, strenuous, and stupendous struggle, in the prosecution of which the nation, he was convinced, would not falter until victory had been achieved. (Applause.) His Grace also warmly eulogised the task the men of the country were accomplishing. Nobly had our manhood responded to the call of duty; men and women, in fact, were being inspired to an amount of willing service such as had never before been concentrated in one united national purpose. (Applause.)

Women had freely given themselves to service surrendering their time, their amusements, and their comfort. (Hear, hear.) They had undergone courses of training and had fitted themselves for hospital work in a manner and with a cheerful alacrity worthy of all praise. (Applause.)

Notts. Women's Response.

He did not think the women of Notts. had been surpassed by the women of any other county in the devoted and energetic earnestness with which they had discharged the multifarious duties which they had so willingly and eagerly undertaken. (Hear, hear). Whatever had been the nature of the necessity or requirement, the women of Notts. had made quick and adequate response. In fact, like Queen Elizabeth in the days of the Armada, though "possessing the body of a weak and feeble woman, they had the heart and stomach of a king, and of a King of England too." (Applause.)

Wherever a hospital had been required it had been provided, and when, as in that case, it had been found necessary to enlarge one, the commandant and her staff of assistants had been equal to the occasion. (Hear, hear.) Heartily did he congratulate Mrs. Birkin on the success of her efforts, and he was proud to think she and her efficient staff were doing such excellent work.

Concluding, his Grace said all knew from innumerable testimonies how brave and gallant our soldiers had proved in the field, and when he visited a Red Cross hospital he was always impressed with the wonderfully courageous, cheerful, and hopeful spirit in which the men bore their sufferings. All honour to them and the devoted women who attended them. (Applause.) He had much pleasure in declaring the new ward open, and was confident that the wounded and sick soldiers who came there would speedily realise they could not possibly be in better hands. (Applause.

Tribute to Medical Men.

Colonel Ashwell proposed a vote of thanks to the Duke, and in seconding, Dr. Francis said they all knew his Grace was just now a very busy man, but the greatness of his heart was equally well known. (Applause.)

Acknowledging the compliment, his Grace paid a [illegible] tribute to the medical staff of the

First-Hand Experiences.

XV.—WEEK-END MUNITION WORK.

I had always been very eager to do some war work in my spare time, although I could not give my whole time to it. The opportunity came one day when I heard that Sunday munition workers were wanted to give the regular hands a rest. They must be at the factory at ten o'clock on Sunday morning, with lunch, a munition frock, cap, and gloves, and be prepared to work until six o'clock in the evening, having an hour for lunch and a quarter of an hour for tea.

Sunday happened to be a very brilliant day, and on the way to the factory I almost regretted that I was not free to go into the country and enjoy the sunshine and flowers; but I put these thoughts behind me, and, telling myself what patriotism really means, and how the regular munition workers stuck to their work under all conditions, I plodded along the hot street.

It happened that I did not know the exact whereabouts of the factory, but I soon lighted on it, because there were little bits of metal all round the door, and at a pair of large gates a heap of metal shavings; and just as the clock struck ten I stepped very gingerly through a small door cut in a pair of large ones and walked into the timekeeper's office. As I gave my name and address my heart began to beat. There was a roar of heavy machinery, which rather frightened me. I knew nothing whatever of machinery, and had thought that probably as I was an amateur I should have to pack bullets, or do something equally simple. The idea of having to work a large machine had never occurred to me.

After taking off my hat and coat and putting my munition frock, cap and gloves on, I went into the workshop. This was a very large shop, with rows of machines, like those one sees in pictures, with straps running from the machine on the floor to an affair of wheels and rollers near the ceiling. The noise of the machines made it almost impossible to hear yourself speak, and when you were spoken to you had to watch the speaker's mouth very closely, so that you could understand without hearing properly. On entering the workshop I found several other women arrayed similarly to myself standing in a little group. These I joined, and one of them asked me what "turning" I had done. I was mystified. I did not even know what she meant by "turning," so I explained to her that I had never worked on munitions before, and she was rather surprised, but comforted me by saying that I should very soon learn. As we were standing waiting, the men that were already working looked at us as though we were some special species of humanity, and that they were very much interested in the species was quite evident. After a while the foreman came and took some of us off, and placed us under the care of a Belgian, saying, "He will teach you all you want to know." After instructing two other women he came to me and said in French, "Do you speak French?" I told him I did. Then he explained everything about the machine: how to place the shell into it, how to set it revolving, how to stop the revolving, and how to release it, how to gauge the shell, and how to bring the machine to the starting point again.

I was now thoroughly awake to the fact that I had to do finishing turning to 4.5 shells. My idea about packing bullets was quite put aside, and I blushed to remember that I had thought I should have such easy work to do.

The first shell I did came out too small because the machine was not regulated properly. I was very much concerned about this, but the Belgian assured me that I was not to grieve, I should do much better next time. After that I was very careful not to get another shell too small, so about every few minutes I stopped to measure it, and although it took a longer time to finish it was better in the long run, because it was the exact measurement. I continued to do turning until one o'clock, when all machines were stopped working and everyone went to lunch.

All the women had their lunch in a quaint room just above the workshop. It was a low room, and one saw the rafters above one's head. It reminded me very much of "My Room Beneath the Rafters," only one had to imagine one was in a farmhouse instead of a munition factory.

At two o'clock the whistle blew, and all machines were again set in motion, and we all recommenced work. After lunch I was told I could do some filing. The man near me heard this and said, "That's a rotten job; I'm sure you won't like it." I told him one had to do a great many things that were distasteful in war time, and I made up my mind that I would like it whatever kind of job it was. It was not really a bad job; true it was a bit dusty, and the afternoon was hot, but I did my best not to let the man see that I thought it "a rotten job."

Through an open door opposite me I could see a yellowy-green bank edging what looked like a stream. The sun was shining radiantly; I never admired a little bit of green so much as that. I have no doubt that it was the fact of my being in a factory among so many machines that made the grass look so inviting, for I know now that that bit of green is a very dank, weedy marsh, and the lively stream an East-end wharf. At half-past four the whistle blew again, and we all hurried off to tea. Tea was taken in the same room as lunch, and we partook of bread and butter, not thin, and tea in cups that were also not thin. That tea was the most hurried one I had ever taken. The tea itself was very hot; we had only a quarter of an hour in which to drink it; but we had great fun all trying to get finished first.

We went down again to the workshop at a quarter to five, and worked steadily on until nearly six. Then a man came round and said would we call for our money on our way to the dressing-room. This surprised me greatly, for I certainly did not think that I had earned enough to be called for. However, I was paid 2s. 7½d., which was really very good considering what I had done. The Belgian was very profuse in his praises, but I am afraid he was not sincere, because I had to ask him so many times how to release the shell, and then could not turn the bolt, so that he always had to do it for me. On the whole, I quite enjoyed my day's work on munitions, but for a long time after my arms felt quite twice their original length, and I could still hear the din of machinery in my ears.

The Duke of Portland, in declaring the ward open, paid a high tribute to the war work of our women. In viewing a hospital of that kind, he said, they saw a splendid example of one very large and very important section of the work that was being done by women—work, indeed, of a most essential and indispensable character, and work for the successful accomplishment of which women were instinctively gifted and peculiarly adapted. (Hear, hear.) Taking a broad survey of the war-work that was being done by women, his Grace emphasised that they were simply splendid; they had risen to the occasion and to the height of the nation's need. (Hear, hear.) It fell to their lot to nurse back to health and strength those who had been disabled in this stern, strenuous, and stupendous struggle, in the prosecution of which the nation, he was convinced, would not falter until victory had been achieved. (Applause.) His Grace also warmly eulogised the task the men of the country were accomplishing. Nobly had our manhood responded to the call of duty; men and women, in fact, were being inspired to an amount of willing service such as had never before been concentrated in one united national purpose. (Applause.)

Women had freely given themselves to service surrendering their time, their amusements, and their comfort. (Hear, hear.) They had undergone courses of training and had fitted themselves for hospital work in a manner and with a cheerful alacrity worthy of all praise. (Applause.)

Notts. Women's Response.

He did not think the women of Notts. had been surpassed by the women of any other county in the devoted and energetic earnestness with which they had discharged the multifarious duties which they had so willingly and eagerly undertaken. (Hear, hear). Whatever had been the nature of the necessity or requirement, the women of Notts. had made quick and adequate response. In fact, like Queen Elizabeth in the days of the Armada, though "possessing the body of a weak and feeble woman, they had the heart and stomach of a king, and of a King of England too." (Applause.)

Wherever a hospital had been required it had been provided, and when, as in that case, it had been found necessary to enlarge one, the commandant and her staff of assistants had been equal to the occasion. (Hear, hear.) Heartily did he congratulate Mrs. Birkin on the success of her efforts, and he was proud to think she and her efficient staff were doing such excellent work.

Concluding, his Grace said all knew from innumerable testimonies how brave and gallant our soldiers had proved in the field, and when he visited a Red Cross hospital he was always impressed with the wonderfully courageous, cheerful, and hopeful spirit in which the men bore their sufferings. All honour to them and the devoted women who attended them. (Applause.) He had much pleasure in declaring the new ward open, and was confident that the wounded and sick soldiers who came there would speedily realise they could not possibly be in better hands. (Applause.

Tribute to Medical Men.

Colonel Ashwell proposed a vote of thanks to the Duke, and in seconding, Dr. Francis said they all knew his Grace was just now a very busy man but the greatness of his heart was equally well known. (Applause.)

Acknowledging the compliment, his Grace paid a well-merited tribute to the medical staff of the hospital. Those gentlemen gave unstintingly of their time and abilities; in fact he did not know what the wounded would do without them. (Hear, hear.)

Thanks were also accorded the chairman, on the motion of the Duke of Portland, seconded by Mrs. Birkin, the latter expressing the opinion that they had in Colonel Seely and his late father two of their very best friends.

This concluded the ceremony, and a brief inspection was then made of the new wards of the hospital.

Presentations to Nurses.

The Duchess of Portland subsequently visited the institution and presented some of the nurses with certificates they had recently gained.

amateur I should have to pack bullets, or do something equally simple. The idea of having to work a large machine had never occurred to me.

After taking off my hat and coat and putting my munition frock, cap and gloves on, I went into the workshop. This was a very large shop, with rows of machines, like those one sees in pictures, with straps running from the machine on the floor to an affair of wheels and rollers near the ceiling. The noise of the machines made it almost impossible to hear yourself speak, and when you were spoken to you had to watch the speaker's mouth very closely, so that you could understand without hearing properly. On entering the workshop I found several other women arrayed similarly to myself standing in a little group. These I joined, and one of them asked me what "turning" I had done. I was mystified. I did not even know what she meant by "turning," so I explained to her that I had never worked on munitions before, and she was rather surprised, but comforted me by saying that I should very soon learn. As we were standing waiting, the men that were already working looked at us as though we were some special species of humanity, and that they were very much interested in the species was quite evident. After a while the foreman came and took some of us off, and placed us under the care of a Belgian, saying, "He will teach you all you want to know." After instructing two other women he came to me and said in French, "Do you speak French?" I told him I did. Then he explained everything about the machine: how to place the shell into it, how to set it revolving, how to stop the revolving, and how to release it, how to gauge the shell, and how to bring the machine to the starting point again.

I was now thoroughly awake to the fact that I had to do finishing turning to 4.5 shells. My idea about packing bullets was quite put aside, and I blushed to remember that I had thought I should have such easy work to do.

The first shell I did came out too small because the machine was not regulated properly. I was very much concerned about this, but the Belgian assured me that I was not to grieve, I should do much better next time. After that I was very careful not to get another shell too small, so about every few minutes I stopped to measure it, and although it took a longer time to finish it was better in the long run, because it was the exact measurement. I continued to do turning until one o'clock, when all machines were stopped working and everyone went to lunch.

All the women had their lunch in a quaint room just above the workshop. It was a low room, and one saw the rafters above one's head. It reminded me very much of "My Room Beneath the Rafters," only one had to imagine one was in a farmhouse instead of a munition factory.

At two o clock the whistle blew, and all machines were again set in motion, and we all recommenced work. After lunch I was told I could do some filing. The man near me heard this and said, "That's a rotten job; I'm sure you won't like it." I told him one had to do a great many things that were distasteful in war time, and I made up my mind that I would like it whatever kind of job it was. It was not really a bad job; true my arms felt quite twice their original length, and I could still hear the din of machinery in my ears.

The Duke of Portland, in declaring the ward open, paid a high tribute to the war work of our women. In viewing a hospital of that kind, he said, they saw a splendid example of one very large and very important section of the work that was being done by women—work, indeed, of a most essential and indispensable character, and work for the successful accomplishment of which women were instinctively gifted and peculiarly adapted. (Hear, hear.) Taking a broad survey of the war-work that was being done by women, his Grace emphasised that they were simply splendid; they had risen to the occasion and to the height of the nation's need. (Hear, hear.) It fell to their lot to nurse back to health and strength those who had been disabled in this stern, strenuous, and stupendous struggle, in the prosecution of which the nation, he was convinced, would not falter until victory had been achieved. (Applause.) His Grace also warmly eulogised the task the men of the country were accomplishing. Nobly had our manhood responded to the call of duty; men and women, in fact, were being inspired to an amount of willing service such as had never before been concentrated in one united national purpose. (Applause.)

Women had freely given themselves to service, surrendering their time, their amusements, and their comfort. (Hear, hear.) They had undergone courses of training and had fitted themselves for hospital work in a manner and with a cheerful alacrity worthy of all praise. (Applause.)

Notts. Women's Response.

He did not think the women of Notts. had been surpassed by the women of any other county in the devoted and energetic earnestness with which they had discharged the multifarious duties which they had so willingly and eagerly undertaken. (Hear, hear). Whatever had been the nature of the necessity or requirement, the women of Notts. had made quick and adequate response. In fact, like Queen Elizabeth in the days of the Armada, though "possessing the body of a weak and feeble woman, they had the heart and stomach of a king, and of a King of England too." (Applause.)

Wherever a hospital had been required it had been provided, and when, as in that case, it had been found necessary to enlarge one, the commandant and her staff of assistants had been equal to the occasion. (Hear, hear.) Heartily did he congratulate Mrs. Birkin on the success of her efforts, and he was proud to think she and her efficient staff were doing such excellent work.

Concluding, his Grace said all knew from innumerable testimonies how brave and gallant our soldiers had proved in the field, and when he visited a Red Cross hospital he was always impressed with the wonderfully courageous, cheerful, and hopeful spirit in which the men bore their sufferings. All honour to them and the devoted women who attended them. (Applause.) He had much pleasure in declaring the new ward open, and was confident that the wounded and sick soldiers who came there would speedily realise they could not possibly be in better hands. (Applause.

Tribute to Medical Men.

Colonel Ashwell proposed a vote of thanks to the Duke, and in seconding, Dr. Francis said they all knew his Grace was just now a very busy man but the greatness of his heart was equally well known. (Applause.)

Acknowledging the compliment, his Grace paid a well-merited tribute to the medical staff of the hospital. Those gentlemen gave unstintingly of their time and abilities; in fact he did not know what the wounded would do without them. (Hear, hear.)

Thanks were also accorded the chairman, on the motion of the Duke of Portland, seconded by Mrs. Burkin, the latter expressing the opinion that they had in Colonel Seely and his late father two of their very best friends.

This concluded the ceremony, and a brief inspection was then made of the new wards of the hospital.

Presentations to Nurses.

The Duchess of Portland subsequently visited the institution and presented some of the nurses with certificates they had recently gained.

Daily News & Leader
15-7-16.

NEWNHAM GIRLS ON THE LAND.

To the Editor of "The Daily News."

Sir,—Allow me to thank Miss Lindsell for her letter of July 13. Her last paragraph is the honourable explanation I expected from a student of Newnham (of which college I know more perhaps than she is aware), and explodes her assertion that "we think the facts important, because the 12s. estimate may discourage other women volunteers for land work who must live within their wages."

It was to draw the confession from Miss Lindsell that 12s. a week on the land is by no means a living wage (though unconsciously to her, her letter of the 5th gradually leads one to believe she thinks otherwise), that I issued my challenge. It will evidently surprise Miss Lindsell to learn that 12s. a week is considered a good living wage for single, and 19s. for married labourers. It is to the everlasting disgrace of employers who believe this, that extreme poverty is due. The belief is rife amongst those from whom we expect greater intelligence. When nurse on Lord ——'s estate, I had occasion to approach "My Lady" (a Conservative) on behalf of the widow of one of their own labourers who had died suddenly. Her reply was: "What has he done with his money? He had 19s. a week, nurse!" I did not answer. He also had brought up ten children.

My best wishes are with the Newnham girls, who, I hope, some day, will take an active part in land-labour reform, since I now know they are not viewless towards "the large questions raised."

DISTRICT NURSE.

Irish Times
17-7-16 Dublin

VOLUNTEER WOMEN WORKERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE IRISH TIMES.

SIR,—I regret very much to read of the very urgent need of the Red Cross Depôts for volunteer women workers. While determined to give what assistance I can at the earliest opportunity, may I defend my fellow-women from the accusations of frivolity and callousness which are implied in a recent appeal for women recruits, and may I suggest that the lack of workers may be in part due to lack of organisation? The women of Dublin and elsewhere are not shirking their part because they have not been sewing in Red Cross workrooms. One of the ways in which they are doing their bit is in paying for the war. They have to give a great deal of time and attention to adjusting their expenditure to altered incomes and to replacing in their homes the labour of the men and women whom the nation has called to arms and to the making of munitions. A great number are actively engaged in hospitals and other places where they are needed. Those at home would gladly help if they knew that work was necessary, but I would suggest that the Red Cross Society should give them definite, as well as indefinite, invitations to assist them. Any time is inclined to become no time in a busy day. The Dépôts are wise in not limiting the work to special hours or days, in order that the busiest women can give their occasional moments; but they would be still wiser if, in addition, they would have a roll-book for a certain number of days and hours for which ladies should definitely pledge themselves to attend. Possibly this may already have been done. If so, a reference to the matter in the daily Press will only serve to give prominence to their appeal, and in all circumstances I hope they will forgive a little friendly advice.—Yours, etc.,

"ANXIOUS TO HELP."

Dublin, July 15th, 1916.

Farmers & Stock
17-7-16.

NATIONAL COUNCIL AND WOMEN WORKERS

The following has been sent to us :—"The National Land Council is not only supplying hundreds of girls and women as fruit pickers and harvesters, but its work of training girls for more skilled farm work is making great progress.

"Many farmers are taking promising girls and training them, on condition that they stay on at a wage after they have learnt the work. Girls so placed are doing well and really helping the farmers, who are giving a satisfactory account of them. Indeed, there are surprisingly few failures. The Council has also girls who have gained experience in milking, care of stock, and general field work. Farmers who are in need of such labour should apply at once to the Secretary, National Land Council, 16, St. James's-street, London, S.W.

"Applications are dealt with immediately, and every effort made to meet the particular needs of the case. Farmers who apply should, to save time, state the accommodation and wages offered."

Yorkshire Herald
8.7-1916.

WOMEN'S WORK ON THE LAND

To the EDITOR of the YORKSHIRE HERALD

Sir,—A meeting to urge the necessity for women to come forward as workers upon the land was held at the University on Wednesday last. There are several centres in Yorkshire at which short preparatory experience can be obtained, and all information concerning these centres, and particulars of farms requiring labour will be given on application at the Lady Mayoress' Committee Rooms, 4, Park-row, Leeds, between 11 and 1 o'clock. The need is urgent. We are told that 300,000 farm labourers have been called to serve with the colours, and we are certain that when the women of England realise the necessity for their work in this direction it will be given as self-denyingly as has been the case when it has been asked for hospital, munition, and for all kinds of office work.—Yours truly,

M. E. ANSTRUTHER, Hon. Sec.,
Lady Mayoress' Committee.
4, Park-row, Leeds, July 7th, 1916.

663 b. Daily News & Leader 2.8.16.

EDUCATED WOMEN

Urgently Needed to Work in Munition Factories.

The Ministry of Munitions inform us that more women of the leisured and educated classes are needed for munition work. They are asked to join one or other of the sixty training centres that have been set up in various parts of the kingdom.

The women who are wanted must be between the ages of 18 and 45, ready to go to any part of the country, and capable of becoming machine operators in a shell factory, where they will earn at first £1 or 25s. a week. Afterwards, when they are placed on piecework, their earnings will depend upon their own efforts, and may well run up to £3 a week.

"Some of the work is extremely fine work," it was stated. "It is no exaggeration, for example, to say that the life of an aviator often depends on the ten thousandth part of an inch. Aero engine work, for which women are needed, is particularly fine, and the experience of manufacturers is that the better educated the operator the more rapidly does she acquire the habit of working to fine limits."

The training is free, the normal course being four hours a day for six weeks. Londoners should offer their services to Mr. J. C. Smail, L.C.C. Education Offices, Embankment, E.C. The Training Section of the Ministry of Munitions, 6, Whitehall Gardens, S.W., will give the address of the nearest training centre to applicants from the provinces.

Daily News & Leader.
5.8.16.

EDUCATED WOMEN.

Rival Claims of Munitions, Hospitals, and the Land.

Educated women are wanted on the land.

This is the emphatic statement of the Women's National Land Service Corps in reply to rumours that women of this type are no longer asked for by farmers. There has proved to be very little demand for what may be described as holiday labour during August, but women who are willing to go on the land for the duration of the war are still eagerly sought after.

The trouble is that there are not enough educated women to go round, and something like a game of grab between the various interests is the result.

"The special appeal of the past week for educated women to take up munitions and V.A.D. work has hit us very hard," Mrs. Roland Wilkins, head of the Land Service Corps, confessed to a "Daily News" representative. "Very few suitable women are offering themselves; yet the demand about the end of September, when large numbers of men who have been allowed time will probably be called up, is likely to be enormous.

"Women joining now can get six weeks' training—just enough to let them feel their feet—before the rush comes. We can deal with 60 to 70 a week at our training farms, and guarantee plenty of work afterwards."

It ought to be added that Mrs. Roland Wilkins is very careful whom she accepts for service in the corps. She prides herself on rejecting 80 per cent. of applicants, and on having kept 3,500 unsuitable women from trying their hands on the land, and thus damaging the reputation of women among farmers. But she is ready to accept with open arms the girl with grit, the girl who will take the rough with the smooth for the sake of her country, and the girl who does not merely think that a little country air would do her health good.

Daily Mail.
22.9.16.

5,000 WOMEN FOR THE LAND.

The Women's National Land Service Corps, 50, Upper Baker-street, N.W., have on the London hoardings a gaily coloured poster asking for 5,000 educated women between the ages of 18 and 35.

"We are badly in need of the women," said the secretary of the corps yesterday. "It is essential that women workers should start their training at once to be ready to replace agricultural labourers who will be called up when the harvest is over. There were many exemptions granted for men until the harvest was in."

The Times
7.10.16

EDUCATED WOMEN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir,—The correspondence now appearing in your columns on the need of a "Panel for Educated Women" has attracted the attention of the Executive Committee of the Women's Institute, which for the last 17 years has been in close touch with all movements affecting the interests of women. During the whole of that time the training of educated women for secretarial work has been one of our most important activities, and many of our old pupils are now filling posts of public trust and responsibility.

It is our conviction, based on experience, that, given adequate remuneration and satisfactory prospects of advancement—conditions hitherto absent—there would be no difficulty in attracting to posts in the service of the Government well-trained, experienced, and highly-educated women in sufficient numbers to set free the men who are needed elsewhere. Information as to such workers and graded lists of them are available at the offices of the Central Bureau for the Employment of Women, 5, Prince's-street, Cavendish-square, W.; the Federation of University Women, 11, Hart-street, W.C.; The Women's Institute, 92, Victoria-street, S.W., and similar organizations.

Yours, &c.,
M. K. STANBARD, President.
The Women's Institute, 92, Victoria-street, S.W., Oct. 7.

663.B.
The Times.
29.9.16.
6636/24

A PANEL OF EDUCATED WOMEN.

NEEDS OF MUNITIONS MINISTRY.

There is a general impression, as stated in the article published in The Times of Wednesday, that little use is being made of educated women in Government offices to take the place of young men engaged on administrative work who ought to be released to join the Forces.

A representative of The Times called at the Ministry of Munitions to ascertain what openings existed on the staff for women with a university training or the equivalent, and was informed that considerable difficulty was being experienced in obtaining women of this type. Almost half of the present staff of the Ministry are women, and in view of the continued increase of work and of the fact that men of military age are, wherever possible, being released to join the Army, it is expected that the proportion of women will be even further increased in the near future.

Most of the work of the Ministry, other than the routine clerical work, which is now mainly performed by women, is of a technical character, for the performance of which special qualifications, rarely found at the present time among women, are required; but there is a considerable demand for educated women to assist in the higher branches of statistical work, in correspondence involving a knowledge of engineering, chemical, economical, or industrial problems, and in financial work of a superior kind.

It is stated that the Ministry are finding great difficulty in securing the services of educated women with business experience obtained either by service with commercial firms or in charitable and voluntary organizations conducted on real business lines. Women with either administrative or technical experience can readily be employed, but the mere possession of a university degree or equivalent academic qualifications is hardly enough by itself.

Rates of Pay.

It does not appear that the question of pay presents any great difficulty. For routine clerical work the rates approximate to those obtainable in the ordinary market. For superior work rates of salary up to £150 or £200 a year can be given according to the ability of the candidate and the nature of the work to be performed; and in some cases even higher rates have been given.

The needs of the Ministry vary from day to day and from week to week, and although every care is taken that a good candidate's qualifications shall be brought simultaneously to the notice of all Departments of the Ministry, a suitable vacancy may not necessarily be open on the day of the application. It is often found that an excellent candidate is lost because the vacancy suited to her qualifications does not arise until some days after her application has been received. What the Ministry are anxious to secure is a panel of educated women with business experience who will place their services at their disposal and give a reasonable time for their applications to be considered with reference to the vacancies arising.

The opportunity thus afforded for educated women of gaining administrative experience on Government work should prove of great value as providing a means of training which has hitherto not been available.

It may be added that the Ministry are guided by expert advice in matters affecting the welfare and special interests of women working in their offices.

Applications for employment in the Ministry should be made by letter addressed to the General Secretary, Ministry of Munitions, Whitehall-place, S.W., and should contain full details as to the qualifications and experience of the candidate.

Glasgow Herald Aug. 12. 1916.

WOMEN'S WORK IN SCOTLAND.

DURING AND AFTER THE WAR.

"LEISURED WOMEN ARE NEEDED."

A propos an article which appeared in our columns recently on women workers in a Scottish shell-filling factory, it is of interest to note that in shell-making factories there are varying conditions which make the work possible for women who could not stand the physical strain of long hours. While the twelve hours day is the more usual, there is at least one factory having eight-hour shifts, and so excellent are the conditions under which the girls work that many capable women who, not having had previous experience in factory or warehouse work, would not be physically fit for a twelve hours day, are here able to turn out splendid work.

The factory is new and has been specially constructed with a view to present needs, therefore there is plenty of floor space to allow of seats being provided for the workers, who, by the way, wear with their khaki overalls white net caps, which are much lighter than khaki caps, for summer wear. The model canteen is under the direction of a highly trained staff, including ladies with St Andrew's Ambulance, V.A.D., or Red Cross certificates. An ambulance fitted up for first aid is on the premises, and the lady attendant at the stores can do splendid first aid work in case of emergency. Eight-hour-a-day workers of course have a smaller wage than those on a twelve-hour shift, but the weekly pay can always be augmented by piecework, while night work is invariably paid extra.

Even with regard to what is generally known as war work, it should be borne in mind that most of the appointments now being made, though nominally for the duration of the war, may be continued for a considerable time after the cessation of hostilities. For example, it is believed by those in a position to know, that the Women Welfare Workers in factories have come to stay. So satisfactory have they proved themselves that this may now be regarded as an excellent opening for educated women. Many of these appointments, and others of a similar nature, are being made, and suitable candidates are specially trained for their duties.

In Scotland there is at present one woman works manager, and there are women overseers and forewomen, also examiners and inspectors for shell-making and shell-filling. Many of these appointments will go on indefinitely. Glass-making and the preparation of dyes are two of the many trades in which women will find employment. There are also certain branches of instrument-making specially suitable for women. One firm is employing female acetylene-welders, and there are women fire-patrols under the direct control of a fire-master. Mention may likewise be made of trolley women and of the women engaged—as a result of the new schemes where the Dilution Commissioners have released men for active service—in shipbuilding yards.

Much difficulty is experienced in securing women for agricultural work. Even those specially suited to undertake various duties on the land prefer munition work, which is better paid, and which apparently they find more congenial. Girls who have been dairy-maids and those who previous to marriage were farm servants now refuse to take up their old work so long as it is possible to secure employment in shell-making factories. So important is this aspect of the industrial question that committees have been formed under the auspices of the Board of Trade to try to induce married women and girls at present out of work to go back to their previous employment or trade, and so help to carry on the work of the country.

"Experienced, skilled girls should remain at their trade," said an official with whom one of our representatives had a chat the other day. "There is no rush on them for munition work. Juniors who are not of so much value to their present employers, and whose subsequent training will not be materially affected by a year or so lost at this time—these are the girls wanted for munition factories just now. There is no patriotism in older girls giving up the normal work for which they are really needed. In giving it up they show a lack of true patriotism. As regards women of leisure, they, too, are needed—very much needed. And this is a fact that should be emphasised. Of course there are people who say that women of means have no right to take work that might be done by their more needy sisters. The truth of the matter is that at present there is work (and well-paid work) for everybody. And obviously certain duties will be much better discharged by educated women than by working girls who can serve their country much better at some other branch of industry."

It is interesting to note that while social work naturally appeals to many leisured women who may have been engaged in a dilettante way in something of the kind in pre-war days, and whose amateur knowledge may form a good basis for future professional [illegible] including ladies with St Andrew's Ambulance, V.A.D., or Red Cross certificates. An ambulance fitted up for first aid is on the premises, and the lady attendant at the stores can do splendid first aid work in case of emergency. Eight-hour-a-day workers of course have a smaller wage than those on a twelve-hour shift, but the weekly pay can always be augmented by piecework, while night work is invariably paid extra.

Even with regard to what is generally known as war work, it should be borne in mind that most of the appointments now being made, though nominally for the duration of the war, may be continued for a considerable time after the cessation of hostilities. For example, it is believed by those in a position to know, that the Women Welfare Workers in factories have come to stay. So satisfactory have they proved themselves that this may now be regarded as an excellent opening for educated women. Many of these appointments, and others of a similar nature, are being made, and suitable candidates are specially trained for their duties.

In Scotland there is at present one woman works manager, and there are women overseers and forewomen, also examiners and inspectors for shell-making and shell-filling. Many of these appointments will go on indefinitely. Glass-making and the preparation of dyes are two of the many trades in which women will find employment. There are also certain branches of instrument-making specially suitable for women. One firm is employing female acetylene-welders, and there are women fire-patrols under the direct control of a fire-master. Mention may likewise be made of trolley women and of the women engaged—as a result of the new schemes where the Dilution Commissioners have released men for active service—in shipbuilding yards.

Much difficulty is experienced in securing women for agricultural work. Even those specially suited to undertake various duties on the land prefer munition work, which is better paid, and which apparently they find more congenial. Girls who have been dairy-maids and those who previous to marriage were farm servants now refuse to take up their old work so long as it is possible to secure employment in shell-making factories. So important is this aspect of the industrial question that committees have been formed under the auspices of the Board of Trade to try to induce married women and girls at present out of work to go back to their previous employment or trade, and so help to carry on the work of the country.

"Experienced, skilled girls should remain at their trade," said an official with whom one of our representatives had a chat the other day. "There is no rush on them for munition work. Juniors who are not of so much value to their present employers, and whose subsequent training will not be materially affected by a year or so lost at this time—these are the girls wanted for munition factories just now. There is no patriotism in older girls giving up the normal work for which they are really needed. In giving it up they show a lack of true patriotism. As regards women of leisure, they, too, are needed—very much needed. And this is a fact that should be emphasised. Of course there are people who say that women of means have no right to take work that might be done by their more needy sisters. The truth of the matter is that at present there is work (and well-paid work) for everybody. And obviously certain duties will be much better discharged by educated women than by working girls who can serve their country much better at some other branch of industry."

It is interesting to note that while social work naturally appeals to many leisured women who may have been engaged in a dilettante way in something of the kind in pre-war days, and whose amateur knowledge may form a good basis for future professional duties, many a middle or upper class girl who has never had a chance of developing her talents may discover that she has the makings of an excellent mechanic. It is indeed remarkable how many girls of the leisured classes are now showing a distinct talent for mechanical work—many indeed preferring practical to social work.

The Times.
19 8 16

WORK FOR MIDDLE-AGED WOMEN.

AN IMPROVED STATUS.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

Since the war there have been many curious cycles in women's employment, and not the least interesting phase of the most recent has been the new importance of the middle-aged woman—spinster, widow, or wife—in the scheme of things.

Her appearance in fairly large numbers in the army of workers is to a great extent due to the insistence of those women who, whether on committees or otherwise interested, demand that she shall be found work and say that she is, when well-chosen and fitted into her own niche, as important a national asset as the younger woman for whom employers call loudly. Because of a certain shyness of employers there is still a large number of such women on the books of many employment agencies and labour exchanges, but this will be changed presently, when certain schemes which have Government blessing will be put into operation. As numbers of these women have registered at different bureaux, they are probably being counted in many cases twice over. A table of women seeking employment and for whom employment has been found is drafted each month by Mrs. Hoste from the figures available at the Educated Women's War Emergency Fund, which is only one of the many bureaux. It is interesting to note that 15 of a recent month's applicants now in posts, after having attended the bank classes run in connexion with this scheme, are from 36 to 40, while nine are over 40. What has been achieved by Mrs. Hoste's personal influence in the City in the way of breaking down prejudices against women past their first youth ought to make it easier for others interested in this problem. In banking establishments the hours are not long and the work for a woman with a taste for figures is not difficult. Any dissatisfaction with women in banks is directly due to a policy (now being dropped) of taking on women clerks on the recommendation of customers and without any regard to fitness or ability. These banking classes and also the L.C.C. business training classes are giving employers more confidence in the middle-aged woman.

The disadvantage many of these women have in seeking jobs is their lack of training. A past generation allowed its penniless daughters either to become governesses or to drift into the homes of married brothers. The most difficult people to place at the present time are the governesses who have returned from posts abroad, women who have lost their initiative through being at the beck and call of other women, who found it easier to domineer over them than over their domestics. Lack of initiative is difficult to cope with, and this, it may be frankly stated, is the great bar to the employment of many middle-aged women who now are coming into the labour market. They have never acquired that feeling of independence which the earning of good money gives their younger sisters.

A Profession After Marriage.

Dr. Mary Scharlieb expressed the opinion some time back that women of the middle class should marry young and be able to enter young into the play and life of their little children, and when these children are at school and the mother's hands are empty, she should turn to some profession, arguing, of course, that she had taken a matriculation or its equivalent entrance examination before marriage. Dr. Scharlieb has herself proved her own theory—but it is not possible for every middle-class woman to do this; the cost of the children's schooling would often preclude the possibility of a profession for their mother. However, the idea has much to commend it, particularly when one sees that the most flourishing professional women are all of them in the forties—doctors, dentists, artists, actresses, sculptors, pianists, illustrators, and fashion artists. The same applies to business women. The most successful buyers in many West-end shops are married women; the millinery buyer in one West-end shop has left a gap of 15 "household" years between the time of her leaving her employment on her marriage and her return to it. She had learned the habit of long hours and concentration on what she did before marriage. There are many middle-aged business women with country places, the result of their own earnings; there is a dressmaker who keeps a stable and rides to hounds. And the number of women, some of them more than middle-aged, conducting profitable businesses ought in itself to convince employers that brains do not wear out any sooner in women than in men.

Women welfare workers (who need not be in Aberdeen Free Press.

26-9-16

663

THE WOMEN WAR WORKERS.

Sir,—Lately there have frequently appeared in the public press complaints of the way that women war workers have been treated, and a concrete example may be interesting to the public, especially as it took place in Scotland.

A body of students was organised by their superiors to do war work on the land and so take the place of labour called to other work. The agreement was carefully made under the recognised public authority. Each girl of this party was to be paid a wage of 15s per week, an unfurnished house was put at their service, beds and furniture were lent, simple dishes were to be provided, a housekeeper was to cook for them, and promise was made that vegetables would be had cheap. When my daughter wrote home asking permission to undertake this work I gave a quite grudging consent. The girls put the house in order and work began. The housekeeper refused to do more than make dinner for them, and when an appeal was made to the farmer's wife the housekeeper was upheld. Disappointment one: Work began and it was berry picking. Naturally the labour was severe on those girls, but in spite of their inexperience they could pick quite twice as much as the ordinary worker. At first the farmer was surprised and delighted and full of praise, but, if the picking after that for any reason fell below the level, the girls were treated with grumbling and complaints in full quantity. Sometimes this work was varied with hoeing turnips and making hay. There were three men with three opinions of how turnips should be hoed, and woe to the girl who used the other man's method when he wasn't there. In the hay field the men gallantly seized all the light forks and the inexperienced girls had to use heavy grapes. One day a girl got a light fork, but that could not be allowed, she must give it up to the man and use a heavy one. So much for courtesy and consideration.

The farmer announced that he did not like to see girls trachled, so when rain was very severe and it was not suitable to pick berries they were not sent out, but the reason for this appeared at the end of the first week—instead of receiving the promised 15s the girls found that all time lost by wet weather was carefully deducted from their pay. One day they made 3½d!

Here is how they calculated a full day:—In the morning they picked strawberries from 7 to 9: then they picked rasps, and my daughter picked 12 baskets of 7 lb. each. If she had been paid at ½d per lb. this would have been 3s 6d for her eight hours of rasp-picking, not counting the two hours at strawberries; and for this she received 2s 6d for the whole day. This farmer neither kept his contract nor paid at the ordinary rates. He acted on the principle, "Heads I win, tails you lose." He applied this principle to his other workers. He got schoolboys during the holidays and paid them ½d per hour for weeding. These children spent ten hours a day on their knees for 10d. As I write I have a letter lying before me from a Labour Exchange official, who says—"Boys of 11 are earning 2s 3d per day, and one woman who never weeded carrots in her life before made 13s 6d in 2½ days. He pays them per drill of 200 yards at the rate of 3s per drill."

These girls worked hard and never saved themselves; they returned home exhausted, and when they left before the end of three months this farmer complained they were treating him badly, and breaking their contract. This man broke his contract in every item. He did more, he made a profit by under-paying them. It may be asked why these girls did not at once object. They were innocent and inexperienced, and so were easy victims to this predacious man. Never again will they undertake to do war work, and their remembrance of the war in after years will be of how they were exploited by a greedy and grasping farmer.

I enclose my name and address, and sign myself—

FATHER OF ONE OF THEM.

September 25, 1916.

by Mrs. Hoste's personal influence in the City in the way of breaking down prejudices against women past their first youth ought to make it easier for others interested in this problem. In banking establishments the hours are not long and the work for a woman with a taste for figures is not difficult. Any dissatisfaction with women in banks is directly due to a policy (now being dropped) of taking on women clerks on the recommendation of customers and without any regard to fitness or ability. These banking classes and also the L.C.C. business training classes are giving employers more confidence in the middle-aged woman.

The disadvantage many of these women have in seeking jobs is their lack of training. A past generation allowed its penniless daughters either to become governesses or to drift into the homes of married brothers. The most difficult people to place at the present time are the governesses who have returned from posts abroad, women who have lost their initiative through being at the beck and call of other women, who found it easier to domineer over them than over their domestics. Lack of initiative is difficult to cope with, and this, it may be frankly stated, is the great bar to the employment of many middle-aged women who now are coming into the labour market. They have never acquired that feeling of independence which the earning of good money gives their younger sisters.

A Profession After Marriage.

Dr. Mary Scharlieb expressed the opinion some time back that women of the middle class should marry young and be able to enter young into the play and life of their little children, and when these children are at school and the mother's hands are empty, she should turn to some profession, arguing, of course, that she had taken a matriculation or its equivalent entrance examination before marriage. Dr. Scharlieb has herself proved her own theory—but it is not possible for every middle-class woman to do this; the cost of the children's schooling would often preclude the possibility of a profession for their mother. However, the idea has much to commend it, particularly when one sees that the most flourishing professional women are all of them in the forties—doctors, dentists, artists, actresses, sculptors, pianists, illustrators, and fashion artists. The same applies to business women. The most successful buyers in many West-end shops are married women; the millinery buyer in one West-end shop has left a gap of 15 "household" years between the time of her leaving her employment on her marriage and her return to it. She had learned the habit of long hours and concentration on what she did before marriage. There are many middle-aged business women with country places, the result of their own earnings; there is a dressmaker who keeps a stable and rides to hounds. And the number of women, some of them more than middle-aged, conducting profitable businesses ought in itself to convince employers that brains do not wear out any sooner in women than in men.

Women welfare-workers (who need not be in their first youth) after a course of training are in request for munition factories, though in the case of this kind of employment it is well to sound a note of warning, as after the war their services may not be all needed. Hospital orderlies, who are accepted up to 50, are in request, and there are, so far, not enough to meet the demand. The pay, however, is not munificent, and the hours are long. Gardening is another form of work where, if there is training, there is plenty of demand, and as there is no "too old at 80" for men, it may be reasonably expected that "too old at 50" will not hold for a healthy woman who has a natural love of the open air.

The farmer announced that he did not like to see girls trachled, so when rain was very severe and it was not suitable to pick berries they were not sent out, but the reason for this appeared at the end of the first week—instead of receiving the promised 15s the girls found that all time lost by wet weather was carefully deducted from their pay. One day they made 3½d!

Here is how they calculated a full day:—In the morning they picked strawberries from 7 to 9: then they picked rasps, and my daughter picked 12 baskets of 7 lb. each. If she had been paid at ½d per lb. this would have been 3s 6d for her eight hours of rasp-picking, not counting the two hours at strawberries; and for this she received 2s 6d for the whole day. This farmer neither kept his contract nor paid at the ordinary rates. He acted on the principle, "Heads I win, tails you lose." He applied this principle to his other workers. He got schoolboys during the holidays and paid them 1d per hour for weeding. These children spent ten hours a day on their knees for 10d. As I write I have a letter lying before me from a Labour Exchange official, who says—"Boys of 11 are earning 2s 3d per day, and one woman who never weeded carrots in her life before made 13s 6d in 2½ days. He pays them per drill of 200 yards at the rate of 3s per drill."

These girls worked hard and never saved themselves; they returned home exhausted, and when they left before the end of three months this farmer complained they were treating him badly, and breaking their contract. This man broke his contract in every item. He did more, he made a profit by under-paying them. It may be asked why these girls did not at once object. They were innocent and inexperienced, and so were easy victims to this predacious man. Never again will they undertake to do war work, and their remembrance of the war in after years will be of how they were exploited by a greedy and grasping farmer.

I enclose my name and address, and sign myself—

Father of One of Them.

September 25, 1916.

Umpire.

20. 8. 16.

RED TAPE AND A BLUE CARD.

Humiliating Experience of Lady Volunteer.

IF the authorities want women workers to take the place of men (and we have had many appeals from Cabinet Ministers and their satellites) then they are going the wrong way about getting them.

First of all, we want organisation and inducements. If there is any attempt at organised recruiting of women for war work, red tape is surely strangling it.

Here we give the experience of a soldier's wife who desired to offer her services:—

I sallied forth at 9-30 a.m. in search of a situation, armed with certain credentials and references, in the hope of obtaining a place at a munition works, where I had every reason to believe there were vacancies for respectable women. I returned home 5 p.m. a sadder but wiser woman.

The Blue Card.

First I made a three-mile car journey to the Ministry of Munitions office, where I asked to see the lady in charge of such matters. I was in the first instance received by a gentleman, whom I might say here, was a gentleman.

He asked me all particulars, whether I had a blue card (what he meant by this was a mystery to me at the time), and on my apparent ignorance of his question, he politely informed me that Mrs. M. would probably refuse to interview me.

Almost immediately Mrs. M. emerged from a room in the corridor, and walking past myself, sister, and the gentleman referred to, entirely ignored, with a wave of the hand, any attempt at an interview. "I thought so," replied the gentleman in an apologetic manner. "I am afraid it will be necessary for you to get a blue card before she will grant you an interview."

I apologised for my ignorance of red tape routine, and inquired what course it was now necessary for me to pursue to achieve my object. I was then told that I should have to go to the Labour Exchange and register. If considered a desirable person I would be given one of these magic blue cards.

The "Fresh."

My sister and I then proceeded to the Labour Exchange, and being referred to a window marked "Fresh," took up our positions in the long queue already gathered there, and after an hour and fifty minutes' waiting succeeded in obtaining an interview with the lady clerk-in-charge.

This was brutally brief. When I asked if it was correct that there were vacancies at a certain munition works, and if so could I be recommended for one of the positions, the clerk replied that there were no vacancies, and that before anything could be done I must register.

She absolutely refused to discuss the matter in any shape or form, and after being handed a card which I had to fill up, I was summarily dismissed, and found myself in a greater quandary than ever as to what on earth to do next.

I decided to go down to the munition works concerned, and see what could be done if all the red tapeism of these Government departments was thrown on one side. I succeeded in being granted an interview with the manager, who after a conversation evidently thought me a desirable person to have in his works, inasmuch as he gave me a note of introduction to the lady at the Labour Exchange.

The whole of the morning had been spent in journeys from the one place to the other, and it was close on two o'clock in the afternoon when I again arrived at the Labour Exchange, and asked to see the person to whom the works manager's note was addressed. After some little trouble and delay, this woman condescended to see me, and I presented my introduction.

A Storm.

The result of this interview was even more humiliating than any of its predecessors, for after reading the note the lady official appeared to me to absolutely lose her temper, and flew into a positive passion, threatening the writer of the note with all manner of reprisals for interfering with the engagement of workpeople.

After having successfully withstood a terrific flow of insolence, I was again compelled to retreat, and as a kind of send-off I was told that if I still desired employment I must call again in a week's time.

No thanks, not me, I would not go through a similar ordeal whatever my future circumstances. In my opinion whether I was wrongly advised or not, and did not adopt the right and proper procedure in looking for a place, I think the very least the authorities can do is to treat soldiers' wives with courtesy and respect. It made little difference my explaining that I was not begging, but merely asking for employment.

To be bandied about for hours after the manager had told me that such persons as myself were urgently wanted on war work, is a disgrace to the county.

Edinburgh Evening Despatch.

19. 8. 16.

663.

663b

Educated Women and War Work.

The charge has been made against public school girls—girls with a first-class education—that they as a class have not done enough in the war to justify the trouble and expense bestowed upon their upbringing. We do not know the specific grounds upon which these allegations are made; but it seems to us that the author of them has generalised too sweepingly from a few individual cases which have come under his observation. It is a serious thing to make a charge against a class from the experience of a single person, because of necessity his opportunities of direct observation are necessarily limited. Only careful inquiry into a very wide area will provide the material upon which to base a judgment.

Sof far as appearances go, however, we see no reason to withhold credit from this class any more than from any other class in the community. The same charge has been directed against the young men who have been educated in our foremost schools, with what injustice the casualty list can tell. We make bold to say that if you examine the records of the youths who have been turned out from the great schools in Edinburgh, or in all Scotland for that matter, it will be found that these are rare exceptions in which duty has been shirked. The spirit of the public school boy has been one of the most glorious facts in the war.

As for the public school girl, there are various reasons for any negligence of national duty, which may fairly be accepted as excuses, if excuses be needed. In the first place, these girls have not been brought up to have any adequate conception of public duty. Till comparatively recent years a few showy accomplishments, marriage, and a more or less easy life were all their scheme of life contained. It is only lately that young women of this class have had the chance of putting their talents to better use. When the war broke out there were few young women who dreamt that they would ever be called upon to play a serious part, and this misconception was not confined to women. In the second place—and this is a particularly powerful reason—compulsion has not been applied to women. When one sex presumes to criticise the other, it should be remembered that a vast number of young men never thought it incumbent upon them to play a man's part in the struggle till they were compelled to do so. It required compulsory service to make them realise that they had an imperative duty to the country which maintains and protects them.

But setting aside considerations such as these, it is not admitted that women of the public school class have proved themselves unworthy of their race and of their privileges. Who are our nurses, organisers and attendants in soldiers' rests, paid and unpaid clerks in Government departments; bank and insurance clerks, munition workers, and all the others who have made universal service possible? A goodly proportion are women of the maligned class. Of course, there are shirkers, women into whose heads never entered the idea that idle pleasure may not be the only aim in life; philanthropic potterers, and too large a number whose motive in doing what they call "war work" is to obtain publicity rather than to be honestly and humbly helpful. These parasites are always with us, and they are not all women. But they are not by any means the larger number, and they become smaller every day as the gravity of the situation grows more apparent and the sense of public duty is more deeply touched. Women, women of all classes, have done nobly by the nation, and the men who are the first to acknowledge their devotion are those who have the best means of judging the earnestness and value of their service.

Evening Standard
26. 8. 16.

HOP-PICKERS WANTED.

HUNDREDS OF EDUCATED WOMEN WANTED AT ONCE.

Some hundreds of educated women are wanted by the Women's National Land Service Corps, 50, Upper Baker-street, for the hop-picking season. Hop-picking is less exacting than fruit-picking. Work does not start before six or half-past, and no experience is necessary.

Educated women selected by the Corps will be sent to farmers in Worcestershire, who will employ no other extra labour. One of the Corps' organisers has already inspected an empty farmhouse, schoolhouse, and barn that have been offered for accommodation. The women will send on in advance mattress-covers, and the farmers will fill them. They will sleep on the floors.

Accommodation is provided free, but the women will have to arrange their own board out of their earnings, which should amount, at piece-work rates, to 2s. or 3s. a day. The ages of the women must be between eighteen and thirty-five. No children can be taken. More educated women are also required to take a short course of training for permanent farm work.

Less Hop Growing.

A Board of Agriculture return issued last night gives the acreage under hops in 1916 as compared with 1915 as follows:—

	Acres, 1916.	Acres, 1915.
Kent	19,499	21,335
Hants	1,380	1,514
Hereford	4,645	5.405
Surrey	426	552
Sussex	2.656	2.864
Worcester	2,643	2,961
Other counties	103	113
Total	31,352	34,744

The decrease in 1916 is thus 3392 acres, compared with 1915. Compared with 1914 the falling off is 5309 acres in 1916.

Westminster Journal.
16.9.16
663 B
663b/28

WOMEN AS FARM WORKERS.

WESTBURY RURAL COUNCIL'S RIDICULE.

Slowly but surely woman is becoming emancipated, and the war appears to be hastening the process. She now only needs the vote so long denied her to complete her triumph and emerge from the subjection of the tyrant man. There is scarcely an occupation or profession from which women are at present debarred. With a courage which must be admired by the most sceptical of men, they have invaded provinces which hitherto have been regarded as the exclusive preserves of the sterner sex, from whom they have wrested the prerogatives which they have claimed as their own. In the face of considerable prejudice and opposition the lady doctor practises in some of the larger towns, and now the lady preacher threatens to occupy the pulpit, much to the consternation of some of the clergy and laymen. In many avocations from which they have been excluded women have successfully asserted their right of entry, and the war has still further enlarged the scope for feminine activities. How far women will advance in this direction is problematical. We have not yet heard of the woman butcher, but judging from certain advertisements appearing in the papers recently it would not be surprising if she were eventually evolved.

In the world of agriculture women have so far failed to establish their position. They still have to overcome a great deal of prejudice. It is evident that farmers do not think much of female labour, and applications made by two young ladies anxious to undertake agricultural work were received by the Westbury Rural Council, at their meeting on Tuesday, with no little amusement and ridicule. The young ladies, particulars of whose qualifications were forwarded by the War Agricultural Committee at Trowbridge, were described as strong and capable, of good education, and with three years' experience of farm work. They did not want to be labourers, but to have responsible posts, if possible, on a scientific farm, one desiring to act as bailiff where there is a master. Here, one would have thought, was a golden opportunity for farmers compelled to dispense with the services of sons or employees joining the Army, but the idea of a woman farmer was not taken at all seriously. When later on an applicant for exemption at the Westbury Rural Tribunal complained of the shortage of labour the military representative flourished the lady agriculturists' letter at the farmer, suggesting that here was a solution of the difficulty, but the applicant declined to take advantage of the offer. The woman agricultural wroker apparently has to encounter a formidable barrier of opposition, but the time may yet arrive when farmers, owing to the constant drain upon the male population, will be only too glad to avail themselves to a greater extent of female labour.

663b/29

Having a Well-Earned Rest—The "Heroine of Loos."

THE HEROIC FRENCH GIRL WHO RESCUED BRITISH SOLDIERS BY SHOOTING GERMANS: MLLE. MOREAU.

Mlle. Emilienne Moreau, whose fame as the "Heroine of Loos" is world-wide, is seen here on the sands at Trouville, where she is having a rest with her mother and brother and sister. A number of friends are specially staying at Trouville with her also. Mlle. Moreau was, a few weeks ago, publicly decorated by the British Ambassador in Paris with the British Military Medal and that of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem. Previously she had been decorated with the French Military Cross. A girl of seventeen, during the battle of Loos she saw some Germans firing on the British from a cellar. She courageously went to the rescue, and shot two of the enemy with a revolver, killing three more with hand-grenades. Mlle. Moreau is seen on the right.—[Photo. by C.N.]

663 b/30

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

A POPULAR writer once said that "men hunt, fish, keep the cattle, or raise corn, for women to eat the game, the fish, the meat, and the corn." What he probably had in his mind, though he was too polite to say so, was that men, and men only, were fit to do the useful work of the world. But the stern logic of recent events has killed that theory beyond hope of resurrection. Its epitaph was written by Mr. Asquith the other day when he said, "The women of this country have rendered as effective service in the prosecution of the war as any other class of the community," and no one would accuse Mr. Asquith of going out of his way to emphasise the value of women's work in its relation to the State.

A NEW BUSINESS FOR WOMEN: PIANOFORTE-TUNING.

Not tuning only, but manufacturing of pianos, is among the various kinds of employment which women have taken up successfully. Our photograph shows a woman learning to tune a piano.—[Photo. by L.N.A.]

. . . .

Since women have proved—because they have at last had a chance—that they really do possess practical genius, men have been so busy patting them on the back that it will be a difficult matter for them to reconcile themselves to being treated as merely "ordinary," instead of superwomen, once more. There is no doubt about it, women have stood the test of the last two years very well. There are no signs of slackening.

Skilled work and trained brains are no mean gifts to offer in the service of the country, but their value is apt to be a good deal minimised if they happen to be employed in an unsuitable direction. That the number of misfits was not greater was due in large measure to the Women's Service Bureau, organised by the London Society for Women's Suffrage, at 58, Victoria Street, S.W. It is the society's contribution to national necessity, and a very valuable contribution too. As far as women's work is concerned, I suppose its effects are more valuable and far-reaching than any other institution of the kind in London. It is run on lines of sheer common-sense, and the results of its labours will continue long after peace has been signed.

. . . .

Its aims are fourfold. In the first place, acting on the round-peg-for-the-round-hole principle, it begins by enrolling the services of educated women who are able and anxious to help in these critical times, and then seeks to "place" them where their particular qualifications will be of most value to the country. Unlooked-for needs demand emergency measures, so the Bureau makes arrangements by means of short

[Continued overleaf.

NOVEL WORK FOR WOMEN: THE CULTIVATION OF BACTERIA.

The cultivation of bacteria demands scrupulous care, and women are being employed to tend the sprays on filter-beds in the Midlands. They wear high boots of rubber, and rubber coats and skirts.—[Photo. by Topical.]

Bath Herald. Nottingham. 663. B.
663b/31

Glasgow's Memorial Tribute to Lord Roberts.

A REPLICA OF THE CELEBRATED CALCUTTA STATUE: UNVEILED BY THE GREAT SOLDIER'S DAUGHTER.

The Countess Roberts, the elder daughter of the great soldier, unveiled the equestrian statue of Earl Roberts which has been erected in Kelvingrove Park, Glasgow. Among those who attended the ceremony were Lord Derby, Under-Secretary for War, Field-Marshal Viscount French, General Sir Ian Hamilton, the Duke and Duchess of Montrose, the Marquess of Ailsa, and Lord and Lady Lamington. A notable feature in the proceedings was the presence, grouped in front of the statue, of some hundred and forty veteran soldiers who had served with or under Lord Roberts in various of his campaigns. They included veterans of the Indian Mutiny, the Abyssinian War of 1868, and the Afghan campaigns of 1878-80 and the historic march to Candahar.—[Photo. by C.N.]

courses to supply the call for semi-skilled workers in aircraft and munition factories. It lends a hand, too, in the task of sending out women to take part in the work of caring for the sick and wounded overseas; and, lastly, it gives women an opportunity for full and thorough instruction in professions and trades

GIRL FARMERS IN ESSEX: FEEDING THE PIGS.

The Hon. Edward Gerald Strutt, who controls his brother's, Lord Rayleigh's, farms at Terling, has trained young women to look to the herds and do other farm-work, in place of men called to the colours. Our photograph shows some of them at Ringer's Farm.

Photo. by Sport and General.

where there is a prospect of a permanent or temporary shortage.

. . . . .

The Bureau, by the way, works partly in conjunction with the Labour Exchanges, and the number of women who have taken advantage of its good offices runs into many thousands. Roughly speaking, there is no form of work, whether paid or voluntary, with which its officials are not capable of dealing; and, as an instance of its hydra-headed activity, it may be mentioned that some of its clients are at present serving as tram-conductors, lift-girls, clerks, agricultural labourers, forage and munition workers, railway and munition workers, as well as in many other occupations.

. . . . .

Not the least interesting development in regard to women's work has been the enlistment in increasing numbers of their services in aircraft factories. In this direction the Women's Service Bureau can claim the credit of having started the first school in the country where women can be taught oxy-acetylene welding — a branch of aircraft work that requires great care and accuracy. Here again the women have proved once more that they are equal to any call that may be made upon them, and the demand for workers from the school is in excess of the supply. Other classes exist for micrometer-viewing, with instructions in reading from drawings; gauging and measuring, for the inspection of the parts of aircraft, as well as those for instruction in lathe-work (turning and fitting and filing of metals); and, if only sufficient funds were available, the work could be greatly extended.

. . . . .

It is certain that women will have to continue to work after the war. So, with an eye to the future, the authorities at Victoria Street have made a thorough and exhaustive inquiry into the possible shortage in professions and trades, and new openings in industries hitherto chiefly carried on by enemy countries. As a result, it seems clearly established that if women are not allowed to come to the rescue we shall in the future, unless the Hun is to regain his old place in the trade world, be reduced to wearing clogs, reverting to the hour-glass, suffering toothlessness with as good grace as we can command, and in general leading a quite uncomfortable sort of existence. The Bureau, however, is doing its best to brighten the prospect by founding scholarships for women which will enable them to train in these and other professions or trades, and is thus throwing open to them additional opportunities for undertaking work that is patriotic as well as profitable.

CLAUDINE CLEVE.

TAKING THE PLACE OF MEN WHO HAVE "JOINED UP": GIRL FARMERS IN ESSEX.

Girls and women are doing men's work on Lord Rayleigh's farms in Essex. They are billeted in Terling, and work in overalls and breeches and soft felt hats. Lord Rayleigh's brother, the Hon. Edward Gerald Strutt, has trained them. The girls in our picture are putting the corn up in shocks.—[Photo. by Alfieri.]

Bath Herald
19.8.16

A feature of the influx of women into industry which is often overlooked is the difficulty of providing for the needs of gentlewomen, who find themselves to some extent out of their sphere in London, or who are, at any rate, anxious to get into touch with others who may be in a similar case. The difficulty is in a fair way to being met by the extension of the Lady Workers' Club, which was founded just before the war, and has since acquired a value which its organisers can hardly have anticipated. Its activities are now being extended in a most interesting fashion under the influence of several distinguished ladies. The moving spirit, perhaps, is Lady Henry Somerset, whose capacity for organisation obviously fits her for the task.

It looks as though the storm in a teacup over women preachers has almost subsided. The Bishop of London has told the agitators politely that they have been making an altogether unnecessary fuss, and the principal Church paper, in which the controversy raged, has suspended correspondence on the subject. I doubt if there will be any general desire to revive it. Mr. Athelstan Riley and his friends have been directing their heavy artillery against proposals which nobody has made, and enthusiastic feminists have been insisting on granting Church women what they apparently do not want. The most general sentiment one encounters in ecclesiastical quarters is one of regret that the trouble should have cropped up at all, and Dr. Ingram guardedly hints that the whole controversy is the work of the devil. Meanwhile, the Roman Catholic Press has indulged in satirical faculties at the expense of Ecclesia Anglicana, and English Bishops are said to be contemplating the inclusion of daily newspapers in the Commination Service.

Yorkshire Even. Post.
15.9.16

A CANON'S DAUGHTERS AS POTATO PICKERS.

EDUCATED WOMEN WORKING ON YORKSHIRE FARMS.

Farmers in Yorkshire are making more use of the young women who are being turned out from the various agricultural hostels and training centres to assist on the land.

A correspondent of the "Yorkshire Evening Post," who visited that typical farming country, the Isle of Axholme, on the borders of South Yorkshire, was informed by one well-known farmer, president of a branch of the Farmers' Union, that he at present had 12 young women of birth and education working for him, and that he could not get on without their services. They were sent by the lady organiser for Yorkshire and Lincolnshire, whose headquarters are at York.

They are at present, he said, assisting in the gathering in of the potato crop, and are receiving the ordinary rates of pay for such work. One is the daughter of a well-known novelist; the father of two others is a Canon of the Church of England, while another is a Girton girl.

They share a cottage which the farmer has fitted up for them, and sometimes are invited to the tea-table of host and hostess, whom they accompany occasionally on a motor trip. They have all had some previous training at the hostels, but the farmer said he preferred girls who had had no training at all.

Our correspondent was assured that one well-known farmer in the locality is in need of 150 such young women, to assist him with his potato crop. The main difficulty is to house them.

In a stone quarry near Doncaster a number of young women may be seen at work, whilst in the building of a model mining village near the same centre a number of women are acting as bricklayers' labourers. They carry bricks, throw up tiles, and may be seen perched aloft fearlessly on the rafters of the buildings.

Nottingham Guardian.
15.9.16
663.B.
6636/33

WOMEN AND HOSPITAL WORK.

Sir,—You were kind enough on July 29th last to publish a letter from us asking for women to assist in military and auxiliary military hospitals. The response has been very satisfactory, and we have now enough special service probationers on our waiting list to enable us to fulfil the probable requirements of the next two or three months. We gladly take this opportunity of letting the public know how well the women throughout the empire have responded to our appeal for help to the sick and wounded.

May we suggest that those who, for various reasons, have not hitherto been able to take up hospital work should spend some of their spare time during the autumn and winter in qualifying themselves for it by attending the necessary lectures and taking first aid and home nursing certificates? It is probable that we shall have to call for more help in the early months of next year, and we need not point out how desirable it is that those women who then come forward shall have qualified themselves for the work which they will be called upon to do.—We are, sir, &c.,

ARTHUR STANLEY,
Chairman, Executive Committee British Red Cross Society.

RANFURLY,
Director of the Ambulance Department of the Order of St. John.

The Catholic Home Journal.
15.9.16

Englishwomen's Work in France.

Scarcity of Nurses and Governesses.

THE war has changed many things in the order of women's work in France, but in none is the change greater than in the work which was once done by Englishwomen in French families and French business houses. Before the war the supply of workers surpassed the demand for them, especially for those employed in French families, but now Frenchwomen are calling for English governesses and English nurses in vain.

There are now 10 applicants for one nurse or nursery governess. Patriotism seems to be the chief obstacle. Very many English girls and women who were content in times of peace to leave England and wander about the Continent as dependents in a foreign family have, since England went to war, gone back to work for their own country, and many of them are now making munitions, nursing the soldiers, or serving in canteens or some other public organisation.

Some day they will probably think of going abroad again, and it is their future work there which calls for attention. The success of the English governesses in the past has lain rather in their national and individual qualities than in their professional aptitude. Women who have never taught children before go out to France to teach French children English, and only children's nurses who teach nothing but obedience and cleanliness are professionally equipped for their undertaking. The result is an English nurse in France is well paid and has a clearly-defined and not uncomfortable position in the household of her employer, whereas the pay of an English governess is generally poor and her position in the family is quite undefinable.

NO INITIATIVE.

In a recent article in the "Times," an organiser of women's work in England said that the most difficult women to get work for to-day were those who had returned from abroad where they had been at "the beck and call of other women." She complained that they had no initiative and nothing of that pleasant confidence in their own powers which comes with "knowing one's job" and the resulting good pay. The position of a "nursery governess" or a "mother's help" does not encourage initiative, but a plain "nurse" or "governess" or "housekeeper" who knows her business has firm ground to stand on, and can claim just consideration and good pay.

English women teachers are needed in French families, but they should be trained for their work. English trained nurses for children have proved that competence meets its reward, and if English teachers set up as high a standard of work as the nurses French children will learn to speak better English and their governesses will hold a very different position in French families from the one they hold now. Many thousands of Englishwomen are employed to teach English in foreign families on the Continent, but very few earn a living wage with a chance to save. The result is that in late middle age they are reduced to living on charity, either given by foreigners or their own country-people, and in both cases it is bitter to the taste of those who accept it.

THE CURE.

Many tragedies are the outcome of these conditions, which if written in detail would seem as cruel as war's worst horrors. The cure for them, happily, lies in the workers' own hands; they must know their business thoroughly, and they must unite in demanding a just pay for what they do.

Another opening for Englishwomen in France, and one which demands first-rate work for very good pay, lies in business offices. But here, again, is the stumbling-block of incompetence on the side of the workers. To be of practical use to a business man in France his secretary must know French as well as English, and be able to write both languages in shorthand, long-hand, and on the type-writing machine. If a girl can do this she can ask and get a very generous salary. Even as things are English typists get good pay for more or less incompetent work; but an educated woman who knows both languages, typewriting, and shorthand is assured in Paris of being able to earn a good living, which allows her to save for the future. The trouble is that such women are very hard to find, and their incompetent stop-gaps threaten to spoil the market.

Daily Express.
23.9.16

WOMEN AND

DENTAL MECHANICS AND FARM HANDS.

The secretary of the Women's National [redacted] Service Corps notifies that educated women are urgently needed to start training at once for agricultural work. Many of the farm labourers have been exempted from military service until the harvest was gathered in, and it is expected that in a short time many of these men will now be called up. So far, there are not nearly enough experienced women to take their places.

The corps can arrange for educated women to receive short trainings that last from four to six weeks, costing from 15s. to 25s. weekly, including board and lodging. When trained, the women will be sent out in squads of three or four wherever their help is needed by the farmers, who pay them either for day or piecework. An excellent opportunity of doing really valuable and patriotic work is here offered to suitable women.

The demand for women dental mechanics—one of the new war-time professions for women—is by no means met by the present supply of workers who have trained for this purpose. The principal of a recently opened school for dental mechanism states that she is constantly asked to recommend women who can assist in the workshops of dental practitioners.

These dentists are prepared to give excellent pay, provided they can find women sufficiently experienced to turn out good work. This profession offers excellent prospects therefore of well-paid employment to the girl who can first spare the time and the few guineas required to take a thorough course of training.

WORKING MOTHERS.

It is interesting to learn that the Women's Industrial Council, 7, John-street, Adelphi, is organising an important investigation as to the effects of various industrial occupations on motherhood. Now that such an enormous number of women are employed in different industries and the question of the falling birth-rate is already becoming a serious menace to the future welfare of the nation, it is most important to find out exactly what occupations are not favourable to motherhood.

As a consequence of this investigation no effort will be made to bar married women from industrial work, but rather to bring about such an improvement of conditions that risk of injury to their children may be minimised.

Funds are needed to carry out this investigation by expert workers, and all those who are interested in the carrying out of this valuable piece of national service are asked to communicate with the secretary of the Women's Industrial Council at the above address.

"Conflicting Ideals of Woman's Work," by Miss B. L. Hutchins (T. Murby and Co., 6, Bouverie-street, E.C., 1s. net), is a book which should interest many women in these epoch-making days. Miss Hutchins discusses the opinion of those who consider that woman's only right place is in her home circle, and compares it with actual facts regarding woman's present position in commerce and industry. A balanced view of both sides of this question cannot fail to be of value to all who thoughtfully consider women's employment and its influence.

Daily Express
19.9.16

663.B.

663b/34

WOMEN AND

QUALIFIED ANALYTICAL CHEMISTS.

Now that money is rather scarce in many homes, and it is comparatively easy for young people to find paid work, there is a tendency on the part of many parents to let their girls leave school much too early and immediately start some form of paid employment.

This is a deplorable mistake, for a lack of education will handicap a woman all her life, and the girl who is allowed to finish off her school work when she is fifteen or sixteen is deliberately giving up her chances of a successful career. One would urge parents to make every possible sacrifice to keep their daughters at school until they have completed a good education, and in cases where the girls show distinct ability and love of study to let them work for a scholarship at one of the universities, and thereby train for one of the more learned professions that later on will offer them really good chances of earning a satisfactory income.

To take a case in point, a young girl was advised some time ago to remain at school, pass her matriculation examination, and then to sit for a scholarship at the University of London. She gained her scholarship, took a three-years' course in chemistry, and eventually passed out of the university as a qualified analytical chemist and at once obtained a Government appointment, starting at £250 a year.

This girl's experiences need not stand as an isolated case. There are plenty of clever girls who would do equally well if they were given the chance, but, too often, unfortunately, they are allowed to leave school much too early, and thereby lose the opportunities that would be afforded to them by continued study.

The principal of the East London College, which is a branch of the University of London, states that there are many openings for analytical chemists, and that at the moment the supply of qualified workers is not equal to the demand. Women are eligible for these appointments, and the posts, particularly those in the Government laboratories, are well paid, while the work itself is most interesting.

The girl who wishes to become an analytical chemist must first pass her matriculation examination or its equivalent, and then enter the university for a three-years' course of study, which in some cases may be reduced to two years. There are a number of scholarships and exhibitions in connection with the university that greatly lessen the expense, and in any case the fees are moderate.

When the final examination has been passed and the student has finished her training, there are various posts open to her for analytical work, and it is important to note that even the present demand for trained workers in this particular profession is likely to be increased in the near future.

Particulars of the University courses, fees, scholarships, etc., can be obtained on application to the secretary, the East London College, Mile End-road, E.

Daily Mirror
26.9.16

663 B

663b/35

WORK FOR WOMEN WITHOUT CONSCRIPTION!

PRACTICAL ADVICE ON GETTING EMPLOYMENT.

By JESSIE E. DUNBAR.

SHOULD we have conscription for women? This subject has aroused considerable discussion of late. It has been said that the authorities need more woman workers; many women answer that they are eager to have work but nowhere can they find it to do.

For some time past I have been engaged in finding out where war workers are needed.

The Women's National Land Service Corps, 50, Upper Baker-street, W., state they need 5,000 educated women between the ages of eighteen and thirty-five. They give, and arrange with the counties, bursaries to suitable applicants. Wages are from 16s. weekly with free housing. The National Political League, 16, St. James's-street, also say they need land workers in numbers. They have placed about 5,000.

Regarding canteen work, the Y.M.C.A. and several other societies have a large number of canteens for munition workers. There are a few paid posts and a fair demand exists for voluntary workers.

There seem excellent prospects for young women as clerks in Government and commercial offices. Since 1914 the women in the Civil Service have been increased by 29,000. Girls straight from school earn 15s. to 20s. weekly. Naturally, the more qualifications they have, the better the salary offered. In Government offices, where a number of women war workers are employed, the commencing salary, I was informed by an official, is 25s. Some of the posts are responsible, and in many cases the salary is from £3 to £5 weekly.

The Labour Exchanges have entered into a new era with the war, so many Government positions can only be obtained through these offices. The two big exchanges which specialise in clerical posts are those in New Bridge-street, E.C., and Great Marlborough-street. The Labour Exchange at Queen Anne's Chambers practically deals only with professional women. They have a register of university graduates and professional women. Posts worth several hundred pounds a year have been obtained through the services of this exchange.

WHERE WOMEN ARE WANTED.

A number of women are employed in banks, and it is said that there are not enough capable women clerks to go round. Personal recommendation is especially valuable in seeking employment of this kind. Apply to banks in your own district first of all, with as many introductions as possible. Salaries vary from 20s. to 35s. weekly.

Regarding Voluntary Aid Detachment and hospital work, arm yourself with certificates and try Devonshire House, the Pall Mall and the Kensington branch of the Red Cross Society; also your local depot.

The Women's Legion is using women cooks for camps and hospitals. This sphere will widen. Mrs. Long, at the Duke of York's School, Chelsea, gives all particulars to inquirers. Residential head cooks (certificated) earn £40 a year. Ordinary cooks need not be certificated, but should have a sound knowledge of cookery and excellent references. The salary is then £20, with allowances. Lady Londonderry organised the Women's Legion, which is an efficient body, and she hopes in time to get her women cooks into hospitals, etc., in France. Women are wanted now.

As to women obtaining posts as chauffeurs, Miss Ellis is commandant of the motor transport section of the Women's Legion, which is at 72, Upper Berkeley-street. Only trained women drivers are wanted, and there is a waiting list of those. In the near future a big demand is expected. There are twenty-five women in the Army Service Corps, and ten are on approbation with the Royal Flying Corps.

Those in authority tell me that munition workers are plentiful in London and environs. There is a demand in Birmingham, but there may be a few weeks' wait. The minimum wage for unskilled labour is about £1 weekly.

A branch of activity that has been somewhat overlooked is welfare work. Educated women are in charge of the comfort and sometimes the health of women workers in munition hostels, factories, canteens, etc. The pay is about £100 a year. Apply to the Ministry of Munitions (Mr. Rowntree's department).

Needlewomen are wanted, and Lady Gosford tells me she welcomes regular workers at the Red Cross Depot, Burlington House.

Lady's Pictorial.
30-9-16

ARE WOMEN SLACKERS?

Order to Mr.

Please supply me regula Pictorial" weekly until fu account in the usual way.

Signed .....

Address .....

.....

THERE are always two sides to every question. Sometimes there are more. An attack has been made recently on women, who have been violently described as shameless slackers. This sort of thing is very easy to do, and on the face of it there seems to be just cause for grumbling that there should be a shortage of nurses, of canteen workers, and other war-workers, while there are women idling in tea-shops, frequenting places of amusement, dancing in private houses and at hotels, and killing time in company with young officers. But we do not always know why many of them are so doing, and the fact that a seemingly fit woman of any age from twenty to fifty is apparently seeking pleasure rather than serving the country does not necessarily prove that she will not do so. Jumping at conclusions has been one of the exercises in which far too many people have indulged during the war. They mount the seat of judgment and condemn their fellows with no evidence against them. We have seen what the White Feather Brigade did in this direction, and the recent "rounding-up" campaign has made it abundantly clear that it was a case of much cry and little wool, so far as the charge of male shirkers was concerned. Without doubt there are men, and women too, who do not care a brass farthing about their country, who frankly consider it their first duty to "look after number one," who do not want to help, but against a happily comparative few we must set the splendid tens of thousands who have given themselves willingly to help on the righteous cause for which we are fighting, and with them we must put the very large number of women who have offered their services, but for whom there really was no work, together with the other large contingent of applicants who are really quite unsuitable. We cannot badge everybody; but were it possible to do so we fancy we should not hear quite so much about "unsplendid women" and women "slackers." Savoir tout est tout pardonner. Only the questioning of individuals can decide how far there is justification for launching invective against "thousands of unoccupied women who have not responded to the call." Many capable, willing women have been rejected because of their age; many because there is really no niche in which they can stand without expensive and long training; many because the labour has not been properly organised; many because there is even now a distrust of women in certain fields of work. A large number have had to stand aside because they could not afford to work for nothing and could not obtain a living wage. There are plenty of reasons why women are "doing nothing." Somewhere there has been miscalculation, a muddle has been made in some direction, which, maybe, "compulsion for women" might clear up. But, honestly, we do not think this would be the best way of finding the remedy. Let there be a focusing, a centralisation of all women's work, and women would then know where they stand. It is no more fair to the womanhood of Great Britain than it is just to its manhood to raise this cry about slackers. To take the few as representative of the majority is ridiculous. And even the few would be fewer if there were better organisation.

Sunday Times.
Oct 15, 1916.

THE NEED FOR WOMEN WORKERS.

AN L.C.C. DEMAND.

By HAROLD COX.

The article published under this heading last week has brought to me a considerable number of letters. Most of my correspondents are evidently anxious to obtain work of one kind or another, but lay stress on the difficulty which they have met with in looking for it. In particular, they complain of the dilatory methods of the Government Departments. Doubtless the Governmental methods are dilatory, but, on the other hand, it is clearly impossible for a Government Department to accept every applicant for work without making somewhat elaborate inquiries.

Broadly speaking, there are two classes of work for women at the present time. There is the Higher Grade clerical work, for which only University women are eligible. Such women should apply direct to the Civil Service Commissioners, but it is right to state that the supply of University women for this work already exceeds the demand. On the other hand, there is a still unsatisfied demand for Lower Grade clerical work in Government offices. Women who want this work should apply either to their nearest local Labour Exchange or at the Exchange for Women's Work at Great Marlborough-street. There is no age limit and many of the women who apply and get appointments are over forty. Some are accepted even as young as sixteen.

EXCESSIVE HOURS OF WORK.

One of the great difficulties in the way of inducing middle-class women to undertake manual work is to be found in the excessively long hours of factory work. At the beginning of the war the ordinary hours were even lengthened owing to the pressure of the demand for war munitions. It has taken the Government nearly eighteen months to discover that excessive hours of labour, especially in the case of women, diminish the output of work. Latterly some most excellent reports have been published by the Munitions Department pressing home this point and it is to be hoped that as a result of these official reports a considerable reduction in working hours will take place, that Sunday labour will be abolished, and regular provision made for a Saturday half-holiday. On the basis of a shorter day and a shorter week a great many middle-class women who have been excusably frightened at the prospect of working eleven or twelve hours a day ought to be able and willing to undertake manual work.

Undoubtedly, however, there will still remain a considerable number of women who are not physically strong enough for regular manual work, even with an eight-hour day, or whose home obligations make it impossible for them to give up their whole day to outside work of any kind. For such women there is still available an almost unlimited opening for unpaid part-time work.

AN APPEAL FROM THE L.C.C.

As an example of the kind of work for which women volunteers are now wanted, the Care Committees of the London County Council may be mentioned. These committees theoretically exist for every school in London and there ought to be at least eight or nine members on each committee. In practice, the membership of the Care Committees has fallen so low that though there are a thousand schools requiring committees there are only a thousand committee men or women available for the work, with the result that scarcely any school has a sufficiently large committee and some schools have no committee at all.

At least an extra nine thousand workers are wanted for this work alone. The County Council is appealing for these nine thousand voluntary workers and is able to justify Daily Express.

17.10.16

663 [illegible]
663b

CHEAPEST GOOD FOOD IN THE WORLD?

WHAT THE CANTEENS DO FOR MUNITION WORKERS.

TEA BY THE TON.

Breakfast of three rashers, three slices of bread and butter, jam, a tomato, sugar and milk, and all for a fraction over sevenpence.

People rubbed their eyes yesterday morning when they learned from the "Daily Express," on the strength of a report by Dr. Leonard E. Hill, that munition workers are obtaining substantial meals of this character and at this price in their canteens. Even more enviously they read of a good dinner of roast beef, Yorkshire pudding, potatoes, cabbage, apple pie, and custard, all for 8½d.

How is it done? In any popular restaurant the dinner scheduled would cost at least 1s. 3d.—probably more. Wives and mothers catering at home regarded the figures incredulously.

"The figures are actually those at which the food was supplied at canteens in April last," said a colleague of Dr. Hill, on the Health of Munition Workers' Committee, when questioned by a representative of the "Daily Express" yesterday.

"Since April there has been a considerable rise in the price of food-stuffs, and the delay of two months in the publication of the report may make some slight readjustment necessary on the point of prices.

"The additions, however, would not be serious. Four of us had an excellent tea in a canteen the other day for a total sum of eightpence."

VOLUNTARY HELP.

Corroboration of the figures came from Lady Lawrence, chairman of the Munition Makers' Canteen Committee, which sends out 1,220 voluntary helpers to the munition canteens in the London area every week.

"It is, of course, the voluntary help—and we need still more of it—that enables us to sell good food at these low prices," said Lady Lawrence. A specimen dinner for girls would be priced as follows:—

Plate of meat (best English)	5d.
Potatoes	1d.
Second vegetable	1d.
Suet pudding, with jam	2d.
	9d.

"In the men's canteens the meat would be in larger helpings at 7d. We are able to give really wonderful cakes and cups of tea and milk at a penny each.

"Buying in large quantities is a consideration in prices. Tea, for example, we buy by the ton, and sugar we also bought in ton quantities while it was obtainable.

"The meat is now usually bought locally from the butchers, but on a wholesale scale. There is now some difficulty in the delivery of vegetables, but our purchases of potatoes when possible are by the ton. At one canteen alone we take 600 quarts of milk every day.

NO RENT TO PAY.

"There is no charity about the canteens beyond the fact that the helpers give their services without pay, except, necessarily, the skilled full-time cooks. There is no rent to pay, but we have to allow a small margin for contingencies. If, for example, we knew exactly how many meals would be required each day, we should avoid completely a certain amount of waste. The number may vary by fifty, as sometimes the workers bring their own meals, or go elsewhere for a change.

"It should be remembered that we are catering not only for men earning possibly quite good wages, but also for girls whose earnings may not be more than 15s. or £1, and to whom good food and cheap is a real necessity

"We make no appeal for subscriptions, but we do need more women to help, especially those who can assist regularly. The usual periods are from 9 a.m. to 2 p.m., 12 noon to 6 p.m., and a night shift from 9 p.m. to 6.30. Offers of service made to 58, Victoria-street, will be very welcome.

"Some idea of the task and the need for it may be gained from the fact that at one large canteen we serve regularly 700 hot meals in half an hour, and altogether 3,000 workers will be served with refreshment.

"As far as the quality of the meals is concerned—I always take the canteen fare when on duty there, and so do all the members of the committee."

THREEPENNY MEALS

have no committee at all.

At least an extra nine thousand workers are wanted for this work alone. The County Council is appealing for these nine thousand voluntary workers and is able to justify that appeal on the ground that it is rendering much valuable assistance through its schools to the general purposes of the war. Not only is it training munition workers and manufacturing munitions in technical schools, but it is also stimulating the children in all its schools to help to meet some of the misery that has arisen out of the war. For example, the children of the elementary schools are providing 10,000 clothing outfits as a Christmas gift from London children to the children of Belgium and Serbia.

THE WORK OF CARE COMMITTEES

The business of a Care Committee is, in general terms, to stand in loco parentis and to do for the child many of the things that a well-to-do parent would as a matter of course do, but which a poorer parent is unable, through ignorance or lack of means, to undertake. Especially are these committees wanted to see that the doctor's advice with regard to the health of the child is carried out.

The work is of enormous value from the point of view of building up the new generation and this consideration can hardly be exaggerated when we realise what a large fraction of the present generation over eighteen years of age is rapidly disappearing. In addition to looking after the children while they are at school, Care Committees play an important part in finding employment for the children when they leave school. Necessarily work of this character calls for workers of private means and leisure. In many cases it does not occupy more than an hour or a couple of hours a day. There are surely enough men and women of leisure in London to provide the necessary number of voluntary workers.

(A number of letters on this subject appear on page 10.)

[illegible] when on duty there, and so do all the members of the committee."

THREEPENNY MEALS.

GERMANY'S NEW EFFORT TO SOLVE FOOD PROBLEMS.

AMSTERDAM, Monday, Oct. 16.

New light on the food problem in Germany is contained in the following despatch sent by Mr. Carl W. Ackerman, the Berlin correspondent of the United Press of America, on his return from a visit to Cologne, where a plan of combating the high cost of living has been instituted that is quite likely to be carried out in other large German cities, and continued even after the war.

"American cities," he writes, "should send commissions to Cologne this winter to study the Rhine capital's new municipal food department. The municipality is feeding 80,000 persons daily, providing better and cheaper food than would be possible for individual working men's families.

"With a number of other neutral correspondents I had the opportunity of making a thorough inspection of the Cologne food department. I watched the preparation of one of the regular municipal meals and ate it. It cost only threepence, and it was better than could have been prepared by a family in Berlin for five times that amount.

"The demand for city-prepared meals is now so great that it is estimated Cologne will be feeding 200,000 persons daily during the coming winter. The basis of the municipal meal is a stew containing meat and vegetables. It is prepared in gigantic tins and distributed while still hot, by means of wagons, throughout the city. The city is utilising old factories for the purpose of drying vegetables and fruits and making jams, which are sold so cheaply that the people have no desire to return to the old system. Nothing is wasted. Potato peelings, for instance, are dried and made into food for horses."—Exchange.

NO MILK OR SUGAR IN BERLIN.

A number of Englishwomen who have been in Germany since the outbreak of war arrived at Gravesend yesterday from Flushing.

One of the women, in an interview with a "Daily Express" representative, said that she had not tasted sugar for a long time, and milk was unobtainable in Berlin, except for children under ten years of age.

"Leather is very scarce," she added, "and it is impossible to have boots soled and heeled in the ordinary way. One may have small patches put on the soles of one's boots at a cost of 6s.

"English people are taxed very highly, and before we were allowed to come away we had to pay all taxes up to next March."

ONE EGG IN THREE WEEKS.

AMSTERDAM, Oct. 15.

The Berlin municipality announced that every citizen would receive two eggs in the period from October 1 to October 22, but, according to the "Lokalanzeiger," the supply of eggs was disappointing, so that the citizens had to be satisfied with one egg apiece in these three weeks.—Reuter.

The Queen
18-11-16

6636/38

6636

(For Index see page 712)

The Inland postage of this week's number of the "Queen," without plate, is 2d.

THE QUEEN,
The Lady's Newspaper.

THE FUTURE OF ENGLISHWOMEN.

By the VISCOUNTESS WOLSELEY.

THE WORLD OVERHUNG AT NIGHT with a thick mist, through which, here and there, a bright star is seen, seems a propitious time for a Zeppelin raid! It is not good, however, to allow such forebodings to disturb us, and so, when dawn comes, I set forth to climb the hill and gain the downland. When I emerge upon the open downs, and the great distant view of the weald is spread out map-like below, a sound greets me.

It is the throb of a great Empire's heart. Nothing is comparable to this regular, deep sound of cannon fire, which the cessation of all week-day sound of rural work or machinery brings out, to-day being Sunday, with greater force than ever. That England is fighting for her very heart's blood we know, but had we any doubt at all, it were only necessary to come to these hills and listen to the steady unswerving sound which for past months has been with us day and night.

We hear its muffled softness when first we lie down to rest, and again when soft down breezes are wafted from the sea the sound continues vigorously, unflinchingly. Will it be much longer, or is the end near? we ask continually, and when there goes out a cry to the women of England to come forward and help yet more with Red Cross or voluntary aid work, we know that the need is great and that the cry of the wounded continues.

Can Women do More?

Can women do more than they are doing? It would seem that hardly any department of industry is without them at the moment, for whether it be in the shops that provide us with the necessaries of life, or in postal or telegraph departments, munition works, hospitals, gardens, farms, at very turn in short we are met by women. In their own homes those who have dismissed servants and governesses are replacing them by learning to do their work. It seems to me that the hearts of these women are in the right place, that they know that it is up to them to relieve men and enable them to fight and that to the best of their abilities they are helping to win the war, but and the but is perhaps what is the impediment their training has been insufficient.

We have now to be grateful for any amateur work that we can obtain, because by far the larger proportion of our women workers have never been educated with a view to doing independent work. With us until recently the main idea with parents was to save for the education of their sons, but daughters they thought need not receive especially good education, because after all they were intended to have as a primary object of life that of rendering the best service they could as helpmate to the man of their eventual choice. If they made him happy, if they brought up their daughters to follow their own example and add to his professional attainments, inclinations, their ambitions, but in most cases they still are unfitted, unprepared owing to a lack of proper training.

The Unpaid Worker.

And so I feel that this call to women has come with force and vigour, and will perhaps strengthen their endeavours to develop into worthy citizens. There will be an awakening at length amongst English men and women, who will realise that the education of daughters should be as thorough as that of men, and that having received it they will be entitled or, I should like to say, obliged to claim a just remuneration for their work. Then there would be an end to over much that is voluntary and unpaid, and a general striving would ensue towards the perfecting of that which could be offered to the world for its true value. When we come to think of it, most of the successful war work which they have done has been given freely without thought of gain, and although this shows a grand spirit of unselfishness of character, there is another aspect to the question. Only those whose families are well provided for, or who are themselves possessed of independent means, can afford to give time to voluntary aid work, to Red Cross hospitals, to the Government scheme for organising workers for the land and many other institutions which may be termed the very foundation of our nation's "staying power" in this prolonged ordeal. Unless these ladies have sufficient capital to purchase their clothes, food, and general requirements for a busy life, unless they are justified in devoting those most precious gifts of health and time, gifts which a bread-earner knows only how to value sufficiently, they cannot do this voluntary work. The numbers, therefore, of women who are so fortunately placed is limited, and that is why the cry for educated women still continues, not because they themselves are faint-hearted or "slackers," but merely because the majority possess only the means which suffice for home life and home duties. Then, again, another question arises in our minds. Is it fair upon those who have to earn a living that so many others, more fortunate in owning this world's goods, offer their services for nothing? Will this re-act upon those who are not amateurs but are professionals? England is brimming over at the moment with queries such as these, all of which concern the future of her women-folk, and just as we know for certain that it is injurious to offer voluntary service to the farmer because he will then try to grasp it alone, and when he cannot obtain sufficient free workers he will abstain from getting paid ones, or he may under-pay those which he is driven to employ, so we are bound to confess that the same result holds good in other branches of work. Too many voluntary workers denote generous qualities in a nation; they typify a gracious spirit of goodwill, but they may sadly impede and hinder the prospects of those who are forced by lack of means to earn their bread.

The Training of the Young.

As I think over these phases of new existence and new life that must of necessity open out to the women of Great Britain to-day, as I see in imagination the many hundreds who will have lost the support of a father, a brother, a husband, perhaps, there comes to me the certainty that the time has arrived for all young girls to be trained to have some definite calling, some fixed means of livelihood. How often do we not hear of those who, having been tenderly nurtured, accustomed to every luxury that a country home, a town house, perhaps a yacht and a villa on the Riviera, can give, are suddenly deprived of all these joys and find them swept away through the failure perhaps of some business concern or by the mismanagement of family affairs. What is, then, to become of these unfortunates? Will they linger on playing the part of "genteel poverty," one of the most harassing and difficult ones belonging to the world's stage, or will they with strength and vigour step back to a training ground and endeavour to make up for lost time by learning in real earnest to "play the game" in a real profession? It will be happiest for them if they decide upon this course, even if it means their assuming the humble spirit of a student when in reality they have reached the staid years of middle age.

Old and New Ideas.

Probably much that is backward in our development, much that impedes success in a provincial that which bears a semblance even of strife. Since, however, the great war so long expected has come at last, and both women and children are engulfed in its tide, whether they wish it or not, there has arisen the need for a speedy alteration in our methods for the education of English daughters. All should learn thoroughly some trade, and, if possible, it should be one which they are inclined to appreciate, so that in the event of their remaining unmarried or of their passing through some phase of financial trouble, this one source of help will always be ready at their side.

It speaks well for the powers of organisation and the patience of our women that most of the undertakings that have been given over lately to their management have been accomplished often by a staff of those who, having family and other duties to fulfil, have continually had to fit in their arduous official work with constant interruptions. Sometimes a secretary, too, had to train up an understudy to carry on her work of directing perhaps some hundred other voluntary workers, because at any moment she might have to answer the call of her children, left during holiday time with no one to look after them. Others have had to break off serious tasks because a need for house-hunting arose or some servant had to be suddenly relieved of too great a strain which a household reduced in number had brought about. Yet, in spite of these daily disturbances caused to work which concerned either the organisation of a hospital or the food supply of the nation, all has gone on smoothly by means of relays of loyal workers who replaced those who were obliged to quit their offices. But few men accustomed to the steady tradition of unbroken hours of office work would have tolerated this additional burden borne by women, and it is with a view to lightening their task in the future that these lines of suggestion are written.

The Building Up of the Race.

Much is expected of the rising generation of Englishwomen, but it will hardly be within their grasp to fulfil it unless they are treated munificently, as are their sisters in Canada and in the United States, to the proper, sound education that can alone fit them to be worthy, staid citizens. There would be an end then to all that hysterical striving, that breaking down in health and over-anxious battling that now takes place, and women need in no sense lose any of that soft feminine charm which is, and always will remain, their chief attraction. Those who pay us flitting visits from across the ocean manage to acquire a thorough professional business education, but this in no sense takes away from the softness, the tactful speech, the graceful bearing which is so essentially a woman's emblem. With but few exceptions, their clothes, the care with which they study their personal appearance, are quite as thoughtfully considered as is the branch of serious work in which they have specialised, and in which they show that comprehension of good workmanship which with us is possessed usually by the male population. The Englishman learns it whilst playing games, and at public schools or in the army, and unconsciously this good tradition of work is handed down to him as it has been to hundreds of other schoolboys, but our women have until recently had but seldom an opportunity of learning to work in the way that a man learns to train for a living.

These and many other thoughts connected with the future of Englishwomen are continually with us, and seem united in these days with that distant heart-beat of the Great Empire, for the building up of our race after the war rests largely with those young women who, single or married, will have to shoulder far larger and greater burdens of responsibility than those of their predecessors.

CHRISTMAS CAROL.

Of the Crown with which Mary Crowned her Son.

STAND up, my Lord, my King!
And let me crown Thy head
With this bright garland woven fresh
Of blossoms blue and red.

My Child, but Thou shalt wear
Far other crowns than this,
A crown of thorns, ah, woe is me!
And then Thy crown of bliss.

Yet of Thy grace, sweet Son,

THE QUEEN,
The Lady's Newspaper.

THE FUTURE OF ENGLISHWOMEN.

By the VISCOUNTESS WOLSELEY.

THE WORLD OVERHUNG AT NIGHT with a thick mist, through which, here and there, a bright star is seen, seems a propitious time for a Zeppelin raid! It is not good, however, to allow such forebodings to disturb us, and so, when dawn comes, I set forth to climb the hill and gain the downland. When I emerge upon the open downs, and the great distant view of the weald is spread out map-like below, a sound greets me.

It is the throb of a great Empire's heart. Nothing is comparable to this regular, deep sound of cannon fire, which the cessation of all week-day sound of rural work or machinery brings out, to-day being Sunday, with greater force than ever. That England is fighting for her very heart's blood we know, but had we any doubt at all, it were only necessary to come to these hills and listen to the steady unswerving sound which for past months has been with us day and night.

We hear its muffled softness when first we lie down to rest, and again when soft down breezes are wafted from the sea the sound continues vigorously, unflinchingly. Will it be much longer, or is the end near? we ask continually, and when there goes out a cry to the women of England to come forward and help yet more with Red Cross or voluntary aid work, we know that the need is great and that the cry of the wounded continues.

Can Women do More?

Can women do more than they are doing? It would seem that hardly any department of industry is without them at the moment, for whether it be in the shops that provide us with the necessaries of life, or in postal or telegraph departments, munition works, hospitals, gardens, farms, at very turn in short we are met by women. In their own homes those who have dismissed servants and governesses are replacing them by learning to do their work. It seems to me that the hearts of these women are in the right place, that they know that it is up to them to relieve men and enable them to fight and that to the best of their abilities they are helping to win the war, but—and the but is perhaps what is the impediment—their training has been insufficient.

We have now to be grateful for any amateur work that we can obtain, because by far the larger proportion of our women workers have never been educated with a view to doing independent work. With us until recently the main idea with parents was to save for the education of their sons, but daughters they thought need not receive especially good education, because after all they were intended to have as a primary object of life that of rendering the best service they could as helpmate to the man of their eventual choice. If they made him happy, if they brought up their daughters to follow their own example and soar to no professional attainments, but to be good wives and mothers, then this, some ten years ago, was all that was wanted.

Now, however, a change has come over all, and it means an entire reorganisation of women's work. This change has found women ready as regards their [illegible] and women, who will realise that the education of daughters should be as thorough as that of men, and that having received it they will be entitled or, I should like to say, obliged to claim a just remuneration for their work. Then there would be an end to over much that is voluntary and unpaid, and a general striving would ensue towards the perfecting of that which could be offered to the world for its true value. When we come to think of it, most of the successful war work which they have done has been given freely without thought of gain, and although this shows a grand spirit of unselfishness of character, there is another aspect to the question. Only those whose families are well provided for, or who are themselves possessed of independent means, can afford to give time to voluntary aid work, to Red Cross hospitals, to the Government scheme for organising workers for the land and many other institutions which may be termed the very foundation of our nation's "staying power" in this prolonged ordeal. Unless these ladies have sufficient capital to purchase their clothes, food, and general requirements for a busy life, unless they are justified in devoting those most precious gifts of health and time, gifts which a bread-earner knows only how to value sufficiently, they cannot do this voluntary work. The numbers, therefore, of women who are so fortunately placed is limited, and that is why the cry for educated women still continues, not because they themselves are faint-hearted or "slackers," but merely because the majority possess only the means which suffice for home life and home duties. Then, again, another question arises in our minds. Is it fair upon those who have to earn a living that so many others, more fortunate in owning this world's goods, offer their services for nothing? Will this re-act upon those who are not amateurs but are professionals? England is brimming over at the moment with queries such as these, all of which concern the future of her women-folk, and just as we know for certain that it is injurious to offer voluntary service to the farmer because he will then try to grasp it alone, and when he cannot obtain sufficient free workers he will abstain from getting paid ones, or he may under-pay those which he is driven to employ, so we are bound to confess that the same result holds good in other branches of work. Too many voluntary workers denote generous qualities in a nation; they typify a gracious spirit of goodwill, but they may sadly impede and hinder the prospects of those who are forced by lack of means to earn their bread.

The Training of the Young.

As I think over these phases of new existence and new life that must of necessity open out to the women of Great Britain to-day, as I see in imagination the many hundreds who will have lost the support of a father, a brother, a husband, perhaps, there comes to me the certainty that the time has arrived for all young girls to be trained to have some definite calling, some fixed means of livelihood. How often do we not hear of those who, having been tenderly nurtured, accustomed to every luxury that a country home, a town house, perhaps a yacht and a villa on the Riviera, can give, are suddenly deprived of all these joys and find them swept away through the failure perhaps of some business concern or by the mismanagement of family affairs. What is, then, to become of these unfortunates? Will they linger on playing the part of "genteel poverty," one of the most harassing and difficult ones belonging to the world's stage, or will they with strength and vigour step back to a training ground and endeavour to make up for lost time by learning in real earnest to "play the game" in a real profession? It will be happiest for them if they decide upon this course, even if it means their assuming the humble spirit of a student when in reality they have reached the staid years of middle age.

Old and New Ideas.

Probably much that is backward in our development, much that impedes success in a professional career, is due to the chivalrous spirit of our men, who are reluctant, even in these twentieth-century days, to hear of women battling in the midst of rough waters. They like those who they connect in their mind with home and peace to be guarded from [illegible] through [illegible] source of help will always be ready at their side.

It speaks well for the powers of organisation and the patience of our women that most of the undertakings that have been given over lately to their management have been accomplished often by a staff of those who, having family and other duties to fulfil, have continually had to fit in their arduous official work with constant interruptions. Sometimes a secretary, too, had to train up an understudy to carry on her work of directing perhaps some hundred other voluntary workers, because at any moment she might have to answer the call of her children, left during holiday time with no one to look after them. Others have had to break off serious tasks because a need for house-hunting arose or some servant had to be suddenly relieved of too great a strain which a household reduced in number had brought about. Yet, in spite of these daily disturbances caused to work which concerned either the organisation of a hospital or the food supply of the nation, all has gone on smoothly by means of relays of loyal workers who replaced those who were obliged to quit their offices. But few men accustomed to the steady tradition of unbroken hours of office work would have tolerated this additional burden borne by women, and it is with a view to lightening their task in the future that these lines of suggestion are written.

The Building Up of the Race.

Much is expected of the rising generation of Englishwomen, but it will hardly be within their grasp to fulfil it unless they are treated munificently, as are their sisters in Canada and in the United States, to the proper, sound education that can alone fit them to be worthy, staid citizens. There would be an end then to all that hysterical striving, that breaking down in health and over-anxious battling that now takes place, and women need in no sense lose any of that soft feminine charm which is, and always will remain, their chief attraction. Those who pay us flitting visits from across the ocean manage to acquire a thorough professional business education, but this in no sense takes away from the softness, the tactful speech, the graceful bearing which is so essentially a woman's emblem. With but few exceptions, their clothes, the care with which they study their personal appearance, are quite as thoughtfully considered as is the branch of serious work in which they have specialised, and in which they show that comprehension of good workmanship which with us is possessed usually by the male population. The Englishman learns it whilst playing games, and at public schools or in the army, and unconsciously this good tradition of work is handed down to him as it has been to hundreds of other schoolboys, but our women have until recently had but seldom an opportunity of learning to work in the way that a man learns to train for a living.

These and many other thoughts connected with the future of Englishwomen are continually with us, and seem united in these days with that distant heart-beat of the Great Empire, for the building up of our race after the war rests largely with those young women who, single or married, will have to shoulder far larger and greater burdens of responsibility than those of their predecessors.

CHRISTMAS CAROL.

Of the Crown with which Mary Crowned her Son.

STAND up, my Lord, my King!
And let me crown Thy head
With this bright garland woven fresh
Of blossoms blue and red.

My Child, but Thou shalt wear
Far other crowns than this,
A crown of thorns, ah, woe is me!
And then Thy crown of bliss.

Yet of Thy grace, sweet Son,
Forget not in those days
The crown poor Mary wove Thee once
Of mother-love and praise.

PAULINE W. ROOSE.

The Queen.
18/11/16

663b/39 663.B.

ENGLISHWOMEN IN THE COMMERCIAL WORLD.

By MRS MARGARET HEITLAND.

THAT WE HAVE EMPLOYED GERMAN MEN too much and Englishwomen too little is one of the lessons the war is daily teaching us. Employers, stripped of their men, look for Englishwomen to fill the empty places. What do they find? In many cases that the women who might have been experienced and equipped for trade have been so much dissuaded from entering it that they are absolutely ignorant of commercial methods, and require that somebody else should be employed in teaching them. Some employers even are so much appalled at the commercial ignorance their own countrywomen display that they engage Belgian girls by preference, finding that the foreign young woman has so much more "turn" for trade that even with the language handicap she can outstrip her English competitors.

I believe that people who have been brought into relations with Belgian refugees will bear me out when I say that those Belgian women of the middle class who are disposed to earn a livelihood by wage-paid work in shops or offices, generally display a more marked business gift than our own young women. When they go into our shops they seem really to enjoy selling things and to be interested in their customers' ideas and tastes. If they wish to enter an English office they pursue the project with zeal, practising shorthand as though they loved it, and studying the peculiarities of our mop[illegible] stem with attention. Of course there are those who [illegible] care to earn their living, and there are others who [illegible] o earn their livelihood in non-commercial ways. But I refer to those Belgian girls who go into business by choice; and I say that it appears to me their choice is, in this case, a more whole-hearted one than that of most of our own young women who go behind the counter or seat themselves at the typing desk.

Temperament may have a good deal to do with the difference to which I have alluded between the young womanhood of Belgium and England, but social conditions and education probably count for much more in the result. Our national social conditions, arising as they have done from that rapid wealth-making that took place during what a modern novelist has termed the "iron-age," have forced people to aspire to distinction in some spheres above the commercial domain. There have been so many people with large fortunes made during the iron age that other realms of effort have had to be discovered. The women have found those realms in social distinction and success; the men in political and social success combined. There are likewise countless thousands of middle-class people to whom the acquisition of wealth would be a most interesting event assuredly; but it has been considered good form to suppress this fact, and for everyone to appear to be well endowed from the start.

Persons of the highest type of mind and character c[illegible] ot in the making of money find enough to satisfy their thoughts and hopes. But gaining the money rewards of commerce is nearly always intermingled with other achievements, such as the acquisition of knowledge bearing on the business, the pleasurable sense of doing a difficult thing with success, and all the interplay of relations between superiors, equals, and subordinates which takes place constantly in any large firm. Possibly it is this last feature which best explains the attraction that commerce exercises over its own workers. The beginner and the subordinate are anxious to please, are interested in their colleagues, are proud of the position of the house to which they belong. The heads and managers are happy in occupying places where their work seems to be of importance, and where the employees look to them for instruction and help. It is this interplay of human relations that makes many a business interesting which to the outside observer may seem terribly dull.

Before the war women in England saw very little of business except its dullest sides. Kept pretty closely to such duties as taking down letters in shorthand and typing them, they learnt little of any business except the one in which they happened to be engaged as clerks, and even of it their knowledge was closely restricted. In shops, and notably in the various branches of the drapery, dressmaking, and millinery trades, the chances of rising have been considerably better than they were among the city office girls; yet even here the number of buyers and travellers has been comparatively small. Yet it is in buying and travelling that commercial people get to know their own world and are enabled to make discoveries which they may turn to account.

Many businesses which were more or less closed to women before the war now stand open to them. Women can go into banks, into the offices of railway companies, and into the commercial workshops of all kinds of enterprises. The[illegible] have now a wonderful opportunity for picking up knowledge, and it is to be hoped they will make the best use of their chances. Yet not every girl can succeed in business by being thrown into it to sink or swim. If she has no other teacher than herself her apprenticeship may be needlessly long.

These considerations lead me to press very earnestly for the establishment of some thorough and liberal system of commercial day schools throughout the country. The London County Council has led the way, and already does much to give girls the commercial training they require. The Council would doubtless acknowledge that it could do more, and that it will do more in time. Such experiments as its grocery school and its special day classes for women bank clerks and others are moves in a direction where other councils ought speedily to follow.

The smaller towns still keep pretty generally to their plan of evening classes which, useful though they are, do not give a complete preparation for either commerce in general or a trade in particular. In many towns the girls may seek in vain for classes where they can get a complete knowledge of accountancy—such a knowledge as would enable them to dissect the books of a firm and discover the relations that certain items of expenditure (such as labour, materials, rent, fuel, plant renewals, &c.) bear to each other or to other items for previous years under the same headings. They need to be able to discover by some other instruction than bankruptcy whether a business is not paying its way, and to pick out the item where most loss or waste is apparent. We have been too apt to think that a typing clerk or a careful bookkeeper is a business woman. She may be at the beginning of a business woman's career; but to become a real business woman she requires a great deal more than one or other of these acquirements. She needs to know several languages; she ought to have some knowledge of the geographical conditions and products of other countries. All that she can read of works of travel and modern history she will be able to use, and a great deal more.

Indeed, anyone who supposes that nothing can be taught in a commercial day school except shorthand, typing, making out bills, working a copying press, and tying up parcels is vastly mistaken.

In drawing up a programme for the kind of commercial schools we want in this country the puzzle would be to say which subjects could be left out. The whole nation, I know, is overworked. Yet surely now is the time for developing its commercial powers—now, when, as the vulgar say, it "has the place to itself."

The Common Cause
27-11-16

N.U.W.S.S. Scottish

WITH THE AMERICAN UNITS.

The following is a most interesting extract from a letter from Dr. Sybil Lewis to a friend. Dr. Lewis is in the American Unit, and was previously with Dr. Hutchison at Valjevo :—

" We are getting our tents pitched in a beautiful spot, and hope all the equipment will be here in a day or two, and then we shall be able to start in earnest. Don't be worried if my letters are a little erratic in arrival, as posts from here are not so regular as from Salonika. I am delighted to be away from Salonika, and up among the hills, where one can breathe.

" We came all the way by motor. Fancy a string of thirty-nine Fords ! and all had to stop if one went wrong. Fortunately for me I was in the first, so escaped the worst of the dust. The first few hours was across the plain, and would have been dull but for the other occupants of the road, who varied from Greeks and Turks in their picturesque clothes to French, and even a string of carts under the guidance of Chinese, with their curious little star-shaped helmets. Then mules, buffaloes, horses, autos of all varieties, family groups flitting, or at their cottage doorways, as we bumped past. We had a long wait by the roadside at dinner time, while three punctures were repaired, and then went on. Once we got into a block, a very narrow bridge, carts already stopped on it, and not room for us to pass, when a cavalcade coming in the other direction tried to do so. Confusion worse confounded when the buffaloes found themselves faced with Fords. However, we backed, and let them shepherdess next door, ... family, increased by a blind lodger, work on the land, and a liking for the occasional distractions of the village made her shun extensive use of the well, but also gave her a large-hearted tolerance of those whose views were different. The difficulties in the way of instituting pumps and sinks in country cottages are great, but where it has been done the housewife's life has been transformed.

The cottagers' friendliness made us particularly anxious to show that we had not come to play but to work. The first day we found we offended by continuing our hoeing of thistles when rain set in. It was natural to us, but to the labourer a change of clothes is a serious thing, and we quickly learnt to follow the lead of " Thomas," our instructor, who wrapped himself in a sack and sat under a hedge for shelter, and if the rain continued concluded, " Us 'ad better be going hame." But we were put to the test as to our determination to work. The solemn shepherd summoned us with a nod on the first really wet day, and we found ourselves cleaning a stable that had not been touched with broom or pitchfork for two years, satisfactory work showing its results quickly, for where our zest was perhaps half-assumed at first, we were pleased to find large manure heaps growing outside the stable as the hours passed, and when we discovered that our task was considered three-quarters of a day's work for four men, and that our party of four women had worked well up to time and finishing early, with time over for more " docking," we felt satisfied that we had passed our test. Working hours were from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. for women, and from 6 a.m. to 4 p.m. for men. We were ready for either, and doubtful as to whether we were to be considered men or women, but when we found on enquiry that we should raise dismay locally by considering ourselves men, we conformed to the women's hours, greatly to the shepherdess's relief. We had our chance of longer hours on haymaking days, which began with the improved weather. On these we worked till 7 p.m., or as much longer as was necessary. In this way hours taken off for sheltering are equalised by the agricultural labourer. There is no half-holiday on Saturday in that district. " Maybe we'll get it after the war," thought Thomas. Most would use the holiday, it seems, to dig their own garden plot, for which there is very little time at the seasons when the garden cries out for work.

If we were lucky in our district and our neighbours, we were luckiest of all in our employer, whose personal influence told much in those parts. He knew his men and knew about their work, and, as a keen farmer and broad-minded landowner, would close his eyes to the doings of the picturesque rabbit-catcher with his traps of tar buckets, but he also knew how to come round. " I know you'll do your best to help us these haying days," and the labourer who described the scene said, " You can't help doing your best when the Squire thinks that of us." Besides the 14s. a week, the labourers have their cottage and a garden (which they work themselves in their free time), and they are given coal, wood, and milk, according to the size of their families, so that the rate of pay is not so poor as it looks on paper.

Evening News
22-11-16

IVb 1

663b/40

SUNDAY SHELL-MAKERS.

100 Women Wanted to Make Munitions One Day a Week.

One hundred women munition workers are wanted by Messrs. Vickers, Ltd., to work on Sundays at a factory less than 20 miles from London.

They are to take the places of week-day workers who are now not allowed by the Ministry of Munitions to work on Sundays. Since the restriction was announced volunteer workers who were working on Sundays have dropped off, thinking that there was no further need for them.

" The need is greater than ever," an official of Messrs. Vickers told The Evening News to-day. " Machines are standing idle every Sunday because of the want of these 100 workers. That means 1,400 shells fewer a week. In a year's time 72,800 shells would be missing.

" Each volunteer when she is proficient can make herself responsible for 14 shells every Sunday.

" Those engaged in sedentary employment find the manual work a relaxation, particularly when it is coupled with the sense of having done something practical for the war."

Educated women between the ages of 18 and 40 years are wanted at once for the vacancies. Those who can do so go for a week's preliminary training, but arrangements have been made for women who are engaged during the week to be trained on Sundays.

For their work on Sundays they will receive 3s. and a bonus on output, which will depend on their skill and industry. The hours of work are from 9.30 to 7 p.m., and dinner and tea are provided at the works canteen at a charge of 8d. for dinner and 5d. for tea.

Application should be made either to the Labour Exchange, 439 Edgware-road, or to the secretary of the Sunday Volunteer Workers, Messrs. Vickers, Ltd., Erith.

The Daily Mirror
2-12-16

WOMEN IN AN UNDERGROUND CANTEEN.

FINE WORK IN PROGRESS AT A PARIS TERMINUS.

By BEATRICE HERON-MAXWELL.

WAR has made many wonderful changes and developed many latent talents and traits that might never have been realised by their possessors. The daughters of England had indeed already shown a mental potentiality and physical capacity that were signs of modern evolution, and the marked individualities of young British womanhood were evinced both in work and sport.

It would have been strange, therefore, if neutral nations looking on at the efforts of those entangled in the meshes of war had found Englishwomen wanting in energy, enterprise or determination to make the wheels go round that roll us onward to victory. Wherever the wagon might slow down on home or foreign paths there have been women's shoulders ready to help it along.

Take, for instance, the small band of pioneers who started a canteen at the Gare du Nord in Paris over a year ago.

It has become a haven for many a weary, hungry, thirsty and spent soldier.

The large cellar, formerly a basement luggage store, is now known as the Emergency Canteen, and it has sheltered as many as 5,000 soldiers a week, some for a few hours, many for a night or two, during the winter months of 1915-1916; and there still pass up and down its long staircase an average of 2,000 men weekly—English, French and Belgian.

Our own countrymen pay a moderate tariff, but French and Belgian soldiers are welcome, as guests, to the hospitality of their British hostesses. There is no suggestion of patronage in this keeping open house for these brave comrades-in-arms: it is the privilege of friendly alliance that we claim.

At the foot of the two flights of steps, after passing along a short corridor, one enters the underground canteen. On the right is a long dining-table with benches on either side, and on the left the gas ranges at which two of the English ladies are always busy with the unending routine of meals. From the roof scanty daylight filters through small clouded glass squares in the pavement overhead.

LITTLE LUXURIES.

This end of the wide cellar is a lounge with means for reading, writing, playing games, or resting. Curtains drawn two-thirds across it screen the next and middle portion where rows of small beds are set in orderly array, with extra mattresses in readiness so that more than the 200 sleepers provided for can be accommodated with a shakedown.

Curtains again form a barrier, behind which is a dressing-room, with several basins, an unlimited supply of hot-water, and —an addition much appreciated—a fitted bath. A French boy scout and an Italian man represent the entire masculine staff of the canteen and give personal attendance to the visitors.

The establishment is completed by a screened recess leading out of the lounge reserved for the ladies themselves, as a store-room and for rest intervals. It is provided with two couches for those who take it in turn to stay there all night.

The Women's Emergency Canteens for Soldiers, one of the numerous Œuvres des Dames Anglaises in France has its London headquarters in York-place, with an English honorary directorate. Lady Bertie of Thame is its president in Paris, and the organiser in France is Miss Desmond Hackett.

Miss Dorothy Brooke, the directress, has presided over this oasis for about a year; and her helpers, all voluntary workers like herself, sign on for a minimum of six weeks' service and pay £1 a week each for the privilege of giving it, in addition to defraying the cost of their own board and lodging.

British girls all of them, capable and with plenty of grit, they acclimatise themselves with the utmost cheerfulness to an atmosphere and conditions that are vitally different from those of their usual lives at home.

The Common Cause
27-11-16

Evening News
22-11-16

Irish

First-Hand Experiences.

XVII.—SOME OXFORD WOMEN ON THE LAND.

"The nicest thing we ever did was to go on the land," some of our party agreed, after having worked for a month at 14s. a week as unskilled labourers. We seem to have been lucky in our district and its inhabitants, for our neighbours took us naturally from the beginning, and showed every disposition of friendliness. An advance party, cycling into the unknown, was received at the farm of our destination with "So you've come. Will you have some tea? Lucy will show you the way to the cottage and bring you your milk at night." When Lucy, aged eleven, had escorted us to the semi-detached cottage where we were lodged, the shepherd neighbour poked his head in half shyly with an "you can pull the cabbages, and have some currants; we've carted wood into the shed close by, and they've brought coal," and soon afterwards some of his babies knocked at the door to bring flowers and look at the strange ladies. An empty shepherd's cottage on a hillside and overlooking a sloping hayfield had been furnished with all essentials by our employer, and we used to look at its grey roof and square chimneys that sent up a thin trail of smoke as we were working long hours in the fields close by. Labouring on the land increases one's sense of the value of one's own fireside and sheltering roof. Inconveniences are part of a cottager's life. You are lucky to have a clear spring just outside your porch, from which you can carry your water supply indoors pail by pail. "Ye'll be takin' the whole well indoors next," said the shepherdess next door, as she watched us with surprise. A large family, increased by a blind lodger, work on the land, and a liking for the occasional distractions of the village made her shun extensive use of the well, but also gave her a large-hearted tolerance of those whose views were different. The difficulties in the way of instituting pumps and sinks in country cottages are great, but where it has been done the housewife's life has been transformed.

The cottagers' friendliness made us particularly anxious to show that we had not come to play but to work. The first day we found we offended by continuing our hoeing of thistles when rain set in. It was natural to us, but to the labourer a change of clothes is a serious thing, and we quickly learnt to follow the lead of "Thomas," our instructor, who wrapped himself in a sack and sat under a hedge for shelter, and if the rain continued concluded, "Us 'ad better be going hame." But we were put to the test as to our determination to work. The solemn shepherd summoned us with a nod on the first really wet day, and we found ourselves cleaning a stable that had not been touched with broom or pitchfork for two years, satisfactory work showing its results quickly, for where our zest was perhaps half-assumed at first, we were pleased to find large manure heaps growing outside the stable as the hours passed, and when we discovered that our task was considered three-quarters of a day's work for four men, and that our party of four women had worked well up to time and finishing early, with time over for more "docking," we felt satisfied that we had passed our test. Working hours were from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. for women, and from 6 a.m. to 4 p.m. for men. We were ready for either, and doubtful as to whether we were to be considered men or women, but when we found on enquiry that we should raise dismay locally by considering ourselves men, we conformed to the women's hours, greatly to the shepherdess's relief. We had our chance of longer hours on haymaking days, which began with the improved weather. On these we worked till 7 p.m., or as much longer as was necessary. In this way hours taken off for sheltering are equalised by the agricultural labourer. There is no half-holiday on Saturday in that district. "Maybe we'll get it after the war," thought Thomas. Most would use the holiday, it seems, to dig their own garden plot, for which there is very little time at the seasons when the garden cries out for work.

If we were lucky in our district and our neighbours, we were luckiest of all in our employer, whose personal influence told much in those parts. He knew his men and knew about their work, and, as a keen farmer and broad-minded landowner, would close his eyes to the doings of the picturesque rabbit-catcher with his traps of tar buckets, but he also knew how to come round. "I know you'll do your best to help us these haying days," and the labourer who described the scene said, "You can't help doing your best when the Squire thinks that of us." Besides the 14s. a week, the labourers have their cottage and a garden (which they work themselves in their free time), and they are given coal, wood, and milk, according to the size of their families, so that the rate of pay is not so poor as it looks on paper.

Arcadia is the home of Conservatism and conventionality, and we found the one thing we must not do was to shock local feeling. They accepted our short skirts as ladies' ways; but they would have resented emancipation from the social standard in other ways that tempted us. We spent our nights indoors, we respected the Sabbath, we were careful not to exact or expect anything that one labourer does not naturally do as a kindness to another, we conformed to the codes of neighbourliness. But perhaps most important of all seemed great care in showing that we had come as unskilled workers ready to learn from the skilled. We found that they understood us over this, were ready to show us anything, and took a great interest in our progress; in exchange they turned to us for news of the war or occasional advice about clothes or children, and we parted wishing on both sides to see more of one another, and as regards work we had the satisfaction of hearing that the local farmers' meeting passed us as a successful experiment after three weeks of our work; and at a place ten miles away from our farm, where I begged a cup of a friendly cottager, I was told incidentally as news, "Those ladies at so-and-so are doing well, the farmers say."

To us there remains the happy memory of long days in the open fields, with views of far hills and clumps of trees or grazing cattle, and an intimate knowledge of this or that field in particular on which we saw our haycocks at a far distance! Certainly it was hard work and brought stiff muscles during the first week. People who do not wish to take their holidays actively had better avoid the land; but to the others it should be wholesome recreation and an avenue to many an experience and a better knowledge of a world that does not labour for pleasure.

ceive 3s. and a bonus on output, which will depend on their skill and industry. The hours of work are from 9.30 to 7 p.m., and dinner and tea are provided at the works canteen at a charge of 8d. for dinner and 5d. for tea.

Application should be made either to the Labour Exchange, 439 Edgware-road, or to the secretary of the Sunday Volunteer Workers, Messrs. Vickers, Ltd., Erith.

The Daily Mirror
2-12-16

WOMEN IN AN

ER THE GREA

er W. J. Edwards, R.F.A. longs to Uffington, in Berkshire.

Corporal James F "Fighting Fifth." Berwick's h

On the Belgian Front in West Flanders.

A FAMOUS CORPS AFTER RELIEF FROM THE TRENCHES: THE "GUIDES" RETURNING TO QUARTERS.

A detachment of one of the regiments of "Guides" of the Belgian Army is seen returning to quarters in the left of a barn, on being relieved from duty in the trenches. In their khaki-covered steel helmets and khaki uniform coats, few tourists in Belgium who remember the "Guides" of former times would recognise the corps for the same. The Belgian "Guides" of pre-war days were a crack corps par excellence, and in their natty turn-out the dandies of the Brussels garrison. Their officers' spick-and-span uniforms were quite street sights in the Belgian capital for visitors. That the "Guides" can fight as well as any soldiers in the world, the Germans have had proof on more than one occasion, and will know again when King Albert's men advance.—[Belgian Official Photo.]

663b/42

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

"WOMEN have shown themselves most capable and eagerly patriotic in the years of the war; they have had a chance to show what they can do, and they have already demonstrated their skill and adaptability to new and strenuous activities. Their skill, goodness, and bravery are beyond all praise. The future prosperous Britain will certainly arrange to utilise to the utmost women's work in many industries both manufacturing and distributive."

. . .

The words quoted were spoken at a recently held meeting of the Royal Society of Arts, and are yet another proof of the value of the services women have been rendering the country during the last two years. They are valuable, too, as an indication that prejudice against women's work as such is slowly dwindling. Not so very long ago, even the most ardent male supporter of the cause of feminism would hardly have ventured to express publicly such unbounded faith in the capabilities of the "weaker sex."

. . .

But quite apart from their value as a general tribute to women's work, the words are rather specially interesting at a time when the question of a complete mobilisation of all labour and resources for war purposes is under consideration by the Government. Of course, if all the "resources" of the country are to be really mobilised, women must be included in the process, and the part that women will play when the mobilisation has been concluded is a subject of keen speculation amongst those most interested in her future advancement.

INDISPENSABLE: IN THE BELGRAVIA WORK-ROOMS AND WAR-HOSPITAL SUPPLY DEPOT FOR BRITISH AND ALLIED WOUNDED.

Our photograph shows ladies at work in the packing department of this excellent depot, for the funds of which a sale and entertainment are to be held, to enable the depôt to increase its output of materials.—[Photograph by Sport and General.]

SPLENDID RED CROSS WORK ON THE SALONIKA FRONT: A SCENE AT A SERBIAN FIELD HOSPITAL.

Nothing could be more complete than the devotion with which the wounded are tended in the various war-areas, and our picture affords an incontestable proof of this.—[Official Photograph.]

. . .

In whatever other spheres of labour they may be called upon to enter, it is fairly certain that agriculture in one or other of its numerous branches is pretty sure to occupy the time of a large number of women. Someone suggested the other day that planting the parks with potatoes instead of flowers might have served as a valuable object-lesson to a people to whom, even now, the serious results of war have not been sharply brought home. Whether the hint will be acted on or not remains to be seen, but Mr. Runciman's recent pronouncements on food do suggest the idea that its production, even on a small scale, is the duty of everyone with a square inch of ground they can call their own.

. . .

Foreseeing the need of women's services likely to arise in agricultural work, the Women's National Land Service Corps was formed last February with the object, as stated in its recently published interim report, "of speeding up the recruitment of all classes of women for work on the land, in order to ensure the maintenance of the home-grown food supply." At that time the question of labour on the land had, owing to depletion caused by the war, become rather serious. The only labour available to replace it was that of women, and the Government, in consequence, took the step of establishing an organisation throughout the counties which by means of local committees was to urge on women, on the one hand, the patriotic duty of working for the farmers; and, on the other, to impress upon farmers the desirability of utilising such services whenever opportunity offered. It was just about this stage that the Women's Farm and Garden Union sent a deputation to Lord Selborne, then President of the Board of Agriculture, as a result of which the society received permission to organise the training of women for land work, a concession that ultimately led to the formation of the Women's National Land Service Corps, as a war offshoot of the older society, with the object of dealing with the problem of emergency war work as opposed to permanent employment.

[Continued overleaf.]

6636/43

. . . .

Apart from the object already mentioned, the corps aims at creating a favourable opinion as to the value of women's work in agriculture by sending out only such workers as are capable of making a good impression, and so helping to break down the prejudices of those who object to the employment of women in agricultural work. Further, the members are used not only as workers, but as organisers of the work of village women, and help also in general propaganda work by helping county committees in organisation work and speaking at meetings if there happen to be a call for such duties. With a view to avoiding disappointment both for employees and employers, inexperienced candidates for work have to undergo a preliminary six-weeks training. Of course, it is not claimed that thoroughly competent "hands" can be turned out in that time, but it has been proved that during that period the students acquire a pretty useful knowledge of milking, of the handling of tools, and the care of animals, which enables them to tackle their first paid job with more intelligence than would otherwise be the case. Above all, the consequent hardening of the muscles results in their being better fit, physically, to tackle really hard manual work without being unduly fatigued.

TO SUPERVISE WOMEN WORKERS OF CANADA: MISS BESSIE McKENNA.

Miss Bessie McKenna, of St. Thomas, Ontario, is a graduate of Toronto University, and has specialised in social work. She has now been appointed Supervisor of Women Workers in Canada, by the Minister of Labour. She qualified herself for the position by working in a Canadian munition factory, her previous experience having been in settlement work.

Photograph by Sport and General.

. . . .

After about six months' work, it has been found possible to form some sort of idea of the success of the enterprise, and the evidence available points to a successful start and an even more successful future. The women who have taken their work seriously—and the corps has no room for those who do not—find the life healthy and attractive, in spite of inevitable hardships and discomfort. On the other hand, employers have not been slow to express their appreciation of the work of the educated woman who has been carefully selected and "placed" with discrimination. For the rest, the announcement by the Government that after Jan. 1 next all exemptions of agricultural labourers will be reconsidered has merely urged the corps to even greater efforts. But funds are, of course, necessary to the upkeep of a voluntary organisation such as this, and anyone who would care to help financially should write to the headquarters of the Corps, 50, Upper Baker Street, N.W.—CLAUDINE CLEVE.

IN FRANCE: WOMEN ON THE TRAMS.

The question of women driving tram-cars and heavy vehicles generally in London has been rather hotly debated, but in Bordeaux they are to be seen acting as drivers and also as conductors. Our illustration shows a woman driver and a ticket collector; and a poilu.—[Photograph by C.N.]

6636/44

Doing Her War-Work: A Scottish Dairy-Woman.

CARRYING OUT WHAT WAS FORMERLY A MAN'S JOB: TESTING MILK IN A LABORATORY.

It goes without saying that the adaptable Scot, of either sex, is very much and very creditably to the fore in the industrial revolution brought about by the war; and the intelligence and industry shown by the new army of women workers are beyond praise. A branch of war work taken up by women in Glasgow is shown in our illustration of a woman worker in a large depôt of the Scottish Dairy Company, where women now not only test the milk, as shown in our picture, but also carry out heavy tasks previously assigned to men, such as loading the vans, cleaning the cans, and tipping milk into the tanks. They engage in their various branches of work without hesitation, toil conscientiously and steadily, and carry them through with success. — [Photo. by Illustrations Bureau.]

Devon Gazette. 8/12/16

WOMEN

FOR THE LAND.

AN EXETER MEETING.

Under the auspices of the Devonshire Women's Agricultural Committee a meeting was held at the Maynard's School, Exeter, yesterday, by kind permission of Mrs. Trenerry, to discuss the training and employment of educated women and girls to help in the food production of the country. In the unavoidable absence of Sir Thomas Acland the chair was taken by the Archdeacon of Exeter.

The Archdeacon, in opening the meeting, said he believed employers, after a little experience, would begin to realise that ladies and girls, when they put their shoulders to the wheel, were quite willing to do things as well as other people. He reminded his hearers that it was incorrect to say that agriculture was not a skilled calling; in fact, it required a great amount of skill.

Miss Calmady-Hamlyn, in the course of an earnest address, informed her hearers that, naturally, there were many difficulties to be faced in connexion with the employment of women on the land, but she was thankful to say that a good many of the difficulties had been overcome in Devon. Having spoken of the great patriotic scheme through which women were asked to assist on the land, she said the scheme had now become a living working fact in Devon and England. So much a fact was it that at the present moment 65,000 women in England were wearing the Government armlet, which was only given to women who had completed 30 days' work, or 240 hours' work, on the land. That was a substantial beginning in face of so many difficulties. She pointed out that the farmer might be described as the chief custodian of the food of the nation. They realised at Tribunals that the farmer was one of the few men who was bound to be left where he was. But the farmer's position brought with it great responsibilities. Women must offer themselves to work on the land, not because they thought they were the equal of men or the skilled labourer, but simply because, under the circumstances, they were offering to help and work with him in this crisis. Having remarked as to the difficulties experienced in making the Devon farmers see that women could help them, she advised women to be patient with the farmers, who were slowly, but surely, coming to realise they wanted women labour. She praised the spirit of the Devon working-women, who, as soon as the need was explained to them, had only been too willing to do what they could on the land, and spoke in appreciative terms of the manner in which the farmers had treated these women in her part of the county. Dealing with the call to educated women and girls, the speaker pointed out the difference between real education and other kinds. Real education never stood between Englishwomen and the national call. However high a degree women possessed, it did not prevent them going into munition works and risking their lives, and even losing them sometimes, as 25 did the previous day. The girls in a school like that, with their training, could not help realising and understanding the need of going out at the end of their school life and giving a part of their life to the care of the land. Women, she concluded, must not fail the men who were fighting. They must not fail, and she was sure they would not fail. That was why she asked them to give every bit of time they had to spare for the care of the land. She asked them always to remember the words of Lord Selborne inscribed on the certificates which were given to every woman after she had finished eight hours' work on the land. The words were, "Every woman who works on the land is as surely helping her country, as the men who are fighting in the trenches or on the sea." (Applause.)

Miss Trenerry said that for nearly twelve months they had organised parties of the girls to give some of their spare time to work on the land. There was a certain amount of response, and some of the older girls had come forward nobly. She believed the response would have been even greater. She emphasised the need of the girls being well shod, as they were less liable to catch cold. Above all, she asked parents not to think the work was unsuitable, because the girls got rather tired the first time they did work on the land. Dealing with some of the arguments raised against girls doing work on the land, she said that some people had asked her why the boys' schools did not do similar work. She suggested that some scheme might be organised through which girls' schools and clubs might cultivate waste land.

The Rev. F. G. Copeland, speaking as a parent of one of the girls at the school who had done farm work, contended that nothing but good could come from such action, provided they were well shod, and the responsibility for this rested with the parents. As regards boys' schools, he believed that the majority of the higher grade ones, at any rate, were busy in their workshops making munitions.

Miss Calmady-Hamlyn emphasised the importance of local schemes being arranged by which women could assist in cultivating allotments, etc., which might otherwise be left [illegible]. As an instance of what could be done in this direction, she mentioned that [illegible] ladies, most of whom had [illegible]

The Scotsman. 8/12/16

663. B.

WORK FOR WOMEN.

INDUSTRIAL REQUIREMENTS IN SCOTLAND.

Women are at present extensively employed in unaccustomed capacities. Many others, from patriotic motives, are anxious to do useful work, but have a difficulty in discovering where their services would be most welcome. In some of the more familiar classes of war work the supply exceeds the demand in particular localities; in others the supply falls short. In other occupations, again, there are openings for women workers to which those anxious to do productive work might be attracted if the conditions were better known. The Labour Exchanges in the Edinburgh district have done a large amount of useful work in registering applicants and giving information as to quarters where a demand for workers exists. As a result of inquiries at the Exchanges and at the headquarters of a variety of industrial concerns in the Edinburgh district, the following information as to openings for the employment for women and the conditions of work has been obtained. In the immediate district of Edinburgh, the result of the inquiry indicates that, except for skilled persons, the demand for women workers is at the moment being fully met. Elsewhere in Scotland, however, they are required, especially for agricultural work.

A DEMAND FOR FARM WORKERS.

The Labour Exchange in Edinburgh and a department with headquarters at the Divisional Office in the Grassmarket are endeavouring to induce women to undertake farm work. The need is urgent. Women workers are specially required for Ross-shire, Dumfriesshire, and Berwick. The reluctance of farmers to employ inexperienced workers, which was a difficulty last year, has disappeared under the more pressing need of the present time. What kind of women are most suitable? A lady official dealing with this department, herself fully experienced in farm work, said if she were an employer she would prefer educated women. They are, she said, the most conscientious in their work. Those farmers who had employed such women had found them satisfactory. A naval officer's wife and a governess had "made good" in this way. In Ross-shire, there was an arrangement for a sort of apprenticeship. Beginners would receive 10s. a week for a few weeks, and 15s. a week afterwards, with cottage and perquisites. Similar conditions ruled in Berwickshire. In Dumfriesshire, women who could feed cattle and milk cows got £1 a week, with perquisites. These terms, she considered, compared favourably with the earnings of munition workers, espetially when the favourable terms for getting supplies of milk, eggs, and butter were considered, and the conditions are more pleasant. One difficulty is housing. Another, more applicable to the town women, is the dulness of the country, especially in winter. This point has been considered by the County Committees appointed some time ago. These Committees are taking an interest in the workers; and amongst other agencies are arranging for social eveninga.

UNIFORMS FOR WOMEN AGRICULTURISTS.

At the Kilmarnock training centre, established some time ago, the supply of recruits is not equal to the demand for them. There some of the women are trained to plough. The workers are ploughing in some cases in Ross-shire. As an inducement to women to come forward for this work of first national importance, the Government has issued an armlet, which is given to workers who have done at least thirty days' work on the land. It is of green cloth, with a red crown. Equipment has also been considered. Strong overalls, thick jackets, and other items of attire are issued to workers through the department in the Grassmarket Labour Exchange Buildings at cost price. The equipment includes boots with serviceable clog soles and leather leggings. Miss Taylor, who had for some years been an instructress under the North of Scotland College of Agriculture in Inverness-shire, has been appointed organiser of women's work on farms. Women who desire to take up agricultural work should apply to Miss Taylor at the divisional office of the Labour Exchange in the Grassmarket. It may be noted that all places to which women are sent are previously inspected by a member of the staff.

WOMEN HORTICULTURISTS.

To judge from the numerous applications which have been received by the Edinburgh and East of Scotland College of Agriculture, there are many openings for skilled women gardeners. The need is greater than the supply. The regular course in horticulture consists of attendance for two winters in the institution, with a certain amount of practical work in the College garden at Liberton. Students require to be a full year in a recognised garden before they are finally certificated. An emergency course is about to be instituted. Its duration will be four weeks, and the instruction will be mainly in practical work at the College garden, with a certain amount of elementary theoretical teaching as well. The classes will be limited in numbers in order that everyone may have individual attention. It is understood that arrangements have been made for maintenance allowances being granted to those undergoing this training. In nursery and seed-growing establishments women have filled places hitherto occupied by men with satisfaction to their employers. For the most part the women were unskilled when they were engaged, but they quickly adapted themselves to the work, and soon made themselves proficient. Work of this kind, however, is not continuous all the year round, and the present time may be regarded as a sort of "dead season." In the spring and summer, from the middle of February onwards to June, the demand for labour increases, and women's work in present circumstances is indispensable at that time. A well-known firm of seedsmen in the Portobello district reported that as the result of an article which appeared a few months ago in The Scotsman, they have had a large number of applications from women which they [illegible] to be one of the existing drawbacks to recru[itment]. For the inexperienced there are vacancies [at] nominal starting wage, varying according to [age] and qualifications, from 5s. to 10s. weekly. W[hen] the period of training, which extends over seve[ral] months, is finished, the worker is, as a general rul[e] put on piecework. Complaints have been mad[e] that this change from time to piece rates mean[s] at first a drop in wages until a greater degree [of] skill is attained. An experienced worker can ear[n] quite a good wage if she shows a reasonable amount of skill. Factories in all parts of the country, including the Edinburgh district, require both skilled workers and learners.

ON THE RAILWAYS.

Substitution on the railways has made some progress. Women porters and carriage cleaners are now familiar figures at the stations. Evidence of further changes that may be anticipated in this direction is found in the proposal made by an English company to introduce women guards. Interviewed in regard to the part taken by women as railway workers, an official of a Scottish company stated they had proved fairly satisfactory. They were being introduced in the clerical departments, and also as parcel porters, ticket collectors, booking clerks, goods porters, goods checkers, and carriage cleaners. In the latter capacity, he said they had been very successful, but where heavy work was entailed physical disabilities had entered into the question of substitution. In the clerical departments the shorthand typists who had been introduced were doing valuable work where previous training in railway administration was not absolutely essential. It was pointed out that the railway clerk passed through an apprenticeship, and this period of training was indispensable in the discharge of various departmental duties. The difficulty at present was to get really experienced typists. They had been taking on girls with previous commercial training and girls of good education from school, who received a probationary wage during a period of training extending over several months. The difficulty was to get girls with a sound training. Women were also being employed in other clerical branches, including several departments of the head offices. Work in the booking offices had not been regarded with much favour so far by women, the long and irregular hours of employment which take the booking-clerk out early and late being the greatest deterrent. There was no lack of applications from women for work in all grades of the railway service. Indeed, they had more applications than vacancies to be filled.

CLERICAL EMPLOYMENT.

In no sphere of war activity have women been more successful than in clerical work. According to the representative of a well-known Edinburgh institution, they are really superior to men in some classes of this work. The demand for women clerks has far exceeded the supply, or at least the supply of the right kind of girl. A girl fresh from school, with a good education and a thorough knowledge of English, after a course of commercial training, is most suitable. She has not yet got out of the way of learning—her mental machinery is still operating. In this she gains over the woman who has been for several years at home after leaving school. The latter is generally on the outlook for a "lady secretaryship," as to which she has vague ideas. She may very often expect short hours and congenial work without going through even a short space of office routine. The substitution of women for men has taken place to a very large extent in the National Health Insurance Office—only 15 per cent. of the men of military age being left. Before the war 231 men and 79 women were employed; now there are 35 men and 182 women. The supply of girls for routine work has been quite satisfactory — these girls being obtained through the Labour Exchange, or selected by the Employment Bureau under the School Board. One difficulty about employing older women with no previous experience of office work is that they expect a larger salary than the young girls which, besides being bad economy, leads to trouble with the others. The working day is an eight hours' one, and the girls begin at 10s. a week, rising to 11s. at the end of six months and 14s. at the end of a year. There are also women of superior training and education for more responsible posts—University graduates, for example.

HOSPITAL WORK.

Large numbers of the "home" women could be very useful to the Red Cross as store-keepers, cooks, &c., and certainly no woman of the present day is more in demand than the domestic servant or the nursery-governess, from whose ranks women have been drafted into the tramway, postal, agricultural, and shop services. Nurses are required from time to time to fill vacancies in the Scottish Women's Hospitals for foreign service. The majority of those employed are fully trained nurses, but the hospitals employ a certain number of women who have had less than a three years' training in a general hospital. All must, however, have had considerable experience in nursing. In addition to these, a large number of women orderlies are employed. They receive no salary, but board, uniform, and travelling expenses are provided. Orderlies take the place of probationers and V.A.D.'s in other hospitals. For posts as orderlies, preference is given to women who have been trained and have had either experience in nursing or some training in domestic economy. Preference is also given to those who can speak French fluently. Girls are acceptable who have been accustomed to housework in their own homes and are strong, healthy, and adaptable. The nurses receive a salary of £20 per annum, with board, laundry, uniform, and travelling expenses. A small salary is paid to cooks, housemaids, and clerks, but only a comparatively small number of these are required. There are also a large number of women chauffeurs, all of whom must have had at least a year's experience and a thorough training in mechanical work and repairs. Only women who are thoroughly robust and able to rough it under difficult conditions are accepted, and no workers are taken who are not highly recommended by previous employers. At present no difficulty has been experienced in filling any vacancies that occur.

...these part the women were unskilled when they were engaged, but they quickly adapted themselves to the work, and soon made themselves proficient. Work of this kind, however, is not continuous all the year round, and the present time may be regarded as a sort of "dead season." In the spring and summer, from the middle of February onwards to June, the demand for labour increases, and women's work in present circumstances is indispensable at that time. A well-known firm of seedsmen in the Portobello district reported that, as the result of an article which appeared a few months ago in The Scotsman, they have had a large number of applications from women which they have not been able to comply with. At present they have a big staff of women workers in their establishment, and are unable to employ more, but they are hoping to take advantage of a proportion of the offers as soon as their busy season begins in February.

THE MUNITIONEERS' CONDITIONS.

From the point of urgency munition work should have a strong claim upon women at the present time. The work of shell-making, so far as female employment is concerned, is easily learned, and offers good remuneration. Efficiency is generally acquired within a month, and that no particular aptitude is necessary is seen from the fact that the ranks of the munitioneers have been recruited from such classes of women as domestic servants, shop-girls, and leisured women, who are tackling in this way the first manual labour they ever performed. The experience of a Scottish firm may be quoted as typical of wages and conditions. The work, which is continuous day and night, is arranged in three eight hours' shifts. The women on the two spells of day work earn a minimum of £1 per week of forty-five hours, and a bonus on the output of the establishment, which is equivalent to 25 per cent. of their wages, and, on the night shift, 4s. a week extra and the same bonus. Women have been found to adapt themselves very readily to the work, and in this particular case some of them are being trained in tool-setting. Before the end of the year, it may be mentioned, 2000 women are wanted for munition work in Scotland. Wages 22s. 6d. a week, with uniform and other articles of clothing provided. No previous training is essential. These women are accommodated at the large centre which requires them in hostels, the housing being as nearly as possible on garden city lines. The sum of 12s. weekly is retained for board and lodgings. Leisure is catered for in clubs, a picture house, and dancing halls, and other forms of entertainment. The physical well-being of the women is specially cared for by a resident staff. The only qualifications required of applicants, who must arrange matters through the local Labour Exchange, are that they should be active and in a good state of health, and, of course, cleanliness and tidiness are insisted upon. Locally there are few vacancies, but recruiting for large centres elsewhere is proceeding.

POSTAL SUBSTITUTION.

On the postal side of the General Post Office in Edinburgh women have been introduced in large numbers to take the place of men. In this case also applications must be dealt with through the Labour Exchange. On indoor jobs such as sorting about 150 women have been drafted in since the beginning of the war, and over 200 women have been taken on for letter delivery. The conditions are good. The indoor rate of pay ranges from 22s. to 25s. a week, according to capacity, with a bonus of 2s., and the working period is eight hours a day. The outdoor employees have 21s. a week, and the bonus, and in their case uniform and boots are provided—no little items in a time of high prices. Between the hours of 6 A.M. and 6.30 P.M. the outdoor women work three letter deliveries, involving altogether about eight hours' work. All applicants for the postal employment must be over 21 years of age, and comparatively short training is required in either case, though the indoor work, for which female compositors have been found specially suitable, requires a longer time. Women are in special demand for the Christmas postal rush. Already some 700 have been enrolled, but there is need for more. The work concerned concentrates in the week prior to Christmas.

THE CASE OF THE CONDUCTRESS.

Women have proved efficient on the trams and buses as conductresses. In winter the open air demands a more robust physique than many forms of women's work, but those who are able for the work like it exceedingly well, and naturally seem to thrive upon it. The women on the Edinburgh tramways are said to learn the business of tickets and fares in about ten days or less, and they are paid on the same scale as the men. The work on the buses which ply to the surrounding districts is a little more difficult, with the longer distances and the greater variety of tickets involved. From a week to three weeks is the period that suffices to instruct a woman thoroughly in bus duty. The wages range from 27s. to 33s. weekly. One large firm is utilising women for a variety of other occupations, such as motor repairing in its lighter and simpler aspects, cleaning of cars, painting and upholstering, and timekeeping. In every case the women begin at a wage of £1 a week. Women for this work are engaged as required.

HOSIERY WORKERS.

The war has given a marked impetus to the hosiery trade. Big orders have kept the mills going at high pressure, and there is consequently a labour problem. The demand for women is greater than the available supply. It is, of course, the skilled hand who is in greatest request. The small commencing wage is believed board, laundry, uniform, and travelling expenses. A small salary is paid to cooks, masseuses, and clerks, but only a comparatively small number of these are required. There are also a large number of women chauffeurs, all of whom must have had at least a year's experience and a thorough training in mechanical work and repairs. Only women who are thoroughly robust and able to rough it under difficult conditions are accepted, and no workers are taken who are not highly recommended by previous employers. At present no difficulty has been experienced in filling any vacancies that occur.

The Common Cause
12-1-17

663b/46 0636

The Educated Woman on the Land.

There was once upon a time a woman who spent her girlhood and youth as daughters at home invariably spent their girlhood and youth, even in the later Victorian Age. The boys of the family were educated and sent out more or less equipped for the battle of life; the girls, if they did not marry, stayed where they were and acquired the difficult art of carrying on such pursuits and occupations as may be carried on in a restricted area, without inconvenience to any other member of the family. When the home was broken up finally, after the death of both parents, a little, a very little, money fell to this woman's share. She was advised to invest it and live with relations. Only one woman in a thousand would have done otherwise, and she was that one. She took a very small farm, investing most of her tiny capital in the venture. For a Londoner this seemed a wild and rash scheme of adventure. No doubt the family foresaw her speedy return, without any investment, to live with relatives. Perhaps the tale might be expected to end that way, seeing that the heroine had little or no practical knowledge, and her relatives may have taken the view that "by this time her life-story was over," as Victorian novelists used to say of women of thirty. If so, their disappointment was complete. The little farm not only paid under her management— it was a striking success! But she set about succeeding with energy. She rose at four o'clock in the morning; she looked after the hot food for the poultry herself; she learned for herself all the arts and crafts of a small farm; she went to hear every lecture on agriculture or horticulture given in her neighbourhood; she bought books and read them at night; she got the best advice on the chemistry of the local soil and the manures it needed; finally, she found time to keep the accounts properly (an art which she had not acquired), and she did not try after impossibilities—she felt her way and tried her experiments on a small scale. Before very long a big London store was paying her an extra penny a pound for her poultry, because it was worth the money. Never could she be got to admit that her success was due to unusual ability—she insisted that she had only learned her business and given her mind to it, and that those who did not, "deserved to starve." But she neglected no opportunity of getting the best up-to-date scientific knowledge she could secure, and she grudged no trouble in carrying it out systematically. Let us therefore own at once that she was unusually able, and that in ordinary times others might hesitate to follow her example. But we have left the Victorian Age a long way behind us, and now the educated woman is entreated to go on to the land in a national emergency. "The lesson to be taken to heart above all others is efficiency," says The Times, "for there is now promise of a revival of agriculture and a satisfactory and profitable career for women may be found on the land."

Women are urged in every newspaper to become Food Producers. Every propagandist, it is true, also says that want of housing accommodation and low wages are obstacles to the career. "The cottage question in general, and the tied cottage grievance in particular, are powerful factors," says Mr. E. N. Bennett,"* in driving townwards the population of our villages. A large proportion of our cottages are, in the words of a Royal Commission's Report, "vile and deplorable dwellings, built without any adequate regard for sanitation or the air supply necessary for healthy sleep." Even of such cottages as exist there are not enough. Old cottages decay until they are abandoned; the housing problem in the country was acute long before the war. As for the "low wages," the other outstanding difficulty, it is estimated that 60 per cent. of agricultural labourers were receiving less than 18s. per week before the war, all allowances and extras included, and highly skilled workers, such as the shepherd, seldom got as much as 23s. 9d. It is under these unpromising conditions that educated women are asked to "step in"—not only to increase our food production, but to make what they can of conditions produced by very complex causes during the last hundred years and more. At first sight it certainly looks a formidable undertaking. It is impossible to overlook in these pressing invitations to educated women to come forward, the element too often lurking in an appeal to women's patriotism—the wish to get cheap rather than efficient labour. Agricultural problems have been neglected for long, and we have the arrears to pay at compound interest; are we now to use women expensively educated for quite other ends, as stop-gaps? Is it too late even now to begin organising, rather than using up and wasting our woman-power?

At present the only solutions of the housing problems are unsatisfactorily vague. Country houses might, no doubt, be utilised as hostels, if their owners happened to be patriotic enough to lend them, and well enough endowed to move out and live somewhere else; but the supply of country houses seems hardly likely to be equal to the demand. Farmhouse lodgings (another suggestion) sound more promising, but the powers of the farmer's wife to "do for" lodgers are limited; for she herself is hard-worked, and servants are very unwilling to go to service in farmhouses. Building "hutments," though at first it may seem impracticable on the score of labour and cost, might, however, be worth considering; especially where small settlements of women would be able to work over a considerable area.

Experts seem to be agreed that the best way in future of sending out women emigrants to the Dominions will be in groups of twenty or so at a time; each homestead group to be sufficiently numerous, in case of temporary ill-health to carry on the work. The outlay on necessary tools and furniture is much less for one group of a score or so than it would be for a dozen different settlers. One furnace answers for the whole establishment, and one bake-house oven. Again, the great loneliness of life on the land is a serious drawback to girls and women who are quite unused to it. Life in a "bothy" is a much more cheerful matter. We have not been offered, so far as can be seen, any cheaper alternatives; and as our food supply is a vital matter, some solution of the housing problem must be found. Numbers of women are now being specially trained as carpenters, and sent to France to erect hutments there. Some of these women carpenters could be retained to build hutments for women settlers on the land in Great Britain.

There remain all the problems of water-supply, sanitation, stores, and transport. But these are exactly the problems which our Units have tackled successfully in other lands—Serbia, Russia, and Corsica. What one or two isolated women could not undertake successfully, a settlement can carry out by co-operation.

If the settlement of women farm labourers should develop after a time into a co-operative society of women farmers, all the experience gained would be invaluable. In an account which appeared last year in THE COMMON CAUSE of an estate which is divided up among a number of women-farmers, the benefits were described of the central depôt for machinery, and the advantages of clubbing together to buy seeds, tools, and fertilisers, and to send produce to market. In the near future there will probably be many openings for such co-operative farms in the pheasant-ridden counties which have almost ceased to be self-supporting. If the "bothy" scheme contributed to such a result the outlay would be repaid over and over again.

One consideration more. A few score of settlements of educated women-workers, who would be brought into continual contact with the present conditions of village-life, should bring, in their turn, a new and hopeful element into the old problems of which reformers seemed inclined to despair. When educated women were imprisoned in Holloway Gaol, Holloway Gaol bestirred itself at last, and got one or two of its more outrageous defects set right. When educated women, nurses first, and then doctors, took up their places in hospitals and workhouses, evils previously despaired of began to mend. So let us hope that when the educated woman puts herself into the farm-labourer's place, much that was evil and has hitherto been obscure and assumed to be the inevitable, may be seen clearly enough from a new angle, and found not to be in the eternal nature of things, but curable. Two hundred thousand women wanted for the land! God give them good speed!

Nottingham Express
18-1-17

Sheffield Telegraph
18-1-17

Daily Express 6636
8-3-17

WOMEN AND THE LAW.

An old question will be reopened at the annual meeting of the Bar to-day, when the admission of women to the profession will again be proposed. This matter—unlike the admission of women to the ranks of solicitors, which would require legislation—is in the hands of the barristers themselves, and it is their conservatism which has barred the way. So effectually has it done so that when, four years ago, Mr. Holford Knight made his proposal, there were fewer than forty supporters at a meeting attended by four hundred lawyers. It is hardly likely that so considerable an opposition has been worn down. Nor do we think that it can fairly be urged that the merits of the question have really been affected by the war. Women have done valuable work, surpassing all expectation in many cases, but it would be a little difficult to show that it is work which proves an unsuspected capacity for legal work. No shortage of male lawyers, we are told, exists, and if it did, of course it would be impracticable to talk of meeting it by the introduction of women, for they would require about three years to qualify. But we are far from urging that Mr. Knight and his friends should sit down under the refusal of four years ago. There is, on general grounds, a strong case for the plea they are making. If it is urged that women are not likely to make good lawyers, they may fairly retort that, even so, that is a natural incapacity which may safely be left to itself, and is far from supplying a ground for setting up artificial barriers. A more serious objection is that the interests of justice will not be served by introducing a disturbing factor into the atmosphere of Law Courts. That raises a psychological question on which more than one opinion may honestly be held. There are branches of the law in which it is quite possible that women's influence would be a humanising and altogether beneficent one. The question lawyers have now to settle is whether they will take the risk of throwing open the doors in the faith that matters will adjust themselves. There is a widespread opinion that this is one of the reforms that are "bound to come." At least, we are sure that the ladies and their advocates will not be silenced by an adverse vote to-day.

THE LADY GARDENER.

WHAT WOMEN CAN DO OUT OF DOORS.

(By F.R.H.S.)

The other day I was talking with a prominent nurseryman in Sheffield on the subject of labour for gardens. I asked him what his views were on the subject of the lady gardener. His reply was characteristic, and just what I expected. He said: "Lady gardeners have a great future before them if they will only begin gardening at the beginning, and consent to proper training."

Will the would-be lady gardener consent to be properly trained? That is a question of some importance. Unfortunately many aspirants think they can rush into gardening in a minute, and become fully qualified head gardeners in half an hour, but such is quite impossible.

It may be a surprise to some people in Sheffield to know that there is already a big demand for lady gardeners, or, if another name be preferred, we can say for female gardeners. Men are being called up for service, and all others that can possibly be spared are sent into munition factories, thus making labour for gardens of all kinds—market, nursery and private gardens—extremely hard to get. But it is imperative that gardens should not be neglected during the coming season. With food at the price it is, the most must be got off existing gardens, as well as those to be formed on land which has lain idle for the last two years. Sheffield women can greatly help in growing food, if they will only go to work seriously, and I may say that gardening is pleasant work; indeed, for those who have strong constitutions it is one of the most healthy of all outdoor lives.

Training Essential.

Some form of training is almost essential if the aspirant is to be worth her pay later on. It is all very well ladies making up their minds to grow vegetables in their own private gardens by themselves, now that their man has been called up. In most cases they cannot do it; they do not know how to do it; they do not know the elementary principles of gardening; so no wonder their garden is not a success. While very much can be learnt from good books, such are not enough to make a successful gardener, and women who really want to do their bit at a time when their country so sadly needs their aid, would do much better to pocket their private feelings on the matter and offer themselves to some good market or nursery gardener.

Work on a nursery or market garden is hard; that must at once be confessed, but it is wonderfully good training. The women-gardeners have to rough it much as the few men who are left have to do. They have to be out in nearly every sort of weather, so a strong constitution and a proper rig out are necessary. Here the aspirants have to learn to do exactly what they are told, they have to watch closely to see how various things are done, and their own feelings must be laid entirely aside. There are some jobs which they may not think they ought to be told to do, such as wheeling manure on to the land, but they must do them without murmur, for the woman who is particular about what she will and will not do is not one that will get on in gardening. A chance will very soon come for her to show what she is worth. Her employer may want some seed sowing, or a few plants potting on at a time when he has no men to spare for the job. So he will tell her to do it. She will have seen the men doing work of that nature before, and if she is wise she will have noted how it was done. So she uses her knowledge here. Her employer is pleased, he pushes her on, and each little job he gives her is a step in the ladder to becoming a true gardener.

Opportunities.

A few months pass. An urgent call comes from a private gentleman that he must have a gardener to do some work at once. The aspirant's employer does not know what to do; he hasn't got a man to spare. Then he remembers his aspirant. "I wonder if she could possibly do it," he says, and he sends for her. The lady gardener would be foolish indeed, if she said she would not go, because the work was rather hard, and maybe difficult. So she is sent to this private garden, and wins laurels for herself and her employer.

After a year it is time to look out for a regular position under a clever head gardener in a private garden, unless your present employer offers you inducement to stay on with him, by raising your wages. In this direction aspirants should aim high; they will learn a vast lot more if they are under a very clever head man, than if they are under a mere nobody. That, of course, is fairly obvious.

Some women are, of course, far more clever in learning gardening than others; it seems to come to them naturally. In that case it is not too bold a thing to try for a head gardener's post after a year or 18 months of training. Here again the aspirant should aim high, but not too high this time. Lord So-and-So might be willing to take her, but he has acres of pleasure grounds which she is not yet competent to manage. But Sir Somebody-Else only has a good herbaceous border, some shrubberies and a lawn, and all the rest of his extensive garden is taken up with growing vegetable crops. That is the position for her. Vegetable gardens are far easier to manage than pleasure grounds, a point which should be noted.

The above sketch is naturally very brief, but the chances of a woman as a gardener have not been exaggerated. The secret of success is to miss no opportunities, to be always on the alert, willing and eager to do anything that comes along. A start should be made as soon as possible, for the sooner the aspirant gets taken on by a nurseryman or market gardener the sooner she will be a head gardener. Even assuming the war does not last as long as her year of training, I do not think she will be sorry, for gardening out of war-time has, of course, far greater possibilities than gardening in war-time.

While she is being trained, the aspirant can, in her spare time, educate herself considerably by reading good gardening books.

AEROPLANE MAKING.

A particularly interesting branch of munition work is the making of fittings—small metal parts—used in the construction of aircraft. The work is light, and is readily carried out by women once they have received the training required. A special three weeks' course of training under a skilled woman instructress has been arranged by the Women's Service Bureau, which consists in learning how to file up to a template (a metal guide that must be copied with minute exactness), and also how to make tracings for some parts of the work and to measure with a micrometer.

The greater part is semi-skilled employment, but some learn to make gauges and tools for machines, which is more difficult. The workshop is at Chelsea, and when the women have completed their training they are drafted into Government factories.

At the present time there are vacancies for suitable applicants, and the women required are those with a good education, preferably college students, as a most important qualification is a sound knowledge of mathematics. This does not mean merely the ability to multiply and subtract, as some have imagined, but a knowledge of algebra and Euclid and experience in reading decimals, as the gauges have to be read correctly up to the thousandth part of an inch.

The age limit is from eighteen to thirty-five, and good health and good eyesight are very necessary. Most of the work is done standing, and it is, therefore, unsuited to girls who are not strong and tire quickly. The work itself is not actually heavy, and the factory hours are not always long, but vary according to the pressure of work; Sunday is generally a holiday, and usually Saturday afternoons are free as well. It is impossible to state the exact pay that can be earned after training, as this varies according to the amount of work done and the skill required. The fee for the full course is one guinea.

Women who wish to train for making aircraft fittings should write to the secretary, Munitions Department, Women's Service, 58, Victoria-street, S.W., or they can call for an interview between the hours of ten and 1.30 at the same address.

6636/47

Daily Telegraph
25. 2. 20.

TRAINING OF WOMEN.

An appeal for £200,000 is being made on behalf of the Household and Social Science Department of King's College for Women, University of London. The department was founded in 1908, its headquarters at that time being in Kensington-square. In 1915 the department was removed to the present buildings on Campden-hill, but, owing to lack of funds, it has been possible so far to erect only two-thirds of the proposed structure. The work of the college has developed so rapidly that the completion of the building has become most urgent. To such a degree has the number of applications for enrolment increased that unless money can be obtained very shortly it will be necessary to refuse large numbers of applicants. Trained women are needed to-day as administrators of domestic matters in colleges and schools, as teachers of scientific housewifery, as housekeepers, managers of canteens or hostels for working girls and women, and in other capacities, and the department now appealing for funds is doing an important work in helping to supply the demand for these women. The expenditure involved is as follows: To complete buildings, £45,000; to endow professorships (hygiene, child welfare, &c.), £32,000; to equip laboratories, £10,000; to library, £5,000; to outstanding liabilities, £8,000.

Yorkshire Observer
19. 3. 20.

WOMEN'S CALL TO FIGHT LABOUR.

SIR,—British women, having faced so many years of sacrifice and struggle to gain their political freedom, and after proving by their splendid service and devotion during the war how worthy they are of this long-delayed privilege, cannot but look with grave misgiving on the trend of political events in our country to-day. It almost looks as if we were in danger of losing that for which we have fought so hard and won at so much cost.

The dawn of freedom came to women at a perilous time in our history, and brought with it far greater responsibility than we had ever anticipated, and it is up to all women to consider whether they are facing those responsibilities with the thoughtful activity our country needs of us.

We are faced to-day with a policy advocated by extremists among so-called Labour leaders, which is as savage in principle as it lacks common sense, knowledge and humanity. We look upon this policy as far too nearly allied with the Bolshevist policy under which yoke the Russian people to-day are undergoing such unutterable suffering and torture. Our sympathies go out to these people, and we learn the lesson from their sufferings to fight this menace to civilisation in our own country with all the determination common to all true British women.

Women demand that they shall have a share in promoting the National wellbeing through the present British Constitution and thus help to hand down to future generations a country worthy of our forefathers and the heroes of recent years who sacrificed life and service in forming and protecting it.

We, therefore, call upon all women to organise at once by joining the Middle Classes Union. This union is non-party, with a definite policy of active opposition to Bolshevism in any form whatever, and to the proposed programme of the extreme Labour Party. Besides which, it deals very practically with many other questions, such as "equitable distribution of taxation," "suppression of profiteering," and is ready to organise so as to maintain essential public services in any emergency.

We appeal to the patriotism of the women of all unorganised classes to co-operate in promoting the common good of our country.

BERTHA BELDON,
Organiser of Women's Section,
Middle Classes Union.
General Buildings, Aldwych, London, W.C.

6636
6636/49

icated to his comrades dead and living, and its craftsnship, as well as its reality, may be judged from this deau:

If we return, will England be Just England still to you and me—
The place where we must earn our bread?
We who have walked among the dead,
And watched the smile of agony,
And seen the price of liberty,
Which we have taken carelessly
From other hands. Nay, we shall dread,
If we return,
Dread lest we hold blood-guiltily
The thing that men have died to free.
Our English fields shall blossom red
In all the blood that has been shed,
By men whose guardians are we,
If we return.

---

ton Pools. By JOHN DRINKWATER. (Sidgwick and Jackson. 2s. 6d. net.)

DMIRERS of Mr Drinkwater's poems—and no one can uestion his craft and accomplishment—will find in this olume what they expect to find. Some of the poems are

---

Collected Poems. By WILLIAM H. DAVIES. (Fifield. 6s. net.)

MR DAVIES'S quiet muse has won its public. The present collection is made by himself.

Worple Flit and Other Poems. By E. WYNDHAM TENNANT. (Blackwell. 2s. net.)

THIS small volume shows finished craftsmanship throughout. In places it has more than that.

Between Doubting and Daring. By JANE BARLOW. (Blackwell. 1s. net.)

A FEW of these verses have real charm. In others the matter is trite and heavily handled.

NOVELS.

Xingu. By EDITH WHARTON. (Macmillan. 5s. net.)

ONE thing everybody knows about Mrs Wharton as a story writer—she is, in the phrase of our small boys, as clever as

---

MR MUIRHEAD BONE'S DRAWINGS OF THE WESTERN FRONT.

A GATEWAY AT ARRAS.

(From the second volume of drawings, just published.)

about the war; others are tranquil in spirit. All reach a good level, though none are particularly striking.

Hallow-E'en and Poems of the War. By W. M. LETTS. (Smith, Elder. 2s. 6d. net.)

MISS LETTS is an Irish poet. She has published, before this, good work, but none quite to equal "The Call to Arms in our Street," "The Spires of Oxford" is beautiful, too. Her writing is singularly delicate and exact.

Pelpieap. By ERIC SUTCLIFFE. (Longmans. 3s. 6d. net.)

THESE poems are almost all of them beautiful, and some of them, such as "Narcissus" and "To a Dead Face," are on a very high level indeed. The exactitude and delicacy of observation in their themes would have satisfied George Meredith, while their artistry in the main is simple and perfect.

Allegresse and other Poems. By WILLIAM WATSON. (3s. 6d. net.)

[illegible]

she can stick. The only question, indeed, about this last volume of hers is whether it may not be a little too clever—the plots, some of them, use "the last word" in varied directions with such singular adroitness. All the stories are interesting; the collection of them is head and shoulders above the ordinary. We only venture to grumble, and that ever so slightly, at the something wanting in them in feeling because of that standard Mrs Wharton herself set us in her Tales of Men and Ghosts.

• • • • •

Moor Fires, by E. H. Young (Murray, 6s. net.), is not quite a successful novel, but it has remarkable, even first-rate qualities. The magic of its moorland background—the mental space, nebulousness, and want of objectivity in it—is really given. It is high praise to say the book has a certain Bronte-esque quality. But it has.

• • • • •

Romance in a caravan! Lives there a man with soul so dead as never to have longed for life in a little house [illegible]

the caravan is the least convincing part of the story, and gipsy blood but a poor excuse for Phinney's methods. However, the latter's punishment is long drawn out and "fits the crime," and caravan life provides all the romance and sentiment we expect of it. There is real charm about the caravan scenes, and we become acquainted with some attractive characters. Phinney's father, for the most part a quiet onlooker, is a dear person. From the atmosphere of war it is all as remote as possible.

• • • • •

In Esther Lawes, by Edgar Jepson (Hutchinson; 6s.), the life of a young English governess in a small West Indian island is carefully portrayed, and with so much detail of each day's somewhat monotonous happenings as to suggest a diary. The island appears to have been unusually unfortunate in its white population, for the whole atmosphere is one of continual quarrels and jealousy amongst rival planters and their families. Deformed Ichabod Walrond, with his riches, superiority, and vindictiveness, is rather of the Sir Richard Calmady type, but not particularly agreeable. To bring matters to a climax incident of a distasteful kind is finally introduced, but even then Esther's unnecessary and quite unlikely marriage somewhat delays the obvious conclusion.

• • • • •

Mrs Charles Whitham has translated for English readers Martin Rivas, the most popular of the stories written by Don Alberto Blest-Gana, the great Chilian novelist, and the translation (6s. net) is published by Messrs Chapman and Hall. It is a story of life in Santiago about the middle of last century, and the hero, a young countryman of sterling character, makes his presence felt in the house of his rich patron in spite of his poverty and his modesty. Practically against her will he wins the heart of the proud beauty he adores—as he thinks, hopelessly. It is a lengthy novel, but gains in interest as it proceeds.

• • • • •

MR EDGAR WALLACE still relies on his device of the "Four Just Men" for giving us a thrilling story, The Just Men of Cordova (Ward, Lock; 5s. net). It is apparent, however, that this device is wearing a little thin. The attempt to transfer the interest to Cordova is only transitory, because the crimes of the villain and their punishment bring us back to this country. One cannot help remarking that the "Just Men" might very well, in the present instance, have left the punishment of the chief criminal to the police.

• • • • •

In An Unusual Romance, by Maud Horswell (Elliot and Stock; 6s.), a childless couple adopt a beautiful baby girl whose origin is wrapped in mystery. Just when Barbara becomes old enough to enter into "love's young dream" her deficiencies in the way of name and family become embarrassing. Naturally at this critical moment the mystery is unravelled, and Barbara is endowed with lands, a title, and irreproachable parents. Of its type this is a far from unusual romance. Had it any claim to reality we might grant it unusual.

• • • • •

Mr Forrest Reid cannot be dull or undistinguished, and The Spring Song (Arnold; 6s.), a tale of the terrible obsession of an imaginative small boy in an unimaginative family, has very great delicacy. As a narrative, however, it is not very convincing. Henry James, we feel, has worked this ground before and, perhaps because it is unlawful territory for the novelist, has worked it "better" because more horribly.

• • • • •

MISS RICHINGS, who has written previously a story of Chaucer's time, tells in Broken at the Fountain (Heath, Cranton, 6s.) of fourteenth-century Portugal. The tale at times grows a little heavy, but it has good work in it. Its much-persecuted heroine is at first a lady-in-waiting to Dom Pedro's wife, and after—— But that is to tell the story!

EXHIBITION OF MR MUIRHEAD BONE'S DRAWINGS OF THE FRONT.

THE EXHIBITION of Mr Muirhead Bone's drawings at the galleries of Messrs Colnaghi and Obach consists chiefly of the series now being published by the authority of the War Office by Messrs George Newnes Ltd. in two-shilling parts, which have already become widely known to the public. The reproduction of the drawings in their published form is so good that the interest of the originals is to some extent discounted. In the present show there are exhibited seventy-six, of which only forty, and those the most important ones, have already appeared in print and have been noticed in our columns. Among the remainder are two interesting little road studies (Nos. 12 and 18) and many little scenes in faint colour of human life at the front. Perhaps the best of those still unknown generally to the public is an extraordinarily clever pencil sketch of a room under the gables of a French farmhouse, where the drawing of the timber beams is of the best quality of the artist's work. The two fine pencil drawings of Amiens Cathedral and the Quai at Rouen have already appeared, and so has the magnificent drawing of the portal at Arras, which is reproduced in this issue. Readers of Balzac will perhaps recognise in this fine gateway a resemblance to the entrance to the courtyard described in Douai in the Recherche de l'Absolu. Both of them have the massive quality which betokens a Spanish origin and are a fine echo from the days of the Spanish occupation of French Flanders. It is interesting to note that in Arras, a few hundred yards from this gate, the Anglo-French treaty of peace was signed after the Battle of Agincourt. Of the figure pictures the most striking are those of the "Doctors Waiting for the Wounded" (reproduced in one of our recent issues) and "A Mess of the Royal Flying Corps." The battle pictures we have already noticed. We are informed that this fine collection of original drawings will be housed in the British Museum as the property of the nation. They well deserve it.

[illegible]

A GATEWAY AT ARRAS.

(From the second volume of drawings, just published.)

about the war; others are tranquil in spirit. All reach a good level, though none are particularly striking.

Hallow-E'en and Poems of the War. By W. M. LETTS. (Smith, Elder. 2s. 6d. net.)

MISS LETTS is an Irish poet. She has published, before this, good work, but none quite to equal "The Call to Arms in our Street." "The Spires of Oxford" is beautiful, too. Her writing is singularly delicate and exact.

Pilgrimage. By ERIC SHEPHERD. (Longmans. 3s. 6d. net.)

THESE poems are almost all of them beautiful, and some of them, such as "Narcissus" and "To a Dead Face," are on a very high level indeed. The exactitude and delicacy of observation in their themes would have satisfied George Meredith, while their artistry in the main is simple and perfect.

Retrogression and other Poems. By WILLIAM WATSON. (3s. 6d. net.)

THIS is much more of an essay against slipshod writing, and vague "poetic" feeling, than it is a volume of poems. Mr Watson, like George Meredith, believes the ordinary conception of poetry—as embroidery, if not slight perversion, of fact—to be a false one. This in view, he extols Gray she can stick. The only question, indeed, about this last volume of hers is whether it may not be a little too clever—the plots, some of them, use "the last word" in varied directions with such singular adroitness. All the stories are interesting; the collection of them is head and shoulders above the ordinary. We only venture to grumble, and that ever so slightly, at the something wanting in them in feeling because of that standard Mrs Wharton herself set us in her Tales of Men and Ghosts.

• • • • •

Moor Fires. by E. H. Young (Murray, 5s. net.), is not quite a successful novel, but it has remarkable, even first-rate qualities. The magic of its moorland background—the mental space, nebulousness, and want of objectivity in it—is really given. It is high praise to say the book has a certain Brontë-esque quality. But it has.

• • • • •

Romance in a caravan! Lives there a man with soul so dead as never to have longed for life in a little house on wheels. Jane's Husband, by Susan Redgrave (Sampson, Low, Marston, and Co.; 5s. net) was no holiday-maker playing at caravan life, but a true gipsy proud of the bluest of blue of gipsy blood. Jane, alas! belonged to the unromantic conventional middle-class. Her introduction as a second in Martin Rivas, the most popular of the stories written by Don Alberto Blest-Gana, the great Chilian novelist, and the translation (6s. net) is published by Messrs Chapman and Hall. It is a story of life in Santiago about the middle of last century, and the hero, a young countryman of sterling character, makes his presence felt in the house of his rich patron in spite of his poverty and his modesty. Practically against her will he wins the heart of the proud beauty he adores—as he thinks, hopelessly. It is a lengthy novel, but gains in interest as it proceeds.

• • • • •

MR EDGAR WALLACE still relies on his device of the "Four Just Men" for giving us a thrilling story, The Just Men of Cordova (Ward, Lock; 5s. net). It is apparent, however, that this device is wearing a little thin. The attempt to transfer the interest to Cordova is only transitory, because the crimes of the villain and their punishment bring us back to this country. One cannot help remarking that the "Just Men" might very well, in the present instance, have left the punishment of the chief criminal to the police.

• • • • •

In An Unusual Romance, by Maud Horswell (Elliot and Stock; 6s.), a childless couple adopt a beautiful baby girl whose origin is wrapped in mystery. Just when Barbara becomes old enough to enter into "love's young dream" her deficiencies in the way of name and family become embarrassing. Naturally at this critical moment the mystery is unravelled, and Barbara is endowed with lands, a title, and irreproachable parents. Of its type this is a far from unusual romance. Had it any claim to reality we might grant it unusual.

• • • • •

Mr Forrest Reid cannot be dull or undistinguished, and The Spring Song (Arnold; 6s.), a tale of the terrible obsession of an imaginative small boy in an unimaginative family, has very great delicacy. As a narrative, however, it is not very convincing. Henry James, we feel, has worked this ground before and, perhaps because it is unlawful territory for the novelist, has worked it "better" because more horribly.

• • • • •

MISS RICHINGS, who has written previously a story of Chaucer's time, tells in Broken at the Fountain (Heath, Cranton, 6s.) of fourteenth-century Portugal. The tale at times grows a little heavy, but it has good work in it. Its much-persecuted heroine is at first a lady-in-waiting to Dom Pedro's wife, and after—— But that is to tell the story!

EXHIBITION OF MR MUIRHEAD BONE'S DRAWINGS OF THE FRONT.

THE EXHIBITION of Mr Muirhead Bone's drawings at the galleries of Messrs Colnaghi and Obach consists chiefly of the series now being published by the authority of the War Office by Messrs George Newnes Ltd. in two-shilling parts, which have already become widely known to the public. The reproduction of the drawings in their published form is so good that the interest of the originals is to some extent discounted. In the present show there are exhibited seventy-six, of which only forty, and those the most important ones, have already appeared in print and have been noticed in our columns. Among the remainder are two interesting little road studies (Nos. 12 and 18) and many little scenes in faint colour of human life at the front. Perhaps the best of those still unknown generally to the public is an extraordinarily clever pencil sketch of a room under the gables of a French farmhouse, where the drawing of the timber beams is of the best quality of the artist's work. The two fine pencil drawings of Amiens Cathedral and the Quai at Rouen have already appeared, and so has the magnificent drawing of the portal at Arras, which is reproduced in this issue. Readers of Balzac will perhaps recognise in this fine gateway a resemblance to the entrance to the courtyard described in Douai in the Recherche de l'Absolu. Both of them have the massive quality which betokens a Spanish origin and are a fine echo from the days of the Spanish occupation of French Flanders. It is interesting to note that in Arras, a few hundred yards from this gate, the Anglo-French treaty of peace was signed after the Battle of Agincourt. Of the figure pictures the most striking are those of the "Doctors Waiting for the Wounded" (reproduced in one of our recent issues) and "A Mess of the Royal Flying Corps." The battle pictures we have already noticed. We are informed that this fine collection of original drawings will be housed in the British Museum as the property of the nation. They well deserve it.

DRESS CUTTING AND DRAFTING. By M. Prince Browne. Part 1. contains Bodices, Sleeves, and Collar; Part 2. Skirts and Adaptation of Bodice Patterns to Blouses, &c.; Part 3. Tailoring and French Pattern Modelling; Part 4. Adaptation of Patterns to the Cutting-out of Undergarments. Price 1s. each part; four parts in case, 4s.—FIELD & QUEEN (HORACE COX) LTD., Windsor House, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C. [ADVT.]

6636/50

CULTURED WOMEN AS MUNITION MAKERS

A CALL TO NATIONAL WORK.

By THEKLA BOWSER.

THE MERE POSSIBILITY of a State Mobilisation of Women should turn the scale in their decision to undertake regular war work, voluntarily, just as the suggestion of conscription sent thousands of our best men to the recruiting stations.

Are the cultured women, those who have had the advantages of good birth and fine education, going to wait "to be fetched?"

"They have not waited; they are working already," perhaps will be the retort. That is true in a large measure, but there are still hundreds of leisured women who are doing nothing for the war, or are just salving their consciences by knitting a few socks or putting in an irregular attendance at a War Work Depôt.

At the very outset of this article let me quote the words used to men by the late Lord Kitchener: "Be honest with yourself; be certain that your so-called reason is not a selfish excuse."

If in the words that follow I dare to hit out clean and straight from the shoulder, it is because I have seen such sights as are unimaginable to those who have not been within ear-range of the firing line. In France I have dressed the wounds of men travelling from trenches to base, I have seen the extremes of misery and pain and wretchedness borne with indomitable courage by men of every grade in life, and now that I am home, invalided, I can only use my pen as a medium in some poor endeavour to stir the enthusiasm of women who have hitherto felt no call to sacrifice themselves and become regular war workers, going to their task week in and week out until that wonderful day dawns when Peace shall reign once more upon the earth.

The woman with true "reasons" and not "excuses" can read all that I have to say with a clear conscience; she is probably making time from her domestic or other duties to give in knitting or to canteen or war depôt work, and thereby is doing very real and much needed service; but there are still thousands of leisured women who, for want of a better name, may be called "ladies," women of good birth who have lived in comfort, if not in luxury, all their lives, who could take their courage in both hands and offer themselves unconditionally and entirely as munition makers for the "duration of war."

All over the country there have sprung up factories, great and small, where shells and cartridges are being turned out by the million daily. One of the many wonders of the war is the marvellous way in which factories, originally established for absolutely unwarlike purposes, have been converted into munition works.

In a certain country town, for instance, there was a factory where work connected with house-building was carried out. At the very commencement of the war this firm grasped the situation and installed machinery for shell-making. It commandeered, through Government, certain plant in neighbouring factories, and adapted it to war work; it trained its foremen to become foremen in charge of machinists instead of carpenters, and it trained its "hands" in the processes of shell-making. It was not easy, but it was accomplished, and the nation's work went forward steadily.

But gradually the men, as and when they could be spared, left the works—they were content to be making the shells—they wanted to be "over there"—while men and their fore-firm, which is only instanced because it is typical of hundreds of others, wanted more than that from its hands. It wanted enthusiasm, patriotism, conscientiousness, and intelligence.

Shell Inspection.

An inspiration came upon one member of the firm. Where better could these qualities be looked for than in women of the higher grades of society? Ladies, not by courtesy, but by actual birth, by education, by upbringing; women who had had all the advantages that go to make the best type of womanhood, physically and mentally strong, with the love of home and country in their hearts, the earnest desire to be of use, the ability to give them all because they are unhampered by the financial and domestic difficulties which loom about them less fortunate sisters.

The idea was not an instant success, and many women labouring

Use of the Weighing-kept running without operators? Where were more men to be found? Women already were being employed to a certain extent, but there are so many avenues for the labour of the working woman nowadays that they are not easy to get, nor do factory hands generally bring to their work anything more than the wish to get through the necessary hours which will carry them to a satisfactory pay-day. This classes; each wore the blue overall and cap which is given out to all workers by the firm.

It was an experiment, and all kinds of prophecies were made; but the originator of the notion held firmly to his opinion, and refused to be disheartened when a great many of his new workers came regularly for a week or two and then decided that they must really "have a rest."

"I will come back later on," they would say plaintively, and probably were astounded when they were quietly told, "Oh no, thanks; if you leave now you will not return."

In these very works there is a clever machine which churns all kinds of old metal into filings, and then pours out the golden dust over a stairway where the "treads" are magnetised. Thus every atom of steel is caught and held, whilst the brass passes onwards to be re-made into shell cases. Just so with the women workers—gradually but surely the work tests and sifts them; those of true and pure steel cling to the magnet, which is nothing more or less than unswerving patriotism.

The refining process is hard and sharp, but it leaves no dross, so that the "ladies" who prove their "grit" are worth twice or thrice as much to the firm as the worker who knows nothing of the joy of working for the work's sake.

Many cultured women who have courageously tried to work in war factories have found the conditions so terrible that they have given it up in despair. That position can be and should be remedied, and in our typical firm there are colonels' wives, doctors' daughters, "county" people who had hitherto known nothing but comfort in their daily lives, who have now worked continuously, day by day, for months and even for over two years. Some of them are still doing the most ordinary work of feeding a machine, or transferring portions of shells from one shop to another, but others have risen to positions of responsibility. No account whatever has been taken of their rank in the social scale, the best qualified women in each shop being taken out and trained as "tool setters." That means that a certain number of machines are put under each one's charge. She is taught how to adjust the "tools" in each machine and how to keep them sharp and in good condition. It is her business to see that all her machines run well, and if one stops or turns out bad work it is her fault.

The gentl woman, surely must bring to bear upon all such work, something more than her scantily-educated sister can do. Once having been taught the actua work, she can use her intelligence, her delicacy of handling the tools, her whole capacity, to keep those machines, not just in running condition, but in the very best order. She will take a pride in having no "break down" amongst her machines, and she will exert herself to the utmost to make them turn out the best work.

The housing problem is a big one, but in this case it has been overcome. At first the workers were forced to live in small, dull dwellings, where they were charged high prices for comfortless accommodation. If people are to work well and especially if they have always been accustomed to the comforts of life, they cannot do eight hours' arduous toil without having suitable conditions in their "off" time. This firm therefore took several large houses, furnished them prettily, and turned them into clubs for their lady workers. Each one pays her share of the cost, but no profit whatever is made, and certain standing expenses are borne by the firm.

A charming house, standing in its own grounds, has been

By THEKLA BOWSER.

THE MERE POSSIBILITY of a State Mobilisation of Women should turn the scale in their decision to undertake regular war work, voluntarily, just as the suggestion of conscription sent thousands of our best men to the recruiting stations.

Are the cultured women, those who have had the advantages of good birth and fine education, going to wait "to be fetched?"

"They have not waited; they are working already," perhaps will be the retort. That is true in a large measure, but there are still hundreds of leisured women who are doing nothing for the war, or are just salving their consciences by knitting a few socks or putting in an irregular attendance at a War Work Depôt.

At the very outset of this article let me quote the words used to men by the late Lord Kitchener: "Be honest with yourself; be certain that your so-called reason is not a selfish excuse."

If in the words that follow I dare to hit out clean and straight from the shoulder, it is because I have seen such sights as are unimaginable to those who have not been within ear-range of the firing line. In France I have dressed the wounds of men travelling from trenches to base, I have seen the extremes of misery and pain and wretchedness borne with indomitable courage by men of every grade in life, and now that I am home, invalided, I can only use my pen as a medium in some poor endeavour to stir the enthusiasm of women who have hitherto felt no call to sacrifice themselves and become regular war workers, going to their task week in and week out until that wonderful day dawns when Peace shall reign once more upon the earth.

The woman with true "reasons" and not "excuses" can read all that I have to say with a clear conscience; she is probably making time from her domestic or other duties to give in knitting or to canteen or war depôt work, and thereby is doing very real and much needed service; but there are still thousands of leisured women who, for want of a better name, may be called "ladies," women of good birth who have lived in comfort, if not in luxury, all their lives, who could take their courage in both hands and offer themselves unconditionally and entirely as munition makers for the "duration of war."

All over the country there have sprung up factories, great and small, where shells and cartridges are being turned out by the million daily. One of the many wonders of the war is the marvellous way in which factories, originally established for absolutely unwarlike purposes, have been converted into munition works.

In a certain country town, for instance, there was a factory where work connected with house-building was carried out. At the very commencement of the war this firm grasped the situation and installed machinery for shell-making. It commandeered, through Government, certain plant in neighbouring factories, and adapted it to war work; it trained its foremen to become foremen in charge of machinists instead of carpenters, and it trained its "hands" in the processes of shell-making. It was not easy, but it was accomplished, and the nation's work went forward, steadily.

SHELL INSPECTION.

ONE OF THE WORKSHOPS.

But gradually the men, fit and well, felt the more urgent call of the guns; they were not content to be making the shells—they wanted to fire them. Older men and those less able than themselves could work these machines, whilst they must get up to the firing line and take their share in the fighting. The firm was only too glad to see their men "joining up," but there came a day when it knew it was up against a huge difficulty. How were the machines to be kept running without operators? Where were more men to be found? Women already were being employed to a certain extent, but there are so many avenues for the labour of the working woman nowadays that they are not easy to get, nor do factory hands generally bring to their work anything more than the wish to get through the necessary hours which will carry them to a satisfactory pay-day. This firm, which is only instanced because it is typical of hundreds of others, wanted more than that from its hands. It wanted enthusiasm, patriotism, conscientiousness, and intelligence.

An inspiration came upon one member of the firm. Where better could these qualities be looked for than in women of the higher grades of society? Ladies, not by courtesy, but by actual birth, by education, by upbringing; women who had had all the advantages that go to make the best type of womanhood, physically and mentally strong, with the love of King and Country in their hearts, the earnest desire to be of use, the ability to give their all because they are unhampered by the financial and domestic difficulties which hedge about their less fortunate sisters.

The idea was set in motion, and many women belonging to county families in the neighbourhood offered themselves as workers. No distinction whatsoever was made between them and the ordinary "hand." Each one was put to the job which seemed to suit her best; each took her place in one of the "shops" side by side with women of all classes; each wore the blue overall and cap which is given out to all workers by the firm.

It was an experiment, and all kinds of prophecies were made; but the originator of the notion held firmly to his opinion, and refused to be disheartened when a great many of his new workers came regularly for a week or two and then decided that they must really "have a rest."

"I will come back later on," they would say plaintively, and probably were astounded when they were quietly told, "Oh no, thanks; if you leave now you will not return."

In these very works there is a clever machine which churns all kinds of old metal into filings, and then pours out the golden dust over a stairway where the "treads" are magnetised. Thus every atom of steel is caught and held, whilst the brass passes onwards to be re-made into shell cases. Just so with the women workers—gradually but surely the work tests and sifts them; those of true and pure steel cling to the magnet, which is nothing more or less than unswerving patriotism.

The refining process is hard and sharp, but it leaves no dross, so that the "ladies" who prove their "grit" are worth twice or thrice as much to the firm as the worker who knows nothing of the joy of working for the work's sake.

Many cultured women who have courageously tried to work in war factories have found the conditions so terrible that they have given it up in despair. That position can be and should be remedied, and in our typical firm there are colonels' wives, doctors' daughters, "county" people who had hitherto known nothing but comfort in their daily lives, who have now worked continuously, day by day, for months and even for over two years. Some of them are still doing the most ordinary work of feeding a machine, or transferring portions of shells from one shop to another, but others have risen to positions of responsibility. No account whatever has been taken of their rank in the social scale, the best qualified women in each shop being taken out and trained as "tool setters." That means that a certain number of machines are put under each one's charge. She is taught how to adjust the "tools" in each machine and how to keep them sharp and in good condition. It is her business to see that all her machines run well, and if one stops or turns out bad work it is her fault.

The gentlwoman, surely must bring to bear upon all such work, something more than her scantily-educated sister can do. Once having been taught the actual work, she can use her intelligence, her delicacy of handling the tools, her whole capacity, to keep those machines, not just in running condition, but in the very best order. She will take a pride in having no "break down" amongst her machines, and she will exert herself to the utmost to make them turn out the best work.

The housing problem is a big one, but in this case it has been overcome. At first the workers were forced to live in small, dull dwellings, where they were charged high prices for comfortless accommodation. If people are to work well and especially if they have always been accustomed to the comforts of life, they cannot do eight hours' arduous toil without having suitable conditions in their "off" time. This firm, therefore, took several large houses, furnished them prettily, and turned them into clubs for their lady workers. Each one pays her share of the cost, but no profit whatever is made, and certain standing expenses are borne by the firm.

A charming house, standing in its own grounds, has lately been taken over for this purpose. The old gardener has been kept on so that vegetables may be grown, and an excellent housekeeper manages the catering and work of the club. There is a large dining-room, a very pretty drawing-room, and a quiet writing and rest room. The bed rooms are mostly large, so that two beds are placed in each; but screens or curtains are arranged to give privacy. There is a tennis lawn, and in the drawing-room a piano, so that the workers may "re-create" themselves in various ways.

6636/51

The shifts are arranged in varying lengths to overcome the awkwardness of going to the works during the night. They are of seven, eight, and nine hours in length, and the work is so arranged that everyone gets a night shift once in three weeks.

Workers enter as probationers for two weeks, and are paid 15s. a week. After that they are guaranteed a minimum of 22s. a week at the rate of 6d. an hour, and are put on piecework, and as they very quickly become proficient their pay increases week by week, so that they earn on the average between 25s. and 30s. per week.

So far women have not been employed in the laboratory of the works., though there is no reason why they should not be, if women who are skilled in metallurgy will come forward; nor are they to be seen in the tool room, where the most exquisite of tools, fine and delicate, are made by highly-skilled workmen. This may all be only a matter of time, for many women have a real taste for engineering, but hitherto have lacked the opportunities of training, so that before long cultured women may be taking their places in the tool room, which is in very fact the heart, the main-spring, of a factory.

Mess Room for Girls.

Many women workers prefer to have their meals in the factory instead of going out for them, and for this reason a most delightful canteen has been established, where a good plate of hot meat and two vegetables is served for fourpence and a cup of tea for one halfpenny. The room is pleasant and the meals are thoroughly well cooked.

A very large part in the life of the factory is played by the Nurse Superintendent, who has under her care every employée. It is to her that the woman worker first applies, and if suitable is engaged by her. The Superintendent puts each woman to the job which she considers most suitable, and no discussions or grumblings are allowed. The worker must be content to do absolutely as she is told, to work cheerfully wherever she is put, and to obey the rules of the factory implicitly.

The health of the workers is remarkably good, but there is an excellent surgery, where all accidents are attended to and where workers report themselves if they are ill. Quietly and unostentatiously the trained nurse, who is the right woman in the right place, has taken over all kinds of great and small tasks which go to the smooth working of things in general. She is a woman of the world, who has travelled and has seen life from various standpoints, and her hospital training is only one of the many adjuncts that make her capable of dealing with the divers problems which present themselves to her in the course of a day. Under her she has three excellent "First Aid" nurses, who take the three shifts and are always on duty in the surgery in turn. During the day the superintendent goes through every shop in the works at least once, but generally several times, and at night the nurse in charge of the surgery goes through the entire works once.

A welfare committee exists in the works, one girl from each shop being elected by her comrades as a member. When it seems desirable to settle any points of welfare the committee calls a meeting and things are amicably arranged. There is a hockey club and there are dancing and games on certain evenings in the mess room.

It is all very interesting and very wonderful because, to put it long such an experiment it has already proved entirely successful

But there is just one weakness, one chip in the shoulder which must be remedied if the output of shells is to be not only kept up but increased [illegible] been shown that women munitioners can do the [illegible] that their health does not suffer; that their keen concise, which rings out from the management of many a munitions factory in general, and from the one of which I have been writing in particular.

The cultured women of the kingdom must be honest with themselves and allow no excuses to creep in. Let them look at it fair and square. The men of their own station in life went in their thousands to stand in the ranks to fight side by side with the roughest and lowest of their fellow creatures. What mattered that when they were all fighting for the right? We women cannot go up into the firing line to take the awful risks of warfare, and only a comparative few are able to go and nurse the men within the war zone; but there are hundreds and thousands of leisured women today who have not fully set their hands to the plough, but who could and should serve their country and the peace-loving world, which wants to see the war come to an early but satisfactory and honourable end; they can throw in their lot with these noble pioneers who have already toiled unremittingly at munition making.

The really ordinary "hand" works automatically, and drops out the instant she has an excuse to get free; but the cultured woman will run her machine just as long as it will move, and will get every ounce of work out of it. She has behind her inspiration, enthusiasm, initiative, and she uses the brains and the training which a happy fate has given her. A mighty privilege she holds, and she must realise it.

Shall these ranks be allowed to have empty spaces? One hundred and fifty more women of this class are required at once in one factory alone. Will you set your shoulder to the wheel? If it be impossible, will you talk about the

A VERY URGENT APPEAL.

READERS of the Queen have always responded most liberally to appeals for the wounded, and now an urgent request is made to them. It is for knitted comforts for the Red Cross, for which requests are pouring in to the Countess of Gosford, the demand far exceeding the supply. The Red Cross is asked on an average to supply 90,000 various garments a week, and of these 25,000 are knitted. There is no stock at all of these at present, and when workers fail the authorities are obliged to purchase, which is undesirable both as avoidable use of professional workers' time and of money. So great is the need that it seems justifiable to plead that time which can possibly be spared from other occupations should be given up to knitting for the next few weeks. Many of the things wanted—face washers, for instance—can be knitted by quite little children, or again can be done by busy mortals in the briefest of spare moments, as for the matter of that can the bed socks, which are also very much needed and make the smallest demand on time or patience, on skill or sight. These face washers and bed socks are specially asked for, as are knitted skull caps, gloves, mittens, helmets, day socks, and cardigans. Directions for knitting any of these are procurable from the Central Workrooms, price 1d. each, but to facilitate matters a few of the most urgently needed are appended. Even gifts of ones and twos count up delightfully, so it is earnestly hoped that a very considerable number will find their way quickly into Lady Gosford's store.

Knitted Face Washers

require some swab knitting cotton and a pair of bone needles, No. 2. Cast on thirty-five stitches (about 10 inches) and knit plain until a square is made.

Knitted Skull Cap for the Wounded

requires 2oz. three-ply wheeling any dark wool, two needles; bone or steel, Nos. 7 or 8. Cast on forty-eight stitches, knit fifteen rows, 2 plain, 2 purl; knit plain for 12 inches, then fifteen rows, 2 plain, 2 purl, and cast off. Sew up the sides, turn cap inside out, and fasten corners down to where the ribbing begins.

Bed Socks

require 5oz. white double knitting wool and four bone needles, No. 8. Cast on sixty stitches, twenty on each of three needles. Knit 2 plain, 2 purl for 10 inches, then all plain for 10 inches, then decrease 1 stitch about the middle of each of the first two needles, and 1 at the beginning and end of third needle. Then knit 6, take 2 together, and repeat, doing this to end of round. Knit 6 plain rows. Knit 5, take 2 together, and repeat to end of row. Knit 5 plain rows. Knit 4, take 2 together, and repeat to end of row. Knit 4 plain rows. Knit 3, take two together, and repeat to end of row. Knit 3 plain rows. Knit 2, take 2 together, and repeat to end of row. Knit 2 plain rows. Knit 1, take 2 together, and repeat to end of row. Knit 1 plain row. Knit every two together; then cast off the few remaining stitches, leaving a length of 4 or 5 inches of wool to be neatly finished off with darning needle.

Mufflers

should be 58 inches long and 10 to 12 inches wide; dark wool.

Gifts should be sent to the Countess of Gosford, Central paid 15s. a week. After that they are guaranteed a minimum of 22s. a week at the rate of 6d. an hour, and are put on piecework, and as they very quickly become proficient their pay increases week by week, so that they earn on the average between 25s. and 30s. per week.

So far women have not been employed in the laboratory of the works, though there is no reason why they should not be, if women who are skilled in metallurgy will come forward; nor are they to be seen in the tool room, where the most exquisite of tools, fine and delicate, are made by highly-skilled workmen. This may all be only a matter of time, for many women have a real taste for engineering, but hitherto have lacked the opportunities of training, so that before long cultured women may be taking their places in the tool room, which is in very fact the heart, the main-spring, of a factory.

Mess Room for Girls.

Many women workers prefer to have their meals in the factory instead of going out for them, and for this reason a most delightful canteen has been established, where a good plate of hot meat and two vegetables is served for fourpence and a cup of tea for one halfpenny. The room is pleasant and the meals are thoroughly well cooked.

A very large part in the life of the factory is played by the Nurse Superintendent, who has under her care every employée. It is to her that the woman worker first applies, and if suitable is engaged by her. The Superintendent puts each woman to the job which she considers most suitable, and no discussions or grumblings are allowed. The worker must be content to do absolutely as she is told, to work cheerfully wherever she is put, and to obey the rules of the factory implicitly.

The health of the workers is remarkably good, but there is an excellent surgery, where all accidents are attended to and where workers report themselves if they are ill. Quietly and unostentatiously the trained nurse, who is the right woman in the right place, has taken over all kinds of great and small tasks which go to the smooth working of things in general. She is a woman of the world, who has travelled and has seen life from various standpoints, and her hospital training is only one of the many adjuncts that make her capable of dealing with the divers problems which present themselves to her in the course of a day. Under her she has three excellent "First Aid" nurses, who take the three shifts and are always on duty in the surgery in turn. During the day the superintendent goes through every shop in the works at least once, but generally several times, and at night the nurse in charge of the surgery goes through the entire works once.

A welfare committee exists in the works, one girl from each shop being elected by her comrades as a member. When it seems desirable to settle any points of welfare the committee calls a meeting and things are amicably arranged. There is a hockey club, and there are dancing and games on certain evenings in the mess room.

It is all very interesting and very wonderful because, in spite of being such an experiment, it has already proved entirely successful.

But there is just one weakness, one chip in the design, which must be remedied if the output of shells is to be not only kept up but increased.

[illegible] been shown that women munitioners can do the [illegible]; that their health does not suffer; that their lives [illegible] not be unhappy nor uninteresting. A cultured, highly cated woman can do the work better than those of the er classes, and can prove of inestimable use in the factories because of the influence which she can exert amongst the "hands." The secret of her influence lies in her being one of them, and one with them in every shade of meaning of the word. No superiority, no class distinction, no thought that she is different to her neighbours must be allowed to creep into her mind, much less into her speech and action.

But the weak link nay, almost the break in this magnificent chain of patriotic work—what is it?

The lack of workers! That is the answer, prompt and few are able to go and nurse the men within the war zone; but there are hundreds and thousands of leisured women today who have not fully set their hands to the plough, but who could and should serve their country and the peace-loving world, which wants to see the war come to an early but satisfactory and honourable end; they can throw in their lot with these noble pioneers who have already toiled unremittingly at munition making.

4

The really ordinary "hand" works automatically, and drops out the instant she has an excuse to get free; but the cultured woman will run her machine just as long as it will move, and will get every ounce of work out of it. She has behind her inspiration, enthusiasm, initiative, and she uses the brains and the training which a happy fate has given her. A mighty privilege she holds, and she must realise it.

Shall these ranks be allowed to have empty spaces? One hundred and fifty more women of this class are required at once in one factory alone. Will you set your shoulder to the wheel? If it be impossible, will you talk about the need to your friends and fire them with enthusiasm? We shall be only too glad to answer any questions, and to put correspondents in touch with factories which need workers. Letters should be addressed to the Lady Editor, Queen Offices, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C.

Many a great work of philanthropy has been forwarded by the generous help of our readers, and now we would call upon them for aid in this matter of urgent national made glorious by the heroes who have fallen whilst answering the call of duty.

[Photo. Avery.

Another Workshop.

A VERY URGENT APPEAL.

READERS of the Queen have always responded most liberally to appeals for the wounded, and now an urgent request is made to them. It is for knitted comforts for the Red Cross, for which requests are pouring in to the Countess of Gosford, the demand far exceeding the supply. The Red Cross is asked on an average to supply 90,000 various garments a week, and of these 25,000 are knitted. There is no stock at all of these at present, and when workers fail the authorities are obliged to purchase, which is undesirable both as avoidable use of professional workers' time and of money. So great is the need that it seems justifiable to plead that time which can possibly be spared from other occupations should be given up to knitting for the next few weeks. Many of the things wanted—face washers, for instance—can be knitted by quite little children, or again can be done by busy mortals in the briefest of spare moments, as for the matter of that can the bed socks, which are also very much needed and make the smallest demand on time or patience, on skill or sight. These face washers and bed socks are specially asked for, as are knitted skull caps, gloves, mittens, helmets, day socks, and cardigans. Directions for knitting any of these are procurable from the Central Workrooms, price 1d. each, but to facilitate matters a few of the most urgently needed are appended. Even gifts of ones and twos count up delightfully, so it is earnestly hoped that a very considerable number will find their way quickly into Lady Gosford's store.

Knitted Face Washers

require some swab knitting cotton and a pair of bone needles, No. 2. Cast on thirty-five stitches (about 10 inches) and knit plain until a square is made.

Knitted Skull Cap for the Wounded

requires 2oz. three-ply wheeling any dark wool, two needles, bone or steel, Nos. 7 or 8. Cast on forty-eight stitches, knit fifteen rows, 2 plain, 2 purl; knit plain for 12 inches, then fifteen rows, 2 plain, 2 purl, and cast off. Sew up the sides, turn cap inside out, and fasten corners down to where the ribbing begins.

Bed Socks

require 5oz. white double knitting wool and four bone needles, No. 8. Cast on sixty stitches, twenty on each of three needles. Knit 2 plain, 2 purl for 10 inches, then all plain for 10 inches, then decrease 1 stitch about the middle of each of the first two needles, and 1 at the beginning and end of third needle. Then knit 6, take 2 together, and repeat, doing this to end of round. Knit 6 plain rows. Knit 5, take 2 together, and repeat to end of row. Knit 5 plain rows. Knit 4, take 2 together, and repeat to end of row. Knit 4 plain rows. Knit 3, take two together, and repeat to end of row. Knit 3 plain rows. Knit 2, take 2 together, and repeat to end of row. Knit 2 plain rows. Knit 1, take 2 together, and repeat to end of row. Knit 1 plain row. Knit every two together; then cast off the few remaining stitches, leaving a length of 4 or 5 inches of wool to be neatly finished off with darning needle.

Mufflers

should be 58 inches long and 10 to 12 inches wide; dark wool.

Gifts should be sent to the Countess of Gosford, Central Workrooms, Burlington House, Piccadilly, W. They will be very welcome.

Modern Dogs of Great Britain and Ireland, by Rawdon B. Lee, F.Z.S. Upwards of seventy illustrations in collotype from drawings by Arthur Wardle and B. H. Moore. The Sporting Division (2 vols.), Ten Shillings (fourth edition); the Non Sporting Section (1 vol.), Five Shillings net (third edition). Field & Queen (Horace Cox) Ltd., Windsor House, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C. (Advt.)

6636/52

LORD MASHAM, who has just died, was very little in the public eye, for he led a very retired life apart from all the burning questions of the day. He had very artistic tastes, and was a connoisseur in pictures, making this subject his pet study and hobby. The fortunes of the Masham family were laid by the first peer, formerly Mr Cunliffe-Lister, who had a most successful business career and died a very rich man. His interests in coal and similar concerns were immense, and practically all his projects turned out lucky for hospitality. They are very musical, and unusually fine music such as is rarely heard in private houses has often been an attraction at 6, Hamilton-place. King Edward's affection for some of the Sassoon brothers, especially Mr Arthur Sassoon, was well known, and during the last years of his life he almost regularly paid a yearly visit to them at Brighton. Mr Meyer Sassoon is of a younger generation, the King's great friend being his uncle. His elder brother, Sir Edward Sassoon, succeeded to another brother's title last year.

many well-known people supporting her e
H. G. Wells, whose utterances regarding attention, naturally enough. The prophet declares that when the Lady Drogheda years on opens a similar exhibition there small differences of detail in spi.e of gr ment.

Lord Stair is amongst the lucky few w allowed to leave Germany for Switzerla

[Hoppé

LADY KATHLEEN HILL.
Only Daughter of the Marquis of Downshire, whose Engagement to Second Lieut. W. H. C. Rolls has just been announced.

cum. He it was who bought the lovely Juvenals Abiev Lady Arughnle's collection at the Stratton Galleries to our exchange system of prisoners of war.

who had a most successful business career and died a very rich man. His interests in coal and similar concerns were immense, and practically all his projects turned out lucky them at Brighton. Mr Meyer Sassoon is of a younger generation, the King's great friend.being his unc'e. His elder brother, Sir Edward Sassoon, succeede.l to ano'her brother's title last year.

ment.

Lord Stair is amongst the lucky few w allowed to leave Germany for Switzerla

[Hoppé.

LADY KATHLEEN HILL,
Only Daughter of the Marquis of Downshire, whose Engagement to Second Lieut. W. H. C. Rollo has just been announced.

ones. He it was who bought the lovely Jervaulx Abbey estate, but his son when he succeeded to the title and property did not keep it, preferring to live at Swinton Park, near Masham, a place bearing no comparison in beauty. The new and third Lord Masham is married, but has no children.

Miss Violet Sassoon is going to marry Mr Derek Fitzgerald, of the Irish Guards, Mr and Mrs Eustace Fitzgerald's son. Her people, Mrs and Mrs Meyer Sassoon, had a reputation in pre-war days of giving some of the most brilliant entertainments in London, having in common with many other members of the Sassoon family a genius

Lady Drogheda's aero show at the Grafton Galleries is one of the things to go and see just now, not only from personal interest but from the charitable point of view as well. The proceeds are to be devoted to a war hospital and very worthy cause. Lady Drogheda herself has worked practically night and day over it, and has carried her cause personally many a time. Before her marriage she was Miss Kathleen Pelham Burn and one of the most beautiful girls in Edinburgh. Originality has always been her keynote, and this is expressed in many ways besides the unusual decoration of her London house, in which black is the predominating note. Amongst the exchange system of prisoners of war.

prisoner early in the war, and has been for in Germany. During this time his fathe succeeded to the title soon after he was Stair is going out to Switzerland to be with her husband. She was Miss Violet Harford, and one of the Rosse family. Lord and Lady Stair have three boys and two girls, their second son carrying out the family tradition and having the name of Hew. It is a common custom with the Dalrymples, and is observed quite as fully by collateral branches. When the present Lord Stair's grandfather was alive he was known by the courtesy title of Master of Stair, there being

Evening Standard
3-7-17

The Pocket-Money Worker.

The position of the "Pocket-money worker" is already being considered by the Women's Industrial Council, aided by the Suffrage societies, as undoubte. if she continues to exist after the war, she will prove a menace to the real woman worker who earns her living by her wages.

Many girls who have never worked before have responded to the call of patriotism and have replaced men, and staffed many of the new wartime Government offices. When the war is over many of these departments will close, while women employees will be replaced by returned soldiers in both Government offices and private firms. Women clerks will be thrown out of work, and the keen competition will lead to lowered wages. If the girl who just works for pin-money still exists she will do serious harm to her sisters by taking a salary that is not a living wage.

The campaign against the "Pocket-money worker" will, therefore, endeavour to explain to girls and their parents the necessity for women standing out for a fair wage.

From the feminist point of view it is a most interesting movement, and deserves the support of every fair-minded woman.

CORISANDE

The Queen

12 7-17

UNREST ON £100 A YEAR.

By MRS MARGARET HEITLAND.

PROFESSIONAL UNREST is rife among the women who have only £100 a year by way of salary. I do not mean to imply that women who receive less are more tranquil in mind; for they are not. But below a certain line of poverty unrest itself is an expensive luxury. Even agitation costs something in stationery, stamps, and locomotion. Therefore the woman who is extremely poor is generally obliged to remain very quiet.

The women on £100 a year are usually well educated. They have brought various ambitions and hopes into professional life, and if those hopes are disappointed, they have enough vigour to make their protest heard.

For two reasons their protests are particularly emphatic just now. The first and main reason is the simple fact that £100 a year does not mean what that income used to mean. It is probably not equal to more than £50 before the war. In 1914 educated competent women felt that they had left the £50 a year stipend behind them ages ago—or (to be more exact) shall we say five-and-twenty years ago. I do not mean to imply that there were not before the war women who were obliged to content themselves with £50 a year. But such women were paid this small salary for work of another kind from that which I have in mind. They were either quite beginners in office work or, if older, they were women of inferior educational and general calibre. They were certainly not women who had taken a degree at any of the universities, or if, quite by exception, they were such, they must have accepted extraordinarily bad terms. By the first half of 1914 the salary of £100 a year had come to be considered a fair starting point for the inspector, secretary, organiser, or other official who had been educated at one of the universities, and had undergone for a few months an initiatory training in her professional duties. Since the outbreak of war, professional women have found themselves, as the years and the months have gone by, receiving actually less and less in all that money can purchase. And while they have been receiving payment on a declining scale, the demand for their work has been increasing. We are often told that the laws of supply and demand adjust themselves automatically where women are concerned. Yet in this case we see the growing demand coinciding with the actually smaller remuneration of labour. This is obviously caused by the want of elasticity in money values.

Prices adjust themselves in some directions, but in others they remain exactly where they were before the war. This is the real crux of the matter. That salaries should remain rigid is by no means disagreeable to the people who pay the salaries. These persons are for the most part also suffering from high prices, and possibly from the rigidity of their own salaries and incomes. If they are not suffering in this way and if they are, indeed, engaged in some business which the war makes profitable, they have no excuse for refusing to pay their women secretaries, clerks, and others, such salaries as may be commensurate with the increased expensiveness of living.

The employments where unrest on £100 a year chiefly shows itself are those which are connected with the promotion of a cause, a form of philanthropy, or some other undertaking which the beneficiaries are not eager to pay for. Hospitals and schools, no less than all the undertakings which are designed to affect thought and opinions, are for the most part unremunerative. There is no money in them.

Not always is it from mean motives that the directors of such undertakings pay their employees poorly. The funds at disposal may be so small that the choice lies between employing few women at moderate salaries, and then overworking them, or paying a larger number of women quite inadequately. There is another reason, however, and a bad one. A great many estimable persons have an idea that any kind of public reformative work ought to be done by means of unpaid labour. The item "salaries" in their statement of accounts is one which they publish with reluctance. "What," they ask themselves, "will our subscribers say if they find that so much of their money is going in salaries? They gave their money to promote our cause; not to make a livelihood for clerks. We must try to cut down our clerical staff and get more of our work done by unpaid volunteers." Reasoning of this sort leads philanthropic societies to commit many sins of under-staffing and of over-working the small staff they do employ.

Reformers are also concerned to offer their own special public benefits on the cheapest of terms. For example, they may be eager to give the daughters of poor parents a first-rate education. The school or college which they provide receives pupils at the lowest of fees. The pupils by virtue of their education are to be enabled to earn good salaries. But the school itself cannot possibly afford to pay anyone a good salary. Its former pupils, if they return to it asking for posts on the teaching staff or as school matrons, stewards or secretaries, are dismayed at the miserable wage they are offered. Hospitals work under very similar conditions. They attain their immediate public aim but not without injury to some members of the working public—more particularly the nurses. Many people would not rob Peter to pay Paul so systematically and with such an untroubled conscience were they not imbued with a secret conviction that a job and jobbery are closely connected, and that work—other people's work, at all events—has no real money value.

People regard other people as tremendously lucky to get a job; and the job those other people do get is always of a "soft" variety. Workers, even when scarce, are only desirable before they are obtained. The very cook who would be such a treasure if we could find her is scarcely worth her wage, when found, and is extraordinarily lucky to get such an easy situation as our own. If we of the ordinary public think thus disparagingly of those who feed us, we are not likely to attach more value to the labours of secretaries, organisers, inspectors, and writers who only do more professionally and consistently what we imagine that we could alter a have found themselves, as the years and the months have gone by, receiving actually less and less in all that money can purchase. And while they have been receiving payment on a declining scale, the demand for their work has been increasing. We are often told that the laws of supply and demand adjust themselves automatically where women are concerned. Yet in this case we see the growing demand coinciding with the actually smaller remuneration of labour. This is obviously caused by the want of elasticity in money values.

Prices adjust themselves in some directions, but in others they remain exactly where they were before the war. This is the real crux of the matter. That salaries should remain rigid is by no means disagreeable to the people who pay the salaries. These persons are for the most part also suffering from high prices, and possibly from the rigidity of their own salaries and incomes. If they are not suffering in this way and if they are, indeed, engaged in some business which the war makes profitable, they have no excuse for refusing to pay their women secretaries, clerks, and others, such salaries as may be commensurate with the increased expensiveness of living.

The employments where unrest on £100 a year chiefly shows itself are those which are connected with the promotion of a cause, a form of philanthropy, or some other undertaking which the beneficiaries are not eager to pay for. Hospitals and schools, no less than all the undertakings which are designed to affect thought and opinions, are for the most part unremunerative. There is no money in them.

Not always is it from mean motives that the directors of such undertakings pay their employees poorly. The funds at disposal may be so small that the choice lies between employing few women at moderate salaries, and then overworking them, or paying a larger number of women quite inadequately. There is another reason, however, and a bad one. A great many estimable persons have an idea that any kind of public reformative work ought to be done by means of unpaid labour. The item "salaries" in their statement of accounts is one which they publish with reluctance. "What," they ask themselves, "will our subscribers say if they find that so much of their money is going in salaries? They gave their money to promote our cause; not to make a livelihood for clerks. We must try to cut down our clerical staff and get more of our work done by unpaid volunteers." Reasoning of this sort leads philanthropic societies to commit many sins of under-staffing and of over-working the small staff they do employ.

Reformers are also concerned to offer their own special public benefits on the cheapest of terms. For example, they may be eager to give the daughters of poor parents a first-rate education. The school or college which they provide receives pupils at the lowest of fees. The pupils by virtue of their education are to be enabled to earn good salaries. But the school itself cannot possibly afford to pay anyone a good salary. Its former pupils, if they return to it asking for posts on the teaching staff or as school matrons, stewards or secretaries, are dismayed at the miserable wage they are offered. Hospitals work under very similar conditions. They attain their immediate public aim but not without injury to some members of the working public—more particularly the nurses. Many people would not rob Peter to pay Paul so systematically and with such an untroubled conscience were they not imbued with a secret conviction that a job and jobbery are closely connected, and that work—other people's work, at all events—has no real money value.

People regard other people as tremendously lucky to get a job; and the job those other people do get is always of a "soft" variety. Workers, even when scarce, are only desirable before they are obtained. The very cook who would be such a treasure if we could find her is scarcely worth her wage, when found, and is extraordinarily lucky to get such an easy situation as our own. If we of the ordinary public think thus disparagingly of those who feed us, we are not likely to attach more value to the labours of secretaries, organisers, inspectors, and writers who only do more professionally and persistently what we imagine that we could after a fashion do ourselves.

In short, we all tend to beat down the value of other people's work. Solid, tangible things such as cabbages and potatoes, we will pay for if we must; but against the demand for payment for services we stand obdurate. I sometimes doubt whether we should care to pay for a journey were it not that railway and 'bus companies understand our weakness and sell us a ticket that we can handle.

We detest paying for the impalpable. Therefore persons who sell the impalpable, that is to say their work and service, must be exceedingly firm with us. They must fix their own prices. They must say that certain kinds of service, performed by women of certain qualifications, are to be paid for at prescribed rates and that as the purchasing power of the £1 declines, the payment must rise. In the meantime societies and philanthropic pioneers if they cannot afford to pay properly for service must restrict the scope of their endeavours. They must not merely cut their coat according to their cloth; they must be very careful that they are not cutting somebody else's cloth.

Daily mail
26.-9.-17.

CLASSES FOR SOCIAL WORKERS

To the Editor of The Daily Mail.

Sir,—May we make known through your columns an experiment in systematic training for voluntary social work? It is a carefully planned part-time scheme to meet the needs of a body of men and women on whose services the State is making increased demands.

A Joint Social Studies Committee for London has been formed composed of representatives of various bodies, which provide general social training, including representatives of the London School of Economics and of the Household and Social Science Department of King's College for Women. The minimum course approved by the committee consists of lectures for two hours weekly throughout the academic session, with about ten hours weekly devoted to practical work. Such a course, though primarily intended to improve the efficiency of voluntary social work, would be admirably suited for public-spirited men or women wishing to prepare themselves for the responsibilities of citizenship and reconstruction in the difficult years which lie before us.

The experience of the first year has been full of encouragement; 45 candidates entered last session for the various courses recognised by the committee. All of these were busy men and women with heavy claims on their time. Several were married women with home responsibilities; others were engaged in responsible social or war work. A provisional committee has been formed to deal with matters connected with the students, and it is hoped as the work develops that a union may be established composed of men and women who have qualified under the approved courses.

The new session will begin early in October, and those wishing to avail themselves of the facilities outlined above will have an opportunity of personal advice and, as far as possible, individual arrangements. Fuller information may be had on application to the Secretary of the Provisional Committee, 11, Marble Arch, W. 1.

E. COOPER PERRY, Chairman, Joint Social Studies Committee.
EDITH LYTTELTON, Chairman, Provisional Ctee. on Social Service.
VIOLET MARKHAM, Hon. Treasurer.
ELISABETH MACADAM, Hon. Sec., pro tem.

The Christian.
11.-10.-17.

Training for Women-Workers.—Many women without family ties, for whom the factory or farming are physically impossible, are looking for a chance of "doing their bit." To meet such cases, free training is being offered in the CHURCH ARMY to women-workers, with salaried posts guaranteed after training. The vacancies it is now seeking to fill, are in many cases caused by the fact that the ranks of workers have been depleted because their men are serving at the Front. Hence the women who come forward to fill the vacant places can feel that they are doing War-work of a very real and valuable kind.

Daily Mail
8/2/15.

WOMEN'S DEMAND TO HELP.

ROUTE OF WAR SERVICE PROCESSION.

Arrangements for the great War Service procession of women through London on July 17 are now well advanced. The route will be:

Embarkment.	Park-lane.
Bridge-street.	Oxford-street.
Whitehall.	Regent-street.
Cockspur-street.	Haymarket.
Pall Mall.	Northumberland-avenue.
St. James's-street.	Embankment.
Piccadilly.

The procession will assemble on the Embankment at 2.30 p.m. and start at 3.30. Mr. Lloyd George, as Minister of Munitions, will receive the deputation of women after the procession has travelled its course, and the result of the interview with him will be announced to the assembled women.

The deputation will march in the first section of the procession, escorted by 400 girls in white carrying crooks with red roses. In the second section the outside files will carry red flags, in the third white flags, and in the fourth blue. In the remaining three sections all the marchers will carry pennons or flags. There will be a special contingent of nurses.

WOMEN'S DESIRE TO SERVE.

Women of all classes are invited to take part to show their willingness to serve their country. The Women's Social and Political Union (Lincoln's Inn House, Kingsway, London) is organising the procession. One of the organisers said yesterday: "Thousands of applications for war service are pouring in from women in all parts of the country. The number of letters is overwhelming. We are also receiving many letters from women who want to march in the procession. It should be one of the greatest processions ever known. It will consist of women coming in their private capacity and representing individually and collectively the desire to serve the country felt by British womanhood as a whole."

A War Service Meeting will be held today, 3 p.m., at the London Pavilion, Piccadilly-circus, W. The speakers will be M. Emile Cammaerts, the Belgian poet, who will also read a translation of one of his poems, and Miss Annie Kenney. The chair will be taken by Mrs. Pankhurst. Admission is free, but reserved seats, price 2s. 6d. and 1s., can be obtained from Lincoln's Inn House, Kingsway, W.C.

MUNITION SCHOOLS.

The Women's Social and Political Union hope that munition schools for women will, after Mr. Lloyd George has seen the deputation on July 17, be opened at once, as well as munition factories into which women can be drafted as soon as they become proficient.

663 & C

Glasgow Herald
6/7/15

663c/1

MUNITION WORKERS.

POSITION OF UNEMPLOYED.

AMATEURS NOT YET WANTED.

Interviewed last night with regard to the enrolment of munition workers, Mr H. E. Morgan, of the Ministry of Munitions, said that the numbers of men offering themselves for war work were keeping up so well that it was hoped to-day to have a body of not less than 80,000 available. There still existed a great need, however, and the more cases there were to investigate the greater necessity there would be for sacrifices by a certain part of the community. The demand, too, was still larger than the number of men coming forward who would be readily available for war work. Men therefore must go on enrolling in increased numbers and employers be willing to make further sacrifices.

Mr Morgan went on to speak of the proposals which have been made for enrolling the unemployed. We have been pressed to enrol the unemployed, he said, and immediately to place them in positions. We shall certainly do this as far as is possible, but we could hardly give the lodging allowance in such cases, which of course is intended for those skilled men who are breaking up their homes in order to enrol for war work or are keeping two homes in order to do so. We shall, however, endeavour to find unemployed persons something to do, and they should enrol in the ordinary way at the munition workers' bureaux. I am informed that in any case there is a very small number of unemployed about. Going on to speak of the question of co-operation among employers, Mr Morgan said that there were several signs of a growing spirit of co-operation which they were doing their best to encourage. He hoped that such methods would stimulate enrolment.

Asked as to whether amateur or part-time workers were at present being sought for the work, Mr Morgan said he recognised that this question was a burning one among a numerous class of people. "I can only say, however," he went on, "that skilled workers alone are required at the moment, and of all trades millwrights are most urgently wanted. In regard to the former question I may say that I have had several very interesting applications. There is the case, for instance, of a stationmaster, a former skilled mechanic, who with his wife has offered to give up his three weeks' holiday to work on munitions. We have also had a letter from a minister who was at one time a skilled engineer. He wants to help in munition making, but at the same time to be allowed to conduct his Sunday service as usual. There would, I am afraid, be great difficulty in taking advantage of such offers. Enrolment under the present scheme does not permit of conditions being made, and the enrolment itself must be for a period of six months. I am afraid we must say that amateurs are not wanted for the present at any rate, the difficulties of organising and utilising unskilled and casual labour being so immense. The National Register will no doubt meet such cases, and persons of this kind, if they are willing, will be offered the work they best can do."

WOMEN'S DEPUTATION TO MR LLOYD GEORGE.

The management for mobilising the labour of women for the work of munitions and in other directions in order to facilitate the drafting of men to the front is receiving considerable support. It is announced that the deputation which Mr Lloyd George has promised to receive on the question on Saturday, July 17, is to be preceded by a great patriotic procession, which promises to be one of the largest and most imposing demonstrations which even the Women's Social and Political Union (which has the arrangements in hand) has organised. The procession will be representative of women of every class, its object being "to demand the right to serve our country and help to win the war."

"Offers of assistance and co-operation are pouring in from all parts of London and the provinces," Miss Annie Kenney, one of the leaders of the movement, informed a press representative yesterday afternoon. "The women are not 'processing' for the sake of having their names put on a register," she added. "It is a demand that women should be employed in the same magnificent way in which they are utilised in France whether for making munitions, in work on the land, or driving taxi-cabs. There are hundreds and thousands of women in London and other parts of the country who are ready and anxious to undertake work at once to release men to fight the common enemy, which is Prussianism."

Behind Miss Kenney stood a banner—one of many which will be carried in the procession—bearing the words "We will not be Prussianised," and other banners which have been given for the demonstration are inscribed with similarly appropriate mottoes, including "For men must fight and women must work," "Shells made by a wife may save a husband's life," "Women believe in duty as well as rights," and "Let none be the Kaiser's catspaw."

East Anglian
Daily Times
~~Naught~~ 5/6/15

WOMEN AND THE REGISTER

Kingsley lived in happier days than ours, days when men had the work and women the comparatively easy job of weeping, while the harbour bar continued its moaning—a thing not always left to the harbour bar, by the way. But all this is changed. Debarred from the fighting line woman asks to give, as the men have given, of her best to the nation; she tires of playing at tasks that are no use. Many and loud have been the lamentations at the shortness of labour both in town and country, yet strangely enough there has been a great hesitation in filling the gaps with women. As things are to-day, woman suffers intensely at the thought that she may not be doing the utmost possible, and hopes that by the National Register things may be put right and her services be requisitioned in various fields. Goldsmith reflected the opinion of his day when he declared that "women are confined within the narrow limits of domestic assiduity, and when they stray beyond them they move outside their sphere, and consequently without grace." Crabbe pithily summed up the current view by saying that "to the man the world is his heart; to the woman the heart is her world." And so down to a few years ago we apportioned the world to man, to woman the home. Then gradually came a change. We saw women aspiring to enter the different professions, and taking her place in offices, performing work that up till then had been considered essentially masculine. In the face of keenest opposition, she clung on and "made good"; in fact, so much so that she entirely replaced man in certain spheres. In spite of this, however, women were thought to be "like plants in the woods" which derive "their softness and tenderness from the shade," and there were certain limits fixed by public opinion beyond which women did not stray.

But August came, and revolution took place in the ranks of women. Truly their time for a bid for freedom had arrived. They needed no urging, no persuasion to bring them to the point of national service. They stated their willingness to do anything, to go anywhere, if by so doing they freed a man for more serious work. Their one regret is that they have not had that encouragement they think should have been theirs. Mr. Lloyd George truly says "that victory or defeat in this war depends upon the supply of the munitions which the rival countries can produce." Yet, while 40 per cent. of Germany's high explosives and shells are made by women, we, despite all the cry for more labour, employ a mere handful in such work. In Germany, as Mrs. Pankhurst informed an enthusiastic audience on Thursday last at the London Pavilion, women are engaged in various services connected with the war in the following percentages of the total number of workers employed:—

40 per cent. in the making of munitions.
15 per cent. in making harness and leather goods.
50 per cent. in the making of tents and general war equipment.
33 per cent. in the making of drugs.
15 per cent. in the making of surgical instruments.
20 per cent. in the making of glass for field glasses, etc.
70 per cent. in the making of tinned provisions.
75 per cent. in the making of textiles out of which garments are made for war purposes.
70 per cent. in the making of tobacco.

The idea that women are incapable of doing this work is ludicrous, for neither Germany nor France would employ them if such were the case. Mr. Lloyd George himself has told us that "in France a vast amount of work in the way of turning out shells, and especially the delicate work of fuse-making, is done by female labour." Then why have not British women been allowed to do the work that French and German women have been? Small wonder that women are grumbling when they find that in Germany half a million women to-day are engaged in making ammunition, while 70,000 odd women who registered themselves at Easter at

The Aberdeen Free Press
663
18/6/15
663c/2

WOMEN AND WAR SERVICE.

700 REGISTERED AT ABERDEEN.

Although the number of women who have registered at the Aberdeen Labour Exchange now totals 700, these figures are not considered satisfactory for Aberdeenshire, and the officials hope that the register will be largely augmented in the near future.

This war register is filling an important function, inasmuch as it brings the employer who experiences difficulty in obtaining workers into close touch with all labour that may be available. Already some 300 women have been sent to Dundee to work in the mills and jam and biscuit factories there, while situations as secretaries and clerkesses have been secured for many others in various parts of the country. These, however, have been women who have been in need of employment, and as yet the services of more well-to-do ladies who have signified their willingness to undertake employment so that men may be released to fight, have not been utilised.

Arrangements have now been made whereby a number of the women will receive a short training in agricultural pursuits, so that they may be of use to farmers who find it difficult to secure male labour during the approaching busy season. On Monday a party of women, numbering 20, will be despatched to the farm controlled by the Agricultural College at Craibstone. Their travelling expenses will be paid, and they will also receive a little money for their work. They will receive a week's tuition, and then another party will take their place, and so on until all have undergone a period of instruction.

A communication was received yesterday morning by Mr Duncan, superintendent of the Exchange, inquiring whether any girls used to the fishing industry were available for employment in Canada. They are required for dressing fish and repairing and making nets.

The Queen
26/6/15

The War Service Register.

Many people are waiting with growing impatience for the practical enrolment of women in all the forms of employment which now require workers. The number of women's names upon the War Service Register continues to increase—it is now over 78,000—but only a tiny fraction of the offers of work made are being accepted. Nor (and this is an important point) are many expert women who understand the conditions of certain employments and industries being asked to help in the sifting out of candidates for work and in finding suitable posts for willing workers. There are, for instance, many women who are well versed in agricultural and horticultural matters who should be invited to help women to find scope for their labours in the orchards, the vegetable gardens, and the hayfields. There are others who could draft off women to some of the ammunition and military clothing factories. The personality and qualifications of individual workers can only be judged by personal interview, and therefore by local people. At present the acceptance of war service offers is left too much to London officials, who have not seen the candidates for employment, and this explains why so few offers are accepted.

The Relief Committees.

These committees, which were formed last summer in the expectation that there would be much distress in the winter caused by the dislocation of trade—an expectation which was mainly fulfilled in London—find themselves now almost without business to transact. The Central Committee on Women's Employment in Grosvenor-place is still carrying out various schemes for the training of women and girls; but in the majority of the provincial towns the relief committees, with all their organisation of employment committees, women's employment sub-committees, finance and investigation committees, &c., are left in a state of "splendid isolation," while new committees are in process of formation. The absence of economic distress is a cause for rejoicing, but it appears to be unfortunate that the machinery of these committees, connected as they are with the city or town councils, could not be adapted to the different needs of the present time, chief among such needs being the employing of women and of men above military age for the industries which are now shorthanded.

A Nottingham Enterprise.

In Nottingham, where there has been a certain amount of trade depression, some of the women connected with the local relief committee have found work to their hand. They have formed a Domestic Workers Sub-Committee, and are making it one of their objects to help the poorer women to a knowledge of economical cookery and household management. Miss Dutton, formerly an organiser for the N.U.W.S.S., originated the idea and is actively engaged in carrying out the scheme. The Domestic Workers Sub-Committee not only holds classes for plain and invalid cookery and provides cheap dinners but also supplies mothers with home helps, who manage their family affairs when they are laid aside by illness. Miss Carey, whose labours in Nottingham are well known, is chairman of the sub-committee, and Mrs Arthur Armitage is hon. secretary. The whole organisation is installed at Newdigate House, Castle Gate, which was lately opened for its new purpose by the Duchess of Portland.

way of turning out shells, and especially the delicate work of fuse-making, is done by female labour." Then why have not British women been allowed to do the work that French and German women have been? Small wonder that women are grumbling when they find that in Germany half a million women to-day are engaged in making ammunition, while 70,000 odd women who registered themselves at Easter at one single invitation of the Board of Trade are only being utilised to the number of 2,000 for national service. They have restrained their impatience merely because they realise how critical the shape of the nation is. At last Hope, in the shape of the Register (a measure, by the way, we advocated as early as April last), has come to them, and we can but trust that through it they may be called upon to do the work they are so eager to undertake, and which they could and would do so well. The Minister of Munitions, Mr. Lloyd George, has consented to receive on July 17th a deputation of women eager to serve their country by joining in the work of munition making, and it is hoped that this may be a stepping-stone to their immediate employment. Naturally we would not see a large number of married women employed. Their place is in looking after the home, and seeing that their children are cared for. They also have a sacred duty to the State. Every child born now is an asset for the years to come, and it is a woman's duty to repair the wastages of war. All our remarks concern the single women alone, for we fear the increased employment of married women would bring about a decrease in our birth-rate; and a fast shrinking birth-rate spells a country's decadence. Far be it from us to read into the fact that women are to be registered the idea that it is but a scheme on the part of the Government to silence for a time at least those women so anxious to work. Rather would we think it, and we confidently believe it is, a sign that the country has at last awakened from its antiquated ideas of women and work, and that before long they will call upon them to augment the ranks of labour. Women, by the sacrifices they have made, have shown that they are well fitted to take their share in shouldering the burden under which our country now staggers. Each woman employed enables a man of military age to take service for his King and country; that is her part in the war. No need to worry about what effect the movement will have on our social and economic life in the future; just as water finds it own level, so will matters adjust themselves in due course after the war. The next thing to be done is the thing to do. The greatest crisis of our tesselated history has revealed a need for women to "carry on" men's work. Wherever possible let us see they be given the chance.

Y Le Daily Mail
25/6/15

NATIONAL SERVICE FOR ALL.

MRS. PANKHURST'S OFFER.

WOMEN EAGER TO HELP.

A rousing appeal for national service was made by Mrs. Pankhurst at the weekly war service meeting of the Women's Social and Political Union yesterday at the Regent-street Polytechnic. The object of these meetings is to demand universal and obligatory war service for men and women.

"The greatest need in our country to-day, if we are to play a proper part in this great conflict, is that the nation as a whole shall be organised for national service," declared Mrs. Pankhurst.

Amid the applause that followed a woman's voice in the gallery cried "Votes for Women!" The audience plainly showed their disapproval of the cry, but Mrs. Pankhurst took up the point: "I wish our 'Votes for Women' friend would realise that votes for women and all that votes for women means is at stake in this war. If we lose this war not only is the possibility of votes for women going to disappear but also votes for men will be a thing of the past."

She went on to refer to Mr. Lloyd George's latest speech. "We realise that what we hoped to hear from Mr. Lloyd George has not been said. He did not in his speech lay before us a plan for organising the whole nation, women as well as men. Speaking as a woman, I would like to tell them that women are eating their hearts out in their desire to see their services utilised in this national emergency."

GERMAN WOMEN'S WORK.

In Germany half a million women were making ammunition. It was not a pleasant thought that even in Germany the value of the services of women in war time was recognised more readily than in this country.

Mrs. Pankhurst appealed to the new Government to give the nation a strong lead. "My burning desire is to make it plain to the only people who can deal with the situation that we are ready as a nation to be organised and brought into line. I am perfectly certain that what this country is waiting for is a strong lead. We are hoping, praying, longing that the Coalition Government is going to have the courage to do the necessary thing and organise this nation as a whole to play that part in the war which it is our duty to play."

British women could work and respond now. "We offer ourselves to the Government, and we are prepared to organise the women of the country for them if they like. We are prepared to hold great meetings for women all over the country and enlist women for war service, whether in making ammunition or in replacing skilled men taken from other industries."

She ended amid prolonged applause: "We know we are going to lose this war unless we use women as well as men."

Miss Annie Kenney, who delighted the audience by her plain speaking, poured scorn on the supposed peace talk going on in Germany. "I believe the whole of it is manufactured in Germany for British consumption, and they hope we will be taken in by it."

Another war service meeting of the union will be held in the London Pavilion, Piccadilly-circus, on Thursday next, at 3 p.m. Mrs. Pankhurst, Miss Annie Kenney, and Mme. Clara Butt will speak, and Mme. Butt will also sing the National Anthem. Admission is free, but seats can be reserved at 2s. 6d. and 1s. each on application to Lincoln's Inn House, Kingsway.

663 b
The Newcastle Journal
3/7/15
663

WOMEN'S WORK.

Mrs Pankhurst has done more since this war commenced to win the serious regard of British men and women than ever she did by her militant advocacy of the vote for her sex. It was a sacrifice on her part, no doubt, to give up the campaign to which she had devoted so much time and energy, and we honour her and her sisters in the franchise movement for their patriotism in subordinating their desire in that direction to the present welfare of their country, and, more still, for the work they have done in impressing upon women the need that exists for their services in these critical times, and in urging upon the Government the advantages to be gained by the employment of those services. We have already pointed to the part women have played in keeping the ordinary commerce and industry of the country going; but it is evident that not nearly sufficient use has yet been made of female labour in the production of those munitions which it is a vital necessity for us to have in constantly increasing quantities. There is proof of this in the statement made in the House of Commons the other evening, when it was shown that while 87,241 women had registered at the Labour Bureaux under the special registration scheme, only 2,322 had been placed in employment. Satisfactory it is to note, therefore, that Mrs Pankhurst, with her organising power, has taken this matter up, and that she has induced Mr Lloyd George to receive a deputation at the Ministry of Munitions on the 17th of this month. We should have been more pleased if an earlier day had been fixed, for it is an urgent question. In Germany nearly half of the workers in the munitions factories are women, and in France, too, as Mrs Pankhurst, who has been over there, tells us, women who, before the war, had no training, are now making shells and fuses—dealing, indeed, with every process of shell-making from the time the steel leaves the forge to the polishing of the fuse. What women can do in other countries they can do, and, we have no doubt, are willing to do here, for it has to be remembered that every able-bodied man who is employed on work that a member of the opposite sex can carry out equally well is employed to the detriment of the nation. Meanwhile, we would call the attention of women to the appeal which Lord Selborne, President of the Board of Agriculture, has made for help in gathering in the harvest. This is labour no less necessary than the direct production of munitions of war.

Manchester Courier.
July 2. 1915

The Women's Response.

Recruiting for the women's army of munitions workers at the stations along the route of Saturday's procession was obviously brisk, but it will come as a surprise to most people to hear that the number of names given in amounted to the huge total of eight thousand. Mr. Lloyd George's statement that the Government were not at present in the position to employ the part-time worker has, of course, ruled out a considerable number of applicants who have business or family affairs to attend to which render whole time service impossible. Still, there is enough material left for the Government to mobilise immediately to excellent effect, and the fact that offers of immediate work have already been received from contractors by the W.S.P.U. augurs well for a speedy start being made in putting it to the test. So far as the part-timer is concerned, the scheme for holding classes in munition work, just organised by the London County Council, should offer a useful safety valve for letting off her patriotic ardour until she is actually wanted in the factories. A six weeks' course of classes, lasting four hours each day, is offered for the modest fee of half-a-crown, and presumably the times of holding them will be arranged to suit would-be war workers who are otherwise employed in ordinary business hours. There can be no doubt that the utility of the part-timer will be increased out of all knowledge if she goes to the factories as a trained worker instead of a novice. The woman who is at present dependent on her business salary for her living will also, by undergoing this course of training, be enabled to earn good wages from the very start of her career in the munitions factory should she ultimately decide to give up her present position at the country's call.

6053/4 6053.

Spectator
24-7-15.

Last Saturday tens of thousand of women paraded through the streets of London to express their readiness to serve the nation. The procession included a pageant of the Allies, the most remarkable figure in which was perhaps the lady who represented Belgium. A mourning figure, with a flowing veil of purple and carrying a tattered flag, she marched barefooted. A deputation was received by Mr. Lloyd George, who, after indicating the ordinary prejudices of employers and working men against women's work, said that their work on munitions would end with the war. Meanwhile women whose services were accepted would be paid at the same rate as men for piecework, and for time work a minimum would be fixed.

The Daily Express
6/7/15.

6636.

6630/5

WOMEN'S RIGHT TO SERVE.

DEPUTATION TO WAIT ON MR. LLOYD GEORGE.

One of the greatest demonstrations by women that have ever been seen in this country will take place on Saturday, July 17, when a deputation, organised by the Women's Social and Political Union, will wait on Mr. Lloyd George, the Minister of Munitions, and demand the right to serve their country, and so help to win the war. It will follow a gigantic patriotic procession which every woman—Suffragette or Anti-Suffragette—is invited to join.

"Had we been trained nine months ago, all we women would have been experts in munition work by now," said Miss Annie Kenney, one of the organisers, to a "Daily Express" representative yesterday.

"Thousands of women are eating their hearts out for something to do, and we want every woman to come along and join our procession, which will form up at the Embankment at 2.30 p.m. on July 17."

Hundreds of women are hard at work embroidering banners for the procession. They bear, among others, the following mottoes:—

We Will Make Munitions.
Women's Work Will Save Men's Lives.
Shells Made by a Wife May Save Her Husband's Life.

Some of the most notable women of the day will take part in the procession. Women who wish to join it are invited to send their names to Lincoln's Inn House, W.C.

Edinburgh Evening Dispatch
July 10, 1915

663c

663c16

Women's Work in the War.

The country will endorse every word of encouragement and promise given by Mr Lloyd George to the demonstration of women who are eager to do something of practical value for the successful conduct of the war. The women have shown their courage and grit and good sense in a time of national peril, and the measure of their devotion will be the measure of the nation's gratitude. This is no time to be bound by prejudice, and conservatism, and fears for man's position after the war. Every thought and effort must be given to the one essential purpose, and after the war men and women will gradually fall into their proper places. But we may be sure of this—there will be vital changes; a nation cannot go through this terrific ordeal without having its thoughts and character profoundly modified. And if women continue to play the noble part which hitherto they have played in this struggle, they will not be the losers. This is the testing time of character, and it is character that will rise to the top in the end.

In this country we have been so long accustomed to look upon women's work as necessarily subsidiary that even the shock of the war has not completely aroused us to a full appreciation of the new order of things, and to realise that war changes everything. Too many of us, men as well as women, are still in that state of mind when we imagine that the employment of women question is still an open one, and may remain so indefinitely. We have not yet realised that this is not a matter of may, but of must; not of convenience, but of imperative need. We cannot afford to lose the assistance of a single woman, whether it be in the manufacture of war material or in taking the place of a man who would be better employed in direct service to the nation. Our allies and our enemies, more accustomed than we are to combination of effort in the interests of the State, are already receiving the benefit of the organisation of women's work. Hundreds of thousands are employed in France and Germany, while we are employing but a small fraction of that number, and are only now preparing to organise the vast potential resources of female labour.

In this process, as in that of enlisting the man power of the nation either for fighting or making munitions, we must sweep aside all pre-conceived ideas and ancient prejudices. As there are thousands of men of what are called the "better classes" now doing their day's darg in the humblest and hardest war service, so we shall expect, and may in time demand, that women who have never had any thought or intention of taking part in any sort of war work, in factory or elsewhere, will find the call of conscience irresistible. It is not only the "working woman" whose duty it is to take a practical part in the national effort. There are many young women—the fact cannot be ignored—whose ideas of service have been confined to romantic misconceptions of the value of their untrained services as nurses. They have little or no knowledge of what this work involves, the severe training, the heavy labour and self-sacrifice required of, and freely given by, the splendid women who take a serious view of their calling. These casual young ladies must be prepared to help in any capacity, whether it savour of romance or not. But women in general have been beyond all criticism. It is to the honour of the women whose representatives made their influence felt in high places on Saturday that they have not waited to be asked. They have come forward of their own free will, and have demanded that the Government shall not hesitate to make full use of the woman power of the country.

The Evening News
10/7/15

WOMEN WILL WORK.

Anxious to Take Their Places in the Munition Factories.

Saturday next is the date of the women's munitions deputation and procession. They hope the Government will estabish munition factories into which women can be drafted as soon as they become proficient.

"Experience has taught us," said Miss Annie Kenney to-day, "that intelligent women can very readily learn the necessary processes and can teach others if a rather longer period of training is allowed.

"The Government are spending between £30,000 and £50,000 on advertising for men munition workers whilst we are gathering women in by the hundreds just now for the work without a penny of cost to the country."

Mrs. Pankhurst will be at the head of the procession, and after the deputation has been received by Mr. Lloyd George the result will be announced from a platform on the Embankment.

The Daily Mail
10/7/15

WOMEN AND SHELLS.

THREE WEEKS TO MAKE SKILLED WORKERS.

The War Service Demonstration on Saturday next (organised by the Women's Social and Political Union, Lincoln's Inn House, Kingsway, W.C.) is intended to convince the Government that women are eager to do war work.

"We know there is a shortage of ammunition," said Mrs. Pankhurst yesterday. "Then without delay women ought to be called in to assist. An ordinarily intelligent woman can learn to do skilled work in about three weeks. In France, where they are making shells and fuses, women are earning 8s. 4d. a day after three weeks' training.

"The Government made one appeal only to women. In response 87,000 enrolled. Let the Government start munition factories for women. There are thousands of young women who have recently left school or college who are quite fitted for the light work of a munition factory, and would be only too glad to help their country."

Daily Mail
July 12 - 1915

66

WOMEN AND MUNITIONS.

The great procession of 50,000 women through London to-day, besides providing an inspiring spectacle, should offer a magnificent demonstration of the eagerness of women to play their part in winning the war by releasing men for the sterner work of active service. There is so much that women can do, and there are so many women who are longing for an opportunity to do it, if only the way be pointed out to them and the opportunity provided. Up and down the country women workers are already engaged in a thousand ways in the manufacture of war material, from filling shells and cartridges to making straps and khaki suits. But with few exceptions those thus employed are women who were engaged in such occupations, or kindred ones, before the war, and only in very exceptional cases have openings been found on war work for educated women with no factory experience. It is true that in London, and possibly elsewhere, a certain number of volunteer workers are giving their Saturdays and Sundays to munitions work in order to relieve women regularly employed for long hours during the rest of the week, but so far as we know no attempt has been made to extend this arrangement. The tendency in Birmingham and elsewhere, on the part of both Government and manufacturers, has been to discourage or taboo voluntary labour in munitions factories, whether by men or women, a tendency which we cannot help but regard as a mistake. It does not seem to have been sufficiently realised that this war has lasted, and will probably last, a long time, and that factory workers, however willing in spirit, cannot go on indefinitely at high pressure and at abnormally long hours. Sooner or later the two alternatives must present themselves if physical breakdowns are to be averted: relief at week ends by means of voluntary labour; or, the restriction of overtime by closing down the factories and thus reducing output.

But this is by no means the only field in which women can play their part. There are very many occupations which can be satisfactorily discharged by women, and which are now being filled by able-bodied young men quite fit for service in the army. Lord Kitchener and his adjutants have already found it necessary to emphasise the appeal for recruits to the shop assistants, clerks, packers, insurance canvassers, and others employed in light occupations and to point out that these classes have not yielded anything like the same proportion of recruits as have those engaged in harder manual labour and in the professions. Such occupations are obviously those in which women workers can, temporarily at least, take the place of men with a reasonable measure of efficiency, and sometimes with equal efficiency. They are services which, in the main, are necessary to the maintenance of the population and to the preservation of our domestic and foreign trade upon which our ability to pay for the war largely depends, and in undertaking them more widely the women of England will be emulating their sisters in Germany, France, and other of the countries involved, who are doing all they can to keep things going at home while their men are fighting. It is the patriotic duty of every man engaged in these trades, and, indeed, in every other non-munition industry, to offer himself for enlistment if he is fit; it is the duty of every employer to give him every opportunity and encouragement, even at the cost of inconvenience or even some business loss, filling his place for him as best he can while he is away, and undertaking to restore it to him on his return; and it is the duty of every woman who is free and able temporarily to take the place of a man and do his work while he is away, to hold herself in readiness to do so should the need arise. If all these will do their duty—and fifty thousand of the women [illegible] to-day showing their [illegible] Lord Kitchener's appeal [illegible]

The Daily Telegraph. 16. 7. 15.

667

WOMEN'S DEMAND TO SERVE THE STATE.

SATURDAY'S DEMONSTRATION

PROCESSION OF 50,000.

To-morrow's procession of women who desire to serve their country is likely to prove one of the most remarkable demonstrations which have been organised in recent years. Thousands of women are to take part in it, including many ladies notable in various spheres of life. Their main object is to lead a deputation to the Minister of Munitions, who has promised to address the gathering from a special platform to be erected in the garden of Munitions Buildings, overlooking the Embankment. But the great demonstration will serve to show the splendid spirit that, as ever at a time of crisis, animates British womanhood. Not only do women desire to serve their country; they demand it as a right.

"War Service for Women," "To make munitions is our right," "We demand the right to serve," "Britain needs the aid of all her sons and daughters in the hour of her trial," "Shells made by a wife may save a husband's life"—these inscriptions from the banners to be carried in the big procession epitomise its spirit and its aim.

ROUTE AND TIME-TABLE.

That the procession will also be highly picturesque goes without saying. Many thousands of Londoners, without a doubt, will turn out to see the Pageant of the Allies, the young girls dressed in white carrying crooks with garlands of red roses, the bands and banners, and to pick out well-known women on the stage, in art, music, medicine, society, and other spheres. Led by a banner-bearer carrying aloft the Union Jack, the procession will form up on the Embankment at 2.30 p.m., and start promptly at 3.30 p.m. The route and approximate time-table will be:

p.m.	p.m.
3.30.—Victoria Embankment.	4.25.—Park-lane.
3.40.—Bridge-street.	4 35.—Oxford-street.
3.45.—Whitehall.	4.50.—Oxford-circus
3.55.—Cockspur-street.	5. 0 —Regent-street.
4. 0.—Pall-mall.	5.10.—Piccadilly-circus.
4. 5.—St. James's-street	5 15.—Haymarket.
4.10.—Piccadilly	5.30 —Northumberland-avenue

Prominent people walking in the procession include: Lady Glanusk, Lady Dupplin, the Hon. Mrs. Henley, Mrs. Waldorf Astor, Lady Colebrooke, the Hon. Mrs. Frederick Guest, Madame Clara Butt, Madame Marchesi, her Highness Princess Sophia Duleep Singh, Lady Butlin, Mrs. Cecil Chapman, Lady Knollys. In all there are to be 125 sections, with 400 women in each, and each section is to be headed by banners and a band. Hundreds of women will join as additional units.

A PICTURESQUE PAGEANT.

Behind the Union Jack bearer will come a military band and a beautifully decorated lorry supporting a large banner with the words, "We demand the right to serve. Deputation to the Ministry of Munitions." Following is to be a large contingent of young girls dressed in white and carrying long crooks with scarlet roses. Then comes the Pageant of the Allies—another detachment of young girls carrying the flags of the Allied nations, and a figure representative of each of the Allies, in the national costume of their womankind. She who is to be the soul of Belgium will be in rags, with bare feet, but she will carry aloft the tattered but still-flying flag of her country. Next to her France, swathed in the Tricolour, with a group of girls wearing the Red Cap of Liberty. After her will come two figures in the peasant costumes of Serbia and Montenegro, with national flags. Russian peasant girls bring up the next section with, in their midst, a girl in white with a white stole, upon which is embroidered the Polish eagle and the word "Poland." Behind Russia will be women of Japan, and Italy's women in Garibaldian costume.

Finally will come Great Britain and her [illegible]. Pictures will indicate the various [illegible] two figures in the peasant costumes of Serbia and Montenegro, with national flags. Russian peasant girls bring up the next section with, in their midst, a girl in white with a white stole, upon which is embroidered the Polish eagle and the word "Poland." Behind Russia will be women of Japan, and Italy's women in Garibaldian costume.

Finally will come Great Britain and her Dominions. Pennons will indicate the various parts of the Empire, and fair girls will represent the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Pankhurst, Miss Annie Kenney, and other members of the deputation bring up the rear, and women of the general public are expected to fall in behind. The Ministry of Munitions should be reached about 5.30 p.m., and Mr. Lloyd George is to make his speech about six p.m.

Tables for the registration of women willing to help in making munitions will be found at intervals in the following thoroughfares: Victoria Embankment, Westminster, Whitehall, Trafalgar-square, Cockspur-street, Pall-mall, St. James's-street, Piccadilly, Park-lane, Oxford-street, Regent-street, Piccadilly-circus, Haymarket, Northumberland-avenue, and on the Embankment.

POINTS FOR THE MINISTRY.

WAGES QUESTION.

A crowded meeting of women at the London Pavilion yesterday, convened by the Women's Social and Political Union, gave enthusiastic support to the movement for universal and obligatory war service for men and women.

Madame Marchesi opened the proceedings by singing the "Marseillaise."

Mrs. PANKHURST said they were glad to renew their assurance to the women of France that they would stand by them, to the death if need be, in their great struggle for liberty. The Women's Social and Political Union had felt that if the war was to be won, if the freedom of the peoples was to be absolutely secured, it was necessary that the men and women of the Empire should be fully and completely organised in order to take their proper part in the struggle. Their preliminary efforts did not meet with much recognition from the Government or the public, and they much regretted the valuable months that had been wasted.

On Saturday they would offer the services of the women of the country to the Government, and then point out to the Minister of Munitions how those services could best be utilised. An essential preliminary was that the Government should establish some means by which women could be so trained as to render their services of full value, and to this end certain existing agencies should be taken advantage of. It would be suggested that the great technical schools and colleges should be utilised during the holidays for the technical training of women. After that training the Government should open, if necessary, factories in which women could work.

They wanted to tell Mr. Lloyd George that it would be something like a national crime if men were allowed to do this work here, when women could do it and release them for the Army. The difficulties with the trade unionists, some of whom were putting every kind of impediment in the way of women helping, would have to be tackled. The deputation would insist that wherever a woman replaced a man she should have the same rate of wages as her predecessor. (Cheers.) That was a demand the trade unionists had a right to make, and the women supported it. It was not right that women should allow any feeling of patriotism amongst them to reduce the standard of wages. (Cheers.)

MUNITIONS VOLUNTEERS.

TRAINING AT VICKERS

Working women at present employed in munition factories are already fully engaged in producing the largest possible output from the machinery available, and it is felt that their efficiency can only be maintained over a prolonged period by relieving them of overtime, especially of Sunday labour. A scheme has therefore been devised to secure a week-end rest for these factory hands by training educated women of the leisured classes in ammunition work, in order to secure a relieving body who will undertake Saturday and Sunday overtime work.

Arrangements have been made with Messrs. Vickers to train, at Erith, the first of these volunteer bands of educated women. These volunteers, after about three weeks' training, will undertake regular week-end relief work, and so serve the double purpose of helping to keep the factory hands efficient, without encroaching against them, and providing for the much needed Saturday and Sunday free, while at the same time maintaining the output of ammunition. A large house has been taken at Erith, and is being furnished and fitted up as a hostel, with accommodation for thirty ladies, and work is to begin on Monday next.

Full details as to the rates of pay, hours of work, &c., may be obtained from the Secretary, Lesney House, Avenue-road, Erith.

The Daily News & Leader 16-7.15.

WOMEN'S DEMAND FOR WAR WORK.

Great Deputation to Mr. Lloyd George.

PICTURESQUE FIGURES IN THE PAGEANT.

Mr. Lloyd George has promised to address publicly the women who take part in the great war service procession which will support the deputation to him tomorrow afternoon After he has listened to the speeches of Mrs. Pankhurst and other members of the deputation, he will come from his office to the garden of the Munitions Building and from a platform there he will give his reply to the women's demand. Mrs. Pankhurst, at her meeting in the London Pavilion yesterday afternoon, hailed this as a very good augury of the success of their design.

"I believe it is going to be an epoch-marking day for us," Mrs. Pankhurst added; and there is every indication that the demonstration will be the largest and most impressive of its kind that London has ever seen. Along the route there will be tables at frequent intervals for the registration of women for munition work. A colour-bearer carrying the Union Jack, and followed by a military band, will head the procession. Then will come a beautifully decorated lorry displaying a banner with the words, "We demand the right to serve. Deputation to the Ministry of Munitions."

"Unconquerable" Belgium.

Girls dressed in white and carrying long crooks with scarlet roses will precede the great spectacular feature, "The Pageant of the Allies." This will be headed by a banner and a group of white-clad girls carrying the flags of the Allies bunched together. Then will come the tragic figure symbolising Belgium—a dark-haired, barefooted girl, holding aloft a tattered flag. She will be posed to represent Mr. Arthur Rackham's picture, "Unconquerable!"

"France," a girl in white, carrying the tricolour, will march next, with four girls wearing caps of Liberty. "Serbia" and "Montenegro" will follow hand-in-hand—two peasants carrying their national flags. Next will be "Russia," a girl in white, displaying a white eagle and the name "Poland." "Japan," two women in native dress, will follow Russia, with "Italy" next—a Garibaldian supported by four women in national dress.

Great Britain and the Dominions.

Great Britain will wind up the pageant. Girls dressed in white will carry pennons bearing the names of the Dominions. Behind them will march four girls representing the United Kingdom; with "England" (a girl in Greek dress and carrying a bunch of St. George roses) surrounded by peasants of Scotland, Ireland, and Wales.

The main procession, headed by Mrs. Pankhurst, Miss Annie Kenney, and the other members of the deputation, will follow the pageant. It will start from the Victoria Embankment at 3 o'clock, and the deputation is timed to meet the Minister of Munitions about 5.30. It is expected that his public speech will begin at six o'clock.

WAR WORK BY WOMEN.

New Scheme of Training at Erith for Week-end Helpers.

In order to relieve those women who are working seven days a week in munition factories, a scheme has been devised whereby they shall have a week-end rest. Arrangements have been made with Messrs. Vickers to train at Erith educated women of the leisured classes who will volunteer to replace the working women in the various departments of the manufacture of shells.

These volunteers—who should apply to the Secretary, Lesney House, Avenue-road, Erith—will have three weeks' training before being allowed to undertake the week-end relief work, and during this period will do no night duty. The first batch of workers must arrive at Lesney House on Sunday next, not later than 6 p.m., and work will begin the following day. It is proposed to employ the volunteers on shell making in three daily shifts of eight hours each. They will be paid at rates varying from 18s. 6d. to 19s. per week of six shifts (48 hours). Saturday and Sunday rates of pay are on the basis of 9d. for 8½ hours' work.

It is not intended to train the educated the procession. Then will come a beautifully decorated lorry displaying a banner with the words, "We demand the right to serve. Deputation to the Ministry of Munitions."

Unconquerable Belgium.

Girls dressed in white and carrying long crooks with scarlet roses will precede the great spectacular feature, "The Pageant of the Allies." This will be headed by a banner and a group of white-clad girls carrying the flags of the Allies bunched together. Then will come the tragic figure symbolising Belgium—a dark-haired, barefooted girl, holding aloft a tattered flag. She will be posed to represent Mr. Arthur Rackham's picture, "Unconquerable!"

"France," a girl in white, carrying the tricolour, will march next, with four girls wearing caps of Liberty. "Serbia" and "Montenegro" will follow hand-in-hand—two peasants carrying their national flags. Next will be "Russia," a girl in white, displaying a white eagle and the name "Poland." "Japan," two women in native dress, will follow Russia, with "Italy" next—a Garibaldian supported by four women in national dress.

Great Britain and the Dominions.

Great Britain will wind up the pageant. Girls dressed in white will carry pennons bearing the names of the Dominions. Behind them will march four girls representing the United Kingdom; with "England" (a girl in Greek dress and carrying a bunch of St. George roses) surrounded by peasants of Scotland, Ireland, and Wales.

The main procession, headed by Mrs. Pankhurst, Miss Annie Kenney, and the other members of the deputation, will follow the pageant. It will start from the Victoria Embankment at 3 o'clock, and the deputation is timed to meet the Minister of Munitions about 5.30. It is expected that his public speech will begin at six o'clock.

WAR WORK BY WOMEN.

New Scheme of Training at Erith for Week-end Helpers.

In order to relieve those women who are working seven days a week in munition factories, a scheme has been devised whereby they shall have a week-end rest. Arrangements have been made with Messrs. Vickers to train at Erith educated women of the leisured classes who will volunteer to replace the working women in the various departments of the manufacture of shells.

These volunteers—who should apply to the Secretary, Lesney House, Avenue-road, Erith—will have three weeks' training before being allowed to undertake the week-end relief work, and during this period will do no night duty. The first batch of workers must arrive at Lesnes House on Sunday next, not later than 6 p.m., and work will begin the following day. It is proposed to employ the volunteers on shell making in three daily shifts of eight hours each. They will be paid at rates varying from 15s. 6d. to 19s. per week of six shifts (54 hours). Saturday and Sunday rates of pay are on the basis of 15s. 6d. for 54 hours' work.

It is not intended to train the educated women in order to oust the wage-earning women, but merely to relieve them. Those who volunteer must agree to take the week-end work for not less than six months.

Lesnes House, which stands in a large garden, has good reception rooms and large airy bedrooms. The workers during training will be asked to pay their factory wage of 15s. 6d. into a common fund for the necessary expenses, and are asked to bring their own outfit for use in the house.

Low-heeled boots are recommended as the standing at work is tiring. Evening dresses are forbidden.

16-7-15

MARCH OF 50,000 WOMEN.

WHAT MRS. PANKHURST WILL ASK.

TO-MORROW'S TIME-TABLE.

"We know that on Saturday the procession will be a very large one, larger than any before held by women," said Mrs. Pankhurst at a crowded war service meeting at the London Pavilion yesterday. "We feel the time has come when women must assert in an unmistakable way their right to serve."

She gave an outline of what the deputation of women would say at to-morrow's interview with Mr. Lloyd George, who, she said, would afterwards announce his reply to the assembled processionists on the Embankment.

"We want to suggest that our great technical schools and colleges may be utilised during the holidays for the training of suitable women, who themselves would become instructors of women's work. After the training we intend to ask that the Government shall take on itself the responsibility of opening special factories in which women can work. We believe there is certain work being done by skilled men which can be done—as I was told in France—by women after a few weeks' training. We want to say to Mr. Lloyd George very strongly that we think it would be something like a national crime for men—especially trained men—to continue any longer doing the kind of work which women in a few weeks can be trained to do."

The deputation would also say that they particularly wanted the Government to employ women, because it was possible for the Government, and was its duty, to fix a standard of payment. Where a woman did the same work as that which a man had hitherto done she must be paid at the same rate.

"We women are less prepared than the women of France because of false ideas of gentility, because of false standards with regard to woman's place in the national life. But war is a great educator. It has swept away more prejudices in ten months than years of agitation have done. I believe that Saturday is going to be an epoch-making day for us."

THE PROCESSION.

To-morrow's procession of women will assemble on the Embankment at 2.30 p.m. The nearest Underground station is Temple. The march begins at 3.30, and the deputation will be received at 5.30 at the Munitions Office. Mr. Lloyd George will address the processionists about six o'clock from a platform in the garden of the Munitions Office, overlooking the Embankment.

The women's march will be a pageant of colour. There will be 125 sections, and the organisers (the Women's Social and Political Union, Lincoln's Inn House, Kingsway) expect that about 400 women will march in each section. Every section will be headed by a banner. There will be a decorative scheme in red, white, and blue.

As announced in yesterday's Daily Mail, a colour bearer carrying the Union Jack will lead the march, followed by a military band. A decorated lorry will carry the large banner inscribed "We demand the right to serve." Then will come girls dressed in white, carrying long crooks with scarlet roses. The "Pageant of the Allies" will follow, in which groups of girls in symbolic dress will represent each of the Allied nations. There will be a nurses' contingent.

The public will walk behind the pageant, headed by Mrs. Pankhurst, Miss Annie Kenney, and the other members of the deputation.

All women are invited to take part in the procession, and are asked to wear white or light-coloured summer frocks. Along the entire route there will be tables for the registration of women for munition work. The route will be:

Embankment	Piccadilly	Piccadilly circus
Bridge st.	Park lane	Haymarket
Whitehall	Oxford st.	Northumberland avenue
Cockspur st.	Oxford circus
Pall Mall	Regent st.	Embankment
St. James's st.

OLD LADY'S GIFT.

At yesterday's war service meeting it was announced that an old lady of ninety-four, unable to walk in the procession, had sent a gift of 10s.

The next war service meeting will be held at the London Pavilion, Piccadilly, W., next Thursday, at 3 p.m.

16-7-15

6638

6638/12

WOMEN PREPARED.

STILL WAITING FOR WAR WORK.

PAVILION MEETING.

There was a crowded audience at the London Pavilion, Piccadilly-circus, yesterday, when a war service meeting was held under the auspices of the Women's Social and Political Union, the object being to demand universal and obligatory war service from men and women, and to consider various other means of helping the country in this time of war. Mrs. Pankhurst, who presided, suggested that they could not do better than open that meeting with an expression of the deep affection and admiration they had of that great country. The women of this country, and particularly in that meeting, were now called upon to renew their assurances to the women of France that they meant to stand by them, to the death, if need be, in the great struggle of liberty. Ever since the war broke out the Women's Social and Political Union had felt that if this war was to be won, and the freedom of the peoples was to be absolutely secured, it was necessary that the people of our great Empire should be fully and completely organised for the purposes of the war. They regretted that so many months had been wasted, and they felt that the time had now come when women must assert in an unmistakable way their right to serve. When the Coalition Government was formed and the Minister of Munitions was appointed, they decided that the time was ripe to approach that Minister and point out to him that the women in this country were not being utilised for war purposes to the extent they were, not only among our Allies, but also in Germany. They hoped to provide a dramatic object-lesson and sweep away those Early Victorian prejudices that women could only do certain work. She was sorry that women had to advertise the fact that women loved their country, and were eager to serve it. They would urge upon the Government the necessity of establishing special factories in which women could work. Women could do a great deal of work now performed by men after a few weeks' training.

MEN IN AMBUSH.

In France they had a word from the men who stayed behind doing work which women were capable of doing, and that word meant "men in ambush." She welcomed the idea of the National Register of the whole nation, and insisted that it would be something like a national crime if skilled men were allowed to go on doing work which could be done by women. The question had arisen of the status of the women who had become Government servants for the duration of the war. A difficulty arose from the trade unionists, some of whom had selected war time as an occasion to strike, and although there were splendid exceptions, many were putting every kind of difficulty in the way of women being employed in war time.

Many of them might be unconscious of the fact that they were pro-Germans. There was a lack of reasoning power which made them do pro-German work. People who put difficulties in the way at the present time were doing incalculable harm. There was something in the protest that women might be used to reduce the standard of wages which trade unionists had for many years fought to establish, but she wanted the Government to employ women. Where women were replacing men and doing exactly the same work they should be paid at the same rate as men. She did not want any feeling of patriotism to depress the standard of living of women; this would be a bad thing for them.

Mme. Marchesi said that hers was a world of song, but she had an excuse for speaking that afternoon. France and England were one—one in friendship, one in suffering, and one in victory which they all hoped for and expected. That was why the French women were as passionately concerned in the welfare and success of their brothers in arms as any British mothers. She was pleased that the women of England had sent their deputies there to-day to offer their services to the nation. Some of them had gifts for tending the wounded, while others could make things for them, and some could make bullets and help to fill the empty cartridge belts and take their places in the factories. Women could be of material assistance and help here.

Daily Express 16-7-15. 663 e

663c/13

WOMEN'S DEMAND TO HELP.

MARCH OF WOULD-BE WAR WORKERS.

RECORD PROCESSION.

The largest women's procession on record will be seen on the Embankment to-morrow afternoon, when thousands of women will assemble to demonstrate their readiness for war service.

The procession, which all women are invited to join, will be in the nature of a pageant. There will be eight sections, including 700 banner bearers, ninety bands, a group of 400 girls dressed in white, and many women wearing the national costumes of one or other of our Allies.

The route of the procession, which will begin its march at 3.30, will be by way of Bridge-street, Pall Mall, St. James'-street, Piccadilly, Park-lane, Oxford-street, Regent-street, Haymarket, and through Northumberland-avenue back to the Embankment.

After the procession a deputation will ask Mr. Lloyd George to accept the women's offer of service and to take immediate steps to organise them for national work. Later the Minister of Munitions himself will address the women from a platform erected in the garden of the Munitions Building, and overlooking the Embankment.

FINAL RALLY.

A final rally before the great procession was held at the London Pavilion yesterday, when Mrs. Pankhurst urged the necessity of organising women to take their part in the great struggle.

"Women are not being utilised here as they are at present in the countries of our Allies and in Germany," she said. "To prevent unnecessary waste of life, women should be put chiefly to the work of manufacturing munitions of war and in other ways serving the country, and so replace men, who would thus be relieved for active fighting.

"We are approaching the Minister of Munitions to furnish an object lesson, as it were, by showing that we are opposed to those Early Victorian prejudices against women doing certain kinds of work. The deputation will urge the Government to utilise many existing arrangements by which women can be trained, such as the technical colleges, which might be used as training quarters during the holidays for women, who in turn could act as tutors to others. The Government might open special factories in which women can be employed.

"I am convinced," Mrs Pankhurst added, "that certain work which is being done by skilled men can be carried out by women after a few weeks' tuition."

A leading article on this subject will be found on Page 4

WOMEN WAR-WORKERS.

VOLUNTEERS TO RELIEVE WAGE-EARNERS.

A practical scheme to employ educated women as war-workers, which will come into operation on July 19, is outlined in a circular which has been sent to the "Daily Express" by Mr. W. H. Cowan, M.P. for East Aberdeenshire.

Arrangements have been made with Messrs. Vickers, it is stated, to train at Erith the first volunteer bands of educated women to enable them to relieve the working women who are at present fully engaged on eight-hour shifts seven days and seven nights a week. These volunteers, after about three weeks' training, will undertake regular week-end relief work, so that the wage-earner may obtain the necessary rest.

Trains will be run from London in connection with the working hours arranged, and a hostel is being furnished at Erith, with accommodation for thirty ladies. Applications should be addressed to the secretary, Lesney House, Avenue-road, Erith.

The London County Council, at the request of the Ministry of Munitions and with the authority of the Board of Education, are about to open certain courses of instruction in engineering workshop practice for workers who already possess a certain amount of mechanical skill and who are willing to go through a six weeks' course of instruction in order to fit themselves to enter munitions factories at the close of [illegible]

MATTERS OF MOMENT.

Women.

The great procession of women, arranged for to-morrow, has been devised as a dramatic expression of their lesire to be allowed to devote their time and talents to the service of the nation. Mrs. Pankhurst certainly has histrionic genius. Thousands of women have registered, and only tens have been employed. Scores of meetings have been held to demonstrate the eagerness of women to serve, but still little or nothing has been done to use the ready enthusiasm. So women of all classes, professions, and ages are to march through the streets with bands and banners and allegorical groups (which experience teaches us will be artistic and appropriate), that all the world may know their loyalty to their country. In the forthcoming interview with the Minister of Munitions, Mrs. Pankhurst will doubtless point out that 500,000 German women are making munitions and that the women of France are working in the nation's ranks. We can imagine her inviting Mr. Lloyd George to look out of his window at the great crowd of her followers, and saying:—"Here are we, employ us!" The women of Great Britain are giving Mr. Lloyd George a fine opportunity to prove his great ability. If he can harness them to the car of State, if he can show them the way, he need fear no more complaints of shortage. The modern woman is strong, self-reliant, trustworthy. England wants all she can give, and she is almost fiercely offering herself.

The women of this country, and particularly in that meeting, were now called upon to renew their assurances to the women of France that they meant to stand by them, to the death, if need be, in the great struggle of liberty. Ever since the war broke out the Women's Social and Political Union had felt that if this war was to be won, and the freedom of the peoples was to be absolutely secured, it was necessary that the people of our great Empire should be fully and completely organised for the purposes of the war. They regretted that so many months had been wasted, and they felt that the time had now come when women must assert in an unmistakable way their right to serve. When the Coalition Government was formed and the Minister of Munitions was appointed, they decided that the time was ripe to approach that Minister and point out to him that the women in this country were not being utilised for war purposes to the extent they were, not only among our Allies, but also in Germany. They hoped to provide a dramatic object-lesson and sweep away those Early Victorian prejudices that women could only do certain work. She was sorry that women had to advertise the fact that women loved their country, and were eager to serve it. They would urge upon the Government the necessity of establishing special factories in which women could work. Women could do a great deal of work now performed by men after a few weeks' training.

MEN IN AMBUSH.

In France they had a word from the men who stayed behind doing work which women were capable of doing, and that word meant "men in ambush." She welcomed the idea of the National Register of the whole nation, and insisted that it would be something like a national crime if skilled men were allowed to go on doing work which could be done by women. The question had arisen of the status of the women who had become Government servants for the duration of the war. A difficulty arose from the trade unionists, some of whom had selected war time as an occasion to strike, and although there were splendid exceptions, many were putting every kind of difficulty in the way of women being employed in war time.

Many of them might be unconscious of the fact that they were pro-Germans. There was a lack of reasoning power which made them do pro-German work. People who put difficulties in the way at the present time were doing incalculable harm. There was something in the protest that women might be used to reduce the standard of wages which trade unionists had for many years fought to establish, but she wanted the Government to employ women. Where women were replacing men and doing exactly the same work they should be paid at the same rate as men. She did not want any feeling of patriotism to depress the standard of living of women; this would be a bad thing for them.

Mme. Marchesi said that hers was a world of song, but she had an excuse for speaking that afternoon. France and England were one—one in friendship, one in suffering, and one in victory which they all hoped for and expected. That was why the French women were as passionately concerned in the welfare and success of their brothers in arms as any British mothers. She was pleased that the women of England had sent their deputies there to-day to offer their services to the nation. Some of them had gifts for tending the wounded, while others could make things for them, and some could make bullets and help to fill the empty cartridge belts and take their places in the factories. Women could be of material assistance and help here.

THE FOE OF INDIFFERENCE.

The women of England must follow the example of the women of France and feed their sons' rifles. They also had to fight the foe of indifference. They also had to stimulate the imagination of men till they had visions of German helmets in Hyde Park, a baby nailed to a door at Maidenhead, and a wife kicked out of her bed to march with her baby at Richmond. It was no good crying over spilled milk and the wasted time.

Miss Annie Kenney said that from the beginning of the war they had advocated the internment of every German. She urged the necessity of declaring cotton contraband, so that no more cotton could get to Germany, even if it entailed the purchase of the whole crop of the United States. She also urged that all contracts made with Germany should be cancelled by the war, and that Germans should not be treated as soft-hearted people, but as huge vampires.

To the delight of the audience Mme. Marchesi sang the "Marseillaise" and Elgar's "Land of Hope and Glory."

many women wearing the national costumes of one or other of our Allies.

The route of the procession, which will begin its march at 3.30, will be by way of Bridge-street, Pall Mall, St. James'-street, Piccadilly, Park-lane, Oxford-street, Regent-street, Haymarket, and through Northumberland-avenue back to the Embankment.

After the procession a deputation will ask Mr. Lloyd George to accept the women's offer of service and to take immediate steps to organise them for national work. Later the Minister of Munitions himself will address the women from a platform erected in the garden of the Munitions Building, and overlooking the Embankment.

FINAL RALLY.

A final rally before the great procession was held at the London Pavilion yesterday, when Mrs. Pankhurst urged the necessity of organising women to take their part in the great struggle.

"Women are not being utilised here as they are at present in the countries of our Allies and in Germany," she said. "To prevent unnecessary waste of life, women should be put chiefly to the work of manufacturing munitions of war and in other ways serving the country, and so replace men, who would thus be relieved for active fighting.

"We are approaching the Minister of Munitions to furnish an object lesson, as it were, by showing that we are opposed to those Early Victorian prejudices against women doing certain kinds of work. The deputation will urge the Government to utilise many existing arrangements by which women can be trained, such as the technical colleges, which might be used as training quarters during the holidays for women, who in turn could act as tutors to others. The Government might open special factories in which women can be employed.

"I am convinced," Mrs Pankhurst added, "that certain work which is being done by skilled men can be carried out by women after a few weeks' tuition."

A leading article on this subject will be found on Page 4

WOMEN WAR-WORKERS.

VOLUNTEERS TO RELIEVE WAGE-EARNERS.

A practical scheme to employ educated women as war-workers, which will come into operation on July 19, is outlined in a circular which has been sent to the "Daily Express" by Mr. W. H. Cowan, M.P. for East Aberdeenshire.

Arrangements have been made with Messrs. Vickers, it is stated, to train at Erith the first volunteer bands of educated women to enable them to relieve the working women who are at present fully engaged on eight-hour shifts seven days and seven nights a week. These volunteers, after about three weeks' training, will undertake regular week-end relief work, so that the wage-earner may obtain the necessary rest.

Trains will be run from London in connection with the working hours arranged, and a hostel is being furnished at Erith, with accommodation for thirty ladies. Applications should be addressed to the secretary, Lesney House, Avenue-road, Erith.

The London County Council, at the request of the Ministry of Munitions and with the authority of the Board of Education, are about to open certain courses of instruction in engineering workshop practice for workers who already possess a certain amount of mechanical skill and who are willing to go through a six weeks' course of instruction in order to fit themselves to enter munitions factories at the close of this training.

The Council will supply all the necessary tools and materials, but workers must provide their own overalls, etc. A small nominal fee of 2s 6d will be charged for the course. Applications must be addressed to the Education Officer, London County Council Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C., and the envelopes should be marked "T.1."

through the streets with bands and banners and allegorical groups (which experience teaches us will be artistic and appropriate), that all the world may know their loyalty to their country. In the forthcoming interview with the Minister of Munitions, Mrs. Pankhurst will doubtless point out that 500,000 German women are making munitions and that the women of France are working in the nation's ranks. We can imagine her inviting Mr. Lloyd George to look out of his window at the great crowd of her followers, and saying:—"Here are we, employ us!" The women of Great Britain are giving Mr. Lloyd George a fine opportunity to prove his great ability. If he can harness them to the car of State, if he can show them the way, he need fear no more complaints of shortage. The modern woman is strong, self-reliant, trustworthy. England wants all she can give, and she is almost fiercely offering herself.

Evening Standard + St. James Gazette. 6·6

17·7·15.

663

WOMEN'S WORK.

MUNITION MAKERS OR LABOUR SAVERS.

By Mrs. ARCHIBALD COLQUHOUN.

To-day's procession of women, organised by the society which has provided so many well stage-managed pageants of the same kind in the past, is ostensibly meant to draw attention to the large number of my sex available for war work.

It is the conviction of some women that unless the sex is forcibly advertised it will get overlooked.

From one point of view they have some excuse. It did not seem possible to persuade the Government of the necessity for interning aliens without all sorts of absurd excesses on the part of the public, and it was, apparently, no use urging the necessity for organising the munition supplies without a Press campaign and a descent to personalities.

On the whole, the best way to get anything done in our country is to make a noise and ask for somebody's head on a charger. From this point of view a procession of women might be justified. Æsthetically, too, there is something to be said for a change from the lines of khaki which now decorate our streets.

Skilled and Unskilled.

As a matter of fact, women in considerable and increasing numbers are employed on all sorts of work connected with supplying the armies in the field, and there is no new principle involved to which attention needs to be forcibly drawn. The main difficulty is the necessary proportion between skilled and unskilled labour, and between workers who can, and workers who cannot be employed for the heaviest tasks.

With the removal of trade union restrictions the employers can take in more and more women, and the deputation might well have addressed itself to the trade union leaders instead of Mr. Lloyd George.

The decision of the National Union of Railwaymen, at their annual meeting, to admit women should give a lead to other labour organisations. It is the only way in which the influx of female labour can be prevented from depressing wages.

Because we still see men employed in many tasks which in Germany or France are performed by women at this time, it is not reasonable to blame the Government or to assume that British women are not doing their share. They are actually helping to nurse the French and the Serbians, while providing in the most complete way for our own wounded.

The task of looking after the wounded alone has, however, been more than she could tackle, although there has never been in France anything like the same proportion of women to whom work of any kind is a novelty. The women of England who now chafe at comparative inactivity are mostly paying the price of belonging to a society which had released a large proportion of its women from all obligation to work.

Manual Labour.

The happiness which many of them have found in hard manual labour is pathetic, but a good number are still trying to reconcile two theories of life. They feel in themselves strength which they want to utilise for the State in making or doing something which will help to defeat the enemy, and at the same time they are, from sheer habit, unable to refrain from using the labour of other women to supply their daily wants. Woman's greatest extravagance is labour, and it is one of the first war economies she must learn to practise. It is not the slightest use to the State for a woman to go out and make munitions if another woman, equally active and strong, must come into her home to supply her place. The true industrial woman does not employ other labour. She is self-supporting in every [illegible]

As a matter of fact, women in considerable and increasing numbers are employed on all sorts of work connected with supplying the armies in the field, and there is no new principle involved to which attention needs to be forcibly drawn. The main difficulty is the necessary proportion between skilled and unskilled labour, and between workers who can, and workers who cannot be employed for the heaviest tasks.

With the removal of trade union restrictions the employers can take in more and more women, and the deputation might well have addressed itself to the trade union leaders instead of Mr. Lloyd George.

The decision of the National Union of Railwaymen, at their annual meeting, to admit women should give a lead to other labour organisations. It is the only way in which the influx of female labour can be prevented from depressing wages.

Because we still see men employed in many tasks which in Germany or France are performed by women at this time, it is not reasonable to blame the Government or to assume that British women are not doing their share. They are actually helping to nurse the French and the Serbians, while providing in the most complete way for our own wounded.

The task of looking after the wounded alone has, however, been more than she could tackle, although there has never been in France anything like the same proportion of women to whom work of any kind is a novelty. The women of England who now chafe at comparative inactivity are mostly paying the price of belonging to a society which had released a large proportion of its women from all obligation to work.

Manual Labour.

The happiness which many of them have found in hard manual labour is pathetic, but a good number are still trying to reconcile two theories of life. They feel in themselves strength which they want to utilise for the State in making or doing something which will help to defeat the enemy, and at the same time they are, from sheer habit, unable to refrain from using the labour of other women to supply their daily wants. Woman's greatest extravagance is labour, and it is one of the first war economies she must learn to practise. It is not the slightest use to the State for a woman to go out and make munitions if another woman, equally active and strong, must come into her home to supply her place. The true industrial woman does not employ other labour. She is self-supporting in every sense of the word, and there is no suggestion at present from any industrial area that there is a shortage of female labour where it is actually asked for.

When the National Register is taken I hope it will be possible to form local registers of women on whom a call for industrial or any other service can be made with a certainty that they are in a position to supply it. Probably, however, the convinced and able bureaucrat who presides over the labour exchanges will cling to his belief that they are the only possible or necessary agencies for such a redistribution of female labour. It is only locally that it is feasible to deal with the question, for any attempt to move large bodies of women about as mobile labour forces is beset with difficulties. Meanwhile the quiet, unostentatious work of providing substitutes for able-bodied men can also best be proceeded with locally.

There are very few posts which do not bring me letters from women anxious to do more war work. "I am free three evenings a week," "My two daughters would like to hear of some activity they could carry on in our quiet country home," "Do you advise me to come to London?" "Can I be of any use during my yearly holiday of one month?" One's sympathies are all with the applicants, but the difficulty of utilising casual labour—mostly unskilled—is almost insuperable. Experience tells one, too, that few of these workers can be relied on even to keep their proffered toll of hours. The regularly employed, paid worker is on a different plane, and to her we must look to supply the labour market as a whole. My advice to those who, for obvious reasons, cannot recommence life on this footing is to economise in labour. It is quite genuine war work.

Walking in processions seems to me rather an extravagance.

The Ladies' Field 663c/15 663c.
July 14-1915

WOMEN AND MUNITIONS.

THE WAR SERVICE PROCESSION AND DEPUTATION TO MR. LLOYD GEORGE.

THE following letter from Mrs. Pankhurst is being sent to women throughout the country:

PROCESSION AND DEPUTATION TO MR. LLOYD GEORGE ON SATURDAY AFTERNOON, JULY 17TH, 1915.

MADAM,—We are faced by the danger of losing our freedom as a nation. The question is literally one of life and death. If the country is to be saved, women must be allowed to help. The service that they can render is enough to make the difference between defeat and victory in this war.

So grave is our national danger, and so terrible is the loss of precious lives at the Front due to shortage of munitions, that Mr. Lloyd George, as Minister of Munitions, has been asked to receive a deputation and hear women's demand for the right to make munitions and render other war service. Mr. Lloyd George has consented to receive the deputation on Saturday afternoon, July 17th.

Before the deputation is received a great procession of women will march through London in order not only to impress the Minister of Munitions, who, I believe, is with us, but to show the politicians and the men generally, as well as our Allies and the enemy, that British women are devoted to their country and determined to save it.

Will you take part in this procession? I am sure that you will. I believe that women were among the first to realise that this war is no ordinary war, but is the greatest struggle between two opposite ideals—between civilisation and liberty on the one hand and barbarism and despotism on the other—that the world has ever seen or dreamed of.

We in this country must do more than we have yet done to support our splendid Allies, who so far have suffered the worst of the enemy's attacks. We must do more to help our heroic soldiers who have gone out to the Front to win or die. We must do more to maintain British honour and prestige; we must do more to save the liberties which the enemy would destroy. We must do more to save this country and the Empire. In short, we must win.

Will you help? The first thing to do is to join the procession in order that as a result of this great demonstration of women of all classes we may gain our full right to serve.

United with you in the desire to serve and in devotion to our country, to our Allies and to the great cause that is at stake, I am, yours faithfully, E. PANKHURST.

The War Service Procession, we doubt not, will show the spirit in which women approach the work of serving their country and will persuade men that in munition work, or any other, their devotion to Great Britain is equal to the spirit shown by our heroes in the trenches.

The deputation to see Mr. Lloyd George will be representative of women who are anxious to work for their country, who have never done any work because no one had told them how to set about it. Each will be able to say to Mr. Lloyd George that their one desire is to work for all they hold most dear their country and their homes.

They will be able to convince Mr. Lloyd George that they have thousands, nay, tens of thousands, of women behind them, young and middle-aged, who, perhaps, have never needed work, but who, now that the country calls so urgently and insistently, are swept onward by the irresistible impulse that they are wanted. Mrs. Pankhurst will introduce the deputation.

The organisation of this great procession is far enough advanced at the time of writing to make success certain. It will form up on the Victoria Embankment at 2.30 p.m. on Saturday, July 17th. The start will be made at 3.30 p.m., and it will wind its way from the Victoria Embankment through Bridge Street, Whitehall, Cockspur Street, Pall Mall, St. James's Street, Piccadilly, Park Lane, Oxford Street, Oxford Circus, Regent Street, Piccadilly Circus, Haymarket, Northumberland Avenue, returning on to the Embankment.

At present 125 sections, carrying banners and accompanied by bands, have been arranged for, and it will be a procession representative of women of all classes and of all political parties. It will not be representative of Suffrage societies only, but will consist of women who as individuals wish to serve their country. In this and also in the absence of a desire to group women according to their trades and professions, this procession is different from any that have been arranged before.

This procession is to show the nation that women are alive to the great danger threatening us, that they are not only willing and eager, but demand it as their glorious right to serve their country in her hour of danger. Women are convinced that, just as much as the womanhood of our Allies and the womanhood of our enemies, they can learn to make munitions or help in any other war work where labour of a necessity would be scarce, were all men of a military age willing to go and fight.

About 200 banners or more, bearing appropriate mottoes, will be borne by 700 banner-bearers; 300 marshals will march in front of their sections and 400 young women dressed in white will help to arrange one of the special decorative features of the procession; 300 more young women will be selling the Suffragette, the organ of the Women's Social and Political Union. A Union Jack will be carried at the head of the procession, followed by a band, and immediately behind will march the deputation which will be received by Mr. Lloyd George as soon as the procession has returned to the Embankment.

The decorative scheme of the procession will be most effective, the colours being carried in flags of red, white and blue alternately, while the flags of the Allies will give different colourings to the pennons of the Union Jack, which will be carried by successive sections.

One of the principal desires expressed by the organisers of the procession is the hope that munition schools for women will be opened at once, and the Women's Social and Political Union also hope that munition factories will be ready into which women can be drafted as soon as they become proficient.

War service meetings have been held, and will be held, regularly every Thursday afternoon at the London Pavilion. At the meeting of July 8th M. Emile Cammaerts, the distinguished Belgian poet, was one of the speakers as well as Miss Annie Kenney, the organiser of the great procession, and Mrs. Pankhurst.

There was much of interest M. Cammaerts had to tell of his beloved country groaning under the yoke of the enemy. Three special points he mentioned, showing what Great Britain's women individually and collectively have done to support Belgium in her adversity. The water in Flanders is specially dangerous for drinking purposes. Sterilisers, costing about £20 each, have been sent over by British women, and no matter how dirty the water poured into these sterilisers may be it comes out clean and wholesome for all purposes.

The Repatriation Committee has begun its work against the time when Belgium will be cleared of the enemy. Time, however, seems long to those yearning for their own firesides. With true insight, the ladies of the Repatriation Committee have hit on a plan to interest and occupy the refugees. They are giving chests to all the women, and just as they would at home fill them with linen clothing and all they require against the time of marriage, those women who have lost everything are already busy building up their homes anew with all they will require when they return.

An amusing incident was mentioned by M. Cammaerts. At Earl's Court a lady of the committee was busy tabulating all the names of the refugees. She chose the dinner hour, sure then of all being present. She came to an Antwerp doctor busy gnawing a bone. She could not understand what he said, so she begged him to write his name down. Gravely he contemplated his bone; there was much good meat yet to be sucked from it. So he presented it to the lady to hold, who just as simply returned it to him to finish his meal when he had written his name. Such little acts of true hospitality, M. Cammaerts commented, do more to endear one nation to another than more heroic measures can do, and they in their multiplicity are invariably the acts of women. LOUISE JORDAN.

The Daily Graphic

17-7-15

663

WOMAN'S DEMAND FOR WAR SERVICE.

The Reason of To-day's Procession.

By CLARA BUTT.

London has been the scene of many notable processions of women during recent years, but that which takes place to-day is likely to prove the most striking of all. The object of this demonstration, together with a deputation to Mr. Lloyd George, is to convince the new Minister of Munitions and his colleagues in the Cabinet that, so far as winning the war is concerned, the women of this country mean business. Women of all classes and professions, of all political creeds or none, will join in this public demand to be enrolled for war service.

The women of France are, we know, already fully engaged, not only in carrying on the enormous agricultural work of their country, but also in the vital manufacturing industries, including the production of munitions. (Many Frenchwomen are now earning between eight and ten francs a day in the shell factories, after three weeks' training.) We know, too, that the women of Germany are rendering tremendous service to the enemy. It is estimated that nearly 40 per cent. of the munition workers in the Fatherland are women, and this represents but one of their many spheres of activity.

Registration Failure.

But what of our own country? The position is, quite frankly, the reverse of satisfactory. Some months ago the Board of Trade published an appeal to the women of Britain asking them to register for war work. The response was splendid. Over 80,000 have registered up to the present. Yet, on the Board's own admission, not more than 3,000 of these have been found employment. Taken in conjunction with the fact that the Board's scheme was badly designed (inasmuch as registration at Labour Exchanges failed to attract the educated and professional women, whose time is valuable), it will be seen that the blame for the comparative non-success of the scheme cannot be laid upon the shoulders of the women.

Take the case of agriculture, for example. Although the problem of feeding the nation is of paramount importance, we have no fewer than 13,000,000 of acres under grass at the present moment—potential sources of food supply which, with the aid of trained women, could be made almost immediately productive. Again, it is estimated that of 1,000,000 workers engaged in farming about 50 per cent. are of military age. Here is obviously a splendid opportunity for women to release many hundreds of men for the fighting line. Incidentally, it is worth noting that some 90,000 women are already engaged in agricultural work—a sufficient answer to those who say that women are useless on the land. A three-weeks' training, generally speaking, will qualify a healthy woman for ordinary farm labour.

The Cry for Doctors.

The services of women are equally in demand in the medical and nursing professions—particularly the former. We have it upon the authority of a well-known hospital surgeon, Mr. Stanley Boyd, that some 7,000 medical men are now serving with the colours, with the result that the greatest difficulty is being experienced in meeting the needs of the civil population. "I could place twelve young women graduates at the moment," says Dr. Mary Scharlieb, the famous specialist, "but I cannot get one." Here again prompt action is necessary, for every day sees a further depletion of our male hospital staffs, and the chances for women doctors in the next few years will be such as they have never yet been. There are, without doubt, scores of women ready and willing to undertake the five years' training necessary to qualify as doctors, but they lack the means. Yet there can be no question as to the necessity of encouraging such women to enter the profession. Not only should more hospitals be thrown open to women; fees should be reduced also, or even abolished entirely to meet the crisis. At present it costs approximately £200 in fees, etc., alone to graduate in this country.

The teaching profession has also been hard hit by the war. Thousands of male teachers have joined the colours, and the education of the nation's children—a problem to which we must pay a little more attention than hitherto if we are to capture German trade—is being hampered in consequence. Only last week the London County Council appointed 400 new women teachers, a fact indicative of the general demand throughout the country.

Willing and Waiting.

So far as the non-professional women are concerned, the demand for their services is insistent. The French have found that their employment in munition factories has been highly successful, and that the women possess not only aptitude but also the stamina necessary for the work. That our own women are equally capable I see no reason to doubt. It is worthy of note, in this connection, that in normal times some 7,000 women are engaged in the miscellaneous metal trades of this country, while another 7,000 are employed in vehicle building. In addition to the demand for women's labour in the various [illegible] it should not be forgotten that there will be

Trade published an appeal to the women of Britain asking them to register for war work. The response was splendid. Over 80,000 have registered up to the present. Yet, on the Board's own admission, not more than 3,000 of these have been found employment. Taken in conjunction with the fact that the Board's scheme was badly designed (inasmuch as registration at Labour Exchanges failed to attract the educated and professional women, whose time is valuable), it will be seen that the blame for the comparative non-success of the scheme cannot be laid upon the shoulders of the women.

Take the case of agriculture, for example. Although the problem of feeding the nation is of paramount importance, we have no fewer than 13,000,000 of acres under grass at the present moment—potential sources of food supply which, with the aid of trained women, could be made almost immediately productive. Again, it is estimated that of 1,000,000 workers engaged in farming about 50 per cent. are of military age. Here is obviously a splendid opportunity for women to release many hundreds of men for the fighting line. Incidentally, it is worth noting that some 90,000 women are already engaged in agricultural work—a sufficient answer to those who say that women are useless on the land. A three-weeks' training, generally speaking, will qualify a healthy woman for ordinary farm labour.

The Cry for Doctors.

The services of women are equally in demand in the medical and nursing professions—particularly the former. We have it upon the authority of a well-known hospital surgeon, Mr. Stanley Boyd, that some 7,000 medical men are now serving with the colours, with the result that the greatest difficulty is being experienced in meeting the needs of the civil population. "I could place twelve young women graduates at the moment," says Dr. Mary Scharlieb, the famous specialist, "but I cannot get one." Here again prompt action is necessary, for every day sees a further depletion of our male hospital staffs, and the chances for women doctors in the next few years will be such as they have never yet been. There are, without doubt, scores of women ready and willing to undertake the five years' training necessary to qualify as doctors, but they lack the means. Yet there can be no question as to the necessity of encouraging such women to enter the profession. Not only should more hospitals be thrown open to women; fees should be reduced also, or even abolished entirely to meet the crisis. At present it costs approximately £200 in fees, etc., alone to graduate in this country.

The teaching profession has also been hard hit by the war. Thousands of male teachers have joined the colours, and the education of the nation's children—a problem to which we must pay a little more attention than hitherto if we are to capture German trade—is being hampered in consequence. Only last week the London County Council appointed 400 new women teachers, a fact indicative of the general demand throughout the country.

Willing and Waiting.

So far as the non-professional women are concerned, the demand for their services is insistent. The French have found that their employment in munition factories has been highly successful, and that the women possess not only aptitude but also the stamina necessary for the work. That our own women are equally capable I see no reason to doubt. It is worthy of note, in this connection, that in normal times some 70,000 women are engaged in the miscellaneous metal trades of this country, while another 7,500 are employed in vehicle-building. In addition to the demand for women's labour in the various war industries, it should not be forgotten that their services are also needed as shop assistants, clerks, and so forth. The various "peace" industries must be kept going, for it is these which must pay for the war in the long run.

Briefly, then, the problem is one for the Government to solve, and that immediately. The demand for women's services is unmistakable; from all parts of the country comes the cry of shortage of labour. The supply, as I have shown, is there waiting to be drawn upon; the army of women war-workers merely awaits mobilisation. It is for the Board of Trade to move and without further waste of valuable time bring the supply and demand together. Our women are impatient to serve their country, but, in the words of the old adage, "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick."

The Daily Graphic 17-7-15

663 c

663c/17

PREPARING FOR "THE DAY."

"The Day" for which these busy women are making preparations is to-day, when the big women's demonstration will wait upon Mr. Lloyd George in connection with war work for women. Mrs. Pankhurst and her staff have been inundated with applications from women anxious to take part.

Evening News
17.7.15

Daily Mail

663 c

663c/18

WHITEHALL AND THE WOMEN.

SIGNIFICANCE OF TO-DAY'S DEMONSTRATION.

By Madame CLARA BUTT.

The women's procession this afternoon bids fair to become historic, since it is at once wonderfully spectacular and of great national significance.

The deputation received by Mr. Lloyd George at his new departmental headquarters will, I feel sure, impress the Minister of Munitions and his colleagues in the Cabinet with the patriotic fervour and devotion to country felt by our women-folk.

For it must be borne in mind that this demonstration is representative of all classes, and is not confined, so far as its personnel is concerned, to any particular organisation.

Although there has been no sign of that hysteria with which we, as a sex, have been credited, it cannot be doubted that the women have fully realised the gravity of the present crisis, not only in the actual theatres of war, but in the less picturesque, though not less important, industrial area also. Hence they are demanding that every facility be given them for training, and that their proffered services be efficiently organised.

In view of the fiasco of the scheme for enrolling women for war service promulgated by the Board of Trade (which registered 90,000 women and has so far found work for about 3,000) it seems necessary to state that no scheme of organisation can prove satisfactory which does not appeal to all classes of women. It requires an expert in each of the various professions and trades to select the right kind of applicant. Trained and untrained, educated and uneducated candidates for employment ought not to be registered indiscriminately. Yet that is what the Board has been doing for months past through its Labour Exchanges.

THREE WEEKS' FARMING.

No one, I presume, will dispute the fact that there is a big demand for women's labour, a demand which, if it is met (as it can be once the Board tackles the problem seriously), must result in the release of hundreds of men for the sterner work of the firing-line.

The last census, for example, showed that in agriculture alone no fewer than 500,000 men of military age were employed. The same returns made it clear that over 100,000 men servants were eligible for the Army, so far as age is any criterion, together with 20,000 motor-car drivers and attendants. In view of these figures it is worth noting that, despite the unattractiveness of the Board of Trade appeal, close on 100,000 women have registered for work to date.

With very short training, these and the many thousands more who have not yet registered could take the places of all those men who have not yet been released for the Army. In the case of agriculture, for example, three weeks' training will be found quite sufficient to transform a girl of average intelligence and physique into a capable farm-labourer. Three months' training will qualify a woman for the driving of motor-cars, whilst menservants, gardeners, grooms, and so on could be replaced in even less time.

Months ago schemes for the training of women for various occupations were placed before the Board of Trade. Nevertheless, with the exception of a class recently opened for the training of girl grocers, and the enrolment of a few girls for agricultural training, the Board have not yet realised the importance of mobilising and training the army of women. Owing to the failure of the powers that be to tackle the matter on business lines, we are faced to-day with a curious situation.

AFTER TO-DAY.

We have on the one hand thousands of women eager for employment; at the same time we have employers complaining of a general shortage of labour. The Oxford Emergency Committee, for instance, reports that there are 228 women out of work in that city alone. Yet from all parts of the Kingdom one hears the call for more workers for munitions, for the land, for shop, office, workshop and factory.

It has been put forward as an excuse in some quarters that there is an objection to employing women. It is difficult to credit this, in view of the undoubted ability of women to do so much of the work that has hitherto been done by men. That there is a reluctance on the part of a few employers is quite possible, but it is by no means general. One can understand the misgivings of an employer who is faced with the problem of replacing trained men by untrained women.

At the same time these same employers could, with a little initiative and foresight, have arranged during the past ten months for the training of as many women as they required. They could have brought their collective pressure to bear upon the authorities with this end in view.

As it is, it has been left for the women themselves to demand [illegible]

WOMEN'S SHELL WORK.

TRAINING TO START AT ONCE.

Mrs. Pankhurst, leader of the Women's War Service movement, yesterday said: "I have every reason to believe that no time will be lost, and that the Munitions Department will take practical steps to train and organise women for war service.

"We started a war service register of women at the offices of the Women's Social and Political Union (Lincoln's Inn House, Kingsway, W.C.) when we began to organise the procession, and every day papers were being filled up by women volunteers. The lists are now considerable, and these lists will be gone through and classified. The training of women will be started at once."

WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE DAY BY DAY.

Volunteer shell-makers beginning work near London yesterday, and a uniformed woman window-cleaner at Clapham.

WOMEN'S ZEAL FOR WORK.

MRS. PANKHURST ON HOW TO LOSE THE WAR.

With the object of demanding universal and obligatory war service of men and women, a meeting was held yesterday at the Regent-street Polytechnic by the Women's Social and Political Union.

Mrs. PANKHURST, who was in the chair, said that Mr. Lloyd George had not yet told them a plan for every man and woman to be organized and placed on a war footing. Women were eating their hearts out with a desire to see themselves used in war service. If the war was to be won the whole intelligence, energy, and capacity of the nation would have to be utilized. Certain skilled workmen were going to be made available for war purposes, but how was it that during all these months people had not been put into training to take the place of the men? Why had not women been called in as the trade union officials had been? The women had some of the most capable organizers, and if they had only been given one part of the national service they would have done the work well and made no fuss about it. They did not look for place or reward. They only wished to be allowed to serve.

In Germany 500,000 women were engaged in making munitions, and yet of the 70,000 women who registered at the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges only about 2,000 had been utilized for national service. It was 10 times more necessary to have martial law here than [illegible] that there is a big demand for women's labour, a demand which, if it is met (as it can be once the Board tackles the problem seriously), must result in the release of hundreds of men for the sterner work of the firing-line.

The last census, for example, showed that in agriculture alone no fewer than 500,000 men of military age were employed. The same returns made it clear that over 100,000 men servants were eligible for the Army, so far as age is any criterion, together with 20,000 motor-car drivers and attendants. In view of these figures it is worth noting that, despite the unattractiveness of the Board of Trade appeal, close on 100,000 women have registered for work to date.

With very short training, these and the many thousands more who have not yet registered could take the places of all those men who have not yet been released for the Army. In the case of agriculture, for example, three weeks' training will be found quite sufficient to transform a girl of average intelligence and physique into a capable farm-labourer Three months' training will qualify a woman for the driving of motor-cars, whilst menservants, gardeners, grooms, and so on could be replaced in even less time.

Months ago schemes for the training of women for various occupations were placed before the Board of Trade. Nevertheless, with the exception of a class recently opened for the training of girl grocers, and the enrolment of a few girls for agricultural training, the Board have not yet realised the importance of mobilising and training the army of women. Owing to the failure of the powers that be to tackle the matter on business lines, we are faced to-day with a curious situation.

AFTER TO-DAY.

We have on the one hand thousands of women eager for employment; at the same time we have employers complaining of a general shortage of labour. The Oxford Emergency Committee, for instance, reports that there are 228 women out of work in that city alone. Yet from all parts of the Kingdom one hears the call for more workers for munitions, for the land, for shop, office, workshop and factory.

It has been put forward as an excuse in some quarters that there is an objection to employing women. It is difficult to credit this, in view of the undoubted ability of women to do so much of the work that has hitherto been done by men. That there is a reluctance on the part of a few employers is quite possible, but it is by no means general. One can understand the misgivings of an employer who is faced with the problem of replacing trained men by untrained women.

At the same time these same employers could, with a little initiative and foresight, have arranged during the past ten months for the training of as many women as they required. They could have brought their collective pressure to bear upon the authorities with this end in view.

As it is, it has been left for the women themselves to demand action of this kind.

Surely, after the evidence of to-day's demonstration, there will be no more waste of time? Schools must be opened for the instruction of women in munition making, motor driving, engineering, and the hundred and one industries that are necessary and immeasurably important to the nation in the present crisis. Women must have every encouragement and assistance to take up work on the land and in the workshops.

WOMEN LIKE BARKIS.

Moreover every facility should be given for them to enter the medical and kindred professions. The shortage of qualified doctors is already serious, whilst it is estimated that the profession of chemistry could easily absorb 5,000 women this year.

Women have already proved their value as motor drivers, lift attendants, tram conductors, and so forth. They have, with satisfaction to the employer, taken the places of men in offices and shops as well as upon farms. In France they have earned high praise for their work as shell-makers; in Germany some 500,000 women are employed in making munitions.

Every day the war continues the employment of women in all grades and departments of industry becomes more and more inevitable. The women have recognised this, as have many of the employers.

It only remains then for the Government to decide whether women shall be drafted at the last moment into occupations of which they know little or nothing, or whether they shall be permitted to undergo courses of training without further delay.

In a word, the women are willing and are waiting for Whitehall to move.

Volunteer shell-makers beginning work near London yesterday, and a uniformed woman window-cleaner at Clapham.

WOMEN'S ZEAL FOR WORK.

MRS. PANKHURST ON HOW TO LOSE THE WAR.

With the object of demanding universal and obligatory war service of men and women, a meeting was held yesterday at the Regent-street Polytechnic by the Women's Social and Political Union.

Mrs. PANKHURST, who was in the chair, said that Mr. Lloyd George had not yet told them a plan for every man and woman to be organized and placed on a war footing. Women were eating their hearts out with a desire to see themselves used in war service. If the war was to be won the whole intelligence, energy, and capacity of the nation would have to be utilized. Certain skilled workmen were going to be made available for war purposes, but how was it that during all these months people had not been put into training to take the place of the men? Why had not women been called in as the trade union officials had been? The women had some of the most capable organizers, and if they had only been given one part of the national service they would have done the work well and made no fuss about it. They did not look for place or reward. They only wished to be allowed to serve.

In Germany 500,000 women were engaged in making munitions, and yet of the 70,000 women who registered at the Board of Trade Labour Exchanges only about 2,000 had been utilized for national service. It was 10 times more necessary to have martial law here than in France, in order to bring the situation home to them. She was probably the biggest rebel present; she meant by that she had certain ideals of freedom and liberty, to the point of giving her life for them. They offered themselves to the Government and they were prepared to organize the women of the country, to hold great meetings all over the country, and to recruit and enlist women for war service if the Government would let them know. By war service she meant either the making of munitions or replacing the skilled men who had been called upon, so that the business of the country could go on. We were going to lose the war, unless every man and woman was properly called upon to do their share.

The Evening News
17/7/15

THE WOMEN'S MARCH.

Mrs. Pankhurst's Message to "The Evening News."

The weather gave little encouragement to to-day's "war service" demonstration of women. But it did not succeed in daunting the enthusiasm of its participants.

"We want to impress the Minister of Munitions; we want to convert politicians and men generally to the fact that we shall no longer stand aside," was Mrs. Pankhurst's message to The Evening News.

"We shall tell Mr. Lloyd George," said another of the leaders, "that women are not only anxious but determined to serve. We are told there is a great shortage of munitions; we want to save the lives of our men.

"We want training schools. Three weeks makes a woman proficient to do munition work in France. The Minister cannot deny that British women are equally capable of similar work.

"To-day, out of 90,000 enrolled women, only some 3,000 have been set to work. No work which a woman can perform to-day should be done by a man."

From an early hour to-day the offices of the Women's Social and Political Union in Kingsway were besieged by delegates from all parts of the country. Women teachers had journeyed down from Scotland, others from Ireland, while there were some from Liverpool, Ipswich, Bexhill, Wales, Somerset, Devonshire, and Newcastle.

Newcastle Journal
17/7/15.

WOMEN'S SERVICE.

The demand of women to serve the State in the present crisis is to be emphasised in London to-day by what is likely to prove one of the most remarkable demonstrations ever organised in that city of demonstrations. Estimates vary, but it is reliably calculated that at least 50,000 women will act as escort to a deputation to the Minister of Munitions, who has promised to address the gathering from a special platform to be erected in the garden of Munitions Buildings, overlooking the Embankment. What Mr Lloyd George will have to say to this deputation we will not try to anticipate, but there are two or three facts in the situation that call for comment. It scarcely needs this demonstration to prove that there is a very widespread desire on the part of the women of our country to lend what aid they are capable of in assisting to bring the war to a satisfactory conclusion. Statistics make that clear, and they also show, at the same time, that that desire has not been met to anything like the extent it might be, large as is the amount of female labour employed now in various capacities, as compared with a year ago. Two circumstances there ahe which mainly account for this, one being that we have not yet drawn upon the manhood of the country to the degree that is possible for military service, and the other that we have only recently commenced in the practical way that should have been adopted many months ago, to organise and make the best of the resources of the nation. Not the least value of to-day's procession, therefore, will be the incentive it will afford to rapid and better organisation. We need only look to what is going on in France and Germany for the proof that there is much work still being done here by men which could be almost as well carried out by women. At the same time those countries afford a lesson to members of the gentler sex on this side of the North Sea, that, however attractive may be the idea of direct assistance in the production of munitions of war, and however laudable may be their desire to render that assistance to make shells, for instance, this work is by no means the only agency of usefulness. If they serve in the field of agriculture or in keeping the other industries of the country going, they are still "doing their bit" for the Flag. They may be doing it even by attending to their ordinary household duties, for, let there be no mistake, there are homes which imperatively demand the constant care of mothers or daughters. This is the danger to be guarded against in the present movement. Just as there are thousands of women capable of going out to work, and who should go out, and for whom places should be found, so there are thousands more who will do their duty by remaining at home in their customary occupations. There is a question, therefore, for the conscience of women, as well as men, at this critical period.

Observer 10-7-15.

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

The procession which will assemble on the Victoria Embankment to-day, and will march to the office of the Minister of Munitions to ask for war service for women should, if the weather be favourable, be picturesque and impressive. The occasion will afford an opportunity for giving visible proof of women's capacity for organisation and their talent for artistic effect. The procession, it is said, will prove by its dimensions the earnestness of women's desire to take a useful part in the work of the nation in this perilous time. Flags and banners will typify their triumphant consciousness of their ability to be of service. Allegorical figures and striking pageants will be there to stimulate the patriotic enthusiasm and rouse the sympathies of the spectators. In accordance with the prevailing custom of such demonstrations, the banners will set forth the aims of this array. "To make munitions is our right"; "We demand the right to serve" will be among the legends thus displayed. They may strike observers as unnecessarily militant and aggressive. But if the processionists' sense of duty to the country finds emphatic expression we must not complain when we have such lamentable evidence as the Welsh miners' strike of the absence of a sense of duty where we might expect to find ardent loyalty and patriotic effort. The intelligent aid thus offered for the work of the war will, of course, be welcome. Already some way has been made in the training and employment of women in munition factories, and opportunities are afforded for women of leisure and those whose activities do not occupy all their time to learn how to be of service to their country.

It may be no harm to remind the deputation which is to wait upon the Minister of Munitions to-day that employment cannot be found in munition works for every woman who may see in those places a field for her efforts. The capacity of factories of the kind for absorbing available labour is limited by considerations of space, by the supply of material, and by the output of which machinery is capable. But there are other useful walks open to women. Nursing the sick and wounded is the first that strikes those in search of women's paramount sphere of usefulness in war time. If that involves a preliminary training too prolonged for those who are eager to be of immediate service, there is still an abundance of opportunity for those with a real desire "to do their bit" in this time of national ordeal. The Registration Act, for example, will create a demand for intelligent workers which should give employment to thousands of educated women. The distribution and collection of the registration forms, and the tabulation of the information which those forms will contain when filled up might in urban districts be done quite as well by women as by men. And beyond the work of helping in the production of war material and aiding public bodies in duties connected with the war, there is a vast field of usefulness for women, whose patriotic self-denial is strong enough to reconcile them to helping in humble capacities, among people whom the war has deprived of the aid upon which they rely in ordinary times. A condition has been laid down by the organisers that the movement for war service for women is not to be used as a means of pulling down wages and supplying cheap labour. That is a wise provision. It would be a misfortune if women who are in circumstances of comparative comfort were to enter into competition with the women who have to work for their living, and if working-women were deprived of employment by the entrance of volunteers into the market. The movement will be helpful if it is directed with the single purpose of rendering service in war time, and if it is directed with wise restraint. It will be worse than useless if it takes to badgering busy Ministers or furnishes new recruits for the ignoble army of carping critics of the Government.

Weekly Dispatch 663c/22 663c

18-7-15

"WOMEN CAN HELP US T

MUNITION MINISTER'S FINE SPEECH YESTERDAY.

50,000 Women Already Making War Munitions.

EQUAL PAY FOR EQUAL WORK.

Mr. Lloyd George at the Ministry of Munitions made an important speech yesterday afternoon in reply to a deputation headed by Mrs. Pankhurst and representing millions of women besides the 50,000 who marched through London streets in a magnificent procession.

The chief points in his speech were:—

"Without women victory will tarry.

"We have 50,000 women turning out munitions of war.

"500,000 women are turning out munitions in Germany.

"Whoever comes forward must be prepared to give the whole of her time.

"A woman shall be paid exactly the same price as a man for piece work.'

The procession was the women's way of demanding the right to serve their country in this grave hour of crisis by assisting in munition making and other war service.

Though the weather was unfavourable to the original idea of the demonstration, which was that of a white pageant, the procession triumphed over the rain and was a great success.

As a masterly achievement in organisation the march of the women did credit to Mrs. Pankhurst and her army of marshals. Their reception by the large crowds which assembled to see the procession pass was very cordial and at intervals there was loud cheering.

"The women of this country can help, and help enormously," Mr. L... seen applauding

In his main speech Mr. Lloyd George said: "Permit me to congratulate you on the very fine procession which I have had the pleasure, with my colleague, Mr. Winston Churchill, of witnessing this afternoon. If any additional proof were required of the organising capacity of women, of which I have been a victim in the past, I could say it was amply demonstrated by that procession to-day. It was uncommerely the trade union prejudice but the conservatism—I am not speaking politically—of the business man. He has been accustomed to see men turn out that kind of work and you cannot persuade him that women can do it just as well and in fine, delicate work of this kind can do it really better than men. You have to persuade him of that fundamental fact to begin with, and also to get rid of the apprehension of the working man, who is in a day. It is not merely that there are prejudices to get rid of, but there are other things to consider. First of all, in this country you have got to get the proper machinery for the turning out of your shell and your material. The first thing that we have got to do is to equip ourselves for an adequate supply of lathes, machinery, and tools for the purpose of turning out work of this kind.

A VERY IMPORTANT MEETING.

"We had a very important gathering in this room a couple of days ago, when we had all the great machine tool makers of this kingdom present, and to that meeting we intimated that we proposed to assume Government control of all machine tool-making shops in this country. They accepted it readily, and for the next few months all the energies of these great shops will be devoted to the turning out of the necessary lathes and machinery for enabling us to increase the output of war material.

"All that takes time. If it is done too hurriedly it would not be done well, but I piece of work she t...out; fectly fair. It would be say, half a crown to...n do 1s. 6d. to a woman, we ha... pay exactly the same ... piece work to wom... to Pankhurst asked a ... She wanted the same ... for time work."

Mrs. Pankhurst ... cause there are ve... that women now wo... fo... ployers are being sw... several cases brought ... re...

Mr. Lloyd George ... All now are going to be... control. It is quite ... get along, I think, wi... as tical control of all ... tre... ments for turning ou... ni... and the Government ... se... is no sweated labour ... or... women will be unski... and they cannot quite ... work as the men, who ... a long time; therefore ... ca... same time rate, but ... to give.

"But Mrs. Pankhu... pe... in insisting that wh... wages should be, it s... h... of wages and a fixed ... guarantee that we s... o... services of women ... t... labour. That is what w...

"Women are prepa... o... services to the natio... a... very grave and serious ... are willing to do their... got those of whom th... ing in the trenches and ... lives and they are unh... not doing something ... anxious to help. T... country can help and h...

"I believe that t... through to victory. Without them victory ... victory which tarries ... whose footprints are f... We want to shorten th... life, and that life whic... and diminishing the ... which war brings. Thi... tion of women in life, ... they are discharging t... ward at the present mo... the brave men who ar... the trenches, 'If you... because you have not e... we will help.' On beh... of Munitions I thank ...

Mrs. Pankhurst exp... the deputation to Mr...

THROUGH TO VICTORY."

—MR. LLOYD GEORGE.

...sly," Mr. Lloyd George in his speech yesterday. Mrs. Pankhurst is ...auding.

she t put; that is per- It wou be fair to give, own to doing that and oman we have agreed to the s ate of wages for wom to men. Mrs. ked a nore than that. he sa of wages even k."

khurst asked that be- are ve ve complaints now wo for private em- being sw. I have had brought re me."

George ll these shops ng to be Government is quite sible for us to hink, wi assuming prac- of all reat establish- rning ou itions of war, vernment see that there d labour or some time be unsk and untrained nnot quic out as much men, who been at it for therefor cannot give the te, but tece rate we can

. Pankhu perfectly right that wh the rate of l be, it s he a fair rate l a fixed ...e which will hat we not utilise the women u to get cheap t is wha want.

are prep to tender their the nati assist it in a nd serio rgency. They o do thei. They have whom thre fond fight- nches and ngering their y are unh hat they are omething p; they are help. T men of this help and l ormously. e that th n help us victory. ar, hear.") m victory ry and the ich tarries a victory rints are fe ts of blood. shorten the or it means t life which curtailing hing the b of sorrow rings. This great func- en in life, elieve that charging th oming for- present mo d saying to en who are g for us in s, 'If your are in peril have not ou ar material .' On behalf Ministry I thank yo ttending.' hurst expr e thanks of in giving three cheers for the Army and Navy."

These being heartily given, Mrs. Pankhurst asked for "Three cheers for the good old country that we mean to save." More cheers were given and Mrs. Pankhurst was also heartily cheered.

WOMEN'S WAR SERVICE MARCH.

Great Procession of 50,000 Patriots.

HOW THEY COULD ORGANISE.

Women who can organise a procession like the one that yesterday spread as a great coloured riband along the Embankment are women who have a right to demand that their services shall not be lost to the nation. It was a triumph of marshalling over the most adverse and unpropitious conditions it was possible to conceive.

Imagine nearly fifty thousand women collected in one long processional line in the rain; imagine that procession forming up with clockwork precision and moving forward orderly and to time; imagine every section of that procession fitting into the general scheme like a mosaic; imagine all the afternoon a pitiless rain blown into the faces of the women by a strong wind in which the flags and bannerettes that were carried perilously fluttered; imagine many girls in the most frail of dresses stepping along in pools of mud. Imagine all this and then you will be able to do justice to the ability of the organising brain that made of these hundred thousand women a harmonious, symmetrical procession.

How was the triumph achieved? It was achieved by a wonderful co-ordination of effort. The procession was divided up into 125 sections. There were marshals and deputy-marshals responsible for each section; over them were superior marshals, and over them divisional commanders. Each unit was a complete entity for the purposes of assembling its women; each unity was a part of a well-balanced whole when the assemblage was complete.

and at these points it was difficult to force a passage.

At convenient intervals on the footpaths tables had been set up at which women busily engaged themselves in registering women willing to do munition work. The questions the willing signatories were required to answer would have done credit to Mr. Walter Long's national register. One saw women fill up these forms and then step in business-like fashion into one or the other of the various sections.

AT THE TABLES.

The usual congregation of hawkers vending tiny Union Jacks and "official" programmes recalled the palmy days of peace. Women in shawls retailed a novelty in the shape of a cotton-wool bird on a green leaf. Whether this was supposed to represent peace was not stated. People bought it without seeking its significance. A crowd has an extraordinary habit for doing what it is told.

While the marshalling of the procession was completing, two or three far from picturesque carts passed up and down exhibiting a placard which informed the public that women ir munitions works only obtained 8s. a week. Another jarring note was formed by the distribution of handbills criticising one of the activities of the Suffragettes.

The striking up of the bands proclaimed the start of the procession. As it moved it was possible to appreciate the general colour scheme. The effect was the triple union of red, white, and blue. First would come one section carrying red flags; the next section would have white flags; and the third section blue flags. This arrangement was repeated right along the line, and though it took the procession half an hour to pass a given point, there was sufficient variety to avoid tiring the eye.

It was at the head of the procession that the real note of pageantry was struck. First came a floral conveyance, its bright splash of colour more fitted to sunny skies than an afternoon of rain. Followed a charmingly pretty girl, who carried all the flags of the Allies bunched together. The crowd was sympathetically appreciative, and the lady of the flags rewarded the spectators with a continuous smile.

Next came young women dressed in the peasant costumes of the different countries fighting against the common enemy, and each with the respective national flag in her hand. Appropriately enough Serbia and Montenegro walked hand in hand. The delightful garb of the four girls representing Russia evoked general admiration, which became all the more enthusiastic when it was noticed that in front of the fair bevy walked a pretty Polish girl with the white Polish eagle embroidered in her stole announcing that she was under the protec-

Why the procession was organised.—A woman who, despite her years, was signing the application form to make munitions.

We are not slackers.
We mean to save our country.
To keep the Kaiser out let us make shells.
Be warned by Belgium's fate.
We demand war service for all.
Deeds, not words.
We will not be Prussianised.
Women's work will save men's lives.
Let us save the men in the trenches.

Every ten sections was led by a band which played inspiring airs. A bluejackets' band inspired in the spectators extraordinary enthusiasm, and they cheered and they cheered again. One old countrywoman caused roars of laughter by doing an impromptu jig on her own as they passed.

There were other humorous incidents which kept the crowd, that was rather annoyed by the rain, in good temper. Many of the women in the procession, for instance, had friends among the spectators, and these they saluted with mischievous twirling of the flags they carried, to their own great amusement and the delight of those favoured with these attentions.

Of the incidents not officially connected with the procession one of the most monly well done, and will help to educate public opinion on this subject. I attach normous importance to it.

A group of the Allies as they were represented by some of the women marchers.

"I think it will be impossible to organise e whole of the resources of the nation 'il you have mobilised the women of country as well as the men. ("Hear, r.") That has been recognised in the ional Registry Bill, which is a come statutory recognition of that point.

Mrs. Pankhurst pointed out, our llies, and our foes on the continent of urope, have already realised that it is ot merely a question of utilising the ervices of women for munitions. It is utilising the energies of women for the purpose of discharging all the duties and the functions of commercial and industrial life, which they are capable of doing as well as men.

"We know what women can do in the matter of helping us in turning out munitions of war. I had a letter sent me from the various works of the number of women already engaged there. I think at present we have something like 50,000 working at the various factories engaged in turning out munitions of war. That, I think, is something between one-fifth and one-tenth of the numbers employed in France. I am told that there are half a million of women engaged in turning out munitions in Germany. These figures and the kind of work that women are doing, and doing very well, simply indicate what a capacity and what a reserve we have got in women's labour for the purpose of helping the nation through this very great crisis.

TWO KINDS OF PREJUDICE.

"I agree that they ought not to be confined merely to the work known as unskilled work. There is very fine work which can be done by women, and which is being done by women in this country, as well as on the continent of Europe, in many cases, for instance, about the finest work in the making of shells. The shell body is pretty rough work which can be turned over to the men. The finest work —the fuses—is being done by women.

"The first thing we have got to do is to get rid of prejudice. That is really a serious obstacle in our way. It is not afraid that when the war is over women will do the work of this kind so well that there will be no further use for the services of men."

Mrs. Pankhurst: Very healthy competition.

Mr. Lloyd George: "The real answer is that this is war work, and when the war is over there will be no need for it and therefore it will come to an end. It is not competition, it is a question of getting men and women to work together for the purpose of helping their country through the worst crisis it has ever experienced.

"I have been enjoined not to waste any time in putting this project into operation. It is perfectly true that enthusiasm has been stirred up. There is a great anxiety displayed by women to take their part in helping their country, and the demonstration to-day will undoubtedly fan that enthusiasm to a still higher pitch than we have ever witnessed before. But I should like to say one or two words, not by way of damping that ardour but by way of enjoining a little patience.

"You cannot organise, mobilise, and bring into operation a new industrial army agree that there is something that can be done in the meantime. A really national organisation might be set up for the purpose of registering the names of all the women who are prepared to devote the whole of their time to any task for which women are fitted in the turning out of war material.

"Whoever comes forward to serve must be prepared to give the whole of her time. We must get a complete register of the women who are prepared to give the whole of their time to the kind of work to which they are particularly fitted in the turning out of war material. Then the second thing is there must be a certain amount of training in order to instruct any of the women who can assist—to utilise a sufficient number of women to be able to direct and instruct the others and help in the organisation of women labour in these new shops.

"These are the two points I wanted to call attention more especially to. With regard to wages I should only like to say this. As far as this work is concerned we have agreed that a woman shall be paid exactly the same price as a man for any victory which tarries' [illegible] whose footprints are foo[illegible] We want to shorten the w[illegible] life, and that life which [illegible] and diminishing the bu[illegible] which war brings. This i[illegible] tion of women in life, an[illegible] they are discharging tha[illegible] ward at the present mome[illegible] the brave men who are fig[illegible] the trenches, 'If your l[illegible] because you have not eno[illegible] we will help.' On behal[illegible] of Munitions I thank you[illegible]

Mrs. Pankhurst expe[illegible] the deputation to Mr. L[illegible] receiving them and inv[illegible] dress the women outside.

"IT IS A QUE[illegible] ORGANISA[illegible]

Mr. Lloyd Georg[illegible] to the Cr[illegible]

Mr. Lloyd George then [illegible] the specially constru[illegible] looking the Embankm[illegible] brief speech to the gr[illegible] received him with lou[illegible]

Mr. Lloyd George s[illegible]: witnessed a very fine pr[illegible] who are anxious to hel[illegible] the hour of emergency[illegible] represent the feeling [illegible] women in this co[illegible] There are thousands [illegible] thousands of them wh[illegible] brothers and husban[illegible] those whom they l[illegible] they want to do the[illegible] help them, men facin[illegible]

"Our country is in gri[illegible] to help it, and I believe that [illegible] alike are prepared to [illegible] the Old Country [illegible] (Cheers.) In France and [illegible] sands of women are wo[illegible] and workshops in order to equ[illegible] at the front with abundant [illegible] able them to face the enemy [illegible]

"We propose in this country [illegible] services of everybody who [illegible] assist us, and then victory w[illegible] lot.

RUSSIA'S INDOMI[illegible]

"I am not afraid of the [illegible] There are dark clouds [illegible] East, but I look at them w[illegible] The indomitable spirit of R[illegible] this storm as it has [illegible] hurricane that swept over its [illegible] They will scatter, they will [illegible] and Russia will emerge mo[illegible] able and help the great de[illegible] tries of the West to achieve [illegible] for freedom in Europe. [illegible]

At this point a woman br[illegible] remark, "What about the w[illegible]

"We will get her into th[illegible] first," replied Mr. Lloyd [illegible] laughter.

"I have only got to thank [illegible] George continued) for coming [illegible] to show your readiness to [illegible] power. London is organising [illegible] tion of organisation. It is [illegible] us all.

"Here we are panting tw[illegible] hind to catch a foe who has [illegible] for years. (A Voice: 'Stic[illegible] But we shall do so. I hav[illegible] at all in feeling confident [illegible] nation which overthrew ma[illegible] in Europe before with its [illegible] will do so yet." (Applause.

The National Anthem [illegible] played by the band, cheers [illegible] Mr. Lloyd George.

Mrs. Pankhurst then [illegible] crowd. "Women are going [illegible] said. "They are going to [illegible] the men in the trenches, an[illegible]

A WONDERFUL CURE FOR CONSTIPATION.

Many serious diseases and disorders have their origin in constipation. It should be [illegible] to at once. You cannot tell what it [illegible] lead to. The poisons which are [illegible] into the blood from the decaying [illegible] matter may result in a variety of [illegible] destroying maladies. The brain [illegible] suffer, all interest in life goes.

[illegible] suffer from constipation, you can [illegible] rid yourself for ever from its [illegible] action without drugs. Our [illegible] ensures perfect health. As [illegible] the ordinary bath. Recognised [illegible] medical profession. Simple [illegible] years, and not expensive.—[illegible] particulars of approval offer [illegible] Co., 40 High Holborn, [illegible]

Tableau of "Russia and Serbia."

tarries fans a victory
ts are foo ints of blood.
orten the w, for it means ife which ans curtailing ng the bu n of sorrow gs. This i e great funcin life, an I believe that arging tha coming foresent mome and saying to who are fi ing for us in
If your l are in peril
ve not enou war material
On behal the Ministry
thank you r attending."
rst expres the thanks of to Mr. Ll d George for and invi him to aden outside.

A QUESTION OF ANISATION."

d George's Speech the Crowd.

eorge then nt out on to construct platform overmbankm and made a the gre gathering, hich with lou cheering.
George s d: "We have ry fine pr ssion of women us to hel their country in nergency they, I believe, feeling if millions of his cou . (Applause.)
usands a hundreds of hem wh have got sons and husband nd fathers and hey love the front, and do the best at home to n facing deadly peril.
y is in pril and we all want believe hat men and women red to their best to help ntry throu to victory.
France, ndreds of thou-are wo ing in the factories in order to equip the soldiers th abundant material to ence the army on equal terms.
in this ntry to utilise the rybody who is prepared to hen victo will come to our

NDOMITABLE SPIRIT.

raid of the esult. (Cheers.)
k clouds ering up in the k at them with confidence.
le spirit of Russia will ride it has led many another swept over its devoted plains.
ter, they will be dispersed,
l emerge once more formid-
the great democratic coun-st to achieve a great victory Europe. (Cheers.)
a woman broke in with the t about the vote?"
t her into the shell factory
Mr. Lloyd George, amid got to thank you (Mr. Lloyd ed) for coming here in order eadiness to do all in your n is organising. It is a ques-ation. It is a question for e panting twelve months be-foe who has been preparing Voice: 'Stick it, old boy!') lo so. I have no hesitation ng confident that the great verthrew many a despotism re with its own right hand (Applause.)

al Anthem having been band, cheers were given for ge.
urst then addressed the men are going to work," she are going to save the lives of trenches, and let us all join of mud. Imagine all this and then you will be able to do justice to the ability of the organising brain that made of these hundred thousand women a harmonious, symmetrical procession.

How was the triumph achieved? It was achieved by a wonderful co-ordination of effort. The procession was divided up into 125 sections. There were marshals and deputy-marshals responsible for each section; over them were superior marshals, and over them divisional commanders. Each unit was a complete entity for the purpose of assembling its women; each unity was a part of a well-balanced whole when the assemblage was complete.

HAD THE SUN SHONE.

The Suffragette leaders have organised many remarkable processions in the past; it is questionable whether they have used their organising ability to better advantage than in the war service procession yesterday.

Had the sun shone and July been kind to the women it was to have been a white pageant. That long riband, stretching from Blackfriars to Westminster, was to have been a symphony in white. Until the last it was hoped to carry out the original intention; then as it was seen the rain had set in for the afternoon the women brought out their dark cloaks and their brown mackintoshes, and what was to have been a white procession was sombre-tinted like an afternoon in November.

The procession was remarkable for the different social grades of which it was composed. Peeresses marched with school teachers, wives of high officers of State were sister processionists with factory girls. The arts sent their representatives, as did the varied professions in which women have made themselves a great name. There were women novelists, women artists, school teachers, typists, and shop girls. The number of elderly women could not fail to strike the observer.

It would take too long to mention all the well-known people who walked in the procession, but in addition to the Suffragette leaders were Princess Sophia Duleep Singh, Lady Glanusk, Lady Knollys, Lady Colebrook, Lady Byron, Lady Butler, the Hon. Mrs. F. Guest, Mrs. Waldorf Astor, Mme. Clara Butt, Mme. Marchesi, and Miss Flora Steel.

A very cheerful phalanx they were in the long wait in the rain. Their cheerfulness was a tribute to women's patience and endurance. It did one's heart good to see women of all ages, many white-haired, marching briskly along, all smiles, though their feet were wet through and the rain dripped off their cloaks.

Those sections which had the good luck to form under the Embankment bridges naturally escaped the rain and were the envy of the neighbouring sections; but really it did not matter. The women who marched yesterday would not have been dismayed had it hailed or thundered. The crowd, not so greatly daring as the women, had a partiality for the bridges,

WANTED FOR CASH.

We are paying from 1s. to 20s. each for Old False Teeth pinned on Vulcanite, Silver, Gold, Dental Alloy, and Platinum. Top price given for old second-hand jewellery, watches, rings, brooches, etc. All parcels kept over for three days pending acceptance of price. Diamonds and pearls bought for cash up to any amount. Speciality: Platinum, Dental Alloy, and Dentists' Sweeps. No lot too large or too small. Sell in the best London market.

J. A. BRIGHT and CO.,
Bullion Dealers and Diamond Merchants,
28, CALLCOTT-ROAD, BRONDESBURY, LONDON, N.W.
References: Union of London and Smiths Bank. [ADVT.]

Mrs. Pankhurst and Miss Annie Kenney marching at the head of the women.

tion of the Russian flag. This part of the procession was the happiest note in the colour scheme.

A sense of the fitness of things dictated that the figure representative of poor, stricken Belgium should be sombrely impressive. The flag that was carried was tattered, but it was held firmly aloft in the breeze, and the crowd understood the allegory—for all the sufferings Belgium had endured her flag would always be kept flying.

The pageant of nations concluded with a tableaux of the British Empire in which the Dominions came first. The four countries of the United Kingdom were represented by the national costumes, and the spectators laughed to see the quaint hat of the women of Wales.

The members of the deputation, led by Mrs. Pankhurst, formed the section immediately behind the pageant. Cheers broke out repeatedly as the well-known Suffragette leaders were recognised by the crowd, a tribute to the popularity which the militant women have gained by their strict observance of the truce.

Striking features of the procession were the vigorously worded banners, including the following:—

Men must fight and women must work.

Belgium and its tattered flag. One of the symbols of war represented in the pageant encouraging was the sight of a recruiting procession with some 800 lads about to be sworn in. As the prospective soldiers made their way along the Embankment they were loudly acclaimed by the processionists and spectators alike.

The procession marched by the following route:—

Victoria Embankment,	Oxford-street,
Bridge-street,	Oxford-circus,
Whitehall,	Regent-street,
Cockspur-street,	Piccadilly-circus,
Pall Mall,	Haymarket,
St. James's-street,	Northumberland-avenue,
Piccadilly,	Embankment.
Park-lane,

It is estimated that 120,000 people on the Embankment alone cheered the procession, and throughout the entire processional route it is safe to say over half a million spectators were posted.

WHERE THE WOMEN MOURN THEIR DEAD.

The Little Chapel Under the Dome of St. Paul's.

Nothing is here for tears, nothing to wail.
Or knock the breast; no weakness, no contempt,
Dispraise, or blame, nothing but well and fair
And what may quiet us in a death so noble.

These beautiful lines of Milton must have been recalled to the minds of those who attended the memorial service, held in the little chapel of St. Dunstan's under the great dome of St. Paul's Cathedral, for the heroes who have fallen on the shell-swept, blood-sodden battlefields in France and Flanders and the Gallipoli Peninsula.

No sound save the sonorous voice of the officiating priest broke the silence of St. Dunstan's Chapel during that peaceful service; none of the worshippers gave way to hysterical sobbing, for the war has taught the women of Britain to bear their sorrows bravely and silently.

The soft rays of evening light were stealing through the lofty, stained-glass windows when the congregation rose to its feet to sing a hymn. The united voices, unaccompanied by the organ, echoed strangely through the small chapel, while in the aisle outside the chanting sounded like a distant murmuring. The hymn finished, the mourners knelt for a few moments in silent prayer.

In silence the women in black passed out of the cathedral, the cynosure of many sympathetic, if curious eyes. A few shed tears, but the majority showed no outward signs of grief: their bearing indicated that their sorrow would be borne bravely—that they would face the future unflinchingly, for they realised that no price can be too great when the honour of England is at stake. The picture of the man Atlas bearing the burden of the world should be changed: it is woman who bears that burden to-day.

Morning Post
19-4-15

THE NEW RIGHT TO SERVE.

We stand upon the threshold of a new age. As yet we scarce realise how far we have travelled within one brief year; but now and then comes some passing event, like a signpost pointing the road or a milestone telling the distance we have covered from the old times "before the war." The women's demonstration on Saturday furnished a sign of these new times, forty thousand women claiming only the right to serve their country! A year ago such a demonstration would have carried a different meaning; but to-day the keynote of national life, both among men and women, is no longer the old soulless demand for rights as rights. The drum roll and gun roar of battle have awakened the spirit that slept. The people begin to see that there can be no true right without service; and that the right to serve is the first of all rights. Already the women of England have shown themselves no whit behind the men in readiness to do their duty to their country. Six weeks ago in these columns we suggested the need for a Women's Legion and hazarded the opinion that the women of Great Britain would rally themselves. Saturday's demonstration proves that our confidence in their patriotism was well founded. Already they have done a vast amount of war work in hospitals, prisoners' relief, homes for the training of mothers, and other useful directions. Now the women of England offer themselves as skilled and unskilled workers to replace men who are fighting for them. There is no more inspiriting phenomenon in this tremendous ordeal than the manner in which the women of the Empire have proved themselves ready for, and capable of, sacrifice.

In an interesting speech Mr. LLOYD GEORGE replied to the leaders of the demonstration, promising that their request should be granted. He touched upon one or two of the main difficulties to be faced. He pointed out that "the prejudice of the old Trade Unionists" offered a serious obstacle, as well as "the apprehension of the working man who was afraid that once you trained women to do this kind of work they would continue to do it after the war was over, and do it so well that there would be no further need for the services of men." Mr. LLOYD GEORGE disposed of this objection by saying "that this was war work, and when the war was over there would be no need for it." This, no doubt, may be true so far as part of the extra munitions work is concerned, but possibly it may not altogether allay the apprehensions of the men. To take a single instance, women ticket-collectors on the railways have proved a success, and some of the railwaymen are already asking whether the men who volunteered for service, and who have returned partially disabled, should not be given such light work in preference to women. On this point we believe all patriotic women will agree that the men who have given their blood for the nation have earned the first right of place.

Another pitfall in the way is the question of wages. Mr. LLOYD GEORGE very rightly pledged himself to see that in the establishments under the control of the Ministry of Munitions there should be no sweated labour. For paying women at a lower rate than men he gave the reason that, as they were unskilled, women could not at first turn out so much work as men, thereby implying that as soon as their output equalled that of men they would receive the same wage. In the meantime a minimum wage is to be fixed as a "guarantee that they would not utilise the services of women merely to get cheap labour." This declaration should go far to dispel one of the fears entertained by the workmen. The mobilisation of the women of Great Britain will contribute in no small degree to the efficiency of the nation and may contribute greatly to the ultimate success in which we all believe. But it cannot be denied that there are difficulties, and it is important in the present state of affairs in the world of labour that these difficulties should be faced, and that any misundercountry. Six weeks ago in these columns we suggested the need for a Women's Legion and hazarded the opinion that the women of Great Britain would 'rally themselves. Saturday's demonstration proves that our confidence in their patriotism was well founded. Already they have done a vast amount of war work in hospitals, prisoners' relief, homes for the training of mothers, and other useful directions. Now the women of England offer themselves as skilled and unskilled workers to replace men who are fighting for them. There is no more inspiriting phenomenon in this tremendous ordeal than the manner in which the women of the Empire have proved themselves ready for, and capable of, sacrifice.

In an interesting speech Mr. LLOYD GEORGE replied to the leaders of the demonstration, promising that their request should be granted. He touched upon one or two of the main difficulties to be faced. He pointed out that "the prejudice of the old Trade Unionists" offered a serious obstacle, as well as "the apprehension of the working man who was afraid that once you trained women to do this kind of work they would continue to do it after the war was over, and do it so well that there would be no further need for the services of men." Mr. LLOYD GEORGE disposed of this objection by saying "that this was war work, and when the war was over there would be no need for it." This, no doubt, may be true so far as part of the extra munitions work is concerned, but possibly it may not altogether allay the apprehensions of the men. To take a single instance, women ticket-collectors on the railways have proved a success, and some of the railwaymen are already asking whether the men who volunteered for service, and who have returned partially disabled, should not be given such light work in preference to women. On this point we believe all patriotic women will agree that the men who have given their blood for the nation have earned the first right of place.

Another pitfall in the way is the question of wages. Mr. LLOYD GEORGE very rightly pledged himself to see that in the establishments under the control of the Ministry of Munitions there should be no sweated labour. For paying women at a lower rate than men he gave the reason that, as they were unskilled, women could not at first turn out so much work as men, thereby implying that as soon as their output equalled that of men they would receive the same wage. In the meantime a minimum wage is to be fixed as a "guarantee that they would not utilise the services of women merely to get cheap labour." This declaration should go far to dispel one of the fears entertained by the workmen. The mobilisation of the women of Great Britain will contribute in no small degree to the efficiency of the nation and may contribute greatly to the ultimate success in which we all believe. But it cannot be denied that there are difficulties, and it is important in the present state of affairs in the world of labour that these difficulties should be faced, and that any misgivings in the minds of the men should be promptly and honestly dealt with from the first, so as to avoid disputes, which are always a cause of weakness. A great patriotic movement such as the mobilisation of women will be a source of increased national strength. It must inevitably lead to many social and industrial adjustments, but for such events have long been maturing.

Daily Express
July 19 - 1915.

663c

663c/24

"The women of this country can help, and help enormously." Mr. Lloyd George said in his speech to the wome Saturday. Mrs. Pankhurst (marked with a cross) is seen appla uding the Munition Minister's speech. On the l deputation in dress emblematic of the Allies, and above is a tableau representing the allied cause.

WOMEN'S RIGHT TO WAR WORK.

(Continued from Page 7.)

At the head of the "Pageant of the Allies" walked a very beautiful and stately girl in flowing robes, representing Belgium. A murmur went up as she passed, for she walked in bare feet. She had started in sandals which did not fit her, and she had to kick them off. This was Miss Ferner-Bringhurst, and as an official of the W.S.P.A. said:—"Her pluck was as great as her beauty." She swept on, her white feet blackened with the mud, smiling.

Next were the leaders of the deputation, Mrs. Pankhurst, Lady Parsons, Miss Kenney, and other notable women. Behind them, four abreast, the seemingly endless stream of the rank and file—the fifty thousand women who were demanding the right to their share in the war.

It was the sight of them which most impressed and moved the packed spectators along the route. They marched bravely, stepping blithely to the lilting music of the bands, their flags fluttering above their high-held heads and set, determined faces. They knew that to serve their country they must make sacrifices, and they were prepared.

There were society women in smart-cut tailor-mades, typists in mackintoshes, girl art students in olive greens, working girls and factory girls by the hundred, and here and there grim old women, bent with work and grasping market bags, charwomen with aprons tucked away and fresh from scrubbing stairs.

It was impossible for the spectators not to feel touched and stirred and proud any one's ardour, he said, but at the same time he had to preach patience. It was not only a question of getting rid of prejudice. It was that it was simply impossible to organise millions and bring a new industrial work into operation in one day. It was impossible, as Lady Parsons had suggested, to start at once. We had lathes, machinery, and tools to make first. We were short in the supply. The Government had told the machine tool makers in that very room that they proposed to control their workshops. And the machine tool makers agreed. But all these things took time. Of course there were things which could be done in the meantime, and one of these things was to make a really national organisation of all women who were willing to help.

The ladies murmured applause, and Mr. Lloyd George held up a warning finger. He was a business man now, stating his business needs. He uttered a warning to the dilettante and the potential "slackers." He wanted real working women.

We are getting offers of service, he said, from women who say, "I have got a day or two to spare; I should like to help you." That was absolutely of no use whatever. Whoever came forward must be prepared to give the whole of her time.

Another matter which had to be considered was training. Women cannot be taught this work in a day, and Mr. Lloyd George sketched out a scheme for the organising of women instructresses to train other women.

THE WAGES QUESTION.

Then came the thorny question of wages. Mrs. Pankhurst had demanded equal pay for equal time. To that Mr. Lloyd George could not agree. On piecework, however, the Government was prepared to pay exactly the same as that paid to men.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE PROMISES THEM EMPLOYMENT.

SHELL-MAKING.

PAGEANT PROCESSION IN THE RAIN.

Fifty thousand women demonstrated in the heart of London on Saturday afternoon, claiming the right of all the women in the land to serve their country by making shells; and at the close of the demonstration Mr. Lloyd George, as Minister of Munitions, said that they should have their way.

On that point he pledged his word twice. Once to the ladies, headed by Mrs. Pankhurst and Lady Parsons, who formed the deputation which waited on him at the Munitions Ministry; and once to the great crowd on the Embankment he addressed from over the garden wall at the back of the new-found Ministry.

He told the women of England that the Government were grateful to them for their offer of aid. They wanted their help and would use it. He knew that women could be organised—he had been the victim of woman's capacity for organisation on other occasions. Here he looked with smiling emphasis at Mrs. Pankhurst, who smiled broadly back. The ladies of the deputation laughed, and the bolder of them said "Hear, hear!"

On the subject of actual work, however, Mr. Lloyd George was strictly, almost severely, serious.

There were society women in smart-cut tailor-mades, typists in mackintoshes, girl art students in olive greens, working girls and factory girls by the hundred, and here and there grim old women, bent with work and grasping market bags, charwomen with aprons tucked away and fresh from scrubbing stairs.

It was impossible for the spectators not to feel touched and stirred and proud of these women of England as, mingled together regardless of class or creed, they tramped through the rain with one fixed aim—the serving of their country in the hour of its need.

"SIGNING ON."

The route lay up Whitehall, along Pall-mall and Piccadilly to Park-lane, and back to the Embankment by Oxford-street, Regent-street, the Haymarket, and Trafalgar-square.

At points all along the route were little tables—the women's recruiting stations—at which women, intent on war work, were signing on. They were signing away their full time and all their energies till peace should be won. Here and there groups of soldiers cheered the women, as well they might. The heart of every man went out to them. They were true women of England, women of whom to be proud.

It was half-past five when the head of the procession reached Whitehall again, and Mrs. Pankhurst led the deputation into the conference room at the Ministry of Munitions. Here Mr. Lloyd George delivered what must, presumably, be called a speech, though his remarks occasionally developed into a conversation with Mrs. Pankhurst and his tone throughout was paternal to a degree.

Mr. Lloyd George began by saying that the National Register was a statutory recognition of the fact that to win the war the women must be organised as well as the men. Already 50,000 women in this country were munition making, but that was only a tenth of the women's work being done in this direction in France. In Germany, too, there were at least 500,000 women making shells. Our reserves of women labour, however, were enormous.

FINE WORK FOR WOMEN.

Smiling benignly on Lady Parsons, Mr. Lloyd George told her that it would be unfair to give women only the unskilled work to do. He pointed to the fuse of a shell which was lying on his desk. The making of fuses, he said, required very fine work, and that work was being done by the women of this country as well as on the Continent. Women could be trained to do this work, and so release men for heavier work of which women were physically incapable.

Then the Minister of Munitions tackled the question of prejudice against women's labour which had been raised by Mrs. Pankhurst. Mr. Lloyd George admitted it existed not only on the part of workmen but in the minds of too conservative business men. They could not be persuaded to believe that women could undertake work which they had never seen them do. As for the fears of the workmen, who were afraid that if women were trained to this sort of work the men would not be wanted, there was only one reply—when the war was over this sort of work wouldn't be wanted at all!

Now Mr. Lloyd George became somewhat solemn. He did not want to damp the organising of women instructresses to train other women.

THE WAGES QUESTION.

Then came the thorny question of wages. Mrs. Pankhurst had demanded equal pay for equal time. To that Mr. Lloyd George could not agree. On piecework, however, the Government was prepared to pay exactly the same as that paid to men.

That, with the portion of his speech which has been quoted above, concluded Mr. Lloyd George's address to the actual deputation. He rose and, in the unaccustomed company of Mrs. Pankhurst, passed through the labyrinthine passages of the new buildings of the Munitions Ministry to the little platform which had been built for the occasion

Beyond that wall the crowd was seething. Thousands and thousands of expectant faces were turned up to the little platform. Brass bands mingled "Tipperary" and the "Soldiers' Chorus" from "Faust." A gigantic Coldstream Guardsman amused himself and the grinning crowd by shouting: "What's the matter with Mrs. Pankhurst? She's all right." Then Mrs. Pankhurst arrived. Loud cheers, led by Miss Kenney, waving a lead pencil in the most approved "Here we are again" W.S.P.U. style.

Then Mr. Lloyd George, and terrific cheering. He held up both hands for silence. Not that silence was easily obtained, for all the while he spoke the trams went jangling and rattling by at the back of the crowd with a pingping of bells.

HELPING THE FIGHTERS.

"There are thousands and hundreds of thousands of women," he began, "who have sons and brothers, husbands and fathers, and those whom they love at the front, and they want to do their best at home to help them—men facing deadly peril. In France hundreds of thousands of women are working in the factories and the workshops in order to equip the soldiers at the front with abundant material to enable them to face the enemy on equal terms.

"I am not afraid," he went on, "of the result. There are dark clouds rolling up in the East, but I look at them with confidence. The indomitable spirit of Russia will ride this storm as it has faced many another hurricane that swept over its devoted plains, and Russia will emerge once more formidable and help the great democratic countries of the West to achieve a great victory for freedom in Europe.

"I only have to thank you for coming here in order to show your readiness to do all in your power. London is organising. It is a question of organisation. Here we are just panting twelve months behind to catch a foe who has been preparing for years. But we shall do so. I have no hesitation at all in feeling confident that the great nation which overthrew despotism in Europe before with its own right hand will do so yet. We shall pull the old country through!"

After the cheering had died away, Mrs. Pankhurst called for three cheers for Mr. Lloyd George, and then for the Navy and the Army. Finally her Coldstream Guard admirer in the crowd called for cheers for Mrs. Pankhurst. The crowd laughed and cheered. The massed bands struck up "God Save the King." It was a stirring ending to a stirring afternoon.

help and would use it. He knew that women could be organised—he had been the victim of woman's capacity for organisation on other occasions. Here he looked with smiling emphasis at Mrs. Pankhurst, who smiled broadly back. The ladies of the deputation laughed, and the bolder of them said "Hear, hear!"

On the subject of actual work, however, Mr. Lloyd George was strictly, almost severely, serious.

REAL WORK.

If women were going to work, he said, they must give their whole time and their whole energies. He gave them to understand that shell-making is no amateur's job. It was a grim business and not one to be played with. The most striking passage in his address was as follows:—

> "The women of this country are anxious to help, and can help enormously. I believe they can help us through to victory. Without them victory will tarry, and victory which tarries means victory whose footprints are the footprints of blood. We want to shorten the war because it means life, and with life it means curtailing in many cases the burden of sorrow which the war brings. That is the great function of women in life, and I believe they are discharging that in coming forward at the present moment and saying, 'The great men fighting for us in the trenches are in peril because they have not sufficient war material, and we can help you.'"

This was the spirit—interpreted with so much insight by Mr. Lloyd George—animating the great procession which preceded the deputation. A wonderful procession it was. It was artistic and essentially feminine, and yet gave an overmastering impression of orderliness and strength. In its precise marshalling and conduct it bore the unmistakable imprint of the organising capacities of Mrs. Pankhurst and her captains.

It stretched, when first paraded, from—appropriately enough—the Boadicea statue by Westminster Bridge to beyond the limits of the National Liberal Club, and, looked at as a whole, it resembled a mighty streamer of tricoloured ribbon. Every woman carried a flag. First, several hundred women bore red flags, the next cohort bore white flags, and the next blue flags. The red, white, and blue effect was arresting, and it stirred.

The banners were mercifully light, so that the women could carry them without too much effort, even in the stiff breeze which was blowing at the time. Their plainly printed inscriptions were indicative of the cry in the women's hearts. Here are some of them:—

> Women's work will save men's lives.
> Let us save the men in the trenches.
> We are not slackers.
> We mean to save our country.
> To keep the Kaiser out let us make shells.

It was nearly three when the great procession started in the rain, bands playing along all its length.

First came the lone figure of a girl in white bearing the Union Jack. Then more girls in white, followed by a great floral wagon, behind which walked girls dressed in the bright and many coloured national costumes of the Allies, French, Russian, Italian, Belgian, Portuguese—and a maid of Japan.

The Huddersfield Examiner

July 19 - 1915.

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

THE German conviction that the British Empire only waited the touch of war to break up into its component and mutually hostile parts has already received a number of severe shocks. Ireland, whose long advertised civil war was to have prevented British intervention, has sunk her differences in view of the common peril and has responded with enthusiasm to the call of liberty and free institutions. India, which was to have risen in revolt immediately on the declaration of war, has laid her ungrudging tribute of men and money at the feet of the King-Emperor and has taken her share, along with her "tyrants," in the struggle against her self-appointed liberator. South Africa, so far from accepting the offers of assistance which Germany so liberally offered, has just succeeded in driving them from one of their most important colonial possessions, and is about to send her sons to fill the ranks of the Allies in Europe.

On a smaller scale the women's deputation which was received by Mr. LLOYD GEORGE on Saturday must afford German observers a similar disappointment. As the MINISTER OF MUNITIONS himself observed with a smile, he has often been the victim in the past of the organising capacity of women; but Saturday's procession, and the demands which its leaders laid before the Government, no longer had terrors for a Cabinet Minister. The unprecedented sight was witnessed of Mrs. PANKHURST applauding Mr. LLOYD GEORGE's speech and only asking to be permitted to help him more effectively in the task which he has before him. We gladly recognise, indeed, the fine enthusiasm with which the Militant Suffrage Movement has thrown itself into the struggle for national liberty and the unselfish devotion with which—leaders and rank and file alike—it has sunk its quarrel with the Government in its ambition to serve the country. Some of the most stirring recruiting appeals have come from leaders of the movement, and its organisation—the efficiency of which Ministers have had good reason to recognise in the past—has been placed unreservedly at the disposal of the public authorities. Although we believe that this has been done with no thought of the future fortunes of the suffrage movement, we may express the belief that, after the war, the movement will have secured for itself an immensely stronger position and will be able to make its appeal on a far more secure and convincing basis than was possible in days when its leaders sought to secure legislation through irritation. The women's procession on Saturday was only a symptom of the wholehearted willingness with which the women of this country are waiting to place themselves at the disposal of the nation and the enthusiasm with which they are ready to take up any work which may be assigned to them.

As to the actual points with which the speakers dealt, we believe that there is full opportunity for the organisation of women's work along the lines which Mr. LLOYD GEORGE suggested. We are a little perplexed at his suggestion that "an organisation might be set "up, a really national organisation, for the purpose of registering the names of all the women "who are prepared to devote the whole of their "time to any task for which women are fitted in "turning out of war material." Surely the National Register will provide such machinery. If it does not, and if for each specific department of work, the Government must organise another and more detailed register, then it is difficult to see what good purpose the original Register is to serve. But, setting that aside for the moment, it is clear that there is much work, not only unskilled but skilled, which women may well perform, and although, as Mr. Lloyd George pointed out, the adoption of woman labour has to meet not only the natural prejudice of the Trade Unions but also the [illegible] conservatism of the business man, we believe that send her sons to fill the ranks of the Allies in Europe.

On a smaller scale the women's deputation which was received by Mr. LLOYD GEORGE on Saturday must afford German observers a similar disappointment. As the MINISTER OF MUNITIONS himself observed with a smile, he has often been the victim in the past of the organising capacity of women; but Saturday's procession, and the demands which its leaders laid before the Government, no longer had terrors for a Cabinet Minister. The unprecedented sight was witnessed of Mrs. PANKHURST applauding Mr. LLOYD GEORGE's speech and only asking to be permitted to help him more effectively in the task which he has before him. We gladly recognise, indeed, the fine enthusiasm with which the Militant Suffrage Movement has thrown itself into the struggle for national liberty and the unselfish devotion with which—leaders and rank and file alike—it has sunk its quarrel with the Government in its ambition to serve the country. Some of the most stirring recruiting appeals have come from leaders of the movement, and its organisation—the efficiency of which Ministers have had good reason to recognise in the past—has been placed unreservedly at the disposal of the public authorities. Although we believe that this has been done with no thought of the future fortunes of the suffrage movement, we may express the belief that, after the war, the movement will have secured for itself an immensely stronger position and will be able to make its appeal on a far more secure and convincing basis than was possible in days when its leaders sought to secure legislation through irritation. The women's procession on Saturday was only a symptom of the wholehearted willingness with which the women of this country are waiting to place themselves at the disposal of the nation and the enthusiasm with which they are ready to take up any work which may be assigned to them.

As to the actual points with which the speakers dealt, we believe that there is full opportunity for the organisation of women's work along the lines which Mr. LLOYD GEORGE suggested. We are a little perplexed at his suggestion that "an organisation might be set "up, a really national organisation, for the pur- "pose of registering the names of all the women "who are prepared to devote the whole of their "time to any task for which women are fitted in "turning out of war material." Surely the National Register will provide such machinery. If it does not, and if for each specific department of work, the Government must organise another and more detailed register, then it is difficult to see what good purpose the original Register is to serve. But, setting that aside for the moment, it is clear that there is much work, not only unskilled but skilled, which women may well perform, and although, as Mr. LLOYD GEORGE pointed out, the adoption of woman labour has to meet not only the natural prejudice of the Trade Unions but also the innate conservatism of the business man, we believe that, with careful and sympathetic organisation, the nation may avail itself far more fully than it has hitherto done of the services of its women citizens. The women, indeed, are ready, and have been ready for many a month. It is the central organisation which has hitherto been lacking and has failed to avail itself of the many offers of assistance which have been received. If the new Ministry of Munitions, amongst its many tasks, can effectively mobilise the female labour of the country for the prosecution of the war, it will, by that fact alone, have justified its existence.

Northern Daily Telegraph.

19-7-15.

66

6630

WOMEN'S WORK WELCOMED.

The moment war was declared women set to work whole-heartedly, readily denying themselves coveted leisure and recreation that they might send comforts to the sons and the brothers who went forth to war. Service in that sphere has never slackened; on the contrary, it has increased, as its need has grown, and as its value has been appreciatively recognised. Very soon, too, it was realised that the call to the colours and the great response made to it meant that, to keep the home work going, to fill the vacant places in the shop and the office, in the mill and the mine, above all in the munitions factories, the retired and leisured men on the right side of 60, and women and girls would be required. Many men who had made a competence, enabling them to leave off active service, gladly returned to their former positions or volunteered service in various forms for the duration of the war. The best, the fullest, withal the most spontaneous, response has come from women. They are found now engaged in many spheres of service hitherto closed against them, and the universal testimony is that they are doing their work excellently. We see them at work not only in the offices as clerks, but on the trams, at the railway booking office, on the farms in large numbers, and, not least, in the munition workshops. On Saturday a great demonstration of women, eager for war service, was held in London. It's success added one more to the many proofs of women's capacity in organisation. The procession was an impressive spectacle, but the importance of the event did not end with the imposing display of loyalty and patriotism made in the Metropolitan streets. Where Mrs Pankhurst is we may be sure business is meant. It was a happy idea to bring the meaning of the demonstration home to the Government, and, not least, to the Minister of Munitions, even although, in the case of Mr Lloyd George, the women knew that in their representations, forcibly as earnestly made, they were preaching to the converted. Mr Lloyd George has been a woman's man all the time—alike in peace as in war.

Mrs Pankhurst headed the deputation of women who waited upon Mr Lloyd George on Saturday. In her speech she assured the Minister alike of the desire and the capacity of women to do their part in turning out war material or in rendering any service open to them. They want to work, and they will not be happy until they have the opportunity of making the fullest use of their capacity. The women in France, and the women in Germany, too, are all employed on service for the war, and the women of Great Britain are resolved firmly not to be behind-hand. Mrs Pankhurst rightly urged that the women have no desire to disturb existing conditions; indeed, their determination is that women's work should not be used to depress the conditions of male labour; further, she asked, and the claim is one that should always hold in peace or in war, that wherever women do the same work as men they should be paid the same rate of wages—"Equal pay for equal work" is the best of all securities against the lowering of labour remuneration. Mr Lloyd George welcomed the deputation, and congratulated the women upon their effective demonstration. He was most appreciative of the offers for work made by the women, and frankly declared that we shall not effectively organise the whole of the resources of the nation for the war until we have mobilised the women of the country as well as the men. As he began his speech so he ended it. "The women of this country," he said, "can help, and help enormously. I believe they can help us through to victory. Without them victory will tarry, and a victory which tarries means a victory whose footprints are footprints of blood."

Mr Lloyd George mentioned that there are something like 50,000 women working at various factories in this country making munitions of war; in France the number is ten times more, and in Germany there are as many. We have therefore a great reserve upon which to draw. What is best of all, is the fact that the women are willing; what is incomprehensible is that they should be kept waiting when the urgency of the work is admitted. Mr Lloyd George for one is ready to avail himself of the service, and he asks that all prejudices and fallacious apprehensions should be set aside so as to get the help that is needed "to bring the country through the worst crisis it has ever experienced." So far as munition work is concerned, Mr Lloyd George reminded the deputation that time is required to obtain the necessary tools, lathes, and machinery; he also said that a really national organisation is needed. Further, he said it is whole-time and not part-time service that is required. A certain amount of training is also essential. As regards wages, Mr Lloyd George said women should be paid exactly the same price for piece work as men, and he added, "The Government will see that there is no sweated labour" in the establishments over which it is taking control. There will be a fixed minimum, "which would guarantee that the services of women are not utilised merely to get cheap labour."

Scotsman
19-7-15.

IN the great deputation of women which waited upon the Minister of Munitions on Saturday is to be seen one of the most encouraging signs of the time. When the history of this war comes to be written no chapter in it will be more honourable than that which tells of what was done by the women of Great Britain. The work they have done and are doing for the nation is incalculable. A war like the present would be impossible to maintain unless the women of the country supported it. It is becoming increasingly apparent that the vigour and success with which it can be pursued are largely dependent on the extent to which the women can be drawn upon to take the place of the male population in the industrial life of the country. Saturday's deputation was concerned with urging the larger employment of women in munition works. The speakers, taking high ground, claimed it as a right and privilege, that they should have their share in providing the country's defenders in France and in the Dardanelles with the means of successful warfare. In urging this upon the Minister of Munitions they were preaching to the converted. Mr Lloyd George has himself been insistent upon the need for utilising the service of women. He was able to announce that 50,000 of them are already engaged in munition works. This, it is true, is a small figure compared with the numbers of women similarly employed in France and Germany. France, according to his statement, has from a quarter to half a million women in the munition factories; Germany, half a million. But it must be remembered that these countries were more far-seeing than our own, and prepared to utilise female labour from the commencement of the war. We are only now beginning, and consequently we are faced with the problem of training the women workers. This will take time, but in the end the number of women employed is certain to be much larger than at present. There are certain prejudices to be overcome—prejudices of employers against departure from use and wont, and of workmen based on the fear of unequal competition and lowering of wages. Nobody desires to see a national crisis made use of to effect a lowering of wages. Mr Lloyd George laid it down explicitly that there must be no sweated labour in the munition factories, and that female labour must be paid equal wages for equal efficiency. As regards the prejudice that some employers have against female labour in itself, it must be remembered that the situation is not one in which an unrestricted choice can be exercised. It is not only munition work which is involved in the question. If the war is to be carried on, the replacement of enlistable men by women must be extended in many other departments of the nation's industrial organisation. In France this replacement has been already carried out almost to its extreme, and Germany is not far, if at all, behind in this respect. Of all the nations now at war, Great Britain has had least recourse to its reserve of female labour. But Great Britain will be compelled to utilise this source in the near future to a much greater extent than it is now doing. To make good the wastage of war requires a fresh call upon the manhood of the country, and this can only be met by replacing all men who are not essential to the country's industry by women. There are certain trades in which the replacement could be effected on a larger scale than at present without essential interests suffering. In shops, for example, the substitution of female for male assistants could be carried out to a larger extent than has been so far attempted. In the warehouses the work of packing absorbs men who ought to be released for the Army. There are such employments as insurance agencies which can be carried out in the meantime by women. These cases are mentioned only as instances of what could be effected in the way of making men available for military service. Every endeavour in view of converted. Mr Lloyd George has himself been insistent upon the need for utilising the service of women. He was able to announce that 50,000 of them are already engaged in munition works. This, it is true, is a small figure compared with the numbers of women similarly employed in France and Germany France, according to his statement, has from a quarter to half a million women in the munition factories; Germany, half a million. But it must be remembered that these countries were more far-seeing than our own, and prepared to utilise female labour from the commencement of the war. We are only now beginning, and consequently we are faced with the problem of training the women workers. This will take time, but in the end the number of women employed is certain to be much larger than at present. There are certain prejudices to be overcome—prejudices of employers against departure from use and wont, and of workmen based on the fear of unequal competition and lowering of wages. Nobody desires to see a national crisis made use of to effect a lowering of wages. Mr Lloyd George laid it down explicitly that there must be no sweated labour in the munition factories, and that female labour must be paid equal wages for equal efficiency. As regards the prejudice that some employers have against female labour in itself, it must be remembered that the situation is not one in which an unrestricted choice can be exercised. It is not only munition work which is involved in the question. If the war is to be carried on, the replacement of enlistable men by women must be extended in many other departments of the nation's industrial organisation. In France this replacement has been already carried out almost to its extreme, and Germany is not far, if at all, behind in this respect. Of all the nations now at war, Great Britain has had least recourse to its reserve of female labour. But Great Britain will be compelled to utilise this source in the near future to a much greater extent than it is now doing. To make good the wastage of war requires a fresh call upon the manhood of the country, and this can only be met by replacing all men who are not essential to the country's industry by women. There are certain trades in which the replacement could be effected on a larger scale than at present without essential interests suffering. In shops, for example, the substitution of female for male assistants could be carried out to a larger extent than has been so far attempted. In the warehouses the work of packing absorbs men who ought to be released for the Army. There are such employments as insurance agencies which can be carried out in the meantime by women. These cases are mentioned only as instances of what could be effected in the way of making men available for military service. Every employer, in view of our great commitments in this war, should ask himself the question whether he is unnecessarily putting obstacles in Lord Kitchener's way by detaining men who could be released. It is not necessary to add that the women who take the place of men who have joined the Army are doing just as useful and patriotic a work as if they were employed, as many of them desire to be, in the more obviously war work of the manufacture of shells

The Yorkshire Observer
19-7-15.

The War and Industry.

THE deputation of women which waited upon Mr. Lloyd George on Saturday and the reception given to it by the Minister of Munitions constitute a singular revolution from the days when many people were opposing the women's enfranchisement movement with the contention that the place of woman is at home. Now, it appears, her place is in the munitions factory, or in any other employment for which she can fit herself with the purpose of increasing the number of men available for service in the field or in some other branch of work more urgently calling for them. Mr. Lloyd George seems to think that there is, or soon will be, room in the munitions factories for great numbers of women. He proposes that while progress is being made with the production of machine tools and the provision of new munition works there should be set up a really national organisation for the purpose of registering the names of all the women who are prepared to devote the whole of their time to any task for which women are fitted in the turning out of war material. We had imagined that such an organisation was already being set up and that its instrument was the National Registration Act. But perhaps the distinction is to be found in the fact that the National Register will invite people to state not only that they are willing to engage in occupations other than their own, but that they are also skilled in the new occupation. There may be many who are willing but are not in the least skilled, and it is those perhaps that the Minister of Munitions wishes to see enrolled outside the National Register. He makes the condition, however, that they must be ready to give the whole of their time to the work. A spare day or two, he says, is no use at all.

We shall perhaps not be wrong if we assume that the desire to extend the production of war material in this country is not limited by any necessity of removing an actual scarcity of supplies to our troops or those of our allies. We are at present importing great quantities of munitions, and these figure among the imports which have to be paid for. Statesmen have insisted a good deal on the desirability of reducing as far as possible the importations of luxuries like tobacco which, by the necessity of paying for them, increase our financial difficulties in times when we are producing a more limited quality of goods for export. It is obvious that the same reasoning applies to any war material now imported from abroad which we could manufacture as advantageously at home. Mr. Lloyd George alluded in his speech on Saturday to one great difficulty in increasing the volume of women's labour—the fear of the trade unions that the wages of men will be reduced by a new form of competition after the war. He replies that these munitions will not be wanted when the war is over. This consideration points to the special suitability of munitions work to the utilisation of the labour of women who are normally not under the necessity of engaging in industrial occupations. If women's labour is extended in any great measure to industries that will survive the war the question raised by Mr. Lloyd George will need to be very carefully handled. The South Wales miners' dispute does not promise well for the settlement of any difficulties that may arise by the forcible suppression of strikes. Though the need for increasing our productive capacity to the utmost is apparent enough, it will be the part of prudent statesmanship to see that the effort shall have the co-operation of all the classes concerned.

With regard to the Welsh miners' dispute there are some hopeful reports that a settlement is not far off, and we hope these reports may prove to be well founded. Even if there is no immediate prospect of a shortage of coal for the Navy and for ships engaged in transport the strike means a loss which at a time like the present the nation can ill afford. The appropriation of all available supplies to Government uses means damage to other industries, and already there are reported to be signs of injury to general trade in the districts affected. It people to state not only that they are willing to engage in occupations other than their own, but that they are also skilled in the new occupation. There may be many who are willing but are not in the least skilled, and it is those perhaps that the Minister of Munitions wishes to see enrolled outside the National Register. He makes the condition, however, that they must be ready to give the whole of their time to the work. A spare day or two, he says, is no use at all.

We shall perhaps not be wrong if we assume that the desire to extend the production of war material in this country is not limited by any necessity of removing an actual scarcity of supplies to our troops or those of our allies. We are at present importing great quantities of munitions, and these figure among the imports which have to be paid for. Statesmen have insisted a good deal on the desirability of reducing as far as possible the importations of luxuries like tobacco which, by the necessity of paying for them, increase our financial difficulties in times when we are producing a more limited quality of goods for export. It is obvious that the same reasoning applies to any war material now imported from abroad which we could manufacture as advantageously at home. Mr. Lloyd George alluded in his speech on Saturday to one great difficulty in increasing the volume of women's labour—the fear of the trade unions that the wages of men will be reduced by a new form of competition after the war. He replies that these munitions will not be wanted when the war is over. This consideration points to the special suitability of munitions work to the utilisation of the labour of women who are normally not under the necessity of engaging in industrial occupations. If women's labour is extended in any great measure to industries that will survive the war the question raised by Mr. Lloyd George will need to be very carefully handled. The South Wales miners' dispute does not promise well for the settlement of any difficulties that may arise by the forcible suppression of strikes. Though the need for increasing our productive capacity to the utmost is apparent enough, it will be the part of prudent statesmanship to see that the effort shall have the co-operation of all the classes concerned.

With regard to the Welsh miners' dispute there are some hopeful reports that a settlement is not far off, and we hope these reports may prove to be well founded. Even if there is no immediate prospect of a shortage of coal for the Navy and for ships engaged in transport the strike means a loss which at a time like the present the nation can ill afford. The appropriation of all available supplies to Government uses means damage to other industries, and already there are reported to be signs of injury to general trade in the districts affected. It ought therefore to be the object of the Government to settle the dispute as quickly as possible without any regard for the credit of the Munitions Act. If that Act will not help in removing the difficulty, it certainly ought not to be allowed to hinder. "The Daily Telegraph" postpones discussion of the Act till the negotiations are over, and that is perhaps the wisest thing to do, though the decision is itself eloquent enough as to the wisdom that went to the making of the Act. "The Morning Post" now places its faith in a new and even more wonderful expedient. "This," it says, "is no ordinary industrial crisis. It is the mutiny of one small class, who control an industry vital to the nation's existence, against the rest of the people. To quell a mutiny we need a man used to handling bodies of men and used to command. For this task a soldier or a sailor is better fitted than any politician. Let such a man go down to meet the miners and fearlessly tell them their duty, and show them that he is not afraid, if need be, to compel obedience, and we believe that the men will listen and will accept his leadership. And if the Government found such a man today it would have the nation with it." The faith of some people in the power of compulsion is truly pathetic. We could imagine no method more likely to postpone a settlement indefinitely than that which "The Morning Post" recommends, and without a settlement the men will not be got down the pits. "The Morning Post" may have been reading mediæval history, recalling how a monarch, confronted by a mob of angry peasants, placed himself at their head with the promise, "I will be your leader." But that monarch was wise enough not to enforce the promise with a threat to break the heads of

Standard
19-7-15

WOMEN FOR WAR WORK.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE ON WHAT THEY CAN DO.

ANXIOUS TO SERVE.

100,000 IN GREAT LONDON DEMONSTRATION.

QUESTION OF WAGES.

Mr. Lloyd George, the Minister of Munitions, made an important speech on Saturday on the organisation of women for war work. He spoke in reply to a deputation headed by Mrs. Pankhurst, which he received in his private room at the Ministry of Munitions, and afterwards addressed the women who had taken part in the great demonstration and procession during the afternoon. It is estimated that the women numbered 100,000. Addressing the deputation, Mr. Lloyd George said:—

Permit me to congratulate you on the very fine procession which I have had the pleasure, with my colleague, Mr. Winston Churchill, of witnessing this afternoon. If any additional proof were required of the organising capacity of women, of which I have been a victim in the past, I would say it was amply demonstrated by that procession to-day. It was uncommonly well done. It has a special advantage, I think, which lies very largely in the fact that it will help to educate public opinion on this subject. I attach enormous importance to it.

I think it would be impossible to organise effectively the nation for the tremendous war we are beginning thoroughly to realise we have embarked upon—it will be impossible to organise the whole of the resources of the nation until you have mobilised the women of this country as well as the men (hear, hear). That has been recognised in the measure which was piloted through the House of Commons with great skill by my colleague Mr. Walter Long. The National Register Bill is a complete statutory recognition of that point. As Mrs. Pankhurst pointed out, our Allies and our foes on the Continent of Europe have already realised that it is not merely a question of utilising the services of women for munitions.

It is, as Mrs. Pankhurst pointed out, utilising the energies of women for the purpose of discharging all the duties and the functions of commercial and industrial life which they are capable of doing as well as men. We know what women can do in the matter of helping us in turning out munitions of war. I had a letter sent me from the various works of the number of women already engaged there. I think at the present moment we have at the outset something like 50,000 working at the various factories engaged in turning out munitions of war. That, I think, is something between one-fifth and one-tenth of the numbers employed in France. I have not got the actual numbers. I hope to get them from M. Thomas in the course of the next few days.

OBSTACLES IN THE WAY.

I was told by someone who knew pretty well what was being done in Germany that there are half a million women engaged in turning out munitions in that country. The figures I have got here, and the kind of work that women are doing, and doing very well, simply indicate what a capacity and what a reserve we have got in women's labour for the purpose of helping the nation through this very great crisis. I agree with Lady Parsons that they ought not to be confined merely to the work known as unskilled work. There is very fine work which can be done by women and which is being done by women in this country as well as on the continent of Europe, in many cases, for instance, about the finest work in the making of shells.

The shell body is pretty rough work, which can be turned over to the men. The finest work—the fuse—is being done by women. As a matter of fact, all that work can be done by women, and men can be turned on to

WOMEN AND THE WAR—AND AFTER.

War time is full of ironies. The most striking is the fact that the South Wales miners, who have provided many thousands of recruits for the Army, should now be helping the enemy in the most effective way possible, and should be able to say, with literal truth, that "only Germany, Austria, and Turkey are on their side." A minor irony is illustrated by Mr. Lloyd George's speech in reply to the women's deputation. The great anti-armaments campaigner, who only a little more than eighteen months ago was busily attempting to prove the expensive folly of preparations against war, is now the one man to whom the country looks to put the munitions difficulty right. On the other hand, the suffragists, who were ready to wreck society a year ago, are now pleading that they shall be allowed to bear a full share of the national burden. The cry of "Votes for women," once the slogan of hammer-throwers and picture-slashers, is no longer heard. Instead, the banners of the ex-militants bear such inspiring inscriptions as "'Women's battle-cry is 'Work, work, work'"; "Men must fight and women must work;" "Shells made by a wife may save a husband's life." It would be easy to sneer at the transformations of the last twelve months—at the Pacifist Radical turned into a fiery advocate of war efficiency, at the cosmopolitan sentimentalist converted into an austere patriot, at the wildest political agitation of modern times diverted into widely different channels. A less superficial view sees more food for hope than for cynicism in these miracles. The alchemy of war has revealed what is fine gold and what is rubbish in the national character. If it has shown how deeply class hatred and soulless greed have perverted a section of the people, if it has brought to light some rottenness and much stupidity, it has also shown that the nation as a whole is sound, and that the spirit of England, properly directed, will triumph over difficulties far graver than any that have yet confronted us, serious as they have been and still are. The horrible spectacle of wilfully idle South Wales is depressing enough. But fortunately it is not representative of the real spirit of working-class and middle-class England. That is more accurately reflected in the demand of the women that they, too, shall serve the country in its hour of need.

There are already, says Mr. Lloyd George, some 50,000 women working in munition factories. But that is only something less than one-fifth and more than one-tenth of the number employed in France and in Germany. We shall not be making the best of this vast reserve of energy until those figures have been equalled if not surpassed. Women can do all kinds of unskilled work except that making very heavy demands on physical strength. They are also equal to very fine work, like the making of shell fuses. There is no reason whatever, beyond the prejudices of employers and workmen, why a very large part of the operations now performed by men should not be accomplished by the agency of female labour. It will, of course, be a matter of time before the women can be organised. It will be still longer before the necessary machines for a great enlargement of production can be supplied. It will be longer still before women without any kind of experience can be trained to tasks requiring a high degree of technical skill. Miracles cannot be expected. The main thing is to get a start, and prepare the way; and one quite essential preliminary is to clear the ground of

I have got here, and the kind of work that women are doing, and doing very well, simply indicate what a capacity and what a reserve we have got in women's labour for the purpose of helping the nation through this very great crisis. I agree with Lady Parsons that they ought not to be confined merely to the work known as unskilled work. There is very fine work which can be done by women and which is being done by women in this country as well as on the continent of Europe, in many cases, for instance, about the finest work in the making of shells.

The shell body is pretty rough work, which can be turned over to the men. The finest work—the fuse—is being done by women. As a matter of fact, all that work can be done by women, and men can be turned on to heavier work which women are not fitted for. That is what we really have in our minds. But as Miss Kenney pointed out, the first thing we have got to do is to get rid of prejudice. That is a serious obstacle in our way. It is not merely the trade union prejudice, but the conservatism—I am not speaking politically—of the business man.

He has been accustomed to see men turn out that kind of work, and you cannot persuade him that women can do it just as well, and in fine, delicate work of this kind can do it really better than men. You have to persuade him of that fundamental fact to begin with, and also to get rid of the prejudice—not necessarily the prejudice, but the apprehension—of the working-man, who is afraid that once you train women to do work of this kind they will do it so well that there will be no further use for the services of men when the war is over.

Mrs. Pankhurst.—Very healthy competition.

Mr. Lloyd George.—The real answer to that is that this is war work, and when the war is over there will be no need for it, and, therefore, it will come to an end. It is not competition, it is a question of getting men and women to work together for the purpose of helping their country through the worst crisis it has ever experienced. I have been enjoined by all the speakers not to waste any time in putting this project into operation. It is perfectly true that enthusiasm has been stirred up. There is a great anxiety displayed by women to take their part in helping their country, and the demonstration to-day will undoubtedly fan that enthusiasm to a still higher pitch than we have ever witnessed before.

But I should like to say one or two words not by way of damping that ardour, but by way of enjoining a little patience. You cannot organise, mobilise, and put into operation a new industrial army in a day. It is not only that there are prejudices to get rid of, but there are other things to consider. First of all, in this country you have got to get the proper machinery for the turning out of your shell by the agency of female labour. It will, of course, be a matter of time before the women can be organised. It will be still longer before the necessary machines for a great enlargement of production can be supplied. It will be longer still before women without any kind of experience can be trained to tasks requiring a high degree of technical skill. Miracles cannot be expected. The main thing is to get a start, and prepare the way; and one quite essential preliminary is to clear the ground of the prejudices, natural, but irrational, against the employment of female labour on a vast scale. The prejudices of employers, however great, are not so formidable as those of workmen. Capitalistic obstruction, if it exists, can be more easily dealt with by the State than the opposition of labour. The male worker's objection to female labour is mainly based on two fears. The one is that there will be "sweating" now and in the near future; the other is that after the war there will be permanent female competition in trades hitherto restricted to men.

To the first objection Mr. Lloyd George replies by facts. Women are to be paid for piecework at precisely the same rate as men. With regard to timework, the same arrangement obviously cannot hold good, having regard to the fact that women workers will for some time be unskilled and untrained, and therefore less productive than the average male employee. However, all the establishments will be under Government control, there will be a fixed minimum, and wages will be fair. There is no intention to secure mere cheapness. The second fear was not considered by Mr. Lloyd George, but it undoubtedly exists, and it may be worth while dealing with it here. Undoubtedly, if hundreds of thousands of women acquire the habit of work in avocations not hitherto open to them there will be a tendency, after the war, to prefer occupation to idleness, and also to cling to those trades which offer a better return than the average field hitherto open to female energy. A good many women who have emerged from shattered homes will not be inclined to give up their newly acquired economic independence. Women who have left domestic service or badly paid clerical work for skilled and comparatively highly paid labour will probably retain a preference for the new conditions. A great deal of social prejudice against manual labour will doubtless not survive the experiences of this war. After all, is that an altogether lamentable thing? It may be doubted—especially having regard to the conditions likely to prevail for many years after a war which has already resulted in an unparalleled destruction of capital. It is clear that, if we are to repair the ravages of the neo-barbarians, there will be work for everybody for a generation to come; to rebuild Northern France, Belgium, and Poland will be a colossal task. Germany, it may be hoped, will have enough to do to attend to her own troubles. The stricken countries will scarcely be able to accomplish the great work unaided. On Great Britain, if her maritime supremacy enables her to keep intact her industrial machinery, will devolve the high privilege and the immense responsibility of helping to reconstitute the vigour of civilised Europe. It may not be an immediately or specially profitable task. In the family of nations the prosperity of one in the long run depends on the prosperity of all, and the immense destruction of capital must affect us indirectly if not directly, in common with the rest of the world. But if there come a period of dear money, scarcity, and hard living, it will also be a period of work for all who are not too choice as to the kind of work or too insistent as to the rate of payment. There great crisis. I agree with Lady Parsons that they ought not to be confined merely to the work known as unskilled work. There is very fine work which can be done by women and which is being done by women in this country as well as on the continent of Europe, in many cases, for instance, about the finest work in the making of shells.

The shell body is pretty rough work, which can be turned over to the men. The finest work—the fuse—is being done by women. As a matter of fact, all that work can be done by women, and men can be turned on to heavier work which women are not fitted for. That is what we really have in our minds. But as Miss Kenney pointed out, the first thing we have got to do is to get rid of prejudice. That is a serious obstacle in our way. It is not merely the trade union prejudice, but the conservatism—I am not speaking politically—of the business man.

He has been accustomed to see men turn out that kind of work, and you cannot persuade him that women can do it just as well, and in fine, delicate work of this kind can do it really better than men. You have to persuade him of that fundamental fact to begin with, and also to get rid of the prejudice—not necessarily the prejudice, but the apprehension—of the working-man, who is afraid that once you train women to do work of this kind they will do it so well that there will be no further use for the services of men when the war is over.

Mrs. Pankhurst.—Very healthy competition.

Mr. Lloyd George.—The real answer to that is that this is war work, and when the war is over there will be no need for it, and, therefore, it will come to an end. It is not competition, it is a question of getting men and women to work together for the purpose of helping their country through the worst crisis it has ever experienced. I have been enjoined by all the speakers not to waste any time in putting this project into operation. It is perfectly true that enthusiasm has been stirred up. There is a great anxiety displayed by women to take their part in helping their country, and the demonstration to-day will undoubtedly fan that enthusiasm to a still higher pitch than we have ever witnessed before.

But I should like to say one or two words not by way of damping that ardour, but by way of enjoining a little patience. You cannot organise, mobilise, and put into operation a new industrial army in a day. It is not only that there are prejudices to get rid of, but there are other things to consider. First of all, in this country you have got to get the proper machinery for the turning out of your shell supplied. It will be longer still before women without any kind of experience can be trained to tasks requiring a high degree of technical skill. Miracles cannot be expected. The main thing is to get a start, and prepare the way; and one quite essential preliminary is to clear the ground of the prejudices, natural, but irrational, against the employment of female labour on a vast scale. The prejudices of employers, however great, are not so formidable as those of workmen. Capitalistic obstruction, if it exists, can be more easily dealt with by the State than the opposition of labour. The male worker's objection to female labour is mainly based on two fears. The one is that there will be "sweating" now and in the near future; the other is that after the war there will be permanent female competition in trades hitherto restricted to men.

To the first objection Mr. Lloyd George replies by facts. Women are to be paid for piecework at precisely the same rate as men. With regard to timework, the same arrangement obviously cannot hold good, having regard to the fact that women workers will for some time be unskilled and untrained, and therefore less productive than the average male employee. However, all the establishments will be under Government control, there will be a fixed minimum, and wages will be fair. There is no intention to secure mere cheapness. The second fear was not considered by Mr. Lloyd George, but it undoubtedly exists, and it may be worth while dealing with it here. Undoubtedly, if hundreds of thousands of women acquire the habit of work in avocations not hitherto open to them there will be a tendency, after the war, to prefer occupation to idleness, and also to cling to those trades which offer a better return than the average field hitherto open to female energy. A good many women who have emerged from shattered homes will not be inclined to give up their newly acquired economic independence. Women who have left domestic service or badly paid clerical work for skilled and comparatively highly paid labour will probably retain a preference for the new conditions. A great deal of social prejudice against manual labour will doubtless not survive the experiences of this war. After all, is that an altogether lamentable thing? It may be doubted—especially having regard to the conditions likely to prevail for many years after a war which has already resulted in an unparalleled destruction of capital. It is clear that, if we are to repair the ravages of the neo-barbarians, there will be work for everybody for a generation to come; to rebuild Northern France, Belgium, and Poland will be a colossal task. Germany, it may be hoped, will have enough to do to attend to her own troubles. The stricken countries will scarcely be able to accomplish the great work unaided. On Great Britain, if her maritime supremacy enables her to keep intact her industrial machinery, will devolve the high privilege and the immense responsibility of helping to reconstitute the vigour of civilised Europe. It may not be an immediately or specially profitable task. In the family of nations the prosperity of one in the long run depends on the prosperity of all, and the immense destruction of capital must affect us indirectly if not directly, in common with the rest of the world. But if there come a period of dear money, scarcity, and hard living, it will also be a period of work for all who are not too choice as to the kind of work or too insistent as to the rate of payment. There will be no room for mere idlers in the new England if she is to win back her old position; and the problem of the economically redundant woman, if not entirely solved, will be immensely simplified. A long view of the situation should suffice to convince the working man that he has no reason for [illegible]hension, but rather for satisfaction, [illegible] productive employment of his kind.

Standard
19-7-15

and your material.—Lady Parsons suggested that we might start at once. The first thing that we have got to do is to equip ourselves for an adequate supply of lathes, machinery, and tools for the purpose of turning out work of this kind.

We had a very important gathering in this room a couple of days ago, when we had all the great machine-tool makers of this kingdom present, and to that meeting we intimated that we proposed to assume Government control of all machine-tool making shops in this country. They accepted it readily, and for the next few months all the energies of these great shops will be devoted to the turning out of the necessary lathes and machinery for enabling us to increase the output of war material.

All that takes time. Even the setting up of those establishments Lady Parsons referred to would take time. If it is done too hurriedly it would not be done well, but I agree that there is something that can be done in the meantime. There are two things that can be done while we are preparing to utilise the services of the women who are ready to help us. The first thing is that an organisation might be set up, a really national organisation, for the purpose of registering the names of all the women who are prepared to devote the whole of their time to any task for which women are fitted in the turning out of war material.

We are getting offers of service from people who say: "I have got a day or two to spare, and I should like to take some job on." That is simply no use to us. Whoever comes forward to serve must be prepared to give the whole of their time. I have experienced that in this office, and I must say wherever that was pointed out the people concerned made arrangements at once to give the whole of their time. I have never seen one man who was unwilling to do so. That is the first thing. We must get a complete register of the women who are prepared to give the whole of their time to the kind of work to which they are particularly fitted in the turning out of war material.

Then the second thing is—it has already been referred to by Lady Parsons and Mrs. Pankhurst—there must be a certain amount of training in order to instruct any of the women who can assist, to utilise a sufficient number of women to be able to direct and instruct the others and help in the organisation of women labour in these new shops. These two branches of activity can proceed now. First of all the national organisation of a sufficient number of women upon whom we can draw when we are ready to fill these new shops. Secondly, means can be taken immediately for instructing and training a considerable number of women in the class of work which I have indicated. That we can do immediately.

PIECEWORK AND TIMEWORK.

These are the two points I wanted to call attention more especially to. With regard to wages I should only like to say this. As far as this work is concerned we have agreed that a woman shall be paid exactly the same price as a man for any piece of work she turned out; that is perfectly fair. It would not be fair to give, say, half a crown to a man and 1s. 6d. to a woman. So we have agreed to pay exactly the same rate of wages for piecework to women as to men. Mrs. Pankhurst asked a little more than that. She wanted the same rate of wages even for timework.

Mrs. Pankhurst.—I asked that because there are very grave complaints that women now working for private employers are being sweated. I have had several cases brought before me.

Mr. Lloyd George.—All these shops now are going to be under Government control. It is quite impossible for us to get along, I think, without assuming practical control of all the great establishments for turning out munitions of war, and the Government will see that there is no sweated labour. For some time women will be unskilled and untrained, and they cannot quite turn out as much work as the men who have been at it for a long time, therefore we cannot give the same time rate, but the piece rate we can give.

But Mrs. Pankhurst is perfectly right in insisting that, whatever the rate of wages should be, it should be a fair rate of wages and a fixed minimum which will guarantee that we shall not utilise the services of women merely to get cheap labour. Women are prepared to tender their services to the nation to assist it in a very grave and serious emergency. They are willing to do their best. Mrs. Mansell said they have got those of whom they are fond fighting in the trenches and endangering their lives, and they are unhappy that they are not doing something to help. They are anxious to help.

They can help. The women of this country can help, and help enormously. I believe that they can help us through to victory (hear, hear). Without them victory will tarry, and the victory which tarries means a victory enemy will scatter, they will be dispersed, and Russia will emerge once more formidable, deadly, and help the great democratic countries of the West to achieve a great victory for freedom in Europe.

At this point a woman broke in with the remark: "What about the vote?"

"We will get her into the shell factory first," replied Mr. Lloyd George, amid laughter.

I have only got to thank you, he continued, for coming here in order to show your readiness to do all in your power. London is organising. It is a question of organisation. It is a question for us all. Here we are, panting twelve months behind to catch a foe who has been preparing for years. (A voice: "Stick it, old boy!"). But we shall do so. I have no hesitation at all in feeling confident that the great nation which overthrew many a despotism in Europe before with its own right hand will do so yet (cheers).

A GREAT PROCESSION.

SCENES AND INCIDENTS OF THE MARCH.

In spite of the inclement weather the women's demonstration was a magnificent success. Heavy rain and half a gale of wind could not deter them or induce them to curtail the original programme, and the entire route was traversed by the majority of the women, it being estimated that about 100,000 took part in the procession, many of them eschewing the protection of mackintoshes even though the rain beat at times unmercifully and gusts of wind threatened to tear the banners from the grasp of the bearers.

The procession was marshalled in sections on the Embankment, and when formed up occupied practically the whole length of the riverside from Westminster Bridge to Blackfriars. Huge crowds assembled to give the women a hearty send-off, and so well had the demonstration been organised that promptly at 3.30, the hour fixed for the start, the head of the procession moved off from the gates of New Scotland Yard. It was headed by a young woman in white bearing a Union Jack, and following her was a military band, which appropriately played the national songs of the Allies as they passed the Houses of Parliament. A lorry, artistically decorated with flowers and plants, and bearing a scroll with the words, "We demand the right to serve," came next, followed by girls in white carrying long staves, from which hung scarlet roses.

A striking feature of the procession was the "Pageant of the Allies," headed by a group of girls bearing the flags of the Allies bunched together. Belgium was symbolised by a young woman carrying a tattered flag, while France was represented by a girl who bore the tricolour. Russia, Serbia, Montenegro, Japan, and Italy, were represented by young women in national costume, and Great Britain was symbolised in the latter part of the pageant. Some 90 bands took part in the demonstration, and each section was headed by banners bearing appropriate mottoes, such as "Woman's Battle-cry is Work, Work, Work," "No Sluggishness Where Women are Concerned," "For Men Must Fight and Women Must Work." One section was entirely composed of nurses, who were preceded by a banner with the words "Prevention is better than cure. Women want to work."

The route followed was via Victoria Embankment, Bridge-street, Whitehall, Cockspur-street, Pall-mall, St. James's, Piccadilly, Park-lane, Oxford-street, Regent-street, Haymarket, Northumberland-avenue, and so to the Embankment again. Throughout the march the women were greeted with much enthusiasm. Notwithstanding the unpropitious weather thousands lined the route, and cheers were raised as parts of the procession which specially appealed to the sentiments of the onlookers came into view. The women and girls took half an hour to pass a given point.

Among the many bands were two of the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve, and as the sailors came in sight, playing lively airs, they were greeted with particularly hearty cheers. Khaki bands, of which there were several, were also picked out for special ovations. At salient points along the route facilities were provided for women who were ready to sign on for munition work, and those in charge of the registration forms had a busy time getting signatures. The leaders of the deputation were Mrs. Pankhurst and Miss Annie Kenney, who followed the Pageant of the Allies in the procession.

Fortunately the rain had ceased before the procession reached the Ministry of Munitions, and Mr. Lloyd George's address after receiving the deputation was made under more pleasant conditions than the demonstrators had dared to hope for when they set out on their

---

WOMEN AND THE WAR— AND AFTER.

War time is full of ironies. The most striking is the fact that the South Wales miners, who have provided many thousands of recruits for the Army, should now be helping the enemy in the most effective way possible, and should be able to say, with literal truth, that "only Germany, Austria, and Turkey are on their side." A minor irony is illustrated by Mr. Lloyd George's speech in reply to the women's deputation. The great anti-armaments campaigner, who only a little more than eighteen months ago was busily attempting to prove the expensive folly of preparations against war, is now the one man to whom the country looks to put the munitions difficulty right. On the other hand, the suffragists, who were ready to wreck society a year ago, are now pleading that they shall be allowed to bear a full share of the national burden. The cry of "Votes for women," once the slogan of hammer-throwers and picture-slashers, is no longer heard. Instead, the banners of the ex-militants bear such inspiring inscriptions as "Women's battle-cry is 'Work, work, work'"; "Men must fight and women must work;" "Shells made by a wife may save a husband's life." It would be easy to sneer at the transformations of the last twelve months—at the Pacifist Radical turned into a fiery advocate of war efficiency, at the cosmopolitan sentimentalist converted into an austere patriot, at the wildest political agitation of modern times diverted into widely different channels. A less superficial view sees more food for hope than for cynicism in these miracles. The alchemy of war has revealed what is fine gold and what is rubbish in the national character. If it has shown how deeply class hatred and soulless greed have perverted a section of the people, if it has brought to light some rottenness and much stupidity, it has also shown that the nation as a whole is sound, and that the spirit of England, properly directed, will triumph over difficulties far graver than any that have yet confronted us, serious as they have been and still are. The horrible spectacle of wilfully idle South Wales is depressing enough. But fortunately it is not representative of the real spirit of working-class and middle-class England. That is more accurately reflected in the demand of the women that they, too, shall serve the country in its hour of need.

There are already, says Mr. Lloyd George, some 50,000 women working in munition factories. But that is only something less than one-fifth and more than one-tenth of the number employed in France and in Germany. We shall not be making the best of this vast reserve of energy until those figures have been equalled if not surpassed. Women can do all kinds of unskilled work except that making very heavy demands on physical strength. They are also equal to very fine work, like the making of shell fuses. There is no reason whatever, beyond the prejudices of employers and workmen, why a very large part of the operations now performed by men should not be accomplished by the agency of female labour. It will, of course, be a matter of time before the women can be organised. It will be still longer before the necessary machines for a great enlargement of production can be supplied. It will be longer still before women without any kind of experience can be trained to tasks requiring a high degree of technical skill. Miracles cannot be expected. The main thing is to get a start, and prepare the way; and one quite essential preliminary is to clear the ground of is simply no use to us. Whoever comes forward to serve must be prepared to give the whole of their time. I have experienced that in this office, and I must say wherever that was pointed out the people concerned made arrangements at once to give the whole of their time. I have never seen one man who was unwilling to do so. That is the first thing. We must get a complete register of the women who are prepared to give the whole of their time to the kind of work to which they are particularly fitted in the turning out of war material.

Then the second thing is—it has already been referred to by Lady Parsons and Mrs. Pankhurst—there must be a certain amount of training in order to instruct any of the women who can assist, to utilise a sufficient number of women to be able to direct and instruct the others and help in the organisation of women labour in these new shops. These two branches of activity can proceed now. First of all the national organisation of a sufficient number of women upon whom we can draw when we are ready to fill these new shops. Secondly, means can be taken immediately for instructing and training a considerable number of women in the class of work which I have indicated. That we can do immediately.

PIECEWORK AND TIMEWORK.

These are the two points I wanted to call attention more especially to. With regard to wages I should only like to say this. As far as this work is concerned we have agreed that a woman shall be paid exactly the same price as a man for any piece of work she turned out; that is perfectly fair. It would not be fair to give, say, half a crown to a man and 1s. 6d. to a woman. So we have agreed to pay exactly the same rate of wages for piecework to women as to men. Mrs. Pankhurst asked a little more than that. She wanted the same rate of wages even for timework.

Mrs. Pankhurst.—I asked that because there are very grave complaints that women now working for private employers are being sweated. I have had several cases brought before me.

Mr. Lloyd George.—All these shops now are going to be under Government control. It is quite impossible for us to get along, I think, without assuming practical control of all the great establishments for turning out munitions of war, and the Government will see that there is no sweated labour. For some time women will be unskilled and untrained, and they cannot quite turn out as much work as the men who have been at it for a long time, therefore we cannot give the same time rate, but the piece rate we can give.

But Mrs. Pankhurst is perfectly right in insisting that, whatever the rate of wages should be, it should be a fair rate of wages and a fixed minimum which will guarantee that we shall not utilise the services of women merely to get cheap labour. Women are prepared to tender their services to the nation to assist it in a very grave and serious emergency. They are willing to do their best. Mrs. Mansell said they have got those of whom they are fond fighting in the trenches and endangering their lives, and they are unhappy that they are not doing something to help. They are anxious to help.

They can help. The women of this country can help, and help enormously. I believe that they can help us through to victory (hear, hear). Without them victory will tarry, and the victory which tarries means a victory whose footprints are footprints of blood. We want to shorten the war, for it means life, and that life which means curtailing and diminishing the burden of sorrow which war brings. This is the great function of women in life, and I believe that they are discharging that by coming forward at the present moment and saying to the brave men who are fighting for us in the trenches: "If your lives are in peril because you have not enough war material we will help." On behalf of the Ministry of Munitions I thank you for attending.

CONFIDENT OF THE RESULT.

Mrs. Pankhurst expressed the thanks of the deputation to Mr. Lloyd George for receiving them, and invited him to address the women outside. Acceding to this request, Mr. Lloyd George spoke from a specially constructed platform overlooking the Embankment. He said:—

We have witnessed a very fine procession of women who are anxious to help their country in the hour of emergency. They, I believe, represent the feelings of millions of women in this country (cheers). There are thousands and hundreds of thousands of them who have got sons and brothers and husbands and fathers and those whom they love at the front, and they want to do their best at home to help these men facing deadly peril.

Our country is in peril, and we all want to help it; and I believe that men and women alike are prepared to do their best to help the Old Country through to victory (cheers). In France hundreds of thousands of women are working in the factories and workshops in order to equip the soldiers at the front with abundant material to enable them to face the enemy on equal terms. We propose in this country to utilise the services of everybody who is prepared to assist us, and then victory will come to us. I am not afraid of the result (cheers). There are dark clouds rolling up in the East, but I look at them with confidence. The indomitable spirit of Russia will ride this storm as it has faced many another hurricane that swept over its devoted plains. The original programme, and the entire route was traversed by the majority of the women, it being estimated that about 100,000 took part in the procession, many of them eschewing the protection of mackintoshes even though the rain beat at times unmercifully and gusts of wind threatened to tear the banners from the grasp of the bearers.

The procession was marshalled in sections on the Embankment, and when formed up occupied practically the whole length of the riverside from Westminster Bridge to Blackfriars. Huge crowds assembled to give the women a hearty send-off, and so well had the demonstration been organised that promptly at 3.30, the hour fixed for the start, the head of the procession moved off from the gates of New Scotland Yard. It was headed by a young woman in white bearing a Union Jack, and following her was a military band, which appropriately played the national songs of the Allies as they passed the Houses of Parliament. A lorry, artistically decorated with flowers and plants, and bearing a scroll with the words, "We demand the right to serve," came next, followed by girls in white carrying long staves, from which hung scarlet roses.

A striking feature of the procession was the "Pageant of the Allies," headed by a group of girls bearing the flags of the Allies bunched together. Belgium was symbolised by a young woman carrying a tattered flag, while France was represented by a girl who bore the tricolour. Russia, Serbia, Montenegro, Japan, and Italy, were represented by young women in national costume, and Great Britain was symbolised in the latter part of the pageant. Some 90 bands took part in the demonstration, and each section was headed by banners bearing appropriate mottoes, such as "Woman's Battle-cry is Work, Work, Work," "No Sluggishness Where Women are Concerned," "For Men Must Fight and Women Must Work." One section was entirely composed of nurses, who were preceded by a banner with the words "Prevention is better than cure. Women want to work."

The route followed was via Victoria Embankment, Bridge-street, Whitehall, Cockspur-street, Pall-mall, St. James's, Piccadilly, Park-lane, Oxford-street, Regent-street, Haymarket, Northumberland-avenue, and so to the Embankment again. Throughout the march the women were greeted with much enthusiasm. Notwithstanding the unpropitious weather thousands lined the route, and cheers were raised as parts of the procession which specially appealed to the sentiments of the onlookers came into view. The women and girls took half an hour to pass a given point.

Among the many bands were two of the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve, and as the sailors came in sight, playing lively airs, they were greeted with particularly hearty cheers. Khaki bands, of which there were several, were also picked out for special ovations. At salient points along the route facilities were provided for women who were ready to sign on for munition work, and those in charge of the registration forms had a busy time getting signatures. The leaders of the deputation were Mrs. Pankhurst and Miss Annie Kenney, who followed the Pageant of the Allies in the procession.

Fortunately the rain had ceased before the procession reached the Ministry of Munitions, and Mr. Lloyd George's address after receiving the deputation was made under more pleasant conditions than the demonstrators had dared to hope for when they set out on their memorable march.

MRS. PANKHURST'S PLEA.

Mrs. Pankhurst, at the interview with Mr. Lloyd George, said that the women had taken part in the procession because they wished to demonstrate their desire to serve in any and every capacity in which they might be used.

They felt that it was essential if they were to do what they wanted to do—namely, release as many men as possible for their proper business of fighting—that there must be set up a system under which women could be trained not only to do very valuable work as unskilled workers, but also skilled work. It was a crime for any man of fighting age, skilled or unskilled, to be doing any work that could be done by women if properly trained.

Lady Parsons urged that there should be some practical training of women in engineering shops. If the employers could see their way to take a few capable and clever girls into their works, in a few months these would form the nucleus of a school trained to run workshops of their own. She urged that establishments for this purpose should be provided at Newcastle.

Mrs. Grant, Miss Baker, and Miss Kenney also spoke, and after Mr. Lloyd George's speeches the National Anthem was played, and Mrs. Pankhurst said:—Women are going to work. They are going to save the lives of the men in the trenches, and let us all join in giving three cheers for the Army and Navy.

These being heartily given, Mrs. Pankhurst asked for "Three cheers for the good old country that we mean to save." More cheers were given, and Mr. Lloyd George and Mrs. Pankhurst were also heartily cheered.

---

cry is "Work, work, work"; "Men must fight and women must work;" "Shells made by a wife may save a husband's life." It would be easy to sneer at the transformations of the last twelve months—at the Pacifist Radical turned into a fiery advocate of war efficiency, at the cosmopolitan sentimentalist converted into an austere patriot, at the wildest political agitation of modern times diverted into widely different channels. A less superficial view sees more food for hope than for cynicism in these miracles. The alchemy of war has revealed what is fine gold and what is rubbish in the national character. If it has shown how deeply class hatred and soulless greed have perverted a section of the people, if it has brought to light some rottenness and much stupidity, it has also shown that the nation as a whole is sound, and that the spirit of England, properly directed, will triumph over difficulties far graver than any that have yet confronted us, serious as they have been and still are. The horrible spectacle of wilfully idle South Wales is depressing enough. But fortunately it is not representative of the real spirit of working-class and middle-class England. That is more accurately reflected in the demand of the women that they, too, shall serve the country in its hour of need.

There are already, says Mr. Lloyd George, some 50,000 women working in munition factories. But that is only something less than one-fifth and more than one-tenth of the number employed in France and in Germany. We shall not be making the best of this vast reserve of energy until those figures have been equalled if not surpassed. Women can do all kinds of unskilled work except that making very heavy demands on physical strength. They are also equal to very fine work, like the making of shell fuses. There is no reason whatever, beyond the prejudices of employers and workmen, why a very large part of the operations now performed by men should not be accomplished by the agency of female labour. It will, of course, be a matter of time before the women can be organised. It will be still longer before the necessary machines for a great enlargement of production can be supplied. It will be longer still before women without any kind of experience can be trained to tasks requiring a high degree of technical skill. Miracles cannot be expected. The main thing is to get a start, and prepare the way; and one quite essential preliminary is to clear the ground of the prejudices, natural, but irrational, against the employment of female labour on a vast scale. The prejudices of employers, however great, are not so formidable as those of workmen. Capitalistic obstruction, if it exists, can be more easily dealt with by the State than the opposition of labour. The male worker's objection to female labour is mainly based on two fears. The one is that there will be "sweating" now and in the near future; the other is that after the war there will be permanent female competition in trades hitherto restricted to men.

To the first objection Mr. Lloyd George replies by facts. Women are to be paid for piecework at precisely the same rate as men. With regard to timework, the same arrangement obviously cannot hold good, having regard to the fact that women workers will for some time be unskilled and untrained, and therefore less productive than the average male employee. However, all the establishments will be under Government control, there will be a fixed minimum, and wages will be fair. There is no intention to secure mere cheapness. The second fear was not considered by Mr. Lloyd George, but it undoubtedly exists, and it may be worth while dealing with it here. Undoubtedly, if hundreds of thousands of women acquire the habit of work in avocations not hitherto open to them there will be a tendency, after the war, to prefer occupation to idleness, and also to cling to those trades which offer a better return than the average field hitherto open to female energy. A good many that they can help us through to victory (hear, hear). Without them victory will tarry, and the victory which tarries means a victory whose footprints are footprints of blood. We want to shorten the war, for it means life, and that life which means curtailing and diminishing the burden of sorrow which war brings. This is the great function of women in life, and I believe that they are discharging that by coming forward at the present moment and saying to the brave men who are fighting for us in the trenches: "If your lives are in peril because you have not enough war material we will help." On behalf of the Ministry of Munitions I thank you for attending.

CONFIDENT OF THE RESULT.

Mrs. Pankhurst expressed the thanks of the deputation to Mr. Lloyd George for receiving them, and invited him to address the women outside. Acceding to this request, Mr. Lloyd George spoke from a specially constructed platform overlooking the Embankment. He said:—

We have witnessed a very fine procession of women who are anxious to help their country in the hour of emergency. They, I believe, represent the feelings of millions of women in this country (cheers). There are thousands and hundreds of thousands of them who have got sons and brothers and husbands and fathers and those whom they love at the front, and they want to do their best at home to help these men facing deadly peril.

Our country is in peril, and we all want to help it, and I believe that men and women alike are prepared to do their best to help the Old Country through to victory (cheers). In France hundreds of thousands of women are working in the factories and workshops in order to equip the soldiers at the front with abundant material to enable them to face the enemy on equal terms. We propose in this country to utilise the services of everybody who is prepared to assist us, and then victory will come to us. I am not afraid of the result (cheers). There are dark clouds rolling up in the East, but I look at them with confidence.

The indomitable spirit of Russia will ride this storm as it has faced many another hurricane that swept over its devoted plains. The and Mr. Lloyd George's address after receiving the deputation was made under more pleasant conditions than the demonstrators had dared to hope for when they set out on their memorable march.

MRS. PANKHURST'S PLEA.

Mrs. Pankhurst, at the interview with Mr. Lloyd George, said that the women had taken part in the procession because they wished to demonstrate their desire to serve in any and every capacity in which they might be used.

They felt that it was essential if they were to do what they wanted to do—namely, release as many men as possible for their proper business of fighting—that there must be set up a system under which women could be trained not only to do very valuable work as unskilled workers, but also skilled work. It was a crime for any man of fighting age, skilled or unskilled, to be doing any work that could be done by women if properly trained.

Lady Parsons urged that there should be some practical training of women in engineering shops. If the employers could see their way to take a few capable and clever girls into their works, in a few months these would form the nucleus of a school trained to run workshops of their own. She urged that establishments for this purpose should be provided at Newcastle.

Mrs. Grant, Miss Baker, and Miss Kenney also spoke, and after Mr. Lloyd George's speeches the National Anthem was played, and Mrs. Pankhurst said:—Women are going to work. They are going to save the lives of the men in the trenches, and let us all join in giving three cheers for the Army and Navy.

These being heartily given, Mrs. Pankhurst asked for "Three cheers for the good old country that we mean to save." More cheers were given, and Mr. Lloyd George and Mrs. Pankhurst were also heartily cheered.

---

of technical skill. Miracles cannot be expected. The main thing is to get a start, and prepare the way; and one quite essential preliminary is to clear the ground of the prejudices, natural, but irrational, against the employment of female labour on a vast scale. The prejudices of employers, however great, are not so formidable as those of workmen. Capitalistic obstruction, if it exists, can be more easily dealt with by the State than the opposition of labour. The male worker's objection to female labour is mainly based on two fears. The one is that there will be "sweating" now and in the near future; the other is that after the war there will be permanent female competition in trades hitherto restricted to men.

To the first objection Mr. Lloyd George replies by facts. Women are to be paid for piecework at precisely the same rate as men. With regard to timework, the same arrangement obviously cannot hold good, having regard to the fact that women workers will for some time be unskilled and untrained, and therefore less productive than the average male employee. However, all the establishments will be under Government control, there will be a fixed minimum, and wages will be fair. There is no intention to secure mere cheapness. The second fear was not considered by Mr. Lloyd George, but it undoubtedly exists, and it may be worth while dealing with it here. Undoubtedly, if hundreds of thousands of women acquire the habit of work in avocations not hitherto open to them there will be a tendency, after the war, to prefer occupation to idleness, and also to cling to those trades which offer a better return than the average field hitherto open to female energy. A good many women who have emerged from shattered homes will not be inclined to give up their newly acquired economic independence. Women who have left domestic service or badly paid clerical work for skilled and comparatively highly paid labour will probably retain a preference for the new conditions. A great deal of social prejudice against manual labour will doubtless not survive the experiences of this war. After all, is that an altogether lamentable thing? It may be doubted—especially having regard to the conditions likely to prevail for many years after a war which has already resulted in an unparalleled destruction of capital. It is clear that, if we are to repair the ravages of the neo-barbarians, there will be work for everybody for a generation to come; to rebuild Northern France, Belgium, and Poland will be a colossal task. Germany, it may be hoped, will have enough to do to attend to her own troubles. The stricken countries will scarcely be able to accomplish the great work unaided. On Great Britain, if her maritime supremacy enables her to keep intact her industrial machinery, will devolve the high privilege and the immense responsibility of helping to reconstitute the vigour of civilised Europe. It may not be an immediately or specially profitable task. In the family of nations the prosperity of one in the long run depends on the prosperity of all, and the immense destruction of capital must affect us indirectly if not directly, in common with the rest of the world. But if there come a period of dear money, scarcity, and hard living, it will also be a period of work for all who are not too choice as to the kind of work or too insistent as to the rate of payment. There will be no room for mere idlers in the new England if she is to win back her old position; and the problem of the economically redundant woman, if not entirely solved, will be immensely simplified. A long view of the situation should suffice to convince the working man that he has no reason for

[illegible]hension, but rather for satisfaction, [illegible] a productive employment of his kind

Aberdeen Daily Journal
19.7.15

66

BRITISH WOMEN.

If Mr Ramsay Macdonald had been wise in his day and generation, he would have sunk all his contorted views on pre-war diplomacy, and, once the nation had declared for war, would have joined the British and not the German Party, or have recognised that it was better to hold his peace than to aid and abet the enemy's cause by platform oratory. Happily the best section of the Socialist-Labour Party in this country is now declaring itself on the Britain for the British side, and not the Britain for the German side. The demonstration of women who are asking for war work held in London on Saturday revealed how well Mrs Pankhurst is playing her cards in the supreme crisis in which the nation is passing through. While the country was at peace Mrs Pankhurst was at war for Votes for Women. The moment the national danger signal was hoisted and Germany had started on its campaign of ruth that was to finish with the occupation of Petrograd and Paris, and London, Mrs Pankhurst became one of the finest of recruiting agents, and is now among the loudest clamourers for war work for women. To many the attitude of women in this war period has given a new turn of sympathy for the women's cause, and it has done so because it is now seen that the women's leaders have had a broader conception of the nation's duty in war-time than some of the most outstanding Labour-Socialist leaders.

Miss Christabel Pankhurst in discussing the pro-German Norman Angell's war attitude, for instance, has turned his illogical theories outside in, and left him a laughable thing of shreds and patches. The same writer has recognised what the invasion of Britain by Germany would mean for the women and children of this country, and from the Belgian lesson has driven it more forcibly home than almost any other writer of to-day. She has seen also with a clarity of view which Mr Ramsay Macdonald and Mr Keir Hardie might well envy that a victory for Germany would mean not only the doom of the aristocracy and the middle-classes, but of the democracy of this country. Some are almost inclined to think that if women had had the power their quick and intuitive gift of reaching a rapid conclusion would have led to the organisation of the manhood and the labour of the nation eleven months ago instead of eleven months after the outbreak of war. France and Germany are utilising the services of women for war munition work, and the demonstration of Saturday, with the sympathy of Mr Lloyd George, should lead to an early utilisation of the energies of women for war service on a much larger scale than has hitherto been the case.

A MOBILIZED NATION.

MEMBERS' REQUEST TO MR. ASQUITH.

ANOTHER WOMEN'S MEETING.

Our Parliamentary Correspondent writes :—

The movement in favour of National Service is growing very strongly among members of the House of Commons, who are likely to be reinforced during the coming sittings by a good many of those who have seen service in the early part of the war. It will be remembered that this course has been strongly urged in these columns in the case of those members who are not actually fulfilling regular regimental duty and who, therefore, might be regarded as having a choice between relatively unimportant military tasks and their duty to the House of Commons.

These members, no doubt, will take such action as they can to raise the question of National Service, but, as a preliminary step and in order to avoid embarrassing the Government, they are seeking an interview with the Prime Minister in order to lay their views before him.

It is understood that the body which has memorialized the Prime Minister in this sense consists of 20 Unionists and 20 Liberals, but, of course, these are only a small proportion of the total number of members who are in favour of National Service.

DEMONSTRATION OF WOMEN.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE ON MUNITION WORK.

The second women's meeting for the advocacy of national service, which took place yesterday at the Surrey Theatre, Blackfriars-road, was most successful. Just before the meeting ended an interesting message from Mr. Lloyd George on the subject of women's war work was read. The telegram ran :—

> Increasing number of women at present being employed on munitions, and many more needed. In the large firms in the metal trades alone there are 20,000 more women employed this year than last. In many branches of munition work women can be employed in still greater numbers, as it is found that the work to be done is such as they can perform satisfactorily.

Sir L. Chiozza Money, who communicated the contents of the message to the meeting, in a few words of comment laid stress on the fact that there were now great opportunities for women in the country, and declared that the system of national service would enable them to take greater advantage of these opportunities.

The meeting was composed almost exclusively of women. Many of them belonged to the humbler classes, and most of them had relatives serving in the ranks. Many were in mourning. The stewards were members of the Women's Volunteer Reserve in the khaki dress which they have adopted.

The resolution which was submitted to the meeting, and agreed to unanimously, was in the following terms :—

> We, women of the British Empire, believe that the time has come when every fit man should be made available for the fighting line, or, if specially qualified, for National Service at home during the war. Further, we believe that the time has come when the services of women should be fully utilised.

the following terms :—

We, women of the British Empire, believe that the time has come when every fit man should be made available for the fighting line, or, if specially qualified, for National Service at home during the war. Further, we believe that the time has come when the services of women should be fully utilized.

The BISHOP of BIRMINGHAM, who was in uniform, presided, and spoke very earnestly in support of the movement for National Service. The majority of the women present, he said, had relatives, near and dear to them, doing something at the front for the Empire. They were conscious of some injustice, for, while they had given all, others had given nothing. They, however, refrained from accusation because they believed that there had only been a want of realization. But they desired to stir the nation into knowledge, and recognized that the Empire rightly demanded the service of all, and not merely of those who were mos t alive to their responsibilities.

THE BISHOP'S WHITE FEATHER.

Referring to the appeals on posters, he said it was not that kind of thing which should be the moving power of the manhood of the country at a time like this. He regretted that the vital subject with which they were dealing should be made a matter of party, and particularly of journalistic rivalry. If a man took one view, he was accused of belonging to a particular gang. He had himself, he told the meeting, been presented by an anonymous person with a white feather on this ground. In reality all this rubbish about contending journalism had nothing to do with the subject before them.

Then they were told that they ought to be silent, because Lord Kitchener would send for the men as soon as he wanted them ; but what they should bear in mind was that the greatest help they could give that magnificent man was by educating public opinion on the subject of National Service. Meeting the argument that such service was undemocratic, he declared that it was absurd, and pointed to the position of the young Frenchman, who joined the ranks under a compulsory system with pride and with love for his country.

Dealing next with the objection that there would be interference with trade, he said that he had studied in Germany, and that it was there thought that part of her great power in industrial matters was due to her compulsory system. Even if it were not needed he should approve National Service of some kind because it promoted real brotherhood. During 12 months he had been much in a military hospital, and from man after man he had heard accounts of the perfect brotherhood that existed between the officers and men of our Army. (Cheers.)

After saying that the greatest fear in Germany at the present time was that we might adopt National Service for the purpose of defeating her, the Bishop told the meeting that in the fields of France, where they were gathering in the harvest, he did not see a single able-bodied man out of uniform, and that every one was doing something in the country's cause. Finally he said that he wanted National Service now, because he did not desire to wait until the best men had all volunteered.

The HON. Mrs. MAXSE, wife of Major-General Ivor Maxse, who moved the resolution, in a speech that was earnest and direct, dwelt on the duty of every man to defend his country. Alluding to the recruiting posters, she declared, amid applause, that she would like to strip them off and burn them.

LADY ASKWITH seconded the resolution. In a reference to recent events she said "it was the proud boast of the women of England that for centuries they had never heard the fire of the enemy. How many of us can say that now ? It is a queer sensation when you hear it for the first time, and I know it rouses in us a spirit that will flinch from no sacrifice, that will fight to the last ounce."

The spirit of our men was a thing to thank God and their mothers for. But supposing a man had been wounded, it was almost more than one could expect of human nature to imagine that he would go out again gladly while his neighbour remained comfortably at home and said he disliked conscription !

SIR L. CHIOZZA MONEY'S WARNING.

SIR LEO CHIOZZA MONEY, M.P., who was in uniform, said that National Service was just and necessary, and the present position was grave. This was not to say that we should not win through, but it meant that we dared not do less than our utmost. Unfortunately the voluntary system was crippling our efforts. One of the greatest of our armament firms, that of John Brown and Co., Sheffield, had actually lost by recruiting 10,000 out of 50,000 men. A committee of which he was a member asked a midland firm to take up the manufacture of a particular article, and the firm replied that week by week they were being robbed of the very men who were wanted for the purpose.

After replying to the current arguments against National Service, the speaker pleaded for its introduction in the sacred name of liberty and declared that we needed a very much larger Army than we had now and that we ought to give France much more support. Even if the voluntary system could give us all the men we ought to have it would take too long to recruit them for the purposes of the present campaign.

The Government, he asserted, ought not to have waited for 13 months before appointing a committee to consider the question of compulsion. The agitation in the country upon this subject had already done much good, and he confidently believed that it would do more. It was the duty of the Government, he held, to recognize that if it prolonged the existence of the present Parliament beyond the prescribed time, it ought to look beyond Parliament to ascertain the real opinion of the people. (Cheers.)

After the resolution had been carried, a poem written by a wounded officer and entitled "Thanks to the Women of England," was read from the platform.

Standard
19-7-15

AGRICULTURE FOR WOMEN.

By LILLIAS HAMILTON, M.D.
(Warden of Studley Agricultural and Horticultural College for Women.)

In agriculture as a profession for women I must also include horticulture, which is in many ways easier of attainment than is farming proper. Moreover, there is a growing demand for women gardeners, and the pay offered is very fair indeed, naturally varying according to the capacity and experience of each individual. Broadly, I should say that there was a greater supply than there is demand for the well-paid dairy posts, and that the very reverse holds good in horticulture, where the good posts offered are considerably in excess of the thoroughly trained women capable of undertaking them. Gardening, like all other professions, has among its members a certain number of women who would never make successful heads of any undertaking. This is a fact that must be accepted by parents and candidates alike, and the pay of a woman as single-handed or under-gardener is not brilliant—between £20 and £30 a year, all found, perhaps. The question is whether a woman, incapable of rising to the position of head gardener, would earn more at any other equally pleasant work. Every case must be judged on its own merits.

A great many educated girls have a small income of their own—say £30 to £50 a year. A woman cannot live on such an income without supplementing it. For such I would say that a free, open-air life in the country as under-gardener or gardener in charge of a small garden, with no financial anxiety, would be pleasanter, and certainly much more healthy, than many of the occupations taken up to supplement small incomes in towns; but for a really capable woman who wishes to live in the country I cannot imagine a more delightful profession than that of head gardener, and it is a well-paid one. It is true that for six months of the year the hours are long, but a head gardener's work is not heavy, and in winter the hours are decidedly short. She must, however, thoroughly know her work and be able to manage those under her. Men are as willing to work for a woman who is successful as for a man, provided she is just and reasonable and does her share. It is quite a delusion that they resent women gardeners. They resent the incompetent, whether man or woman.

WOMAN'S LIMITATIONS.

One thing, however, must be borne in mind, and that is that the woman beginner in the gardening world has not the same value, except in a nursery where there is a great quantity of glass, as has the lad. She is not as strong muscularly; probably she will not be able to do full hours at first, and she cannot very well be set to clean out the stokeholes, though no work, however dirty, is really derogatory, and every gardener must learn to stoke sooner or later. A woman should not constantly lift heavy weights, even if she can do so, and though digging is remarkably health-giving, in moderation, too much of it is undesirable, nor is it profitable, because a woman cannot get through as much heavy labour as can a man. She must, however, learn how best to set about such work and have some practice in it, so that she may direct all operations. She must, in fact, be taught, and that at once creates a difficulty for women who have no means. I think, however, that by co-operation with nurseries something might be done at this time especially to help women with small means and real ability to take up this very desirable occupation.

Owing to the war, no doubt, we have had numerous applications from nurseries for women able to work in houses where strawberries are being forced, also taking chrysanthemum cuttings, thinning grapes, sowing seeds, pricking out, etc., etc.—all light and very suitable work, and work that any girl could learn very quickly. The pay offered is what an educated girl could just manage to keep herself on, and she would gain very valuable experience, and get up her speed. I do strongly recommend girls who want eventually to take up gardening to go now at once into nurseries offering such opportunities. The nurseries would employ them to their mutual advantage till the autumn, when they should take two terms of serious study in theory as well as in general gardening, returning to the nursery for further experience and practice throughout the busy season during the following spring and summer, following it up with a further two terms' study during out supplementing it. For such I would say that a free, open-air life in the country as under-gardener or gardener in charge of a small garden, with no financial anxiety, would be pleasanter, and certainly much more healthy, than many of the occupations taken up to supplement small incomes in towns; but for a really capable woman who wishes to live in the country I cannot imagine a more delightful profession than that of head gardener, and it is a well-paid one. It is true that for six months of the year the hours are long, but a head gardener's work is not heavy, and in winter the hours are decidedly short. She must, however, thoroughly know her work and be able to manage those under her. Men are as willing to work for a woman who is successful as for a man, provided she is just and reasonable and does her share. It is quite a delusion that they resent women gardeners. They resent the incompetent, whether man or woman.

WOMAN'S LIMITATIONS.

One thing, however, must be borne in mind, and that is that the woman beginner in the gardening world has not the same value, except in a nursery where there is a great quantity of glass, as has the lad. She is not as strong muscularly; probably she will not be able to do full hours at first, and she cannot very well be set to clean out the stokeholes, though no work, however dirty, is really derogatory, and every gardener must learn to stoke sooner or later. A woman should not constantly lift heavy weights, even if she can do so, and though digging is remarkably health-giving, in moderation, too much of it is undesirable, nor is it profitable, because a woman cannot get through as much heavy labour a man a man. She must, however, learn how best to set about such work and have some practice in it, so that she may direct all operations. She must, in fact, be taught, and that at once creates a difficulty for women who have no means. I think, however, that by co-operation with nurseries something might be done at this time especially to help women with small means and real ability to take up this very desirable occupation.

Owing to the war, no doubt, we have had numerous applications from nurseries for women able to work in houses where strawberries are being forced, also taking chrysanthemum cuttings, thinning grapes, sowing seeds, pricking out, etc., etc.—all light and very suitable work, and work that any girl could learn very quickly. The pay offered is what an educated girl could just manage to keep herself on, and she would gain very valuable experience, and get up her speed. I do strongly recommend girls who want eventually to take up gardening to go now at once into nurseries offering such opportunities. The nurseries would employ them to their mutual advantage till the autumn, when they should take two terms of serious study in theory as well as in general gardening, returning to the nursery for further experience and practice throughout the busy season during the following spring and summer, following this up with a further two terms' study during the next winter. After this a girl should be in a position to earn a fair salary. In this way she would have had ten months' work in nurseries, two months' holidays, and twelve months in a college during her two years of training.

It is not at all certain that nurseries would always be willing to offer a living wage to women for this class of work, but they certainly are willing to do so at present, and they very likely might take old hands back during the busy season next year. There is, in fact, at this moment a very exceptional opportunity for women of small means to get trained, but educated women must not think that nursery training alone will enable them to get posts as head gardeners. A woman, as I said, has not the same physical strength to offer as a man, so she must have something else. That something else is "knowledge," and this knowledge must be gained from experienced teachers, both in theory and practice. A head gardener must have done a far greater variety of work than can be learned in nurseries, unless many years were to be given up to training in many nurseries. In properly organised colleges, in addition to market-house work, a very considerable variety of plants are grown for teaching purposes only, and unless a woman went from nursery to nursery specialising, she would not acquire sufficient experience to be able to undertake the charge of a garden. That is where the college comes in. An educated girl can there learn in two or three years what an uneducated man or woman would take 10 or 15 years to learn.

Where there is capital farming can be as advantageously undertaken as gardening, but as a rule employers prefer engaging girls who have been brought up on a farm from childhood to run their dairies and milking herds. There are, of course, a few exceptions. Cheese-making, specially perhaps soft cheese, is a profitable employment, but such work cannot be undertaken without capital, or at least a small settled income.

The Daily Telegraph 19-7-15 663c. 663c/32 girls that followed. Then came a pageant of the Allies, a girl in tattered dress with the torn flag of Belgium unconquerable and unbowed beneath the bludgeonings of Fate. Each country had a standard-bearer of her own race. There were women of France in the red cap of Liberty, and peasant costumes of Serbia and Montenegro, and Japan and Russia and Italy all had their party, with, last of all Britain and the Britains beyond the seas declaring their unity of purpose.

But the most striking pageantry was the long column of the procession itself, when, each rank raising aloft flags of red and white and blue, the bands blared out, and it began its march. An endless wave of colour it seemed, stretching far away into the dim distance of the mist of rain, red and white and blue, tossing and falling on the wind, and blue and white and red again, till the colours mingled and blended into a pattern, an infinite flag. From a balcony built out overlooking the Embankment the Minister of Munitions watched the ranks march past him, raising aloft their flags and cheering as they came. He must have thought it a strange and stirring picture. No one who saw it could doubt its inspiration of energy and zeal.

MARCH THROUGH WEST-END.

TRIUMPH OF ORGANISATION.

Whoever among the capable organisers of the great march through the West-end drew up the time-table is entitled to congratulations. The proud bearer of the Union Jack at the head of the procession, who disdained, rain as it might, to protect her white costume with outer coat or macintosh, stepped off promptly at half-past three. Thereafter, barring momentary halts for traffic purposes, the tens of thousands who followed were led at a steady pace along the appointed course until the Embankment had been regained. Two hours were to be occupied by the march, and in two hours almost to a minute it was ended. The whole proceedings were a perfect triumph of organisation, and demonstrated once more in a particularly striking manner the capacity of women to plan big undertakings on successful lines.

The procession, formed in the rain, went steadily forward in the rain until half the journey had been accomplished. Bridge-street, Whitehall, Pall-mall, St. James's-street, and Piccadilly were traversed to the accompaniment of a gusty downpour, but never an umbrella was seen in the ranks of the marchers. Had the weather been ten times worse they would have braved it apparently with the utmost cheerfulness and composure.

The weather seemed to become more gusty than ever when the procession wheeled into Park-lane. Scores of banners swayed like trees in a gale as the wind came sweeping along, and in some cases their bearers had to struggle resolutely with aching arms to save them from dire shipwreck. Here and there male sympathisers felt compelled to come to the rescue, or the banners in all probability would have been down in the mire. But, whilst grateful, no doubt, for a little temporary assistance, the women, it was plain to see, were quite prepared to battle alone against the elements. Happily, before Oxford-street was reached the rain ceased, and during the progress of the procession along that great shopping thoroughfare the outlook gradually became brighter.

Oxford-street, Regent-street, and Piccadilly-circus provided really imposing throngs of spectators. There was, however, less cheering than might have been expected, although, naturally, the pageant of the Allies frequently evoked warm demonstrations of approval. The barefooted representative of Belgium, carrying the tattered flag of that unfortunate country, was the recipient of countless respectful salutations, and the young lady who impersonated Britannia shared with her the honour of attracting chief attraction: There were bands by the dozen, and amongst them all none enjoyed so much popularity as one composed of bluejackets, whose music quite appropriately was confined to popular nautical airs. At many points the sailors were cheered enthusiastically as they stepped along briskly at the head of their section. Their reception was a fine tribute to the popularity of the Navy.

ATTRACTIVE SPECTACLE.

Spectators who watched the entire procession go by found that their attention had been occupied for a full half-hour. Let it be said at once that the time was spent pleasantly enough, for as a moving picture the procession was intensely interesting and full of colour. Both before and after it had passed an opportunity was afforded to women who were present as onlookers to register their names as willing to undertake munition work. Tables had been set up for the purpose at frequent intervals along the route, and in the course of the WOMEN'S HELP IN MUNITION FACTORIES.

MINISTER'S WELCOME.

PROBLEMS OF PAYMENT.

Leaving the procession when it came into the neighbourhood of Whitehall a deputation of ladies, headed by Mrs. Pankhurst, interviewed Mr. Lloyd George in his private room at the Ministry of Munitions.

Mrs. Pankhurst, in introducing the deputation, prefaced her remarks by saying that the women heartily welcomed the establishment of a National Register. Women had joined in the procession which had just taken place because they wished to demonstrate their desire to serve in any and every capacity in which they might be of use. The object of both men and women was to strengthen the national resources and weaken the enemy as much as possible in order to bring the war to a speedy and successful conclusion. Already a large number of women were taking part in the manufacture of munitions, but they wished to see that number very largely increased.

"We cannot as Englishwomen," Mrs. Pankhurst continued, "feel happy until we have at least as many women taking an effective part in some form of service as are doing so in Germany and amongst our Allies. What we feel very strongly is that the women who are working at present are in the main unskilled. It is essential, if we are to do what we want to do—to release as many men as possible for the fighting line—that a system should be set up by which women can be trained not only as unskilled workers, but also to do skilled work. We feel that it is a crime for any man of fighting age, skilled or unskilled, to be doing work that can be done by women if they were properly trained.

"When we see the great waste of valuable human lives in this war we feel that every intelligent woman will be needed, if the war is to be prolonged, to maintain our greatness as an Empire. Arrangements should consequently be made to train women without loss of time. The women are ready, and I hope you will find means to take advantage of that wonderful enthusiasm which they have displayed in small measure to-day.

STANDARD OF WAGES.

"Another important point is that if women are trained and enter the industries of the country in large numbers the standard of wages ought not to be reduced. We, therefore, urge that wherever women are engaged to do work previously done by men, and where they do it equally well, they should be paid exactly the same rate of wages whether for piecework or timework. We want to make no bargain for serving our country. We are willing to make every sacrifice to win this war, because we believe that all the women value and cherish is at stake. We love our country and desire to serve her, and on behalf of the thousands of women outside I offer you their services."

Mrs. Mansel, speaking on behalf of the women of "so-called leisure," said that most of them had relatives at the front, and they desired to reinforce them. If munitions were short the men at the front were exposed to greater danger than should be. The energies of women must not be wasted. Let England be really a nation at war. Let every man take his place in the fighting line if he could, and let every woman reinforce him at home, in the factory, in the field, or wherever she could be used.

NEED FOR TRAINING.

Lady Parsons urged that there should be some practical training of women in engineering shops. If the employers could see their way to take a few capable and clever girls into their works, possibly on the premium system, in a few months they would have them trained to do much valuable service. Simple unskilled work was being done now by thousands of women, but it was necessary to train them for something better. Authority was also required in order that they might take suitable premises.

Mr. Lloyd George: What for?

Lady Parsons: Premises as residential workshops. The women must live near their work. We are ready to take the matter in hand if we have authority.

Mrs. Grant and Mrs. Baker also urged that further opportunities should be provided for women to work on the making of munitions.

Miss Annie Kenney, speaking on behalf of working women, said there were thousands all over the country willing to give their services. She hoped, however there would be no obstacles in the shape of old-fashioned trade unions and employers. In war prejudiced ideas should be put aside.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE "WOMEN CAN HELP."

Mr. Lloyd George, in reply, said: Permit me to say to a still higher pitch than we have ever witnessed before. But I should like to say one or two words not for the purpose of damping that ardour, but by way of enjoining a little patience.

You cannot organise, mobilise, and bring into operation a new industrial army in a day. It is not merely that there are prejudices to get rid of, but there are other things to consider. First of all in this country you have to get the proper machinery for the turning out of your shell and your material. Lady Parsons suggested that we might start at once. The first thing that we have got to do is to equip ourselves with an adequate supply of lathes, machinery, and tools for the purpose of turning out munitions.

We had a very important gathering in this room a couple of days ago when he had all the great machine tool makers of this kingdom present, and to that meeting we intimated that we proposed to assume Government control of all the machine tool-making shops in this country. They accepted it readily, and for the next few months all the energies of these great shops will be devoted to the turning out of the necessary lathes and machinery for enabling us to increase the output of war material. All that takes time. Even the setting up of those establishments Lady Parsons referred to would take time. If it is done too hurriedly it would not be done well. But I agree that there is something that can be done in the meantime.

WHOLE TIME SERVICE.

There are two things that can be done while we are preparing to utilise the services of the women who are ready to help us. The first thing is that an organisation might be set up, a really national organisation, for the purpose of registering the names of all the women who are prepared to devote the whole of their time to any task for which women are fitted in the turning out of war material.

We are getting offers of service from people who say, "I have got a day or two to spare, and I should like to take some job on." That is simply no use to us. Whoever comes forward to serve must be prepared to give the whole of their time. I had experience of that in this office, and I must say whenever that was pointed out they made arrangements at once to give the whole of their time. I have never seen one man who was unwilling to do so. The first thing is we must get a complete register of women who are prepared to give the whole of their time to the kind of work for which they are particularly adapted in the turning out of war material.

The second thing—it has already been referred to by Lady Parsons and Mrs. Pankhurst—is that there must be a certain amount of training in order to instruct any of the women who can assist—to utilise a sufficient number of women to be able to direct and instruct the others and help in the organisation of women labour in these new shops.

These two branches of activity can proceed now—first of all the national organisation of a sufficient number of women upon whom we can draw when we are ready to fill these new shops; secondly, the taking of means immediately for instructing and training a considerable number of women in the class of work which I have indicated. That can be done immediately. These are the two points I want to call attention more especially to.

A MINIMUM WAGE.

With regard to wages, I should only like to say this. As far as piece work is concerned, we have agreed that a woman shall be paid exactly the same price as a man for any piece of work she turns out. That is perfectly fair. It would not be fair to give, say, half-a-crown to a man doing that, and 1s 6d to a woman. So we have agreed to pay exactly the same rate of wages for piece work to women as to men. Mrs. Pankhurst asked a little more than that. She wanted the same rate of wages even for time work.

Mrs. Pankhurst: I asked that because there are very grave complaints that women now working for private employers are being sweated. I have had several cases brought before me. I know you do not wish that to happen.

Mr Lloyd George: Quite right. All these shops are now going to be under Government control. (Hear, hear.) It is quite impossible for us to get along, I think, without assuming practical control of all the great establishments for turning out munitions of war; and the Government will see that there is no sweated labour. For some time women will be unskilled and untrained, and they cannot quite turn out as much work as the men who have been at it for a long time. Therefore we cannot give the same time-rate, but the piece-rate we can give. But Mrs. Pankhurst is perfectly right in insisting that whatever the rate of wages should be it should be a fair rate, and that there should be a fixed minimum which will guarantee that we shall not utilise the services of women merely to get cheap labour. That is what you want. (Hear, hear.)

VERY GRAVE EMERGENCY

Women are prepared to tender their services to the nation to assist it in a very grave and serious emergency. They are willing to do their best. Mrs. Mansel said they have got those of whom they are fond fighting in the trenches and endangering their lives, and women are unhappy that they are not doing something to help. They are anxious to help. They can help, and help enormously. I believe that they can help us through to victory. (Hear, hear.) Without them victory will tarry, and the victory that comes means a victory whose footprints are appropriately was confined to popular nautical airs. At many points the sailors were cheered enthusiastically as they stepped along briskly at the head of their section. Their reception was a fine tribute to the popularity of the Navy.

ATTRACTIVE SPECTACLE.

Spectators who watched the entire procession go by found that their attention had been occupied for a full half-hour. Let it be said at once that the time was spent pleasantly enough, for as a moving picture the procession was intensely interesting and full of colour. Both before and after it had passed an opportunity was afforded to women who were present as onlookers to register their names as willing to undertake munition work. Tables had been set up for the purpose at frequent intervals along the route, and in the course of the afternoon probably thousands of signatures were obtained.

The last stage of the journey was made viâ Haymarket, Cockspur-street, and Northumberland-avenue. So far as the weather was concerned it was the best stage. The dark clouds had disappeared, the sun had come out, and there was the promise of a fine evening to follow. Up to the very end there were no stragglers, and nobody fell out of the ranks. There were plenty of elderly women among the marching thousands, but they kept pace with their younger sisters, and endured patiently any fatigue they may have felt until the whole route had been traversed. When the procession had returned to the Embankment, and sections had dispersed, the women waited in enormous numbers to hear the brief speech of Mr. Lloyd George from the garden wall of the Ministry of Munitions. They gave the right gentleman a magnificent reception.

WHITEHALL STREET.

suitable premises.

Mr. Lloyd George: What for?

Lady Parsons: Premises as residential workshops. The women must live near their work. We are ready to take the matter in hand if we have authority.

Mrs. Grant and Mrs. Baker also urged that further opportunities should be provided for women to work on the making of munitions.

Miss Annie Kenney, speaking on behalf of working women, said there were thousands all over the country willing to give their services. She hoped, however there would be no obstacles in the shape of old-fashioned trade unions and employers. In war preconceived ideas should be put aside.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE.

"WOMEN CAN HELP."

Mr. Lloyd George, in reply, said: Permit me to congratulate you on your very fine procession, which I had the pleasure, along with my colleague, Mr. Winston Churchill, of witnessing this afternoon. If any additional proof were required of the organising capacity of women, of which I have been a victim in the past—(laughter)—I should say it was amply demonstrated by that procession to-day. It was uncommonly well done. It has a special advantage, I think, which lies very largely in the fact that it will help to educate public opinion on this subject. I attach enormous importance to it.

I do not think it would be possible effectively to organise the resources of the nation for the tremendous war we are beginning thoroughly to realise we have embarked upon until you mobilise the women of this country as well as the men. (Hear, hear.) That has been recognised in the measure which was piloted through the House of Commons with great skill by my colleague, Mr. Walter Long. The National Register is a complete statutory recognition of that point. Our Allies and our foes on the Continent of Europe have already recognised that it is not merely a question of utilising the service of women for munitions only. It is, as Mrs. Pankhurst pointed out, utilising the energies of women for the purpose of discharging all the duties and the functions of commercial and industrial life which they are capable of doing as well as men.

RESERVE OF LABOUR.

We know what women can do in the matter of helping us in turning out munitions of war. I had letters sent me from the various works of the number of women already engaged there. I think at the present moment we have at the outside something like 50,000 women working at the various factories engaged in turning out munitions of war. That, I believe, is something between one-fifth and one-tenth of the numbers employed in France. I have not got the actual numbers; I hope to get them from M. Thomas in the course of the next few days. I was told by someone who knew pretty well what was being done in Germany in the way of organising that they have at least 500,000 women engaged in turning out munitions of war in that country.

The figures I have got here, and the kind of work women are doing and doing so well, indicate what a reserve we have got in women's labour for the purpose of helping the nation through this very grave crisis. I agree with Lady Parsons that they ought not to be confined merely to the work known as unskilled. There is very fine work which can be done by women, and which is being done by women in this country as well as on the Continent of Europe—in the making of fuses, for instance, about the finest work in the making of shells. The shell body is pretty rough work. That is the sort of work you turn the men on to. The finest work—the fuses—is being done in France by women. It has been done also in this country by women, but, as a matter of fact, all that work can be done by women, and men can be turned on to heavier work which women are not really fitted for.

GET RID OF PREJUDICE.

That is really what we have in our minds. But, as Miss Kenney pointed out, the first thing you have got to do is to get rid of prejudice. That is a very serious obstacle in our way. It is not merely the prejudice of the old trade unions, but the conservatism—I am not speaking politically—of the business man. He has been accustomed to see men turn out this kind of work, and you cannot persuade him that women can do it just as delicate work of this kind can do it better than men. You have to persuade him of that fundamental fact to begin with, and then you have to get rid of the prejudice—not necessarily the prejudice, but the apprehension—of the working man, who is afraid that when the war is over, once you train women to do work of this kind they will do it so well that there will be no further need for the services of men.

Mrs. Pankhurst: Very healthy competition.

Mr. Lloyd George: The real answer to that is that this is war work, and when the war is over there will be no need for it, and therefore it will come to an end. It is not a question of competition; it is a question of getting men and women to work together for the purpose of helping their country through the worst crisis it has ever experienced.

I have been by all the speakers enjoined not to lose any time in putting this project into operation. It is perfectly true that enthusiasm has been stirred up. There is a great anxiety displayed by women to take part in helping their country, and the demonstration to-day will undoubtedly fan that enthusiasm give the same time rate, but the piece-rate we can give. But Mrs. Pankhurst is perfectly right in insisting that whatever the rate of wages should be it should be a fair rate, and that there should be a fixed minimum which will guarantee that we shall not utilise the services of women merely to get cheap labour. That is what you want. (Hear, hear.)

VERY GRAVE EMERGENCY.

Women are prepared to tender their services to the nation to assist it in a very grave and serious emergency. They are willing to do their best. Mrs. Mansel said they have got those of whom they are fond fighting in the trenches and endangering their lives, and women are unhappy that they are not doing something to help. They are anxious to help. They can help, and help enormously. I believe that they can help us through to victory. (Hear, hear.) Without them victory will tarry, and the victory that tarries means a victory whose footprints are footprints of blood.

We want to shorten the war, for it means life; and by saving life we shall be curtailing and diminishing the burden of sorrow which war brings. That is the great function of women in life, and I believe they are discharging that by coming forward at the present moment and saying to the brave men who are fighting for us in the trenches, "If your lives are in peril because you have not enough war material we will help." On behalf of the nation I am entitled to thank you for tendering your service.

Mrs. Pankhurst, on behalf of the deputation, thanked Mr. Lloyd George for having received them and for his sympathetic reply, and invited him to address the large crowd that had assembled on Victoria Embankment. The right hon. gentleman at once consented, and several of the members of the deputation accompanied him to the platform, specially constructed, overlooking the Embankment.

INDOMITABLE RUSSIA.

Mr. Lloyd George received an enthusiastic welcome from the great crowd, which stretched so far that it was impossible for many to hear. He said: We have witnessed a very fine procession of women who are anxious to help their country in the hour of emergency. They, I believe, represent the feelings of millions of women in this country. (Cheers.) There are thousands and hundreds of thousands of them who have got sons and brothers and husbands and fathers, and those whom they love, at the front, and they want to do their best at home to help these men facing deadly peril. Our country is in peril, and we all want to help it—(cheers)—and I believe that men and women alike are prepared to do their best to help the old country through to victory. (Cheers.) In France hundreds of thousands of women are working in the factories and workshops in order to equip the soldiers at the front with abundant material to enable them to face the enemy on equal terms. We propose to utilise the services of everybody who is prepared to assist us, and then victory will come to our lot.

CONFIDENCE IN THE FUTURE.

I am not afraid of the result. (Cheers.) There are dark clouds rolling up in the East, but I look at them with confidence. The indomitable spirit of Russia will ride this storm as it has faced many another hurricane that swept over her devoted plains. The clouds will be scattered, they will be dispersed, and Russia will emerge once more formidable, deadly, and help the great democratic countries of the West to achieve a great victory for freedom in Europe. (Cheers.)

A woman at this point broke in with the remark, "We have not got the vote yet."

Mr. Lloyd George: We will get her into a shell factory first. (Cheers and laughter.) I have only got to thank you for coming here in order to show your readiness to do all in your power. London is organising. It is a question of organisation. It is a question for us all. Here we are just panting twelve months behind to catch a foe who had been preparing for years. But we shall do it. I have no hesitation at all in feeling confident that the great nation which overthrew many a despotism in Europe before with its own right hand will do so yet. (Cheers.)

The National Anthem having been played, cheers were given for Mr. Lloyd George.

Mrs. Pankhurst, who said the women meant to work to save the lives of the men in the trenches, called for three cheers for the Army and Navy. These were heartily given, and Mrs. Pankhurst also received a cordial cheer.

Daily Telegraph

19-7-15

A CONTRAST IN PATRIOTISM.

No one who glances at the news to-day can fail to be impressed by a strong sense of contrast. On the one hand, we have the cheering spectacle of the March of the Women, loyally offering themselves to the service of the State; on the other we have the deplorable spectacle of the strike of the coal miners in South Wales, withholding the labour of their hands in the hour of their country's most urgent need. The contrast is vivid. The one is full of encouragement; the other arouses a feeling of angry bewilderment, which does but intensify the need of strong, cool handling on the part of the Government. Let us deal first with what is flattering and encouraging to our hopes. To what British women have done in this war we have in these columns repeatedly paid the tribute of our warmest admiration. Their attitude has been splendid. Women always dread the very name of war, because of the havoc it makes in the ranks of those dear to them; but it is never the women of a country who are the advocates of shameful and dishonourable peace, and ours have braced themselves to endure this struggle with a spirit never before surpassed. Their great demonstration, however, in London on Saturday was something more. It was a spontaneous manifestation of their desire to take a fuller part in the task of beating the enemy, and it was a public endorsement of their inclusion by Parliament in the new Natio[illegible] Register. Women are eager to he[illegible], not alone in nursing the wounded a[illegible] supplying comforts for the troops, bu[illegible] doing men's work and assisting to pile up stores of munitions. Their offer has been accepted with enthusiasm. "Without women," said Mr. LLOYD GEORGE in his excellent speech, "victory will tarry, and a victory that tarries means a victory whose footprints are footprints of blood." Nor is it merely a question of munitions. It goes far deeper than that. It is a question of the employment of women throughout almost all the varied ranks of commercial and industrial life, wherever they are fitted and qualified for the work, and it is a question also of employing them on the same terms as men, and on the same basis of full-time employment.

No sweating will be allowed, for fixed minimum rates will prevent the employment of women by such employers as are anxious mainly to secure cheap labour, and the fullest use will be made of all who are ready to offer their undivided energies. Mr. LLOYD GEORGE emphasised the importance of that proviso. It is no use women offering their spare hours; they must be prepared to give their whole time. That, of course, is more than the vast majority [illegible] is sure to be grievous disappointment among those whose services cannot be utilised on that account. But that is the commonsense of the matter, and, after all, the number of women who are free to help the State in this way is enormous, and their willing and enthusiastic labour will be of the utmost value. They will bring to their labour eagerness, patience, patriotism, and, what is of the utmost value in these days, a readiness to learn, combined with strong natural aptitude. What the consequential results are likely to be we will not stay to inquire. All we are concerned with at present is that the help of women is necessary to the State here and now. It is war work, and it must be done, and no one who knows their capacity will doubt its being done well. So much for the bright side of the contrast. When we turn to the dark side, the first thought that occurs is that the President of the Board of Trade needs to have associated with him at this hour other and more influential members of the Cabinet. Let us recall what took place during the last great miners' strike. Lord BUXTON, then Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, was President of the Board of Trade. But he did not conduct the negotiations alone on behalf of the Government. At a very early stage in the proceedings, Mr. LLOYD GEORGE and the Prime Minister were brought in, and the President of the Board of Trade took a subordinate place. We have a great respect for Mr. RUNCIMAN's abilities, but it is time that others lent a hand.

The case is far too serious to allow mere punctilio to stand in the way. The South Wales pits are idle. Other works are closing down. Already it is certain that a week's output of coal will be lost to the country. The enemy is exultant, as well he may be, for this South Wales stoppage is the most dangerous event that has happened in the United Kingdom since the war began. The guilt—no weaker word suffices—attaching to the miners is obvious. No condemnation can be too strong. It is an act of treason to the State, and to their brothers in the trenches. They are sinning against the advice and the entreaties of their own leaders, and, so we firmly believe, against their own best instincts. But scolding and threats will not get the men down into the pits again, and everyone knows that the blame does not rest upon their shoulders alone. Their minds have been steadily poisoned for months and years past. The enemy's agents have been busy in the South Wales valleys; his dupes still raise their voices in the House of Commons and publish their poisonous insinuations broadcast week by week. And who will dare to say of the South Wales coalowners that they are wholly blameless? They are resisting as excessive their men's demand for increased wages, but what consideration have they themselves shown to the consumer in their continuous increase of prices? Moreover, they have not met their men as they ought in this matter, but have [illegible] peace, and ours have braced themselves to endure this struggle with a spirit never before surpassed. Their great demonstration, however, in London on Saturday was something more. It was a spontaneous manifestation of their desire to take a fuller part in the task of beating the enemy, and it was a public endorsement of their inclusion by Parliament in the new Natio[illegible]l Register. Women are eager to he[illegible], not alone in nursing the wounded a[illegible] supplying comforts for the troops, bu[illegible]a doing men's work and assisting to pile up stores of munitions. Their offer has been accepted with enthusiasm. "Without women," said Mr. LLOYD GEORGE in his excellent speech, " victory will tarry, and a victory that tarries means a victory whose footprints are footprints of blood." Nor is it merely a question of munitions. It goes far deeper than that. It is a question of the employment of women throughout almost all the varied ranks of commercial and industrial life, wherever they are fitted and qualified for the work, and it is a question also of employing them on the same terms as men, and on the same basis of full-time employment.

No sweating will be allowed, for fixed minimum rates will prevent the employment of women by such employers as are anxious mainly to secure cheap labour, and the fullest use will be made of all who are ready to offer their undivided energies. Mr. LLOYD GEORGE emphasised the importance of that proviso. It is no use women offering their spare hours; they must be prepared to give their whole time. That, of course, is more than the vast majority of women can [illegible] is sure to what took place during the last great miners' strike. Lord BUXTON, then Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, was President of the Board of Trade. But he did not conduct the negotiations alone on behalf of the Government. At a very early stage in the proceedings, Mr. LLOYD GEORGE and the Prime Minister were brought in, and the President of the Board of Trade took a subordinate place. We have a great respect for Mr. RUNCIMAN's abilities, but it is time that others lent a hand.

The case is far too serious to allow mere punctilio to stand in the way. The South Wales pits are idle. Other works are closing down. Already it is certain that a week's output of coal will be lost to the country. The enemy is exultant, as well he may be, for this South Wales stoppage is the most dangerous event that has happened in the United Kingdom since the war began. The guilt—no weaker word suffices—attaching to the miners is obvious. No condemnation can be too strong. It is an act of treason to the State, and to their brothers in the trenches. They are sinning against the advice and the entreaties of their own leaders, and, so we firmly believe, against their own best instincts. But scolding and threats will not get the men down into the pits again, and everyone knows that the blame does not rest upon their shoulders alone. Their minds have been steadily poisoned for months and years past. The enemy's agents have been busy in the South Wales valleys; his dupes still raise their voices in the House of Commons and publish their poisonous insinuations broadcast week by week. And who will dare to say of the South Wales coal-owners that they are wholly blameless? They are resisting as excessive their men's demand for increased wages, but what consideration have they themselves shown to the consumer in their continuous increase of prices? Moreover, they have not met their men as they ought in this quarrel, but have let it drift on to the present deadlock and thrown upon the Government the onus of finding a way out. But we say of them, as of the men, that it is not a question of apportioning blame, but of an immediate resumption of the production of coal. The Government must take hold. If any mistake has been made, it must be rectified, even if the only practicable solution should prove to be some measure of State control over the coal mines in this troubled area. We do not pretend to see a clear way out of the darkness. But we may be sure that it is no good threatening 200,000 Welsh miners with pains and penalties. If there are any public men who have influence in South Wales their plain duty is to exercise it now on the side of sanity and patriotism. The Government, admittedly, must vindicate their authority. If they fail, we are faced with industrial chaos, and not in South Wales alone. But let them do so with impartial justice, and see that their hold is firm.

The Morning Advertiser
19-7-15.

663

663

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

The remarkable demonstration of which that part of London most closely associated with the official life of the nation was the scene on Saturday adds to the many proofs which women have given since the outbreak of the war of their readiness to do practical work for the Empire. As a spectacle the procession was deprived by the rain of some of its picturesqueness. But what it lost from this cause in artistic effect it gained in the evidence of sincerity and resolution which was afforded by thousands of women assembling in wet and boisterous weather and marching through the muddy streets to show their readiness to be useful. Those who cling to the notion that women should confine their activities to what GOLDSMITH called "the narrow limits of domestic assiduity" have no ground for cheap sarcasms at the expense of the women who thus made demonstration. Feminine vanity could have had no part in collecting the immense assembly. The processionists could have entertained no hope of "looking nice" in such inclement weather. Grace and beauty make but bedraggled and dishevelled figures after prolonged exposure to wind and rain, and when London mud is added to these adverse elements, those who are exposed to them become objects of pity rather than admiration. The muster of processionists even under favourable circumstances would have been impressive; in the face of the unfavourable conditions which prevailed the success of the demonstration demands unstinted acknowledgment.

They had their reward in the appreciative speech delivered by Mr. LLOYD GEORGE in reply to their request that the Minister of Munitions would give them useful work to do. He welcomes their offer of service. The Government is endeavouring to organise the nation, and it is recognised that if national organisation is to be effective women must occupy a large and useful place in the scheme. But all the aid they offer cannot at once be made available in Government workshops. Factories and workshops have first to be equipped, and if this involves some delay, it must not be impatiently assumed that women are merely being put off by promises. The fact mentioned by Mr. LLOYD GEORGE that some 50,000 women are already working in munitions factories removes all doubt as to the capacity of women to give valuable assistance in such workshops, and shows that their suitability for the employment is appreciated. But in the meantime there are other occupations besides those offered by Government work in which women might do splendid service for their country. Fighting is a man's job, though the fact does not seem to be universally recognised among men of military age. Women have done a good deal not only in the way of reminding young men of the call of the Army, but in liberating them for military service by undertaking temporarily positions filled by men in normal times. Much, however, remains to be done in that way. There are army corps of men still doing work which women would do, if not equally well, at all events quite well enough in such a time of emergency as the war has created. Men who ought to be marching against the enemies of their country are content to act as shopwalkers. Others who ought to be in the trenches are behind the counter handling ribbons instead of rifles, or sugar instead of shrapnel. Who can pretend that women would not do this work as well as men? In warehouses men are employed as packers, and a great deal of the work they do might be done by women.

Wholesale drapery houses employ men also; and here is work which seems peculiarly suitable for ladies, who by intuition can divine the tastes and requirements of their sex with a skill that men can seldom acquire either by experience or study of their trade. For public companies, too, there is still much work done by men which might be entrusted to women. For example, industrial insurance companies employ men as collectors, though women would probably import into the work of gathering in the weekly premiums by house to house visitation an amount of tactful interest in the insurers and sympathy with them in their troubles, which would result in an increase of business. Prejudice, as Mr. LLOYD GEORGE said to the women's deputation, stands in the way of the extension of women's sphere of work during the war. Public opinion must break down that obstacle. Here at hand is work to which the women who organised Saturday's

The Picture World
July 19-1915.

The Right to Serve.

The great procession of women in London on Saturday was a dramatic expression of their desire to be allowed to devote their time and talents to the service of the nation.

Thousands of women have offered their services to the nation, and the fact that only a few have been employed has created an impression that those in authority are neglecting a golden opportunity. That is only a superficial view of a complex problem.

The difficulties hinted at by the Minister of Munitions are chiefly the inadequate supply of tools and machinery, and the necessity of further organisation so that a sufficient number of women may be trained to direct and instruct others.

The Government are taking control of all machine-tool factories in the country, and the increase in the output of these establishments will improve the opportunities for the employment of women.

Half-a-million women are making munitions in Germany, and one object of Saturday's demonstration in London was to show the nation generally, as well as our Allies and the enemy, that British women are devoted to their country and are determined to serve it.

They feel that little has been done to use their ready enthusiasm.

The quality of their loyalty to the nation was shown in the democratic character of the great procession through London—"an Indian princess, peeresses, wives of men high in the State, women distinguished in art and letters walked shoulder to shoulder with teachers, typists, shopgirls, factory lasses and British matrons whose sons are already in the fighting line."

These women of Great Britain have given Mr. Lloyd George a fine opportunity to prove his great ability. If he can harness them to the car of State, if he can show them the way, he need fear no more complaints of shortage of labour.

The modern woman is strong, self-reliant, and trustworthy. She is ready and willing to serve the nation, only wanting the opportunity.

She demands "the right to serve" in any and every capacity in which she may be of use.

The Minister of Munitions showed himself to be entirely sympathetic with the views placed before him by the deputation of women, and he expressed his belief that women can help the nation to victory in this war.

He agreed with the suggestion that nothing should be done to depress the conditions of male labour, and that wherever women did the same work as men they should be paid the same rate of wages. That is to be the especial care of the Government which will control all munition-making establishments and will see that there is no sweated labour. This will be guaranteed by a fixed minimum wage.

When the war is over the entry of women into spheres of activity hitherto untried will be one of our greatest problems. But for the present we can only devote our energies to the supreme necessity—the victory of the Allied armies.

If women can help to that end under the conditions indicated for the safeguarding of the wage interests of male workers, we may leave the future to solve its own problems.

They had their reward in the appreciative speech delivered by Mr. LLOYD GEORGE in reply to their request that the Minister of Munitions would give them useful work to do. He welcomes their offer of service. The Government is endeavouring to organise the nation, and it is recognised that if national organisation is to be effective women must occupy a large and useful place in the scheme. But all the aid they offer cannot at once be made available in Government workshops. Factories and workshops have first to be equipped, and if this involves some delay, it must not be impatiently assumed that women are merely being put off by promises. The fact mentioned by Mr. LLOYD GEORGE that some 50,000 women are already working in munitions factories removes all doubt as to the capacity of women to give valuable assistance in such workshops, and shows that their suitability for the employment is appreciated. But in the meantime there are other occupations besides those offered by Government work in which women might do splendid service for their country. Fighting is a man's job, though the fact does not seem to be universally recognised among men of military age. Women have done a good deal not only in the way of reminding young men of the call of the Army, but in liberating them for military service by undertaking temporarily positions filled by men in normal times. Much, however, remains to be done in that way. There are army corps of men still doing work which women would do, if not equally well, at all events quite well enough in such a time of emergency as the war has created. Men who ought to be marching against the enemies of their country are content to act as shopwalkers. Others who ought to be in the trenches are behind the counter handling ribbons instead of rifles, or sugar instead of shrapnel. Who can pretend that women would not do this work as well as men? In warehouses men are employed as packers, and a great deal of the work they do might be done by women.

Wholesale drapery houses employ men also; and here is work which seems peculiarly suitable for ladies, who by intuition can divine the tastes and requirements of their sex with a skill that men can seldom acquire either by experience or study of their trade. For public companies, too, there is still much work done by men which might be entrusted to women. For example, industrial insurance companies employ men as collectors, though women would probably import into the work of gathering in the weekly premiums by house to house visitation an amount of tactful interest in the insurers and sympathy with them in their troubles, which would result in an increase of business. Prejudice, as Mr. LLOYD GEORGE said to the women's deputation, stands in the way of the extension of women's sphere of work during the war. Public opinion must break down that obstacle. Here at hand is work to which the women who organised Saturday's demonstration might usefully apply themselves while they are waiting for work in the munitions factories. We do not suggest that they should adopt militant methods, or even that they should importune employers to the extent of making themselves a nuisance. But they might endeavour to find women capable of filling such positions as we have indicated as affording women an opportunity for liberating men for military service. The next step would be to bring their resources in this respect under the notice of employers, and to remind merchants, drapers, grocers, and industrial insurance companies of the duty imposed by the Empire's danger upon those who hold back men of military age from the country's service.

The quality of their loyalty to the nation was shown in the democratic character of the great procession through London—"an Indian princess, peeresses, wives of men high in the State, women distinguished in art and letters walked shoulder to shoulder with teachers, typists, shopgirls, factory lasses and British matrons whose sons are already in the fighting line."

These women of Great Britain have given Mr. Lloyd George a fine opportunity to prove his great ability. If he can harness them to the car of State, if he can show them the way, he need fear no more complaints of shortage of labour.

The modern woman is strong, self-reliant, and trustworthy. She is ready and willing to serve the nation, only wanting the opportunity.

She demands "the right to serve" in any and every capacity in which she may be of use.

The Minister of Munitions showed himself to be entirely sympathetic with the views placed before him by the deputation of women, and he expressed his belief that women can help the nation to victory in this war.

He agreed with the suggestion that nothing should be done to depress the conditions of male labour, and that wherever women did the same work as men they should be paid the same rate of wages. That is to be the especial care of the Government which will control all munition-making establishments and will see that there is no sweated labour. This will be guaranteed by a fixed minimum wage.

When the war is over the entry of women into spheres of activity hitherto untried will be one of our greatest problems. But for the present we can only devote our energies to the supreme necessity—the victory of the Allied armies.

If women can help to that end under the conditions indicated for the safeguarding of the wage interests of male workers, we may leave the future to solve its own problems.

Birmingham Post
19-7-15

663c

Women and the War.

At one time and another the Women's Social and Political Union has organised a good many demonstrations, and sent to Cabinet Ministers a good many deputations. But if last July anybody had ventured to prophecy that within twelve months Mr. Winston Churchill would be looking with approval on a W.S.P.U. demonstration, and that Mr. Lloyd George would be receiving Mrs. Pankhurst, not merely amicably but gladly, we fancy the prophet would have had few disciples. None the less, it is quite true that Saturday's demonstration and deputation were organised by the Women's Social and Political Union. As Mr. Lloyd George suggested, it is unlikely any other body could have organised so great an affair. But the value of Saturday's events depends not on its organisation, but on the spirit of those taking part. And we should have little faith in it if we did not believe that Mrs. Pankhurst and her friends spoke then for the whole body of British women-folk. Behind the demonstration, behind the deputation, we believe was one idea only—not to touch the old question of man's and woman's relative sphere in the State, but to offer to the State freely all that woman can do. It was in that spirit Mr. Lloyd George received the deputation. The whole world to-day is making an experiment in war. For the first time the armed clash is between nations, and not mere armies. Now some of the countries engaged, most of the countries engaged, had understood what modern war might mean and what it might imply. They had made some attempt, even though only a tentative attempt, to organise the nation at home as well as the armies in the field. With us it was different. So little had we imagined what was to come that we had no national army, still less any national organisation behind the army. So it was that we had first to create our armies and then to consider how best to fill the gap those armies had left in our national life. To-day we have realised that if this country is to wage war in the modern fashion, every citizen must put his services at the disposal of the directing authorities. And women have asked—and asked rightly—that they should in this matter have a man's privileges and responsibilities. France and Germany to-day have each something like half-a-million women engaged in turning out munitions of war. In this country a tenth as many are so employed. But France and Germany have also countless women engaged in other work, necessary work, but not strictly war work. And we, for our part, have scarcely begun to move along this path. Saturday's deputation, we take it, was an offer of service—of service as and when the State may require it. The offer was accepted, and it remains only to use to the best advantage the energy, the skill, the enthusiasm so freely shown. Here, as in other things, enthusiasm is much, energy is much, skill is much. But to get full value for them, two things are necessary—organisation and discipline.

Organisation, if hopes are fulfilled, will be based mainly on the returns compiled from the National Register. Discipline the women themselves must supply. But it is worth while making one or two points—not because they are recondite, but because they are worth all the emphasis the nation can give them. First, the matter of discipline. This work must be treated as a serious and absorbing business. Mr. Lloyd George told the deputation frankly that he wanted whole-time workers. Dilettante casual playing at work is quite useless. There is no room for those who regard war work as a hobby or a pastime, or as something which can be taken up in spare moments. And the reasons which lie behind that admirable dictum suggest logically one or two corollaries. There must be a complete submission to authority, a complete willingness to do whatever the State wants any particular person to do—and to do it as the State wants it, when the State wants it, in the manner the State prescribes. That, in a nutshell, is what we mean by discipline. Or the point may be expanded under the head of organisation. Naturally enough, most people would like to be [illegible]

The Women's Walk.

If only the women's walk yesterday afternoon from Whitehall to Hyde Park and back again had been favoured with fine weather, it would have proved the most striking female demonstration London has seen. Even as it was, despite the cold wind and frequent storms of rain, it was highly impressive; and its organisers deserve every credit for having profited by the long and arduous experience they have had in arranging such affairs. Those who could hear the Minister of Munitions when he addressed the throng on the Thames Embankment seemed highly pleased, and there was a great rush to sign the forms declaring the women's willingness to work. A hope, however, was widely expressed that more tact than hitherto has been shown will be apparent in distributing the work to the voluntary helpers. Some of the instances to be heard of just now are well-nigh incredible; but if the heads of departments will lay aside official tradition and take into consultation women who understand women, the many curious misfits already arranged for will be the last of their type.

663c/35

logically one or two corollaries. There must be a complete submission to authority, a complete willingness to do whatever the State wants any particular person to do—and to do it as the State wants it, when the State wants it, in the manner the State prescribes. That, in a nutshell, is what we mean by discipline. Or the point may be expanded under the head of organisation. Naturally enough, most people would like to be making war munitions. In such work one feels, in a special sense, that one is helping. But only a small proportion of women workers—or men either for that matter—can be usefully trained to make "shells" or usefully employed in making them. If we are not mistaken, it will be found that much of women's usefulness will be in indirect spheres of service—in acting as shop assistants perhaps, in serving on trams, in clerical work, in canvassing, in light manual labour generally. So will they free many men either for the trenches or for the harder manual work, skilled or unskilled, of the factory. Lord Kitchener has told us he still wants every recruit he can get. There are many potential recruits occupied in such work as we have described. And women will be doing good service—service not less good than munition work—if they set free eligible men for enlistment. In this matter, of course, everything depends on organisation. Employers must release men when women can fill the places; business men and the public generally must get rid of prejudices; must ask themselves not whether women can do a particlar piece of work as well as men, but if they can do it well enough to serve. And the men displaced must not hesitate about their duty. Domestic and personal considerations apart, an able-bodied man of military age doing work women could do is wasting his powers, doing something less than his country needs of him. It is such men who must be freed. To free them may not always be easy; but given the women anxious to serve, and the men anxious to be free, it is possible. We have good hope of very useful results from women's labour. But it must be offered without reserve; it must be accepted in the same spirit. And the State must so use offer and acceptance as to make the best of both. Enthusiasm we have in plenty Given discipline and organisation, that enthusiasm should be of incalculable value.

Daily Chronicle
19-7-15

Women and War Work.

The weather was not kind to the great demonstration of women in London on Saturday afternoon; but though a heavy rainfall marred the effect of some of its artistic and beautiful features it did not impair the very impressive character of the procession. A more remarkable demonstration has never been seen in the streets of London. Its original character and its efficient organisation are vastly to the credit of Mrs. Pankhurst and her co-workers. Popular demonstrations have usually for their object the assertion of claims to political rights or privileges. This one was a demand for the right to serve. Women are not one whit less patriotic than men, and at times of national peril they are stirred and exalted by precisely the same impulses and emotions as their fathers, husbands, brothers and sons. At the present time, when the whole destinies of Britain and of the Empire of which it is the heart are at stake, British women yearn to place at the service of their country their vast capacities for labour and sacrifice. They cannot take their places on our ships of war, they cannot fight in the trenches. But over and above those duties of motherhood, than which for a woman there is nothing more sacred or more patriotic, wide fields of service are open to them at home in time of war.

Saturday's demonstration was the assertion of a claim to participate in war work. It is a claim that the country will gladly acknowledge. We need the services of women in munition factories and in war workshops. We need them in many other occupations where vacancies have been caused by the enlistment of men. There are still not a few non-productive industries where the supersession of men by women could take place advantageously. Let these men join the Army, and women will be ready to act as substitutes. We in England were tardy in invoking the help of women. In France and in Germany women's labour has been utilised to a much larger extent. Doubtless the necessity in those countries was greater, but our necessity has grown and is growing. As the Minister of Munitions truly observed, we have in women workers a great reserve for the purpose of equipping the nation in this crisis. One of the problems of the moment is the efficient organisation of that reserve. In a thousand ways British women have in this critical epoch in our history acquitted themselves nobly—as worthy mothers and wives of our heroic sailors and soldiers, as nurses, as doctors, as teachers, as substitutes for men in a variety of occupations. But there are large reserves of potential women workers that are untouched. These women are ready and eager to do their part, whether in producing munitions or in doing other war work. What is needed is an effective method of promptly utilising their services. We hope that in this matter the help of women organisers will be sought. Mr. Lloyd George reminds us that a new industrial army cannot be mobilised and brought into operation in a day. That is quite true.

To fit hundreds of thousands of women volunteers into the industrial machine to do the work most needed by the nation, and for which they are best adapted, is a big operation that must take time. But we hope there will be none of those avoidable delays which are so chilling to enthusiasm. On no account must the use of women workers be made a pretext for reducing wages. Equal pay for equal work ought to be a governing principle in the employment of women. We owe that not only to the women themselves but also to the trade unionists. Mr. Lloyd George's speech was thoroughly reassuring on these points.

The Times,
July 19th. 1915.

Women and the War.

The great procession of women organized on Saturday to claim for women the right, and to demonstrate their intention, of taking part in the work of the war is doubly significant. It reveals the spirit of our women and it is a striking example of their perception that all social and political values will come to be determined by the way they have stood the test of the war. A year ago the very organization which promoted and arranged this huge procession had, in its militant advocacy of political rights for women, placed itself in open conflict with the law and with the feelings of the bulk of the community. On the outbreak of war these women saw at once the vital character of the conflict in which we were engaged. They suspended their demands, dropped their grievances, and threw themselves into the work of national education with the same vigour they had hitherto shown in the advocacy of their own claims. One of their leaders, MISS CHRISTABEL PANKHURST, went further afield, and delivered in the United States a series of admirable lectures which contributed greatly to counteract pro-German propaganda. The demonstration on Saturday was conceived in the same spirit. It was effectively organized, and gave proof—had proof been needed—of women's power of organization. But previous demonstrations for other objects had already borne witness to their ability in this respect. What is new and valuable in this instance is the determination it shows to help in doing the one thing that matters, the winning of the war. In his speech to the deputation that waited on him MR. LLOYD GEORGE said that the first thing to do was to get rid of prejudices—not merely the prejudice of the old trade unionists, but the conservatism of business men and the apprehension of the working man who feared that, once women were trained to do this kind of work, they would continue to do it after the war is over, and do it so well that there would be no further need for the services of men. We think that MR. LLOYD GEORGE here touched the root of the matter. Half our difficulties, political as well as industrial, spring from apprehensions of what may happen "after the war." Many politicians and some Ministers are still thinking of votes; trade unions fear for their rules, and working men for their wages They are in reality looking backwards, not forwards. Before they have half-realized that we are at war, they are making plans for peace time, as they used to know it, without understanding that unless we turn our every thought and deed to the business of winning the war, and of winning it quickly and thoroughly, there will be no votes to catch, no rules to preserve, and no wages to earn. The women, with the quick insight that distinguishes them, have grasped this truth. Saturday's procession is an outward sign that they mean, consciously and deliberately, to do their part. They claim their part as a right, and should not only be allowed but helped to do it. They are more than half the nation, and they will feel very severely the effects of the war. The women of France, of Serbia, of Belgium—to say nothing of the women of Germany—are sharing in the effort and burden of the war to a greater extent than the women of England have yet been enabled to do. We are glad that MR. LLOYD GEORGE gave the deputation a sympathetic hearing, and that his speech to the procession sounded the note of confidence and encouragement. Women themselves will gain much by the discipline of war work. The country will gain more by the merging of the efforts of both sexes in common service for a common cause, which is the cause of civilization.

663c/38 6

The Times - July 19th. 1915.

WOMEN'S WAR PAGEANT.

THE CLAIM TO SERVE.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE'S PROMISE.

Mr. Lloyd George gladly and eagerly accepted the offer of the help of women in making munitions and other forms of war work which was made to him on Saturday by Mrs. Pankhurst and other ladies notable in public life.

That there was reality and substance in the offer was proved by the long procession of women, mainly of the working classes, who marched through West London with banners and bands before the deputation waited upon Mr. Lloyd George. It was an impressive demonstration, and but for the inclemency of the weather it would have been a very beautiful one also. The pageantry was, happily, not altogether spoiled, and the lowering skies and the cold, driving rain only brought out into clearer relief the spirit of service which animated the assembly.

Mr. Lloyd George's Encouraging Words.

Mr. Lloyd George, with Mr. Churchill, saw the procession go by on the Embankment from a platform erected in the grounds of the Department of Munitions. He was deeply moved by it, as he afterwards told the deputation in his room at the Department. He mentioned two prejudices which were affecting the employment of women in the workshops :—

The conservatism of manufacturers who have always been accustomed to seeing men doing this work and could not be persuaded that women could do it as well if not better.

The apprehensions of working men that if women were successful at this class of labour they would be retained after the war and men would feel their competition in looking for jobs.

Dealing with the latter point Mr. Lloyd George said the work was war work, and therefore would come to an end when the war was over. Then he stated the measures which the Government propose to take in order to enlarge the field of female labour in the making of munitions. They are these :—

A register of women who are prepared to give all their time to the kind of work in which they are particularly skilled.

The special training of a number of women for the direction and instruction of female labour in the workshops.

The Government, he added, would not avail themselves of the services of women merely to get cheap labour. Women would be paid for piece work the same as men ; and for time work a minimum rate of wages would be fixed.

The Pageant of the Allies.

The most notable feature of the procession was the pageant of the Allies. It was headed by a girl wearing a Grecian robe of white fringed with gold, and carrying a trophy composed of the flags of the nations at war with Germany. Behind her came native representatives of the Allied countries. The place of honour was given to Belgium. The soul of that martyred, but unconquerable, land was vividly typified by a tall, slender lady dressed in mourning, with a purple veil bound round her head and flowing in a long streamer behind. She carried aloft the flag of her country, torn and tattered, but still beautiful in its colours of black, yellow, and red. She walked barefoot through the slush of the roadways, and on her delicate face there was a moving expression of pride and sorrow. Then came a striking contrast in France, represented by a pleasant-looking young girl who walked with a swagger in her tricolor frock and her red cap of liberty, and charmed the crowd with her merry smiles. The other Allies followed—Russia, Japan, Italy, Serbia, and Montenegro—a most picturesque group in their varied peasant costumes. A girl in white, carrying an armful of roses, typified England, and in attendance upon her were three women, one wearing the kilt and tartan of Scotland, another the high conical hat of Wales, and the other the red colleen cloak and green dress of Ireland.

For the rest, the parade consisted of tens of thousands of women carrying streamers, which worked out a brilliant coloured scheme of many sections in red, white, and blue ; interspersed with numbers of large banners bearing inscriptions. Among the mottoes were :

mufti who came out shamelessly to look at us. Only one of them passed a contemptuous remark, reminiscent of former marches. Quickly a young girl carrying a pennon turned on him. "We're going to do our bit," she cried, "are you going to do yours ?" and hurrying on, left the crowd to hear his answer. It cheered us somewhat to see a few recruiting sergeants presently busy among the "war-shy."

In Park-lane, where there are many private hospitals, the nurses waved to us ; by this time the mud and the rain had done their worst with us, but we struggled on. Our ages were from 70 to seven ; some of us who were old and had worked at sedentary occupations in factory and workshop for many years felt the drag of the streets, but we never let the young girls whose hardest work hitherto had been golf or the great ladies whom we had seen opening bazaars and who strode gladly beside us, know how we felt it in our rheumatic joints Sometimes we saw a woman in black watching our line coming, hesitate a moment, and then join it ; there were many women in black in our lines ; they joined them that there might be fewer in the future.

It was a strange sight to see Mr. Lloyd George fearlessly fraternizing with Mrs. Pankhurst ; it was as if Daniel had invited the lion to his den. His speech was to most of us disappointing ; we only heard afterwards of the practical things he had said to the deputation.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE'S SPEECH.

The deputation to Mr. Lloyd George was headed by Mrs. Pankhurst, who said that women welcomed the establishment of the national register. They desired to make no bargain for serving their country in the making of munitions. Mrs. Mansell, Lady Parsons, Mrs. Grant, Mrs. Baker, and Miss Annie Kenny also spoke.

Mr. Lloyd George, in reply, said that if any additional proof were required of the organizing capacity of women for which he had been the victim on other occasions (laughter), he should say it was amply demonstrated by that procession. Its special advantage, he thought, lay very largely in the fact that it would help to educate public opinion on the subject. He did not think an effectively organized nation for a war such as that which they had embarked upon was possible until they had organized the women of this country as well as the men. That had been recognized by the Bill which Mr. Long had introduced in the House of Commons—the National Register. They had at the present moment at the outside something like 50,000 women working at various factories turning out munitions of war. That, he believed, was something like between one-fifth and one-tenth of the number employed in France. He had been told by some one who knew pretty well what was done in organizing labour in Germany that they had something like half a million women engaged in turning out munitions of war in that country. Figures which he had before him, and the kind of work women were doing so well simply indicated what a reserve we had got in women labour for the purpose of helping the nation through this very great crisis.

The Obstacle of Prejudice.

Mr. Lloyd George pointed out the fuse of a shell which was on his desk. That, he said, was now being done by women in this country, but as a matter of fact all that work could be done by women, and men could be turned on to a heavier kind of work for which women were not physically fit. But prejudice was a serious obstacle in their way. It was not merely prejudices of all trade unionists, but it was conservatism—not political conservatism, but conservatism of business men, who had been accustomed to see men carry out that work, and one could not persuade them that women could do it as well. This kind of work women could do better. There was also the apprehension of the working man that women trained to do work of this kind would do it so well that when the war was over there would be no need for the services of men. The real answer to that was that it was war work, and that when the war was over there would be no need for it. There was no question of competition.

Mr. Lloyd George went on to say that he desired not to damp ardour, but to enjoin patience. It was impossible to organize millions and bring into operation a new industrial work in a day. It was not merely that there were prejudices to get rid of, but there are other things to consider. First of all in this country it was necessary to get the proper machinery for turning out shell and material. The first thing to be done was to get an adequate supply of lathes, machinery, and tools. We were short. There had been in that room an important gathering two days before at which all the great machine toolmakers of the country were present, and at that meeting the Government intimated that it proposed to assume control of all machine toolmaking establishments in this country. They accepted it readily, and for the next few months all the energies of those establishments would go towards turning out the necessary machinery to make war material. But that took time. He agreed that something could be done in the meantime.

"Spare Time" Service Not Wanted.

The first thing was that an organization might be set up—a really national organization for the purpose of registering the names of those who are prepared to devote the whole of their time to any task for which women are fitted in the turning out of war material. "We are getting," said Mr. Lloyd George, "offers of services from people who say 'Well, I have got a day or two to spare, and I should like to help you.' That is absolutely no use. Whoever comes forward to serve must be prepared to give the whole of their time."

The second thing which had to be considered was that there must be a certain amount of training and Montenegro—a most picturesque group in their varied peasant costumes. A girl in white, carrying an armful of roses, typified England, and in attendance upon her were three women, one wearing the kilt and tartan of Scotland, another the high conical hat of Wales, and the other the red colleen cloak and green dress of Ireland.

For the rest, the parade consisted of tens of thousands of women carrying streamers, which worked out a brilliant coloured scheme of many sections in red, white, and blue; interspersed with numbers of large banners bearing inscriptions. Among the mottoes were:—

Women are prepared to pay any price to defeat the enemy.
Delays have dangerous ends.
We believe in our great past, and in our still greater future.
We demand war work and service for all.
We are not slackers.
Women's battle cry is, Work, Work, Work.
Shells made by a wife may save her husband's life.

HOW WE MARCHED.

THE SPIRIT OF THE WOMEN'S PROCESSION.

(BY A WOMAN PROCESSIONIST.)

To one marching in Saturday's procession hearing, not sight, was the strongest sense. One realized numbers only by the waves of sound of marching feet, the noise of the bands playing streets ahead of us, and streets behind us. At 3.30 the "Marseillaise," for many of us our adopted symbol song, sounded in the distance. The first processionists moved off slowly. As section after section swung off n the blowing rain with pennons twinkling nd banners like great kites straining, unexpected omen standing to look at us joined in until e great coil of women that wound slowly und Bridge-street, and got its stride in hitehall became typical of the myriad women om London, East and West, North and South, lters.

here was one thing that troubled us on our march through the rain and the mud; it the number of young men of service age in something could be done in the meantime.

"SPARE TIME" SERVICE NOT WANTED.

The first thing was that an organization might be set up—a really national organization for the purpose of registering the names of those who are prepared to devote the whole of their time to any task for which women are fitted in the turning out of war material. "We are getting," said Mr. Lloyd George, "offers of services from people who say 'Well, I have got a day or two to spare, and I should like to help you.' That is absolutely no use. Whoever comes forward to serve must be prepared to give the whole of their time."

The second thing which had to be considered was that there must be a certain amount of training in order to instruct, not all the women who could assist, but at least a sufficient number of women to be able to direct and instruct the others and help in the organization of women labour in these new establishments. These two branches could proceed now. First of all, the national organization of a sufficient number of women upon whom they could draw when they were ready to fill these new establishments; and, secondly, means could be taken immediately for the training of a suitable number of women in the class of work he had indicated. Mr. Lloyd George continued:—

"NO SWEATING."

With regard to wages, I should like to say this. As far as piecework is concerned, we are agreed that women should be paid exactly the same price as men for any piece of work she turned out. It would not be fair to give 2s. 6d. for men doing that, and only give 1s. 6d. to women. We have agreed to pay exactly the same rate of wages for piecework as to men. Mrs. Pankhurst asked a little more than that. She wanted the same rate of wages for time work.

MRS. PANKHURST said that there were complaints that women who were working for private employers were being sweated.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE.—All these establishments are now going to be under Government control. It is impossible for us to get along without it. The Government will see that there is no sweated labour. For some time women will be unskilled and untrained, and they cannot quite turn out as much work as men can who have been at it for some time. Therefore we cannot give the same time rate of wages. Mrs. Pankhurst is quite right in insisting that whatever these wages are they should be fair, and there should be a fixed minimum, and we should not utilize the services of women in order to get cheap labour.

Proceeding, Mr. Lloyd George again expressed the Government's recognition of the women's desire to serve, and concluded in the following words:—The women of this country can help, and help enormously. I believe they can help us through to victory. Without them victory will tarry, and victory which tarries means victory whose footprints are the footprints of blood. We want to shorten the war because it means life, and with life it means curtailing in many cases the burden of sorrow which the war brings. That is the great function of women in life, and I believe they are discharging that in coming forward at the present moment and saying, "The brave men fighting for us in the trenches are in peril because they have not sufficient war material, and we can help you."

A VISION OF VICTORY.

After receiving the deputation, Mr. Lloyd George appeared on the specially-constructed platform overlooking the Embankment and made a brief speech to a gathering numbering several thousand. In the course of his speech he said:—

"Our country is in peril and we all want to help it, and I believe that men and women alike are prepared to do their best to help the old country through to victory. (Cheers.) In France hundreds of thousands of women are working in the factories and workshops in order to equip the soldiers at the front with abundant material to enable them to face the enemy on equal terms. We propose in this country to utilize the services of everybody who is prepared to assist us, and then victory will come to our lot."

"I am not afraid of the result. (Cheers.) There are dark clouds rolling up in the East, but I look at them with confidence. The indomitable spirit of Russia will ride this storm as it has faced many another hurricane that swept over its devoted plains. They will scatter, they will be dispersed, and Russia will emerge once more formidable, deadly, and help the great democratic countries of the West to achieve a great victory for freedom in Europe." (Cheers.)

At this point a woman broke in with the remark, "What about the vote?" "We will get her into the shell factory first," replied Mr. Lloyd George, amid laughter. He resumed:—

"Here we are, panting 12 months behind to catch a foe who has been preparing for years. (A voice.—"Stick it old boy!") But we shall do so. I have no hesitation at all in feeling confident that the great nation which overthrew many a despotism in Europe before with its own right hand will do so yet." (Cheers.)

The National Anthem having been played by the band, cheers were given for Mr. Lloyd George, and Mrs. PANKHURST briefly addressed the crowd.

Manchester Guardian 663/39 663c.

19-7-15

WOMEN AND MUNITIONS.

GREAT MARCH IN THE RAIN.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE ON THE WORK THEY CAN DO.

LONDON, SUNDAY.

It was natural to compare the women's munitions march through London yesterday with the big suffrage processions of the past. It was certainly bigger than any of the old marches, with the possible exception of the famous demonstration of the constitutional suffragists. The rain cut down the numbers considerably, but as it was there was nearly a mile of women walking three and four abreast. The mustering stretched from Westminster Bridge to Blackfriars. If it was less brilliant than women's processions usually are, that again was the fault of the weather, which made the women cover their bright dresses with a drab monotony of mackintoshes. Nothing so stirred admiration along the pavements as the refusal of the girls in the Pageant of the Allies to hide their gay costumes. Belgium in the tattered purple of mourning carried her flag resolutely through wind and driving rain barefoot in the mud. She was symbolic of the spirit of about ten thousand women setting out in all earnestness and sincerity to ask the Minister of Munitions to give them the nation's work to do.

No one could watch the passing of the women without giving a thought to the contrast with pre-war conditions. The Women's Social and Political Union had organised the procession with their customary expertness in these matters, and Mrs. Pankhurst, at last a heroine with the crowd, walked at the head. Instead of the old spirit of defiance in demand, there was a simple desire to serve. Londoners responded generously to the change of mood, and never has a procession of women gone through the streets followed by heartier good wishes. In mere size the demonstration was curiously impressive. The women went by at a good three miles an hour, flowing on until one's eyes were too tired to watch the interminable fluttering of the banners. Mr. Lloyd George, who stood at the garden wall of his office with Mr. Churchill to see them pass, told Mrs. Pankhurst afterwards that it was "a very fine procession—very well done indeed."

Significant Signs.

The picturesqueness of the march, the ingeniousness of the symbolism, pennons in patriotic colours and banners exhorting like newspaper headlines—these things were less significant than the signs that these were women really ready to begin the hard work of making shells. There were women of all classes among the marchers, but the majority were clearly working women. There were hundreds of East End girls who enlivened the way with jolly banter, and careworn women with a life of work behind them, as well as many educated women who hope that Mr. Lloyd George will give them a chance of training themselves in the technical processes involved.

There were tables set out in the street at intervals where women could give in their names for war work, and a large number did so. The difficulty was not the getting of volunteers—a very small proportion of the women on the Women's Register have been called upon—but of getting the Government to promise to make use of them. As various banners reminded us, the authorities in France and Italy, and in Germany especially, are willing enough to employ the women. Mr. Lloyd George's assurances in answer to the deputation meant an important victory on this point.

Shells made by a wife
May save a husband's life, said one of the banners. "Men must fight and women must work," said another.

A Picturesque Show.

The procession surged up Whitehall to the sound of the "Marseillaise," looking like a long gaudy ribbon laid on the grey street. The crowd had admiring eyes for the pictorial side of the show—the cluster of girls carrying the "Red Rose of Old England," a couple dressed in the peasant costumes of Serbia and Montenegro walking hand in hand, the woman wearing a white stole embroidered with the Eagle of Poland, the Red Caps of Liberty for France, Italy in Garibaldian uniform. The wind bunched together the innumerable little red, white, and blue pennons, and flapped the banners until the legends were illegible. And a score or so of bands gave a pleasing mixture of all the patriotic airs, the hymn-like Russian Anthem, the plunging charge of the "Marseillaise." Men in khaki helped the women to struggle with the banners.

The procession made a wide detour by way of Piccadilly and Oxford Street before it reached the Office of Munitions, where Mrs. Pankhurst had an amiable talk with her one-time adversary Mr. Lloyd George.

Mr. Lloyd George's Promise.

The throbbing of band music penetrated into the room from the Embankment, where the multitude was waiting to see and hear the Minister. Half-a-dozen women, most of whom have menfolk in the fighting line, put the case with excellent brevity and point, insisting on the immediate starting of training centres, and also meeting possible trade union objections by asking for the same rate of wages for the same work as men. Mr. Lloyd George gave great pleasure by promising that so far as piecework is concerned this shall be done. His reply went quite as far as anyone expected. He fully admitted the need of employing more women on shell-making. Fifty thousand women are already at work. He indicated that the Government intends to make a register of women prepared to give all their time to the work—whether this means yet another register besides the Women's and the National Register is doubtful—and to train women to teach others the more skilled side of shell-making. He picked up from his side a delicate bit of mechanism, the fuse of a shell, and said that "what the Government has in its mind" is setting women to work on fuses, leaving the heavier tasks to the men. He made the important announcement that the Government has just decided to take over control of all machine-tool works of the country. "It is impossible for us to get along," he said, "without taking practical control of all the establishments for turning out munitions of war."

The deputation over, Mr. Lloyd George cheerfully consented to Mrs. Pankhurst's request that he should address the crowd on the Embankment. A red-roofed platform had been erected behind the wall of the Office garden, and to this the Minister and the women's leader repaired. An enormous crowd was waiting—seen from the wall it was a spread of faces only limited by the grey river beyond. Here amid the snapping of cameras and cheerful patriotic noises Mr Lloyd George made a little speech full of generous appreciation of the women's wish to help our fighting men and of robust confidence in the issue of the war.

W.S.P.U. Procession.

There was something dreamlike about watching the women's war munitions procession yesterday (writes a woman and a suffragist). While avowedly it was not a "Suffragette" procession, the stamp of the W.S.P.U. and of its marvellous organising ability was over it all. The topsy-turvy thing was the popular reception of it, the policemen along the route smiling with admiration upon the dauntless banner carried in so many defiant parades, "Deeds not words," the stewards, wearing the prison badge, marshalling the women peaceably to Westminster, and that strange scene on the Embankment, where thousands gathering to hear Mr. Lloyd George gazed up at the garden wall and watched a famous prisoner smiling from the security of the Munitions Department grounds. Stranger still was it to see Mrs. Pankhurst after her welcome wave her hand towards Mr. Lloyd George and retire gracefully to the background while he made his brief and not very illuminating speech. When he had finished he turned to go, but thought better of it, and sat down to listen to Mrs. Pankhurst's speech. Unfortunately for those who wished to see this crowning incongruity, the band on her appearance struck up the National Anthem. The Minister, Mrs. Pankhurst, and Miss Annie Kenney stood shoulder to shoulder to "God Save our Gracious King," and then Mr. Lloyd George left the platform, while Mrs. Pankhurst could only call for cheers for our defenders.

An Impromptu Register.

Tables had been set at intervals along the route of the procession, where from midday till sunset women were invited to enrol themselves for war munitions work, and the report from all was that they had been kept very busy, that nearly all the women registering were between the ages of 17 and 40, that all classes were anxious to be enlisted, and that while many women suggested giving their services gratuitously, undoubtedly a large number were working women out of work and desperately anxious to find employment at once. There was one woman—she stood out in their memories—who had asked if there was any "genteel" work in shellmaking. There were women of assured bearing who wrote themselves down as 45 and said calmly, "Of course I'm not." One famous writer put her name down after some despairing argument as to whether the Government would make any use of her abilities. A good many women said they were willing to give up their well-paid work for the duration of the war. Little did the plutocrats of Park Lane think as they gazed down at the fluttering banners of the volunteers that beneath their very eyes cook and parlourmaid and nurse were offering to join this women's army. The busiest tables were in the shopping streets and along the Embankment, where some of the registrars, beginning with 500 forms, had to renew their stores several times.

Women and Munitions.

In his friendly reply to the women's munitions deputation yesterday Mr. Lloyd George made it clear that a start is to be made at putting women's labour in shell factories on a regular basis. The Government has been ready all along to make use of women's labour in shell-making, and although the 9,000 now working in the factories are a small body compared with the women munition workers of France or Germany it is something to have overcome British commercial conservatism even to that extent. The chief difficulty, as Mr. Lloyd George indicated, has been to get a sufficiently large number of women to undertake whole-time service. His proposal to open a register for women prepared to give their time was not very clearly worded, but apparently it is the intention to open yet a third register for this purpose. One would have supposed that the National Register—in itself, as he said, a statutory recognition of women's right to war service—would provide all the information needed. The essence of the women's demand is that the Government should seriously begin the essential work of training them for the highly skilled business they want to engage in. Mr. Lloyd George gave satisfactory assurances on this point, which had been put to him in a practical way by women scientists led by Lady Parsons, the wife of the [illegible] is that the Government should seriously begin the essential work of training them for the highly skilled business they want to engage in. Mr. Lloyd George gave satisfactory assurances on this point, which had been put to him in a practical way by women scientists and by Lady Parsons, the wife of the head of the Glasgow engineering firm. His promise of equal payment with men for skilled piecework gave great satisfaction. On any other terms the women would meet with formidable opposition from the trade unions, which fear a general lowering of labour conditions. The immediate obstacle, of course, is the shortage of shell-making machinery, and in explaining this Mr. Lloyd George made the interesting announcement that the Government is about to use the powers under the Munitions Act to "take control" of all the machine-tool making factories in the country—a step which will enable his department to fix the terms of the employment of women.

Counter-Demonstration.

There is to be another procession of women workers to Westminster led by another Pankhurst on Tuesday evening. It is in some sort a counter-demonstration. It is organised by Miss Sylvia Pankhurst and Dr. Barbara Tchaykovsky and their secessionist militant suffrage society, the East London Federation of Suffragettes. The procession will form at two or three centres in the East End at 8 30 on Tuesday night, and will march to the Houses of Parliament. At 10 p.m. there will be a meeting in the Central Hall, near by. The spirit of this second demonstration is that it would not be patriotic to let "profiteers" and sweaters dig themselves in while the war is on, so that they shall be securely entrenched when the war is over. When vast numbers of women are taking up men's jobs there is an obvious opportunity for cutting down wage standards, and there are certainly some employers who will take advantage if they are allowed. Mrs. Pankhurst, to do her justice, called upon the Government yesterday to guard against this danger, though in a rather perfunctory way. The demonstration led by her youngest daughter on Tuesday will demand that as a capital condition of the enlistment of women for war service there shall be complete safeguards against the undercutting of men's labour. "We must not allow the soldiers to return from the trenches (runs the summons) to find that women have been forced to play the part of blacklegs and have brought the wages for all down to a sweated level." Miss Sylvia Pankhurst's East London Federation is a sort of secession from the W.S.P.U. Its distinction of policy is that it lays equal stress on the suffrage cause and the labour cause, and runs them both together.

Daily News & Leader
19-7-15.

(To the Editor.)

Sir,—In connection with the workers' procession to Parliament on the evening of Tuesday, July 20, which is being arranged to protest against compulsion without safeguards, and to demand equal pay for men and women, the East London Federation of the Suffragettes have taken the Central Hall, Westminster, from 10 p.m. It is not expected that the procession will arrive before this hour, as the marchers will leave Old Ford-road, Bow, and East India Dock Gates at 8.30 p.m.

The members of Parliament who, by their votes in the House, have shown themselves favourable to the objects of the demonstration, have been invited to come out and welcome the processionists; and several of the members have written sending messages of sympathy.

Mr. J. King writes: "I am very grateful to you for writing to me about your deputation on the 20th. It is with the deepest sympathy and conviction that I wish it much success."

Mr. Philip Snowden writes: "I have long appreciated the energy with which you have put forward the claim that the cost of living should be taken into account in considering wages."

Mr. H. G. Chancellor writes: "I hope you will get a sympathetic reply from the Minister of Munitions; I mean sympathy resulting in action."

Mr. W. C. Anderson and other members have also expressed their sympathy.

July 16. E. SYLVIA PANKHURST.

Lancashire Post
21-7-15.

Women and War Service.

They are very busy at the W.S.P.U. headquarters in Kingsway. Women who are anxious to offer their services in munition works have been making an almost continuous descent upon the premises, and firms in all parts of the kingdom are clamouring for suitable women to be sent on to them. Some eight or nine thousand "enlisted" on Saturday, and I gather that there will be no difficulty in distributing them to the best advantage; but the Union is very properly inquiring into questions of wages and conditions before complying with applications for large numbers of women to work for private firms. I find that, although there is some considerable disappointment over Mr. Lloyd George's intimation that only women who can devote their whole time to munition work can be accepted, it is recognised by the majority that the "part timer" in this case would not be of very great use. Meanwhile, women's organisations are finding time to keep an eye on problems which must inevitably arise in the future, and the agenda of the National Union of Women Workers of Great Britain and Ireland, which is to hold a conference in London later on in the year, provides for the discussion of several subjects of the utmost importance. Women's share in the work of reconstruction after the war is to be comprehensively reviewed by some of the foremost of the women's industrial leaders, while other matters which figure prominently in the programme are those concerning naval and military pensions, maternity centres and infant welfare, the hours of women's labour in factories, and the future of the working girls' clubs.

The Canadian News
22/7/15.

THE march of 50,000 women, claiming the right to serve their country by munition work, took place last Saturday.

Although the procession was somewhat spoiled by the weather, the ardour of the women was in no way damped. As my readers are well aware, I am a great advocate of women's work on behalf of the Empire. A year ago I published an article on what women could do for the Empire, and therefore I, at all events, have no apologies to make to the opposite sex. I have always believed and taught that women can do nearly as much for the Empire as men, and I believe it more than ever to-day. I am rejoiced to think that they are going to set to work in real earnest. We have all got to put our shoulder to the wheel. Mrs. Pankhurst and her friends have done a great service to the country by coming forward as they did on Saturday last. I believe in the enthusiasm, the earnestness and the sound common sense of women, who are not nearly such slaves to convention and to tradition as men. As Mrs. Pankhurst says, "We shall carry big scissors with us to cut red-tape."

The Graphic
24/7/15.

663b
663c/42

Woman's Right to serve

Patriotism, said someone in the days when it was considered correct to be smart at one's country's expense, is nothing but a magnified provincialism. He may have been right, according to his lights, lights with which the present state of Europe has seriously interfered. Cosmopolitanism is no longer an added grace; it is a misfortune. In these days it argues badly for you if you can see both sides of an international question. Open-mindedness means that your mind is open to one issue only.

It is, therefore, a compliment to women to say that they have it in them to be provincial on a scale hitherto undreamt of in the way of provincialism. It includes all who are fighting with us in this great cause of the world—or, at any rate, the most important part of it—versus Hohenzollernism. To a woman there is only one Freedom, and those who are fighting for it are her sisters and her brothers, whatever their caste or colour may be. A man may quibble and compromise, losing himself in a labyrinth of pros and cons, dear to the logically minded. Justice has many aspects, and it behoves a wise man to examine them coolly and critically, to discriminate nicely between them, splitting much hair in the process, and finally arriving by devious ways at the conclusion which a woman reaches swiftly at the beginning of things by some secret, straight way of her own. Therefore, I say that the man who applies to these judgments of hers the same sound, slow process of reasoning which he applies to all things, does well; but he who can trust her from the start does better.

In France, apparently, they have done better; in England we are still going through the process of doing well. No one doubts for a moment of the end which awaits us after much deliberation and sundry weighings in the balance, and, to hasten the inevitable, the women, who lead the feminine energy of the country, produced last Saturday a convincing argument in the shape of a stupendous procession, such a procession of service as the world has not often seen. Soldiers marching to battle could not have displayed more willingness for sacrifice, more indomitable enthusiasm, more consecrated devotion. The right to serve—this was the keynote of last Saturday's argument, a right claimed only after due examination of the desire, the capacity and the endurance which every whole-hearted service entails. To say that the hearts of the women of England are stirred as deeply by a longing for national service as those of the women of France is saying no more than the truth. Then why should this magnificent energy be wasted while men are reasoning over ways and means, and the expediency of untying the red-tape dear to their souls? Ways suggest themselves, means stage up ready-made to the hand of him or her whose brain can supply the requisite energy.

Statistics could unfold an instructive tale as to the numbers of Frenchwomen employed in munition factories, women who, before the war, had no training in the making of shells. The opposition of Trade Unions went to the wall before that larger provincialism called patriotism in these stirring days. Every fact in the world is dated by the war, is transfigured by it, and those which cannot change must go. When Brieux, in "La Femme Seule," wrote of the conditions against which the labour of an earnest woman hurled itself in vain, we shuddered, and in our hearts thanked Heaven that our men were not as Frenchmen are—or were. But where are those Frenchmen now? Brieux's play has dated, as if it had been written a century and not three years ago. Woman's work, born of a wave of passionate enthusiasm, no longer hurls itself against doors which remain obstinately closed. Woman's work is recognised as one of the best assets of the country. A new common sense has arisen, transcending the common sense of the world of yesterday. And, while they can do so much better in France, why should we be content with merely doing well at home?

The right to survive the war will be decided for or against us as we shall have proved our capacity for infinite change. Only one thing is certain—nothing will ever be the same again, and only those who can go willingly into the melting-pot will survive the melting-pot. In France the great change fell upon the nation with the swiftness of a bombshell. Invasion, and the intense suffering which follows in its train, especially in these days of barbarously scientific warfare, stirred up feeling and action, as only the realities of life can and will. The right to suffer is a privilege when one remembers all that the evolution of the race owes to suffering.

We, too, have suffered, we know. We have given of our best ungrudgingly. But it is one thing to go bravely forth to fight as on a crusade of freedom, knowing that meanwhile our nearest and dearest are safe from indignities which one dare not even mention; it is another to be fighting desperately, not so much for freedom and ideals as for the very soil on which one stands. The suffering of invasion can be brought home to England best of all by the imagination of her women; of this their intense enthusiasm for service is proof enough.

At Rheims the statue of Jeanne d'Arc has escaped the German shells as if by a miracle. It stands an enduring monument to the faith of France. To-day the Maid, for all her vast capacity for service, would have seen her visions, and dreamt her dreams in vain—at least in England. But in her day she never questioned her right to serve. She served—and her country assisted in the making of a saint. But the right to serve should be anybody's, at any time, so long as he or she can prove fitness for service. CANDIDA.

pictures forming a border to three sides of this page need no title. They speak for themselves. At the sides are typical figures in Saturday's procession. Pankhurst. The top view shows the enormous crowd listening to the addres of Mr. Lloyd George who is seen in two characteristic attitudes at the extr

Spectator 663c/43 66
24-7-15

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

THE thousands of women who marched through the London streets last Saturday, earnestly determined to insist upon their privilege of serving the country, made an impressive spectacle. It is not too much to say that without the help and inspiration of the women we could not win the war. But we have had the good fortune to know from the moment that war was declared that if we did not win it would not be the fault of the women. All fears that a great war would be too nerve-shattering and too horrible for women to give their moral sanction for its continuance have been absolutely dissipated. We have heard of no single case of a woman throwing impediments in the way through a loss of nerve, or through that kind of particularism which might have been expected to make many women argue in terms of deeply moved personal affection rather than of the intellect. No woman has cried in agony that the future of the world might go hang so long as her husband or her son was safe. We can hardly find words in which to express our admiration for this noble bearing, this limitless capacity for sacrifice. It would be a great mistake to suppose that, striking as the procession of last Saturday was, readiness to serve and to suffer is the peculiar characteristic of those who take part in processions. These qualities exist in every corner of the Empire. The women understand that civilization—the safety and freedom of every civilized home in the world—must, since fate would have it so, be purchased by blood, and having made up their minds to it they have shown no tremor of hesitation. Béranger wrote:—

> "Près de la borne où chaque Etat commence > Aucun épi n'est pur de sang humain";

but there is a terrible enlargement of that truth. If every nation rises in bloodshed, it is plain that even so it cannot thereby compound for peace ever after, however peaceful its intentions may be. It must be ready to fight to retain every amenity of life, every gentleness, every art of peace, which a developing civilization has brought to it.

The women have done more than make willing sacrifices for this, the greatest object for which a nation ever fought. When they have given all that they had in losing husband, son, or brother, they have not shut themselves up and brooded or fallen into a state of forlorn and unhelpful passivity. They have gone straight on their way with brave faces. They have continued to do what they were doing before. They have even increased their efforts, and given to the cause the reserves of ministering power which could no longer have a private or personal application. It has been said that many thousands of women who draw more money now than they ever received before have very good reason to be content with the war. It is suggested that they have been bribed, as it were, and that their complaisance is not real. Every one who has analysed the feelings of women who have sent their men to the war must know that this is a libel. The bravery of poor women is as remarkable as that of the rich. They do not—because they are incapable of doing so—balance their affection for the absent soldier against the advantage of having seven, eight, or nine shillings a week more than they had before. We heard of an instructive little comedy at the beginning of the war, when appeals were being made for recruits. A mother suddenly turned up at the town in which her son was working. She was not in the habit of visiting him, and the only deduction her friends could draw from her choice of this moment for an unpremeditated visit was that she had gone to tell him that his first duty was to her and that he must not "go for a soldier." But they were hopelessly wrong. She had gone to see that her son meant to do his duty, and to say good-bye to him in the confident expectation that he would soon be at his training in one of the camps. The most that can be said truthfully of the calm endurance of the women of the working class is that it is aided by a temperamental fatalism. Better-educated women face the issue with a more acute appreciation of its meaning. As their sensitiveness is deeper, so is their need for determination greater. But nowhere can one see failure. We must quote, as a model of the sentiments of a woman who has "thought it all out" and showed no sign of shrinking, a letter from a wife to her husband which the Morning Post published on Wednesday, aptly heading it "Any Wife to Any Husband." It seems that the husband is a Territorial officer who offered himself for foreign service, and perhaps (if we may read between the lines) gave up some billet where he had a prospect of advancement on easy terms at home in order to take his chance in the trenches:—

> "I am very glad you have signed the general service form indeed. I take it like this. No sacrifice is too great. If every one went on that principle, the war would soon be gloriously won. No one should consider themselves. If you respond to the appeals of those in authority, you can't do more. You have done your best, and you can safely leave the rest. I'm sure you are as dear as any one else's husband; but I don't always fuss about it. If God sends you out, He will look after you; and if He takes you, He will look after us. It's not your fault, but I really don't think you are doing much good where you are at present. So, if you want your wife's advice or what she thinks, leave no stone unturned, however boring, to respond and co-operate with those who are 'running the show,' and hang advancement, &c. It isn't always the most loyal, brave, patriotic, &c., who come into the 'limelight,' and I don't care one spot what anyone else says or anything. The men I admire are the ones who do the un-showing jobs, the dirty jobs, the dull jobs, the ill-paid jobs, and such-like, with a cheerful face and no complaints. They are the truly noble, and their reward comes after."

This instance of a married man doing—doing with his wife's encouragement—what he might conceivably have said should be left to the young bachelors can be matched a million times over. It is a splendid reflection on the influence of family life that it is the married men who measure and accept their responsibilities with conspicuous readiness. They have learned that a home is a thing worth fighting for, and they look beyond their own personal experience to the wider sweep of those questions which the war has raised, and say in their hearts that, if they can help to bring it about, no home shall be at the mercy of powerful and grandiose brigands in the world of the future as decent men mean to have it. One is almost tempted to say that these are the men who alone have an indefeasible qualification for a vote; these are the men, however poor their homes may be, who have that "stake in the country" of which it used to be fashionable for politicians to talk. And while we think of homes can we refrain from adding a special note of respect for those brave women in the Dominions who have seen their husbands depart for the war and alone keep the home against their return? Many of the Canadian, Australian, and New Zealand soldiers are married. There must be women on lonely prairies, remote wheatlands, barren sheep-farms, who "run the show" with little help or even alone. They pass day after day without companionship. News is scant, letters are rare. No watcher in England has quite to equal the gallant patience which pulls a woman through an experience like that.

Mr. Lloyd George said last Saturday that fifty thousand women were already working at munitions in Britain, but that in France there were five to ten times as many at work, and that in Germany there were half a million. It is not the fault of the women here that there have not been a million at work for many months. They would have rushed to the workshops as readily as they rushed to do hospital work or to give their lives in field hospitals in France or Serbia. The Englishwoman wants peace; therefore she knows that we must win the basis of peace. Whatever the price may be, it must be paid. It is useless, as she well knows, to say "Peace" when there is no peace. Very different, happily for us, are her sentiments from those of the American pacificist mother about whose peace poem, "I didn't raise my son to be a soldier!" we have written in another article. The English mother does not tell her son that he is absolved from the duty of defending his home. She expressly tells him that he must do it. And she recognizes that she will raise a wretched family indeed, spiritless and virtueless, if the boys are brought up to believe that there is nothing good in sacrifice, nothing to emulate in her own devotion, no spiritual profit in risking all for an ideal. Her variation of the song would certainly be—"I didn't raise my son to be a shirker!"

Daily News & Leader
24/3/16.

MRS PANKHURST AND THE GOVERNMENT.

New Facts Connected with the War Procession.

Miss C. Nina Boyle, head of the political department of the Women's Freedom League, sends copies of letters between the League and the Government on the circumstances attending the procession of women war volunteers organised by Mrs. Pankhurst on July 17 last.

In a letter addressed to Mr. Long at the Local Government Board under the date of July 29 Miss Boyle asked whether Mrs. Pankhurst had been given access to the special register of war service for women at the Labour Exchanges, since women who had enrolled their names on that register, a confidential Government document, were circularised by Mrs. Pankhurst in relation to the procession. What definite safeguards would be given to the public that irresponsible persons would not be permitted to inspect the Compulsory National Register, then about to be taken.

In reply to this communication a letter was received from the Board of Trade, dated August 4, which ran as follows:

> Mr. Long has forwarded to Mr. Runciman your letter of the 26th July, and Mr. Runciman wishes me to say in reply to it that through a misunderstanding the names and addresses of a certain number of women who had registered as war work volunteers were furnished to the organisers of the recent women workers' procession in London. As soon as Mr. Runciman's attention was called to the matter he caused the permission to be withdrawn, but he regrets that before this was done a certain number of circulars had already been dispatched.

Westminster Gazette 663c/45
24.7.16

THE WOMEN'S WAR PROCESSION.

Sir,—It is difficult to realise what public end was served by the Women's War Procession yesterday.

The war service of women requires neither emphasis nor advertisement to-day. The fruits of that service are writ large on the life of the country. At a time when economy is a matter of urgent national importance the waste of money on a show of very mediocre merit artistically is a matter for criticism. Further, with the wounded pouring into our hospitals and the war at a point of maximum strain, it was difficult not to feel that the various groups of women representing munition-workers, nurses, agricultural labourers, and others, would have been far better employed at their respective duties rather than waving banners in the streets.

As regards Mr. Hughes, if the Women's Social and Political Union are anxious to organise a demonstration in his favour, by all means let them do so. Only let it be an honest and above-board demonstration, which does not shelter under another name.

Women who are working in a serious and responsible spirit to-day have, I think, every right to resent their efforts being made a peg on which to hang a political intrigue not remotely connected with their service.—Yours faithfully, ONLOOKER.

July 23.

Glasgow Record
24.7.16.

WAR WOMEN'S DEMONSTRATION.

Yesterday's procession of women war workers was by far the most spectacular display that has ever been seen in London. It was a wonderful pageant, illustrating the enormous help women are giving to the State to-day in the manufacture of shells and munitions generally, in work on the land, and in countless other ways.

Women in their factory overalls; women with the respirators they wear at their dangerous occupation of shell-filling; women in the trousers and puttees they have adopted in their agricultural pursuits; women in khaki uniform; women, indeed, in every garb but that of ease and indolence were in the procession in thousands.

Symbolical cars, flags and banners contributed to the production of a most impressive display.

LONDON AND THE WOMEN.

The demonstration was organised by the Women's Social and Political Union, whose activities during peace times are mostly of the belligerent character. London, which has in the past looked with disfavour upon the processions of the Suffragettes, turned out in its thousands to applaud yesterday's magnificent pageant.

Mr. Lloyd George stood at a window with the Home Secretary as the procession passed along Whitehall, and the demonstrators raised a loud cheer when the two Ministers were recognised.

It must have been a new and pleasant experience to these gentlemen to hear the acclamations of the women, very many of whom in the days of normal politics are their bitter opponents.

45 Weekly Dispatch 23-6-16 663

MR. LLOYD GEORGE SMILES ON THE "NEW WOMAN" OF 1916.

The Secretary for War steps aside for a moment from his gigantic task at the War Office yesterday afternoon to smile approvingly on the women munitioneers—the women of his creation—passing along Whitehall. With him is Mr. Samuel, the Home Secretary.

A section of the women in the vast procession—some girls engaged in a "dangerous trade."

Star 11-7-16.

WOMEN'S GREAT DAY.

War Workers in Uniform to March Through London.

Milkmaids, gardeners, bus conductors, ticket-collectors, nurses, all women who have taken up War work, will march in the great Women's War Procession through the City and West-end on Saturday, July 22.

The demonstration has been arranged by the Women's Social and Political Union, and its purpose is to show how women have tackled the labour problem, how they have stepped into the places of the men who have joined up.

A special feature of the procession will be a picturesque tableau, "Women on the Land." This will include agricultural workers, each in her working costume, with scythe and hoe; gardeners, with spades and baskets; and milkmaids, with pails and stools.

Women in Uniform.

A second section will include women railway officials in uniform, chauffeuses, lady commissionaires, tram and bus inspectors, with a following of window cleaners, chimney-sweeps, scavengers, etc.

A special hospital supply depot will also be in the procession, and here the workers will be seen making first-aid bandages, swabs, splints, etc.

Canteen workers and members of the Voluntary Aid Detachment will form yet another feature, while a detachment of nurses will be led by a lady in the garb of Florence Nightingale.

Girls on Tricycles.

Others in the procession will be hospital laundresses in their print dresses, women clerks recruited from the City banks and offices, where they are doing men's work, errand girls on delivery tricycles, and women van-drivers.

A domestic economy tableau is also being organised, and this will show the great work which women are doing in teaching housewives to economise the resources of the nation.

A tribute to the memory of the men who have fallen at the front will take the form of a group of soldiers surrounded by young girls bearing laurel wreaths.

The Muster.

The procession will muster on Victoria Embankment at 2.30, starting its march an hour later.

The procession secretary, at 114, Great Portland-street, W.C., appeals to women workers to assist as marshals, banner bearers, and program sellers, to lend motor-cars, and also for personal help in advertising the procession.

Daily Mail 15-7-16

WOMEN WAR PROCESSION.

Every industry in which women have taken the place of men will be represented in the women's war procession through London next Saturday afternoon.

Munition workers, tramway-car and omnibus conductors, railway workers, chauffeuses, commissionaires, window-cleaners, chimney-sweeps, and others will all be seen in the women workers' section.

One object of the procession is to draw attention to the sufferings of our prisoners in Germany, and perhaps the most striking tableau of the demonstration will be seen in this section.

Women relatives of men interned in Germany are invited to walk in this section, and they should communicate at once with the Procession Secretary, 114, Great Portland-street, W.

Evening News 18-7-16.

WOMEN WORKERS' PROCESSION.

Features of Munitions and Farm Tableaux.

One of the most picturesque tableaux to appear in the great Women's War Procession on July 22 will represent the work of the women on the land.

The lorry will be covered with grass, on which will be arranged groups of poppies, marguerites, and cornflowers, giving an effective representation of the national colours.

In the centre will be an apple tree laden with fruit, and around this women illustrating the different classes of work done by them on the land.

The munitions section is of particular interest. Leading the section will be 200 women dressed in blue overalls and caps, carrying hammers, micrometers, and screw-drivers. They will be women fitters.

Behind them will come a lorry with girls in overalls and caps working at munitions machinery, and this will be followed by the "Danger Building Section," a group of 200 women and girls in white overalls, caps and veils. They will carry handkerchief respirators worn by women who fill the shells.

AN AEROPLANE TABLEAU.

Girls from the machine shops will be on a lorry carrying cordite and T.N.T. bags. Next will come a wagon on which women will be engaged on aeroplane construction.

It will be a pretty picture, for at the four corners of the vehicle will be raised the shields of the Allies, and high up in the centre the flags of the Allied nations will be waving.

Above all will be a large model of an aeroplane with a woman in the pilot's seat. Many other women performing various munition tasks will also be in this section.

It has been arranged that a group shall be devoted to the Overseas Dominions, and women from the Colonies are invited to communicate with the secretary at 114, Great Portland-street, W.

The relatives of prisoners in Germany, either military or civilian, are also wanted. It is hoped that as many girl workers as possible—'bus-conductors, lift girls, page girls, waitresses, window-cleaners, commissionaires, and others—will volunteer to join the procession in their uniforms.

Derby Telegraph 19-7-16

Women War-workers.

Londoners will witness a remarkable spectacle on Saturday next, when there is to be a women's war procession. As one of its promoters remarks, it will serve to remind the nation of the important part played by females in keeping the flag flying. In almost every phase of national service the fair sex have given a splendid account of themselves, so that elegant dames who have not a great deal of interest in the patriotic doings of their humbler sisters may experience a rude awakening. Occupations which have hitherto been monopolised by sturdy men have been cheerfully undertaken by young women anxious to strengthen the Empire in this critical time. When the historians of the war come to apportion the praise due to "special efforts" they need not hesitate to recognise with the utmost warmth and liberality the enthusiastic exertions of Women War Workers. They have exceeded the expectations of their most devoted admirers. The organisers of Saturday's procession have doubtless some charitable object in view, and we cannot doubt that their plans will be adopted in many of the big provincial towns.

663c/46

Daily Telegraph 663c. 22. 7-16

WOMEN'S WAR WO

TO-DAY'S PROCESSION.

Nearly a year has passed since a great organised demonstration calling upon women to come forward to make the munitions of war was arranged with the approval of Mr. Lloyd George. The movement had already started, and the Government and the more important private firms had begun to employ women, while the trade unions had set aside many cherished principles in order to admit them. To-day sees us with 666,000 women engaged upon over 470 different processes involved in the production of shells of many calibres and their fuses, as well as in the making of .303 cartridges. Vast as this total of workers is, it is not yet sufficient. Woolwich alone could absorb another 10,000, and from the Midlands the call is going into Scotland, whose fine lassies have proved exceptionally skilled and untiring workers, as well as to Ireland, where it is believed there are still valuable reserves of women workers.

It is not everyone, of course, who has the opportunity of realising what is actually done by the women in the munition factories, but the procession of this (Saturday) afternoon will convey in impressive and spectacular form the kind of tasks on which they are now engaged. Arranged on lorries will be the type of machine-tools they have learned to use, working with the most minute accuracy. There are to be hundreds of the girls now employed upon such labours, dressed in the blue or brown or khaki coloured overalls, with caps entirely covering the hair, that have become the uniform wear in these factories. Fittingly, too, the increasing share that they are taking in aircraft work is to be illustrated, while contingents of nurses, members of Voluntary Aid Detachments, agricultural workers, omnibus and tram conductors, and lift and errand girls, will assemble on the Embankment to join with the rest.

A MODEL COLONY.

A small party of representative women enjoyed last week the privilege of going through three very large and very busy factories at Coventry. One of these now occupies a site that a year ago was hay and corn fields, and is therefore of interest as containing only the latest and newest of machinery, made for the most part, be it said, in this country. Should the whole scheme of this factory be developed it will call for thousands of women. Lodgings for such an influx, or even a quarter of it, would be unobtainable in the district, and the Ministry of Munitions has sanctioned the creation of a most carefully thought-out scheme of hostels, supreme over which is a lady who had the greater part of her practical training at Woolwich. There is a fully qualified lady physician as resident medical officer, and she has her staff of nurses to assist her. Already there are thirty-two hostels with accommodation for 126 girls each, in cubicles with one or no more than two beds in them, a system of bath rooms, a central linen store, and most admirably planned kitchen and dining hall. Gardens are being laid out, and there is talk that a kinema theatre may be provided. The sum of 13s 6d a week boards and lodges every resident, and includes always a three-course dinner.

In this factory nothing is turned out but fuses. They are of two types only, and the operations involved are many and various. At one stage you may see girls controlling mechanism with ease that brings to bear 700lb pressure, and is so perfectly automatic that unless everything has been rightly adjusted the handle will not move beyond the mark that indicates 100lb. Other machines deal with the turning, the threading, and the other varied, often infinitely minute, details that all have their part in these marvellously intricate little triumphs of mechanical precision.

Here, too, the girls are handling the tetroil and the fulminate of mercury that are dangerous not only on the score of possible explosion, but also in the skin irritation and rash that may ensue unless all proper precautions are taken. The "danger zone" is carefully marked off by red boards and gates; the visitor may not enter it till she has donned heavy rubber overshoes, lest the nail in a boot should touch any stray particles and produce an explosion that could be quite serious. In certain stages of the work the dust should not be inhaled, and the young women wear thick white gauze veils over the mouth and nose, which has almost the effect of a Turkish yashmak. The detonators may be described as compressed danger, for the explosive contained in a capsule barely as large as a little girl's first thimble would be quite enough to cause serious injury to anyone near it. The final operation of closing in the detonator is always attended by a certain meed of risk, but one of the partners of the firm, himself a keen motorist, who had invented various clever devices for the absorption of shock, has introduced a safety gig, which is now being adopted in other factories, consisting of an exceedingly stout cylinder, with a pipe running to the earth. Any shock, therefore, spends itself downwards, and the worker would feel nothing more than a slight jar.

AT THE MACHINES.

In another transformed factory fuses of yet a different type are being made. More than a hundred operations are involved in them, and, as may be imagined, there is a great deal of extreme specialising about the various parts. You gather various notable bits of information, as that with the machinery now available there is no another feature, while a detachment of nurses will be led by a lady in the garb of Florence Nightingale.

Girls on Tricycles.

Others in the procession will be hospital laundresses in their print dresses, women clerks recruited from the City banks and offices, where they are doing men's work, errand girls on delivery tricycles, and women van-drivers.

A domestic economy tableau is also being organised, and this will show the great work which women are doing in teaching housewives to economise the resources of the nation.

A tribute to the memory of the men who have fallen at the front will take the form of a group of soldiers surrounded by young girls bearing laurel wreaths.

The Muster.

The procession will muster on Victoria Embankment at 2.30, starting its march an hour later.

The procession secretary, at 114, Great Portland-street, W.C., appeals to women workers to assist as marshals, banner bearers, and program sellers, to lend motor-cars, and also for personal help in advertising the procession.

Daily Mail
15-7-16

WOMEN WAR PROCESSION.

Every industry in which women have taken the place of men will be represented in the women's war procession through London next Saturday afternoon.

Munition workers, tramway-car and omnibus conductors, railway workers, chauffeuses, commissionaires, window-cleaners, chimney-sweeps, and others will all be seen in the women workers' section.

One object of the procession is to draw attention to the sufferings of our prisoners in Germany, and perhaps the most striking tableau of the demonstration will be seen in this section.

Women relatives of men interned in Germany are invited to walk in this section, and they should communicate at once with the Procession Secretary, 114, Great Portland-street, W.

It will be a pretty picture, for at the four corners of the vehicle will be raised the shields of the Allies, and high up in the centre the flags of the Allied nations will be waving.

Above all will be a large model of an aeroplane with a woman in the pilot's seat. Many other women performing various munition tasks will also be in this section.

It has been arranged that a group shall be devoted to the Overseas Dominions, and women from the Colonies are invited to communicate with the secretary at 114, Great Portland-street, W.

The relatives of prisoners in Germany, either military or civilian, are also wanted. It is hoped that as many girl workers as possible—'bus-conductors, lift girls, page girls, waitresses, window-cleaners, commissionaires, and others—will volunteer to join the procession in their uniforms.

Derby Telegraph
9-7-16

Women War-workers.

Londoners will witness a remarkable spectacle on Saturday next, when there is to be a women's war procession. As one of its promoters remarks, it will serve to remind the nation of the important part played by females in keeping the flag flying. In almost every phase of national service the fair sex have given a splendid account of themselves, so that elegant dames who have not a great deal of interest in the patriotic doings of their humbler sisters may experience a rude awakening. Occupations which have hitherto been monopolised by sturdy men have been cheerfully undertaken by young women anxious to strengthen the Empire in this critical time. When the historians of the war come to apportion the praise due to "special efforts" they need not hesitate to recognise with the utmost warmth and liberality the enthusiastic exertions of Women War Workers. They have exceeded the expectations of their most devoted admirers. The organisers of Saturday's procession have doubtless some charitable object in view, and we cannot doubt that their plans will be adopted in many of the big provincial towns.

663c/46

they are taking in aircraft work is to be illustrated, while contingents of nurses, members of Voluntary Aid Detachments, agricultural workers, omnibus and tram conductors, and lift and errand girls, will assemble on the Embankment to join with the rest.

A MODEL COLONY.

A small party of representative women enjoyed last week the privilege of going through three very large and very busy factories at Coventry. One of these now occupies a site that a year ago was hay and corn fields, and is therefore of interest as containing only the latest and newest of machinery, made for the most part, be it said, in this country. Should the whole scheme of this factory be developed it will call for thousands of women. Lodgings for such an influx, or even a quarter of it, would be unobtainable in the district, and the Ministry of Munitions has sanctioned the creation of a most carefully thought-out scheme of hostels, supreme over which is a lady who had the greater part of her practical training at Woolwich. There is a fully qualified lady physician as resident medical officer, and she has her staff of nurses to assist her. Already there are thirty-two hostels with accommodation for 126 girls each, in cubicles with one or no more than two beds in them, a system of bath rooms, a central linen store, and most admirably planned kitchen and dining hall. Gardens are being laid out, and there is talk that a kinema theatre may be provided. The sum of 13s 6d a week boards and lodges every resident, and includes always a three-course dinner.

In this factory nothing is turned out but fuses. They are of two types only, and the operations involved are many and various. At one stage you may see girls controlling mechanism with ease that brings to bear 700lb pressure, and is so perfectly automatic that unless everything has been rightly adjusted the handle will not move beyond the mark that indicates 100lb. Other machines deal with the turning, the threading, and the other varied, often infinitely minute, details that all have their part in these marvellously intricate little triumphs of mechanical precision.

Here, too, the girls are handling the tetroil and the fulminate of mercury that are dangerous not only on the score of possible explosion, but also in the skin irritation and rash that may ensue unless all proper precautions are taken. The "danger zone" is carefully marked off by red boards and gates; the visitor may not enter it till she has donned heavy rubber overshoes, lest the nail in a boot should touch any stray particles and produce an explosion that could be quite serious. In certain stages of the work the dust should not be inhaled, and the young women wear thick white gauze veils over the mouth and nose, which has almost the effect of a Turkish yashmak. The detonators may be described as compressed danger, for the explosive contained in a capsule barely as large as a little girl's first thimble would be quite enough to cause serious injury to anyone near it. The final operation of closing in the detonator is always attended by a certain need of risk, but one of the partners of the firm, himself a keen motorist, who had invented various clever devices for the absorption of shock, has introduced a safety gig, which is now being adopted in other factories, consisting of an exceedingly stout cylinder, with a pipe running to the earth. Any shock, therefore, spends itself downwards, and the worker would feel nothing more than a slight jar.

AT THE MACHINES.

In another transformed factory fuses of yet a different type are being made. More than a hundred operations are involved in them, and, as may be imagined, there is a great deal of extreme specialising about the various parts. You gather various notable bits of information, as that with the machinery now available there is no detail of a 4.5 shell that a woman cannot turn out. When you see a single machine that performs nine separate actions, and controlled by one girl, you will believe it. Upstairs, in a light and airy gallery, are girls who have learnt to do the gauging of these various parts. Of course, they are supplied with all the necessary instruments for the task, but the utmost delicacy of sight and touch is required. Such firms as this have their own trained staffs for this work, and over and beyond these are the final tests applied with women's help from the official staff. The proportion of rejections of the various parts made by the women grows steadily less day by day as skill and dexterity develop.

Then there was a sight of women's work in quite another field. Motor-cycles for the despatch riders at the various fronts cannot be turned out fast enough. There are heavy processes involved in their making, as well as the lighter and finer ones of the parts in aluminium, and in all these the women were taking their share. In some ways this was an especially interesting visit, for in these works men and women were standing side by side and using the same tools for similar details. One high in authority in these shops is well known as a prominent Labour leader—a man of great ability and able to express himself remarkably clearly, and his tribute to the excellence of their work was ungrudgingly given. It had been a matter, perhaps, of as much difficulty to the men as to the women to adapt themselves to the changed conditions, but a thoroughly good spirit had entered into the whole position; problems as to wages had been satisfactorily adjusted, and the animating wish of all was to provide what was demanded. As to the future after the war—that could be left. We have to win the war, and having done that we shall be able to see some of the old difficulties from a new point of view. That was the encouraging note that was a final impression of a very busy scene.

Daily News & Leader
24-7-16.

UNDER THE CLOCK.

Bouverie-street, July 24.

The Women's War Procession on Saturday was quite an impressive exhibition, and would have been really imposing but for the jarring note most gratuitously introduced by the preposterous "Hughes" banners. I do not know whether Mr. Hughes on the other side of the world was flattered by the invitations to him to "come back." What conceivable connection they had in any case with women's war work I am still wondering. The silly mystery made about the unfolding of these precious banners adds, and I suppose was meant to add, to the darkness in which the real objects of this demonstration were studiously wrapped. I cannot help thinking that Miss Christabel Pankhurst, who is credited, I see, with organising the show "from Paris," made a mistake in this. There is such a thing as too much mystery. You may wonder at the conjuror's first effort when he produces the rabbit from his hat; but if he is unable to do the simplest action without some trick of legerdemain you end by becoming very irritated with him.

I hear privately that the real object of the promoters was to set the W.S.P.U. on its legs again as a going concern, preparatory to a great campaign for women's suffrage after the war is over. I hope personally we shall get women's suffrage without any further raging, tearing propaganda; and, frankly, I think most people would prefer that the W.S.P.U. should remain in its present curious position of suspended animation, if it cannot disappear altogether. But if it must "come back" (as it wants Mr. Hughes to do), I wish, though I dare not hope—that it would do so without these stage mysteries. They are grown intolerably wearisome; and they are not good business politically.

The Daily Telegraph,
24.7.16

WOMEN WAR WORKERS.

PAGEANT IN LONDON.

Favoured by beautiful summer weather, such as has not been surpassed this year, Saturday's procession of women war workers, organised by the Women's Social and Political Union, was a great success from the spectacular point of view.

It was witnessed by many thousands of Londoners, who lined the pavement and occupied every point of vantage on a long route between the Embankment and Hyde Park, and thence back to Trafalgar-square; and its many highly attractive features in the way of floral and symbolical cars of living tableaux drew forth appreciative cheers at every few yards of its progress. To the women and girl munition makers especially, London's multitudes gave a welcome never less than they deserved.

If ever there was an augury of victory, palpable and pleasing to the hearts and eyes of the citizens of the metropolis, it was to be found in these women and girls in blue overalls and blue caps riding on triumphal cars, or marching vigorously along to exhilarating music through teeming, waving crowds in glorious sunshine, and beneath a cloudless blue sky. The very embodiment they were of physical well-being—the outward and visible pledge of the splendid efforts of the women of Britain in the great war.

One incident in particular was indicative of the spirit of the times. As the head of the procession marched up Whitehall and gained the precincts of the War Office, Mr. Lloyd George—still at work, as was remarked, on a Saturday afternoon in his new office as Secretary of State for War—came out on to the balcony. The crowd beneath quickly recognised the late head of the Ministry of Munitions, and gave him a rousing ovation. Mr. Lloyd George was later joined on the balcony by Mr. Winston Churchill, and both cheered the passing groups of women war workers, who in turn raised on high the shining shell-cases they carried. A gratifying and memorable scene!

For the rest—and apart from this notable incident—the public were probably a little perplexed by the large number of banners carried by the processionists which made some reference to the Premier of Australia. Fully forty to fifty banners bore the name of Mr. Hughes, and called for his "return."

"FIGHT UNTIL VICTORY!"

Considerable care had been taken in the "make-up" of the procession, the emblematical cars being particularly striking. First came the bearer of the Union Jack, behind which was a banner bearing the words, "God Save our King and Queen." Following were eight girls dressed in white and carrying laurel wreaths in front of a banner, inscribed with "Forward to Victory!" Among the many cars was one with a tableau in honour of our sailors and soldiers killed in the war. A veiled woman bore an unsheathed sword in one hand, and in the other a banner inscribed, "To Fight until Victory is our Duty to the Heroic Dead."

Another tableau showed Minerva supporting a portrait of the late Earl Kitchener on a stand framed in laurel wreaths and draped with the Union Jack. Around her were representatives of Egypt, the Soudan, South Africa, and India. In front was a sword, and raised above it the warrior's crown. On a scroll were the words, "The Founder of the Great New Army."

Heralds next announced the Allies' Advance. First came a wounded soldier with a tattered flag representing Verdun, and then Russian, French, British, Belgian, Italian, and Serbian soldiers, and British Bluejackets.

Queen Alexandra's message, "May their generosity forge yet another link between the sister nations," was on a large sign supported by girls representing France and Britain.

Miss Olive Terry, representing St. Michael, headed a pageant of Allies, and was followed by Miss Farmer Bringhurst as Joan of Arc, Miss Janette Steer as Britannia, and a striking living portrait of Queen Elizabeth on a palfrey. Representatives of the Allies in national costume made up this section, behind which came that of the Overseas Dominions headed by horsewomen attired as roughriders. The floral sections were the prettiest, the natural flowers making a very attractive show.

Greatest enthusiasm, however, was manifested towards the war tableaux, in which were illustrated the work of women on the land, railways, and 'buses, in offices and in hospitals, as window-cleaners and sweeps, and in many other ways. The nurses were led by a relative of Florence Nightingale. Hundreds of women and girl munition makers took part in this section, and some of them were seen at work drilling shells, making cases, and filling cordite bags.

There was also a section devoted to demands for protection of British prisoners in Germany and for the internment of alien enemies in our midst. Several bands were included in the procession.

On arrival at Trafalgar-square laurel wreaths were placed on the Nelson column, an act vociferously cheered by a huge crowd.

6683
663c/4

Weekly Dispatch, 12.3.16

663c/48 663c

THE NEW WOMAN OF 1916.

March of the Great Shell Army—to Victory.

"Well, they're some women," said a tall, gaunt Canadian as the procession of fourteen thousand women workers passed through London yesterday.

He was perilously poised on the top of a taxicab, and those standing near cheered him and his sentiments. That was the attitude everywhere yesterday afternoon. Everyone was on the best of terms with everyone else, and most of all with the women workers, hundreds of them, marching proudly by with floating banners. It was Women's Day in London, and the greatest enthusiasm came from the men in khaki and those in the familiar faded blue hospital garb.

Women began to gather on the Victoria Embankment soon after two o'clock. They came in groups of five or ten first, taking their places in their appointed sections and prepared for a long wait, as the procession was booked to start at 3.30. There were women in simple white gowns, women in nursing garb, in the overalls of the munitioneers, and the khaki of the Women's Reserve Ambulance. There were sad and worn elderly women with husbands or sons in German prisons.

No section came in for so much notice and chaff—which was returned with interest—as the party of railway engine cleaners rigged up in dark blue dungaree trousers and smock to match. Many of the women had hastened down from their morning shift without having had a moment to spare for a wash and brush up.

One young girl had come along without her working gear. New dungarees were found in the wagon near by, but the lassie found something wrong and could not get into the overall. A gallant Jack-tar came to the rescue, and amid general amusement his help overcame the difficulty.

The trousers indeed aroused much good-natured badinage. The wearers were aged from eighteen to a grey-haired woman or two of fifty. "Hullo, Ma!" said a working man to her, "Got the trousers on? . . . It ain't the first time you've a'worn the breeks, I'll bet. . . . Nah they'll want the vote."

THE SPECTACULAR TOUCH.

Women were taking their grandchildren to see the procession. One little baby girl was much excited in the search for mother. At last grandma espied her. "But why has she got daddy's trousers on?" was the tremulous question.

No W.S.P.U. procession would be complete without the spectacular touch and the political touch, so there were floats and tableaux and flower-decked lorries filled with small, white-clad boys and girls, children of W.S.P.U. members, and there were countless banners extolling Hughes: "We want Hughes," "Everyone Wants Hughes Except Pro-Germans," "Bring Back Hughes," etc. But it was the groups of women workers which roused the enthusiasm of the great crowds lining the streets. St. Michael (Miss Olive Terry) in shining armour, Joan of Arc (Miss Farmar-Bringhurst) mounted on a staid old horse, Queen Elizabeth in all her glory, the sister nations, France and England, grasping each other firmly on a high wagon, Serbian peasants picturesquely garbed, all these were applauded; but it was the women who are doing the real work who were cheered to the echo.

There were over 300 women from munition factories, in grey, khaki colour, blue, or brown overalls and caps. Most of them were on night shifts and had had no sleep, but were in high spirits all the same. "Our manager didn't want us to come," said one of them. "He told us it was a Suffragette procession, but we came all right. It's for Old Glory all the same, we say." Most of the munition women were tall, straight, and young, but here and there one found an old and worn face and stooping figure.

THE "DANGER SECTION."

The crowd shrieked itself hoarse when the shell fillers who work in the "Danger Section" went by, marching like young Amazons, some wearing respirators, others wearing white veils, and all with hands stained a deep yellow, and sometimes with yellow-spotted faces. As this group passed a lorry filled with wounded soldiers the men waved crutches and stumps of arms as a great straining girl held up her yellow hands and shouted, "We're got our scars, too, good for old England!" and a woman here and there in the crowd wiped her eyes even as she smiled. It was English youth showing its grit; it was Britain at her best.

There was none of London's strange reserve in the women's greetings to wounded soldiers in passing conveyances. Never before have Londoners seen so clearly the intense, underlying affection between the firing line and the munitioners at home.

The women in the Women's Reserve Ambulance Corps marched exceedingly well, and wore their khaki as to the manner born. They were like a group of trained soldiers among recruits.

While the procession was lining up a woman brigadier passing in a motor-car called to a sectional commander. "Captain—captain," she cried aloud six times. Then a stern "Lizzie" secured Miss "Captain's" attention. She had, unaccustomed to rank, forgotten the lettering upon her shoulder sash!

Ten women gardeners wore loose blue coats and wide trousers, the women grocers were in neat blue cotton frocks with veils round their heads; they are volunteer workers who send packages of food to Belgian depots in London. The ladies who serve at canteens were in coats and skirts, and the chauffeuses, in tan coats and caps, ran their cars slowly and carefully through the crowds.

"Seems like old times," said a policeman as the last glimpse of purple, white, and green left the Embankment. "Only a bigger crowd than the Suffrage procession brought out, and there goes the mascot of all these shows," and he pointed to Miss Billinghurst, the cripple, in her wheeled chair, who has been in every W.S.P.U. procession for years

At the War Office, where the greatest crowd had gathered, Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Samuel stood on the first-floor balcony above the main entrance. Bareheaded they found the sun too strong and went inside for hats, and immediately afterwards were joined by Mr. Winston Churchill, who stood in the centre with the new War Minister on his left hand.

Mr. Lloyd George was loudly cheered by all the sections as they passed by, and he again and again acknowledged the cheers and beamed upon his new-found helpers who had rallied around his munition banner.

THE "CANARIES."

Among all these brave women were numbers of "munition casualties"—the wounded women Tommies of the workshops. Their hands and faces were yellow as the long-lost sovereign. Marching bravely in the procession, London yesterday had an object lesson from these women—canaries" the munition towns call them—that can never be forgot.

Here was an object lesson of what women are doing in the war—daily risking their health, undermining their constitution, voluntarily suffering unsightly disfigurement. Wages would not buy that heroic, self-sacrificing devotion to the men in the trenches.

These yellowed women were the soul of the procession. None of the hundreds of thousands who saw them could again doubt whether it is the women's war too.

In the absence of Mrs. Pankhurst in America, Miss Annie Kenney told a representative of The Weekly Dispatch of the changed attitude of London towards women.

"No one," she said, "even in the wildest flights of fancy gave women credit for the wonderful changes war could bring out.

"Could any woman, or man, have seen those disfigured women shell-workers without a rising lump in the throat? I have seen hundreds of such women. The girls can only work in those T.N.T. sheds for a short span. But there is never a lack of more to fill their places—though they know they, too, will come out disfigured as their predecessors.

"There is no suffrage question to-day

"And until a full and lasting victory is achieved women will have no political axe to grind."

THE NEW WOMAN OF 1914.

Wargrave Church, which was burned down by militant Suffragists on Whit-Monday 1914, has been rebuilt at a cost of over £13,000, and was consecrated yesterday by the Bishop of Oxford.

Sheffield Daily Telegraph 24.7.16

Women War Workers' Parade.

In Parliament Square yesterday afternoon people stood sixteen deep to see the procession of women war workers, organised by the W.S.P.U.—the military suffrage Society which has for the period of the war returned to grace, and has been allowed to assist the authorities in recruiting women workers for national purposes. The day was as bright and warm as any we have had this year. The crowd was very big, and the procession most interesting. Women marched in the overalls of shell-making, in the trousers of hay-making, and the yellow uniform of the explosives workers complete, even to the respirators, which must have been uncomfortable wear on such a day. The crowd cheered all of them almost as loudly as it did the Red Cross nurses, whereas the emblematical figures—Joan of Arc and the rest—were watched in silence. Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Churchill watched the procession from a Whitehall window. Last year, when he wanted munition workers urgently, Mr. Lloyd George gave the suffragists a subvention towards the cost of a similar parade—a fact which was not revealed till afterwards. This time the Munitions Department was stated to have paid nothing at all towards expenses. To do so would have been unwise, because the organisers of the pageant chose to sprinkle it with banners calling on Mr. Hughes to return from Australia, and suggesting that the war would not be won till he did it. The opinion is not uncommon in London, but it would hardly do to spend Government money in spreading it.

Daily News & Leader 24.7.16.

THE WOMEN'S WAR PROCESSION.

Surprise Banners for Munition Girls.

MOTIVE OF THE W.S.P.U.

One of the motives behind the women's procession which started from the Embankment on Saturday had been carefully concealed. There was no inkling of it until the last moment. No hints were contained in the catalogue of objects in which the organisers, the W.S.P.U., had heralded the aims behind the movement. But the moment the signal for a start was made the surprise was sprung. Scores of unsuspected banners, which had been kept carefully furled, were loosed in the breeze, and displayed in letters of vivid black on a white ground vehement demands for the return of Mr. Hughes, the Australian Premier. "We want Hughes" shouted the banners. "Come back Hughes." "We want Hughes on the War Council."

Apart from this strident note the proceedings were much as had been anticipated. The announced object of the demonstration was to support the further extension of war service for women, measures for the protection of British prisoners of war, internment of enemy aliens, cancellation of naturalisation certificates, and vigorous prosecution of the war, so that all danger of a compromised peace may be averted.

The women's war work section was a prominent one. Following a banner bearing the inscription, "Girls from the fitting shop," were some 200 women dressed in blue overalls and caps, carrying hammers, micrometers, and screwdrivers. All departments of munition making in which girls have taken the place of men were represented, those in the danger building section being distinguished by their white veils and respirators. The T.N.T. girls and those who fill the cordite bags were dressed in yellow overalls and caps. The munition workers were followed by a lorry from which was suspended a banner bearing the inscription "[illegible]

The War Budget:
29/7/16

c 6 3 b 663c/49

Some Impressions and a Moral

By FLORA ANNIE STEEL

Author of "India Through the Ages," "The Gift of the Gods," "King Errant," &c.

I HAD the pleasure and pride of walking in the Womans' Procession last Saturday. The skies were lowering, the wind blustered, and fine rain slanted under the umbrellas of the spectators. It was not a day for pageants and processions; so the two most vivid impressions left upon my mind were, first, the figure of Belgium, shattered, yet defiant, marching along careless of the mud about her bare feet; and next, that same mud as it lay blistered and puck-marked on the greasy pavement.

There is to some minds nothing more depressing to the spirits than these same pavements where every blister, every mark, records a human footstep that has passed, bringing with it its share of dirt, taking away with it a meed of dirt in exchange. It seems to epitomise the sordid, sullen side of life, and makes the soul shiver.

So let us turn to Belgium; there, at best, the horrors are outweighed by the honour, the tragedy is forgotten in exultation. And yet that figure of a woman, noble despite her soiling, undaunted despite her many wrongs was curiously typical of the attitude of every woman in that vast procession. As it was seen first under the Boadicea Statue, the mind instinctively thought of the thousands and thousands of women who had marched to the conflict of life since the British Queen, roused by many wrongs, had led her undisciplined army against her disciplined foe, only to suffer the defeat which, up till now, has dogged the footsteps of the woman's cause. And so the question came once more. Will it be so now?

Testing a finished ammunition box to make sure that the gauge is accurate.

To judge by the faces in the procession one would say "impossible." Of all sorts and sizes, all ages and complexions, the expression upon all was that of confidence, of expectation. Confidence that they had reached the turning point, expectation that the long months of weary waiting, of idle patience, were over. What those long months have been to many women, Christabel Pankhurst has put into one word —agony. It has been an agony of patience. To see things going wrong which you know you and your kind could remedy; to hear opinions prevail against which every atom of the intuition which is woman's by birth cries out overwhelmingly—this is,indeed, an agony! Men, accustomed to judge of all things public, all things political, and to consider their judgment final, can have no idea of the forlornness with which a woman of brain threads the mazes of her life, knowing that, even if she has the clue, it is no use to herself or to others. Now for the last twelve months almost every woman who marched in Saturday's procession has been feeling that forlornness in greater or lesser degree. Many of them, for instance—though the fact is not sufficiently recognised—had long months ago signed on for munition work through the Labour Exchanges, which, did they choose, could tell of whole bands of capable women who offered themselves for whole-time service last March, and have been awaiting employment ever since; employment not forthcoming because the men's unions have been unable to make up their minds about female labour.

So the expression that showed on the face simulating Belgium, an expression of sorrow and determination, was to be seen on many another face in the procession, and the memory of it, seen against a background of London murk, will long remain with those who saw it, and who could understand it.

The pageant of the Allies was pretty enough—a little artificial, yet still good— but one was conscious of a desire to get it past and done with, and come to the real thing—the woman's claim to be allowed to serve her country. The bands tootling away at patriotic tunes were an interruption more or less unpleasant according to the tune they chose, some of the more modern ones doing their best to vulgarise the whole; but both eye and ear travelled past them to the serried lines of pennants, blue, white, red, and to the quaintly uneven sound of unaccustomed marching feet set on one settled way. On and on they came—the uneven beat above the roar of normal crowd.

And behind them, rising grey, amid grey, driving clouds, the towers of Westminster, the pantheon of patriotism, of politics; the sanctuary men have kept for themselves all the long years.

It needs imagination in a man to realise, to enter into the heart of the scene. But no matter what views one holds regarding woman and her work, the seeing eye must see the sharpness of the contrast, must admit the pathos of it all.

Of Mr. Lloyd George's speech to the deputation and demonstration there is not much to say. Naturally it is impossible to utilise the services of fifty or sixty thousand women—mostly untrained—with one sweep of the pen. None expected this, and though some of us cast hungry glances backwards into the long months that have sped, fruitlessly, and wondered if they might not have brought many strokes of many pens, we were all content to hear that somehow and somewhere our idle hands might be employed to help save life. It is a woman's immemorial task, and the crowd, when they cheered the phalanx of nurses who walked in the procession, showed that all unconsciously they recognised the fact.

Smoothing down and chamfering ammunition boxes.

But the part of Mr. Lloyd George's speech which brought most satisfaction was that in which he said deliberately; "The National Register is a complete statutory recognition of the point that it would not be possible effectively to organise the resources of the nation . . . until you mobilise the women of this country as well as the men."

Here, then, is our right indisputable, our Magna Charta for the future. We can afford to wait until there is time to "organise, mobilise, and bring into operation the new industrial army," of which those 40,000 marching women were but faint indication. But beyond this the Minister of Munitions gave hint of something which in its way brought as much satisfaction. He said that pending the actual utilisation of the women's services "an organisation—a really national organisation—might be set up for the purpose of registering the names of women who are prepared to devote the whole of their time to any task for which women are fitted in the turning out of war material." Now this qualification "really national," read beside the previous assertion that women, equally with men, were a national asset, seems to point to the possibility that the failure of the Labour Exchanges to deal with the organisation of women's labour has been definitely recognised, and that suitable women will be asked to undertake the task, not only of registering names, but also of establishing training centres. There must be no more in the future of the scrappy instruction which ceases for women as soon as male students arrive. There must be no more foot-ling mistakes such as asking a woman who entered as mechanic and skilled chauffeur whether she would learn to milk a cow. One could fill pages with such depressing errors; but the hope that women will be allowed to deal with women as men are with men springs eternal and closes the lips.

So with those ominous words of Mr. Lloyd George ringing in our ears: "Here we are just panting twelve months behind to catch a foe who had been preparing for years," the great demonstration ended, his final "but we shall do it" enabling us to give three cheers heartily for the Army and Navy, which have never failed us, and never will so long as Englishwomen bear brave sons and true.

Motor.
1.8.16.

663.C.

663c/50

OTHER PEOPLE'S VIEWS.

Readers' Opinions on Current Motor Topics.

Motorcars in the Women Workers' procession.

Weekly Dispatch 25-1-17

WHO WANTS A NEW WOMEN'S PARTY?

Views of Some Famous Women Workers.

WHO are the women who want a Women's Party? Besides Mrs. and Miss Pankhurst and a few of their faithful adherents it is difficult to find women who can take their minds off the great work of the moment long enough even to discuss the necessity of such an organisation.

The real women workers of Great Britain, the women who are making history, who are constructing, organising, toiling for reforms for women and children now and after the war, are working with men and see no need of any separate political organisation to secure such reforms.

This is the reason why the newly organised Women's Party has not secured among its co-operators the women who are really representing British womanhood at the moment.

A Women's Party to live up to its name must be a party representing a policy approved by the greatest number of women in the country. This would mean a poll of opinions, an effort as great as a general election. This is certainly not what is meant by Mrs. Pankhurst and Miss Christabel Pankhurst, who, declaring there shall be a Women's Party, elected themselves as leaders and are now waiting for thousands of women to rally round their flag.

Here are some of the views of women who represent other women by working among and for them:

LADY FRANCES BALFOUR, one of the staunchest Suffragists.

This body can only speak for those women who agreed with their social and political outlook in the past. It cannot represent the majority of women who, in the new order of political life, feel the first claim on them is to prove themselves patriotic citizens, looking not at purely party interest, but at the good of all estates of men, in which, for the future, women are included.

MISS MARY MacARTHUR, a founder of the largest organisation of working women in the world.

The organisation which I represent would not touch the so-called Women's Party with a 10-foot pole. Partly because they would prefer to choose leaders of their own rather than those who purpose the party, and partly because there has been not even a shred of democracy in the organisation to which the new Women's Party is a sequel.

The National Union of Women Workers, which I represent, recently took a ballot on the subject of entering politics, and we will, hereafter, as a result of this ballot, take up a definite political policy, but not in this sense of isolating the questions pertaining to women, but rather with the idea of working side by side with men's organisations.

Women must in future rally round an ideal or a definite policy put forth by men and women jointly. They must not rally round individuals for merely personal reasons or follow any party system of political dictation.

This Women's Party is an absurd proposition, especially when presented in autocratic fashion.

LADY PROCTER, President of the Y.W.C.A.

I have been too busy to think in detail of the proposition of a Women's Party, but I can say that I think, to a casual observer, the mistake of emphasising sex differences is obvious. There is grave danger in such course at this time. What we are all working for and must work for is closer co-operation between men and women. Our interests and ideals must be the same.

DR. GARRETT ANDERSON, Head of the Endell Street Military Hospital.

It is ridiculous to think of a Woman's Party at all until women are enfranchised. People say we have won the vote. What makes them think so? I am by no means convinced of it myself.

And there can be no Women's Party until the vote is won, and even then there probably will not be a cut and dried Women's Party, but rather different sections of women co-operating with men's parties. An isolated Women's Party would be a confusion of issues.

The Hon. ANNE MacNAUGHTON, Warden of the largest Hostel for Girl Munition Workers.

It is foolish beyond words to try to have a Women's Party. Women should work to unify, not widen, the difference between the sexes in politics as much as in all other matters.

Certain sections of women as well as men will agree to one political policy and form into parties, but not necessarily women's parties. The newly organised so-called Women's Party will only sow further discord between the sexes, I fear.

MRS. JOHN M. ROBERTSON, an ardent worker for Women's Suffrage.

A Women's Party is an anachronism. We do not want or need a Woman's Party to-day, and there is no reason one should be foisted upon us. Men and women are working together in this great struggle. They have learned to understand each other better, and this means a new basis for many things after the war, a union of interests, a wider sympathy with conditions.

And this understanding, achieved as it has been by the present struggle, makes the necessity for a Women's Party non-existent.

MISS PICTON TURBERVILLE, a Social Worker.

I am convinced that this Women's Party is merely an effort to revive a dead organisation.

It will be difficult to build up a new organisation on an old autocratic basis. It will not be so easy to gather women together in a constructive sense as it was in a destructive sense, unless they are given a real policy or ideal and not merely a personal influence to follow. Women have changed in the last three years.

MISS I. A. R. WYLIE, the Novelist.

It has met defeat in the very name it has chosen. A Women's Party cannot be recognised as such when composed of one woman or one group of women only.

MISS MARY RICHARDSON, one of the stalwarts of the W.S.P.U.

The Women's Party does not allow for a difference of opinion among women. It is an absurd proposition on that and other grounds. Women will work politically according to their intelligence and knowledge and experience. They will vote (when they do vote) for the man (or later the woman) who stands for the policy they approve. They will not vote one way any more than the winds blow one way. A Woman's Party on present lines, then, is of no value whatsoever.

Co-operative News 12-1-18

THE WOMEN'S PARTY.

And Compulsory Rationing.

WE give below two very important letters which throw light on the methods adopted by the so-called "Women's Party," which has been established by Mrs. and Miss Pankhurst (late of the Women's Social and Political Union). It will be remembered that this new "party" recently organised a deputation to Lord Rhondda, urging compulsory rationing, and reports appeared in the press mentioning the fact that this deputation represented labour and co-operative interests. A Coventry correspondent now writes to show the methods adopted by the organisation referred to, while Mrs. David Williams (late Mayoress of Swansea, and a member of the Central Committee of the Women's Guild) disclaims any connection with the deputation, though her name appeared in the reports describing the interview with Lord Rhondda. The letters speak for themselves.—ED., "Corner."

DEAR MADAM,—Permit me to call the attention of Guild members, and branch secretaries in particular, to an organisation known to-day as "The Women's Party." And, in doing so, I also want to draw attention to the general strike in the engineering trade which has recently taken place in Coventry, in which the women workers played a very prominent part. Without entering into the rights or wrongs of the strike, it is sufficient for my purpose to say that the leader on behalf of those on strike gave a pledge to the authorities that no outdoor meetings would be held, but on the 6th day of the strike the Women's Party referred to came along and attempted to hold an outdoor meeting, their purpose being to persuade the girls to forsake the men and go back to work. This meeting not being much of a success, the promoters advertised a meeting (also outside) for Sunday noon, but the Federation of Women Workers was on the scene by this time, determined that if the police permitted these people of the Women's Party to hold a meeting they also would hold one. And here I come to what will interest Guild members. On this same Sunday morning a representative of this Women's Party called upon the secretary of the Coventry Guild, and asked for the names of persons who would serve on a deputation to the Food Controller, as she was sure the Government did not know the state of Coventry's food supply. The secretary suggested the president or vice-president, both of whom were on the local Food Committee. No, the lady did not want prominent people, nor did she require persons who could speak, but working women "who had stood in queues." As the secretary was busy preparing dinner, she gave the names of a few Guild members, without thinking (for, to tell the truth, she wanted to be rid of the lady, as the time of her visit was most inopportune). On the Monday, however, the lady in question visited and succeeded in persuading two members to go on this deputation. Fortunately these women were members of the Women's Labour League, and at the League meeting on the following Monday afternoon they mentioned the fact that they were going to the Food Controller, and had to make final arrangements with the lady at 5-30 that evening. They went to that interview with certain questions, one of which was: "Who was financing the deputation, and where did the money come from?" They were told the money had been collected at a "Win the War" meeting held in Scotland! Needless to say, they did not go on that deputation. We saw it stated in the press that Lord Rhondda had received a deputation from the Women's Party, composed of delegates from various towns, and we wondered if those delegates had been appointed by the same methods as those which had obtained at Coventry. This Women's Party came into the town on the Thursday; the deputation was on the following Tuesday. Your readers can form their own opinion as to their right to speak for Coventry, and Guild members will see how necessary it is to be careful that individual members of the Guild shall not speak for, or join in, any deputation unless appointed at the Guild meetings.—Yours, &c.,

A. E. C.

Coventry.

DEAR MADAM,—I have a copy of "Britannia," dated December 7th, sent me, containing a report of the deputation who waited upon Lord Rhondda, and introduced by Mrs. Drummond.

Amongst the speakers mentioned is Mrs. David Williams (of Swansea), an active worker in labour and co-operative circles, and as I am the only Mrs. David Williams actively engaged in the Co-operative Guild and I.L.P. movements in Swansea, I write to disclaim any knowledge of or responsibility for the statements attributed to her.

I have never met Mrs. Drummond or Lord Rhondda, and am not particularly attention of Guild members, and branch secretaries in particular, to an organisation known to-day as "The Women's Party." And, in doing so, I also want to draw attention to the general strike in the engineering trade which has recently taken place in Coventry, in which the women workers played a very prominent part. Without entering into the rights or wrongs of the strike, it is sufficient for my purpose to say that the leader on behalf of those on strike gave a pledge to the authorities that no outdoor meetings would be held, but on the 6th day of the strike the Women's Party referred to came along and attempted to hold an outdoor meeting, their purpose being to persuade the girls to forsake the men and go back to work. This meeting not being much of a success, the promoters advertised a meeting (also outside) for Sunday noon, but the Federation of Women Workers was on the scene by this time, determined that if the police permitted these people of the Women's Party to hold a meeting they also would hold one. And here I come to what will interest Guild members. On this same Sunday morning a representative of this Women's Party called upon the secretary of the Coventry Guild, and asked for the names of persons who would serve on a deputation to the Food Controller, as she was sure the Government did not know the state of Coventry's food supply. The secretary suggested the president or vice-president, both of whom were on the local Food Committee. No, the lady did not want prominent people, nor did she require persons who could speak, but working women "who had stood in queues." As the secretary was busy preparing dinner, she gave the names of a few Guild members, without thinking (for, to tell the truth, she wanted to be rid of the lady, as the time of her visit was most inopportune). On the Monday, however, the lady in question visited and succeeded in persuading two members to go on this deputation. Fortunately these women were members of the Women's Labour League, and at the League meeting on the following Monday afternoon they mentioned the fact that they were going to the Food Controller, and had to make final arrangements with the lady at 5-30 that evening. They went to that interview with certain questions, one of which was: "Who was financing the deputation, and where did the money come from?" They were told the money had been collected at a "Win the War" meeting held in Scotland! Needless to say, they did not go on that deputation. We saw it stated in the press that Lord Rhondda had received a deputation from the Women's Party, composed of delegates from various towns, and we wondered if those delegates had been appointed by the same methods as those which had obtained at Coventry. This Women's Party came into the town on the Thursday; the deputation was on the following Tuesday. Your readers can form their own opinion as to their right to speak for Coventry, and Guild members will see how necessary it is to be careful that individual members of the Guild shall not speak for, or join in, any deputation unless appointed at the Guild meetings.—

Yours, &c., A. E. C.

Coventry.

DEAR MADAM,—I have a copy of "Britannia," dated December 7th, sent me, containing a report of the deputation who waited upon Lord Rhondda, and introduced by Mrs. Drummond.

Amongst the speakers mentioned is Mrs. David Williams (of Swansea), an active worker in labour and co-operative circles, and as I am the only Mrs. David Williams actively engaged in the Co-operative Guild and I.L.P. movements in Swansea, I write to disclaim any knowledge of or responsibility for the statements attributed to be.

I have never met Mrs. Drummond or Lord Rhondda, and am not particularly desirous of meeting either of them.—

Yours truly,

LIZZIE (MRS. DAVID) WILLIAMS.

25, Winmill-terrace, St. Thomas,

Swansea, December 10th, 1917.

24-1-18
Western Press

THE WOMEN'S PARTY.

MRS PANKHURST IN BRISTOL.

Mrs Pankhurst addressed a crowded meeting at the Victoria Rooms, Clifton, last night, under the auspices of the Women's Party, whose motto is "Victory, national security, and progress." The Lord Mayor presided, and the Lady Mayoress was also present.

The Lord Mayor said that in the days after the war women would take a much greater part in public affairs than they did before by reason of the vote that had been conferred upon them, and it was important that they should be helped to understand the great issues that were at stake at the present time. (Hear, hear.) He was hoping they would be able to dispel some of the poison that had been poured into the ears of many people against that which we believed to be right and just. We did not want a peace that would mean the breaking out of another war, but such a peace as would ensure for the people of every country the opportunity of breathing the atmosphere of liberty. (Hear, hear.) Democracy would have to bear a greater responsibility, and all would have to pull together so that the foundations of the new world should be so laid that there would be a far easier time for all sections of the people. (Hear, hear.) Those who were blessed with this world's goods would have to undertake the responsibility of not running their businesses for mere profit; they must feel that a responsibility attached to the wealth that had been created for them, and that the human side of commercialism must be more fully developed. (Hear, hear.) It must be recognised that working men and women wanted to get more into the sunshine than they had been in the past. After referring to the heroism of the Army and Navy, his lordship held them up as an example to those who were grumbling at home. He urged the public to put aside selfish ideas, to avoid the hoarding of food, and to see that everybody got a fair share. If we all gave up luxuries, limited ourselves to actual necessities, and pulled together, he was satisfied that we should achieve a brilliant victory for liberty and civilisation. (Applause.)

Mrs Pankhurst, who was cordially received, explained that votes for women were coming at a critical time, when, in the words of the Prime Minister, we must "go on or go under." (Hear, hear.) No peace by negotiation at present could be anything less than a victory for Germany, because up to now Germany had been winning, and we had only been getting ready. (Hear, hear.) The Women's Party were keen for social reconstruction and social betterment, but they knew that all their ideals depended upon winning the war. She deprecated the efforts that were being made to foster class division and class hatred in this country, and said one object of the Women's Party was to point out a better way. Women wanted to see a fair distribution of the necessaries of life. They were prepared to go hungry to win the war, so long as they were satisfied that others were not having too much. (Applause.) From the early days of the war they had advocated compulsory rationing and public kitchens for all classes, in order to save the great waste of fuel, labour, and food. (Hear, hear.) The Women's Party wanted to improve the homes of the people, and to give working people the advantages of co-operative kitchens and washhouses. They did not want to see public money spent in perpetuating the worn-out and expensive system which women of the leisured class were giving up. On the subject of industrial reform she expressed the belief that production of necessaries of life could be increased even if men and women worked shorter hours, received more money, but worked with increased energy, on a national and co-operative basis. After referring to the disastrous effects of the revolution in Russia, Mrs Pankhurst said that if the women of this country made use of their vote in such a way as to prejudice the freedom, independence, and safety of our land she would regret that she ever helped to get that right. What was needed was a constructive policy, and we should never take away one thing until we had a better thing to put in its place. (Hear, hear.) The Women's Party were going to work for better things—better education and better homes for the masses of the people. We had to choose between levelling up and levelling down. She urged people to stop grumbling about their grievances, and to do their best in the great effort to carry the war to a successful conclusion. (Applause.) Whilst soldiers who had been wounded again and again fought on cheerfully, we actually had in this country young men who threatened a universal strike if they were combed out. How could they do it? ("Shame.") She believed British women would fight and give their lives rather than see our own country go down before the Huns. (Applause.)

Miss Bowerman also addressed the meeting.

18-3-18
Daily Telegraph

A meeting of the Women's Party was held at the Royal Albert Hall on Saturday afternoon to celebrate the suffrage victory, the speakers being Mrs. Pankhurst, Miss Christabel Pankhurst, Mrs. Drummond, and Miss Annie Kenny, all of whom emphasised the vital necessity of promoting the victory of Britain and her Allies. The resolution passed called upon the Government, the captains of industry, and patriotic working men to co-operate in retaining women in the factories and workshops during and after the war, on the basis of the equal right to work and equal pay for equal work. Donations and collections amounting to £8,000 have been received by the party.

1918.

663c/54

663

(The title of the paper not given. This cutting & the next have been transferred from a soiled page.)

7.6.18.

THE WOMEN'S PARTY.

MRS. DRUMMOND AND ENGLISH BOLSHEVIKS.

A BEATING AND A BOYCOTT FOR THE GERMANS.

There was a regrettably small attendance at the meeting of the Women's Party, presided over by Mrs. Eshelby, at the Woolwich Hippodrome, on Sunday afternoon, the combined result of the beautiful weather and a charge for admission.

Mrs. Drummond, in the course of an hour's eloquent exposition of the aims of the party, said: We want to inspire the women of England with a sense of their new responsibilities as the trustees of the men in the trenches and of the future race. We have now won the voice to which we are entitled in the government of the nation—(applause)—and we have only done so at the point when the national ship was on the point of sinking. But having won the vote, we are going to use it. (Applause.) We are naturally delighted, but we are not going to congratulate ourselves and sit down and do nothing. We accept the vote with an overpowering sense of the responsibility it casts upon us—(hear, hear)—and we pray that we may be given strength and wisdom to courageously and worthily discharge the duties it involves. (Applause.) First and above everything else, we have got to win the war, and as a means to that end we are out to sweep away every trace of that shameful spirit of "defeatism" which is being so strongly fostered in certain quarters, and which is nothing but base in the trenches. (Applause.) We women have a paramount duty to discharge in that direction, and we intend to do it. We have always been right in what we have told the nation. The people of England ultimately discovered the danger of Mr. Asquith, but we of the Women's Party have been pegging away at that danger for ten years. Industrially we have a great object in view on behalf of our sex. When the war is over we intend to secure that every woman who desires to remain in industry shall be permitted to do so; and for the A.S.E. and other bodies to go about exacting pledges from foolish and short-sighted politicians as to who shall be turned out of industry when peace comes is a crime against the future of the nation. (Applause.) The favourite weapon of the Trades Unions when in conflict with the masters is the withholding of production. The Trades Union leaders claim to be brainy people, but anything less brainy, anything less patriotic and common-sense, than the withholding of production it is impossible to imagine. Why, it is as clear as noonday that increase of production is the key to success in the future. An attempt to get women in Birmingham to come out on strike has just been frustrated, and it cannot be made too clear that we women will have nothing to do with any movement which will have the effect of

TREACHERY TO THE SOLDIERS

DELAYING PRODUCTION of the material wanted by our fighting men. (Applause.) The sooner such organisations as engineer such movements are defunct the better—(applause)—at all events we are determined that the women shall have no hand or part in them. (Renewed applause.) Such a spirit is criminal in the last degree, and we are out to fight and defeat it. Any other attitude would be a crime against the men who are fighting for us. These movements are set on foot by our English Bolsheviks, but with the lesson of Russia before our eyes we are forewarned and forearmed against them. Ramsay Macdonald and Philip Snowden want us to enter into negotiations with the Kaiser, but we are not going to do it. They never suggested that we should negotiate with Crippen—(laughter)—yet he only committed one murder. (Laughter and applause.) We must beat the Germans, because if and after we had given them back their colonies in exchange for Belgium and North-Eastern France we should have nothing else to barter with. (Hear, hear.) The women of the Ukraine are confronted by German bayonets and the spectacle of the food of their children being sent to feed their enemies; that is the sort of thing which sections of the A.S.E. and the other Bolsheviks here want us to contemplate. Don't talk to us women about

PEACE BY NEGOTIATION

—(applause)—which would mean for us the fate of Russian and Roumania. We are now suffering the penalty of not having sent help to Serbia at a time when we might have prevented Turkey and Bulgaria from entering the war. All the industrial unrest we have to deplore is being engineered by enemy influence so as to defeat our objects, and place us in such a position that we might have to agree to a German peace. The Women's Party will never consent to that. (Applause.) Germany must be beaten to her knees, and that will involve the defeat of our Bolsheviks at home. We cannot make peace now, our race on earth will soon be run, and we [illegible] things women are now a new factor in the life of the nation, and we have got to get rid of the old wrong policies which have worked such evil in the past. We cannot allow 2½ million of skilled labourers to rule many more millions of workers as they have done too long. (Applause.) They scream about the cornering of capital; yet they coolly propose to set up a corner in labour. (Laughter.) They tell us that women can't work in factories and look after the home as well. Why, women have been doing that for long years, and keeping no-good husbands into the bargain. (Laughter and applause.) People who talk like that don't realise that we have got the vote, but they will when the next general election comes round. (Laughter and applause.) And in that connection I want to warn you against the conspiracy that is going on to keep women off the register, a conspiracy in which husbands and other relations are taking a part. That is which we shall know how to stop. The Women's Party are the champions of the rights of every class in the community; we have never recognised class distinction, and we never shall. We are not under the thumb of employer or employee, of Government or anyone else. The A.S.E. believe in direct action against English employers, but they are in favour of arguing the point with our German foes. One result of their work and a man-made legislation is that the soldier who gives his life receives 1s. 2d. a day, while the man who works at home in safety gets good wages—a contrast which is a scandal and a disgrace to the nation. Upon the Clyde the other day I was the centre of a crowd of workers, and a passing soldier, asking what was the matter and being told that the men were discussing a strike, said to of a crowd: "You are trying to break us in the trenches, but by God when we come back we will break you, and don't you forget it!" That soldier had worked in the very same shop as those men, and had been instrumental in forming a trades union there; and that was his verdict upon the attitude of those who were fomenting strikes in war time—a minority of ignorant, hot-headed nincompoops, who were only in trades unionism to get something themselves, no matter how, and to evade their duties and responsibilities. (Applause.) If we don't see to it now, the coming of peace will mean

A LITTLE GAME

THE RETURN OF THE GERMANS

to take the jobs of Englishmen. (Hear, hear.) We know that in the past the trades union leaders preferred to give work which women could do to any old German, so long as he wore trousers. (Laughter and applause.) We women are going to change all that, and we are out to support every candidate who is in favour of beating the Germans now and boycotting them afterwards (Loud applause.) All the distrust of women that has been in the hearts of trades unionists has been planted there by the Germans who worked alongside them in the factory. (Hear, hear.) We have got a candidates' black list in Scotland, and we shall have one for the whole of the country. We shall deal faithfully and effectively with the pacifists and Bolsheviks who want to get into Parliament in order to play the German game. We women have long memories—our husbands often tell us that when we remind them of something they desire to forget—(laughter)—and we are determined to remember things, and to keep these men out of Parliament. Britain for the British is our motto, and we appeal to you women to have nothing to do with the old parties—politics are dead—and to come into the Women's Party, and help us in the work of the reconstruction of the new England that is to be. (Applause.)

C

1918. 663c/55 66

(No title of paper on the sorted page from which this cutting was 12.6.18.

EAST HAM.

"A CALAMITY THREATENED."

MRS. DRUMMOND AND MR. HENDERSON'S POSITION.

"General" (Mrs.) Flora Drummond came to East Ham on Monday evening and addressed a meeting convened by the Women's Party at the Town Hall.

The chair was taken by Mrs. Eshelby, and prior to the speeches several items of music were rendered. Among those in the audience were Sir Peter and Lady Griggs.

Mrs. Eshelby said that now women had the vote they must be organised and be a power for right. When the Women's Party was formed it was decided that the first thing that must figure in their programme was "War till victory." All the great reforms that were needed depended upon this one thing; there could be no social reform and no peace until the German military machine had been smashed. The women were determined that they would never slacken their efforts to beat the Boche. The Women's Party had made up their minds that at the opportune moment the conditions under which masses of the workers had to live should be altered, for they realised that the only way to get the best out of human beings was by making their conditions and their homes better. (Applause.)

Mrs. Drummond, who was well received, said women must on no account sit down and imagine that their work was done now that they had won the vote. Their work—real, serious citizen work—had just begun. They had secured the franchise at a time, they hoped, when it was not too late. They did not want to be pessimistic, and they were not that way inclined. People who managed to fight through the great opposition that they had fought through—the opposition and prejudice of political parties, the fear and cowardice of politicians—were certainly not people who could be called pessimists. They had got to face a serious situation in the state of this country at the present time. They felt that their responsibility was indeed great, and that their mission was to go forth into the country and try and arouse men and women to face the situation as it really appeared, and see what they could do to put a stop to people who all their lives had been used to arguments and not to facing facts. They were out to see that now that the door of industry had been pushed open to women it should be kept open. (Applause)

"This"—(referring to East Ham South)—said Mrs. Drummond, "is an interesting constituency, because you are threatened here with a calamity. You are threatened with a candidate who represents a body of people whom we women have been fighting since the beginning of this year. I am referring to Mr Henderson." The women of this country had never been contaminated with party politics, and that was why they formed the Women's Party, so that they never should. They must learn from the mistakes that the men had made, and take their advice, that party politics were done, and that it was a dirty game. They must stand for principles, and these principles must be high. Since they had had the vote all eyes had been upon them. The men were telling them that they had "discovered" the women—they discovered themselves years ago. (Hear, hear.) Their responsibility was to see that in that constituency they were not going to have men who had not played the game while this country had been at war.

"When Mr. Henderson took his stand in the country," she said, "he was counted with others, from our point of view, as one of the 'wait and see' crowd. He was responsible with the last Government for the lack of shells, for he was one of the members of that Cabinet. He was one of the members of that Cabinet who for months shut the door to women's employment." She would also remind them that he was a member of a party which before the war flatly refused to defeat the Manhood Suffrage Bill when he knew it would torpedo the Women's Bill and defeat the women's opportunity. When they appealed to him to vote against the Manhood Suffrage Bill he refused to do so, and then he, with his colleagues, had the audacity to stand on the platform and appeal to women for their vote "because he helped to get it!" They must

THROW THAT LIE BACK

in the teeth of Mr. Henderson and his friends. It was the women who had secured their vote, and also their national service since the war began. (Applause.) They would never thank any politician for giving them the vote. She wanted the women to realise the position with Mr. Henderson coming into that constituency. There was a rumour that he might be shifting. She would think so, when the Women's Party was on the track, because they were rather apt to "let the cat out of the bag." What did he represent? If they asked him she did not believe he could tell them. She supposed some sort of petty organisation would "run" him; men had not much conscience about that. (Laughter.) Their first mission was to beat the Germans. She believed there would be an opportunity of having a candidate of the Seamen's Union in that constituency. They were a practical body—they were not a political party; they were determined not only to fight the Germans to-day, but to continue the boycott for years after the war. That was what the Women's Party, too, were going to do. They had got to take the stand that if, after the war, employers took on Germans instead of British women, they would see that they had no places in which to employ them. (Applause.) They were out against everyone who loved every country but his own. They were out against Henderson and his party who were talking about a "league of nations." The idea! Mr. Henderson and his people were never anxious to negotiate with Crippen, who, after all, only took one life. The Kaiser was responsible for the deaths of thousands of people, and was infinitely worse than Crippen. After his visit to Russia Henderson was no good to the people. His

HEAD WAS "TURNED,"

and the Bolsheviks thought they did the best bit of work they had ever been able to do. But they did not "turn" Mrs. Pankhurst's head; she came back as level as before she went to Russia. The Women's Party were fighting to do away with Bolshevik ideas, to do away with the pacifists. They would never negotiate with such devils as the Germans, whose word could not be trusted; they preferred to go on fighting to the bitter end. (Applause.) The men who went about shouting "Love every country but your own" would not be content if they were given the Kingdom of Heaven; they would want hell side by side with it. (Laughter.) They wanted to see Henderson packing up his baggage and going off. (Applause.)

August 1918.

Empire News. 25.8.18

664 K
cf. 663 C

663c/66

ROBERT WILLIAMS AND A "SEX WAR."

WARNING TO ALL WOMEN WORKERS.

By CHRISTABEL PANKHURST.

LONG before the War we demanded equal pay for equal work. In fact, it was one of the main reasons why the Women's Party demanded the Parliamentary vote.

Sometimes we have met with the reply that women cannot expect the same pay as men for doing less work, but the Women's party and those of the women's movement in general have never demanded the Women's Party and equal pay for work which is not equal.

Miss C. PANKHURST.

Our one and simple claim is that when the work is equal (and during the war women have shown many examples of work at least equal to that of men fellow-workers) then the pay must be equal.

In other words, payment must be made for the work done, and without regard to the sex of the worker. To refuse this is to penalise women for being women. What is more, it inevitably drags down the level of men's pay; that is to say, it reduces the price of labour.

The Government are in duty bound to adopt, and ensure the adoption by others, of equal pay for equal work. It is through the Parliamentary vote that the Women's Party plans to win this measure of justice for women-workers.

* * * *

The Women's Party is far from enthusiastic at seeing a certain Pacifist and Bolshevik element among the men trade unionists taking up the cause of Equal Pay for Equal Work.

Mr. Robert Williams, of the Transport Workers' Federation, has made a suggestion against which we must protest most strongly. He says:—

> There is a widespread suspicion among many classes of workers up and down the country that skilled men are being recruited with the military forces and their places filled by women in order to provide the means of obtaining underpaid labour and increasing profits for the employing classes.

The suggestion thus conveyed amounts to a stab in the back to the nation while it is waging its life-and-death struggle with Germany. It is an attempt to spread the false and evil impression that the enrolling of men in the army is for some ulterior purpose and not for its real purpose of saving the nation from defeat and enslavement by Germany.

* * * *

These same words of Mr. Williams are also an insult to the intelligence of women workers, who know full well that never have their chances of employment nor their wages been so good as they are to-day. Though equal pay for equal work has still to be won, yet it will be won, because two things have assured this.

The first is the admission of women to new forms of employment since the outbreak of war, this being largely due to the action of the Women's Party in demanding full opportunities of war service for women.

The second is the gain of the Parliamentary vote (mainly owing to the Women's Party), which has given women a new status and a new power to influence the action of the Government.

Let women workers also beware lest these Pacifists and Bolsheviks who have talked so loudly about equal pay for equal work are really aiming to turn the women completely out of work and leave them with neither work nor pay!

Mr. Robert Williams speaks of what he calls a "sex-war." If there is a sex-war, it is not the women who are responsible for it, nor is any sex-war necessary unless Mr. Williams and other like-minded members of his sex are determined to have one.

All the women ask is equal pay for equal work and the equal right to work. But let it be clearly understood that they do not require the help of Bolsheviks and Pacifists who want industrial war at all costs in Britain and peace at any price with Germany.

Such men are the friends of Germany, but they are not the friends of British working women.

CHRISTABEL PANKHURST.

MERCHANT SEAMEN'S LEAGUE.

BOYCOTT AND TRADES UNION LABOUR PARTY.

I, the undersigned.....declare in favour of the Seamen's Boycott of Germany, and being a Member of the ..... Trade Union .....am in favour of the formation of a Trades Union Political Party, under the Constitutional Rules of the Trades Union Congress.

NAME .....

ADDRESS .....

P.S.—If you are not a Member of a Trades Union, your signature will Signify that you support the Boycott only.

Fill up this Coupon and post it to-day, or write to:—

J. HAVELOCK WILSON, C.B.E.,
Merchant Seamen's League (Desk B),
48, St. James's-street, Piccadilly,
London, S.W.1.

Kentish Independent.
7. 9. 18.

663c

663c/67

PACIFISM IN THE ARSENAL.

MRS. DRUMMOND'S CAMPAIGN.

With the object of exposing and combatting Bolshevism and Defeatism in the Royal Arsenal, Mrs. Drummond is about to enter upon a campaign, from which good results are expected.

Interviewed by a Press representative, Mrs. Drummond, whose headquarters during the next few weeks will be the offices of the Women's Party at 9, Welington Street, protested that in the Arsenal women were not given the same help as men. "But still they stick it," she added. "They stick it because they want to win the war, and these loyal women workers are a real national asset. It is a great scandal that the Woolwich Bolsheviks should be allowed to take up the attitude they have—the victimisation of the loyal workers, both men and women. Our people are 'inside,' and we are constantly getting appeals from the loyal workers in the Arsenal for protection from Bolshevik victimisation. They are attacked because they will not strike to back up the Bolsheviks in Woolwich. There are a splendid lot of patriotic workers in the Arsenal, and the workers on the Clydo, where I have been for a long time, have been greatly encouraged by the loyal resolutions sent to them by Woolwich and by their demands for a fight to a finish.

"The Bolsheviks here are only a small, but noisy minority, and we mean to stop this minority rule. It is a very serious state of affairs that in a place like Woolwich Arsenal there should be people who victimise loyalists, and that they should be allowed to go on doing so. The loyal workers do not have proper protection in the Arsenal, and the Women's Party are making a definite investigation into this and mean to get proper protection for them, for they feel that if this matter is once settled in Woolwich it will be settled all over the country. We are going to the Labour Conference at Derby, and we hope the loyal workers will stand up against the Bolsheviks and show the determination of the majority of Labour that we must win the war.

"I shall be in Woolwich for some weeks, and I mean to see that the loyal workers who want to beat the Germans shall be allowed to get on with their work. Our objects are to win the war by supplying Tommy with all he needs, and it is our duty to protect the workers who want to do this; it was Mrs. and Miss Pankhurst who first opened the door for women to do this work, and it is the duty of the Women's Party to protect them.

"There is one thing the public ought to know. Everyone knows there is a Trade Union Advisory Committee at the Ministry of Munitions—but very few people know that the head of that Advisory Committee is May MacArthur, the pacifist, the wife of W. C. Anderson, and the leader of the Women's Federation! How can loyal workers expect to be protected when the leader of the Trade Union Advisory Committee of the Ministry of Munitions is a notorious pacifist?

"My message to the loyal workers of Woolwich is 'Hang on! Fight to a finish! We will look after you. Many patriotic workers have been driven out of the factories by the Bolsheviks, but we don't mean you to go as well.'"

Daily Mail. 2.10.18.

October 1918.

663 c II
c/ 654

Evening News. 16.10.18.

663c/68

JOIN THE WOMEN'S PARTY.

WRITE TO-DAY.

In Friday's Daily Mail Miss Peggie Crabb, in a fine appeal to women, asked for leadership of the six millions of female voters. She asked in what political army are they going to enrol themselves and under what leadership are they going to march into the promised land of national victory and national safety and prosperity after the war. The Women's Party have the answer to this question ready. They appeal to the women electors to join their ranks under the leadership of Mrs. Pankhurst and her daughter Christabel. "Why a Women's Party?" some have asked, professing to think such a party may mean sex-antagonism. But there is no question of sex-antagonism, for the Women's Party co-operates harmoniously with the men's political sections having in view the same patriotic objects for the war and after. But the Women's Party believe that the women voters can best serve their country by acting in unison and so bringing their own special point of view to bear on national affairs.

MISS CHRISTABEL PANKHURST.

The national war leader, loyally and enthusiastically supported by the Women's Party, is Mr. Lloyd George. The supreme duty of the women voters will be to vote for those parliamentary candidates who are loyal followers of Mr. Lloyd George, so that he may have in the new House of Commons a solid and overwhelming majority for his win-the-war policy.

In the munition crisis, when the admission of women into the munition factories was needed to save the situation, Mr. Lloyd George turned to the Women's Party to help him in breaking down the obstacles which stood in the way of their employment as munition workers. A great procession was organised by the Women's Party, and this led to the employment of hundreds of thousands of women who are to-day helping to win the war by supplying the necessary munitions.

The prevention of industrial unrest is a chief concern of the Women's Party, and from the first they have seen that the war, though won on the battlefield and on the seas, might be lost on the industrial front, where the enemy and his friends and dupes are constantly working in the hope of holding up war supplies and thus compelling a Compromise Peace.

The speakers and other workers of the Women's Party are constantly rousing and urging the workers in the various industrial centres to refuse to down tools in war time and to turn a deaf ear to the incitements of the small but dangerous gang of disloyalists who would, unless thwarted, bring this country to the ruin and humiliation that have already befallen Russia.

All women's questions, including their well-being as wives, mothers, workers, obviously come within the province of the Women's Party, who, however, are confident that British women electors will realise that their responsibility as citizens does not only apply to the protection of their own interests but also covers the whole field of national safety and progress and of Imperial unity and development.

The approach of a general election has prompted the Women's Party to take the large Queen's Hall, London, for victory meetings to be held every Tuesday afternoon at three o'clock and to be addressed by Miss Christabel Pankhurst.

The London headquarters of the Women's Party are at 4, William-street, Knightsbridge, S.W. 1 (telephone, Victoria 4270).

The Women's Party invite every patriotic woman to join their ranks and thus play an effective part on the home political front, where it may truly be said the decisive battle of the war will be fought.

WOMEN'S PARTY DEMANDS.

Miss Christabel Pankhurst Says "Leave It to Foch."

Miss Christabel Pankhurst addressed the second of a series of meetings under the auspices of the Women's Party at Queen's Hall yesterday. A mere military victory, she said, would be of no use unless it were used in the knowledge that the German people as a whole are the enemy.

There was talk of an armistice, but who would benefit by an armistice? Would the Germans have granted the Allies an armistice after the battle of Mons? There was only one person whose opinion was worth listening to at this crisis, and that was Marshal Foch. (Loud cheers.)

The British people, added Miss Pankhurst amid cheers, were happy in their great Prime Minister, Mr. Lloyd George. In every great emergency he had shown himself great. The women voters would see that he was not stabbed in the back by enemies or jealous rivals and that his efforts on behalf of the country and of humanity were not frustrated.

The London headquarters of the Women's Party are at 4, William-street, Knightsbridge, S.W. 1 (telephone, Victoria 4270).

October 1918

"Women's Party"

663c

663c/69

c: 357 & 604

Daily Mail.
7.10.18

Daily Mail. 8.10.18

WOMEN AND THE ELECTION.

The victory meetings which are to be held by the Women's Party in the large Queen's Hall, Langham-place, every Tuesday will begin to-morrow, at three o'clock. Miss Christabel Pankhurst will speak and Miss Annie Kenney will take the chair. Admission is free.

A lead will be given to British women how they shall use their newly-won citizen rights at the general election.

Particulars of the Women's Party and a copy of the programme can be had from the Women's Party Headquarters, 4, William-street, Knightsbridge, S.W. 1. Telephone, Victoria 4270.

DO THE WOMEN REALISE?

There is an election coming which will affect the lives of every man, woman, and child in the country. At this election six million women will be called upon to exercise the franchise for the first time in the nation's history. How will they vote? It is a problem that is troubling the minds of many who have the future prosperity of the Empire at heart.

The untold sacrifices that have been made on the battlefields of this great world-struggle will have been made in vain if the Government of the country is to be weakened by dissension.

The voice of the people must thunder a tremendous call for victory—complete, definite, and lasting. Any constituency that returns a weak-kneed pacifist or a spineless peace-by-negotiation crank to the new Parliament should be slurred with shame. Nothing short of absolute victory by force of arms will satisfy our fighting men. Are the women of these modern Crusaders going to allow the efforts of our men to be whittled away by those who would grasp the hands of a blood-besmirched, unrepentant Germany? It is unthinkable.

When Mr. Lloyd George appeals to the country there must be a nation standing solidly for him. The old paltry pettinesses must be forgotten. There must be a closing of the ranks. Do not let us have noisy minorities thrusting their stupid demands forward at a time when the hands of the Government should be free to fashion a peace after the nation's own heart.

* * * * *

The Women's Party appeal to all women voters to support Mr. Lloyd George and the candidates who pledge themselves to his leadership. Workers are needed to appeal to women who have not the time to read newspapers or attend meetings, and who do not come into contact with constructive thinkers.

Beginning to-day, every Tuesday at 3 o'clock a meeting will be held at Queen's Hall, London, to which all women are invited, and at which Miss Christabel Pankhurst will speak. Will those women who are willing to help write to the London headquarters of the Women's Party, at 4, William-street, Knightsbridge, London, S.W. 1?

The necessity for making certain the security of the Empire is accepted by every right-thinking woman, but there will be many who do not realise the importance of each individual vote. The foundations of the future will have to be built up on the home lives of the people. We must show the women of England how their efforts can best be used to bring prosperity which will benefit each one of them individually, in their own homes.

Do the women realise that they are now responsible citizens and that their efforts will influence the destiny of the greatest Empire that the world has ever known?

Star. 7.10.18.

It is interesting to see that the Women's Party, which is the old W.S.P.U., camouflaged, is now being editorially "boosted" by the Northcliffe newspapers. The Women's Party is controlled by those mischievous ladies Mrs. Pankhurst and her daughter Christabel, whose despotic sway over the W.S.P.U. almost ruined the cause of woman suffrage.

Seizing upon the war as an instrument to resuscitate their declining prestige, they have associated themselves with all the ignoble "stunts" of the past four years. They joined in the "hidden hand" foolishness; the "Old Gang" campaign; the anti-alien fiasco; the ridiculous adoration of Mr. Hughes, of "rifle-strapped-to-plough-handle" fame; and the intemperate campaigns of Mr. Havelock Wilson and Captain Tupper.

The Pankhursts' star has ascended as our political moral has declined. "Mr. Lloyd George is our hope of victory. . . We would give our lives to protect his!" cried Mrs. Pankhurst soon after he and Lord Northcliffe had deposed Mr. Asquith; since when she has enjoyed the Premier's grateful patronage. Women voters, now urged by the Northcliffe papers to support the Women's Party, should note the significant fact that the women trade union leaders like Mary McArthur and Margaret Bondfield, whom women workers know and trust, place a very different valuation upon Mrs. Pankhurst.

October 1918.
(Caxton Hall Conference of Labour Party)

Daily News. 17.10.18.

Star. 17.10.18.

663c/7

'WOMEN'S PARTY' DISOWNED.

"The Hypocrisy of its Claims.

CONFERENCE DECISION.

From Our Special Representative.

The keynote of yesterday's conference of women at the Caxton Hall, Westminster, was one of realisation of the power of citizenship; with it went determination that no opportunity of improving women's position, or of advocating the principles for which she stands, shall be lost through slackness.

The resolution with which the morning's proceedings opened dealt with the need for the political organisation of women, calling upon them to throw in their lot with men rather than to work in separate societies. On the subject of the Women's Party, Miss Susan Lawrence, the chairman, had much to say. Those who advocated a women's party were either very innocent politicians or politicians whose innocence was the least distinguished feature about them. Its leaders had taken the magic name of the suffrage and harnessed it to a particular party. The Women's Party was not a non-party body, but one out to capture the women's vote for a certain body. The hypocrisy of its claims makes membership impossible for all honest-minded women. She appealed to women to adopt an organisation which stood for principles, and not one based on the accident of sex.

THE LABOUR PARTY.

Dr. Marion Phillips carried the attack further in moving the resolution. "The Women's Party supports a particular set of men," she said. "You cannot get very much lower in the scale of political organisation than that." She pointed out that the women's vote would be useless to themselves and to the State if they did not ally themselves to the principles of a definite party. The Labour Party was the one, she said, which had opened its ranks to women on equal terms with men, and which was prepared with a program advocating the reforms for which women stood.

Other Labour women followed her, one of them pleading for the organisation of the younger women, who would be the voters of the morrow. On an amendment brought forward by the Women's Freedom League and the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, several feminist leaders advocated separate women's organisations until they had acquired more experience of politics.

REGULATION 40D.

Miss Sylvia Pankhurst, rising to point the need for women's societies to support special principles, could not refrain from adding her voice to the censure of the Women's Party. "Do not go out of your way to advertise this organisation," she said. "Make our own party a living force. You do not like the name woman to be associated with it, and I resent a name that is also mine should be associated with it."

When the question was put to the vote the resolution was carried.

The next resolution before the conference was one demanding the immediate withdrawal of Regulation 40D, and protesting against the provisions of the Sexual Offences Bill and the Criminal Law Amendment Bill shortly to be introduced into the House of Lords. The resolution was passed.

The "Women's Party."

We are glad to see the strong protests made by Miss Susan Lawrence, L.C.C., and other speakers at the Labour Party Conference against the organisation of the Women's Party on the lines of sex division. It is important that men and women should work together in progressive organisations, and separatist methods of this sort will hinder rather than help in the social reforms in which women and men are alike interested. Take housing, for instance—men are as much interested as women, and there is no reason for a separate women's party to obtain it. Miss Sylvia Pankhurst—who ought to know—said that the Women's Party was obviously a Tory-tariff-Imperial-jingo organisation. It apparently has plenty of funds; and, remembering the source of the funds with which Mrs. Pankhurst organised the great munitions demonstration, it is not difficult to understand where this pactolean stream has its rise.

663c/71

Times 28.10.18.

WOMEN AND LABOUR UNITY.

An effort is being made by pacifist agents in certain districts to influence those engaged in ship construction and munition work in favour of a peace by negotiation. The Women's Party is doing everything possible to counteract this danger. At a meeting at Queen's Hall to-morrow afternoon at 3 o'clock Miss Christabel Pankhurst and Mrs. Drummond will speak on the valuable work which is being done by women workers in all the great industrial centres with the object of restoring that confidence which is so necessary to maintain output.

Every patriotic woman's help is needed, and canvassers, speakers, and organizers are urgently wanted. Those who are unable to attend the meeting are invited to call at or write to the headquarters of the Women's Party, 4, William-street, Knightsbridge, London, S.W.1.

Empire News (Manchester.)

POISON SPREAD BY ENEMY.

Women's Challenge to Aircraft Strikers.

BLOCKING WAY TO BRITISH PROSPERITY.

By MRS. FLORA DRUMMOND.

The aircraft factory strike in Liverpool is a strike for a principle. The woodworkers protest against the "bonus on results" system which aims at increased production.

The strikers contend that such a system will weed out the slow and older workers, who, when normal times come again, will be placed on the unemployment shelf.

I have made it my business on behalf of the Women's Party to open a campaign in Liverpool against fighting for such a principle as this.

It is deplorable that there should be any cessation in work where the production of aeroplanes is concerned, having regard to the vital link they constitute in the fighting strength of our armies.

The Enemy's Game.

An organised labour which seeks to check rather than to aid increased production is riding for a fall.

The Germans know that they have lost this war, and they are now putting all their energies in the direction of the new war they will wage, and which they believe will bring this country to eventual ruin.

The economic war is coming, and it will be won by that nation which places increased productivity in the forefront of its policy.

The trade unions in this country are solidly opposed to such a principle and adopt the pernicious and suicidal policy of "ca' canny."

It is not difficult to see where such a policy will lead the nation. And that is why the Germans are urging their friends in this country to encourage the workers to stand up for this principle, which will be the undoing of the British industrial classes and the nation.

Bolshevik Creed.

The dangerous creed of the Bolsheviks stands for the so-called "democratic control of industry," and encourages shop steward control. That is the straight road not to democratisation, but to demoralisation.

The only true democratisation of industry can be attained by increasing its productivity. So long as the nation ignores that fact so long will the nation be left limping behind in the struggle for world trade supremacy.

And yet at a critical stage of the war a section of our industrial classes are to be seen standing in the way of increased production.

They reck not of the handicap they are placing upon our soldiers, and are blind to the injustice they impose upon the women workers who are as a consequence of the fight for this "principle" thrown into idleness.

I have openly challenged the strikers in Liverpool, and told them that these women hold them responsible for the wages of which they have been deprived.

Many ills will be in a fair way to being remedied when we have secured increased production.

Increased production is the greatest insurance against unemployment so long as there is also increased consumption. If we lose the world markets through poor production there will be less work for all British workers—and less pay.

With increased production the workers will establish industries on a firmer foundation, they will benefit themselves materially, and they will take the biggest step that an organised force can take towards levelling up the working classes to a higher and better standard of life, with increased comfort and content.

FLORA DRUMMOND.

November 1918. 663c.

Empire News: Manchester.
10.11.18.

663c/72

PLOTTERS IN OUR FACTORIES.

WOMEN'S WARNING OF PLANS TO SMASH BRITAIN'S TRADE.

By CHRISTABEL PANKHURST.

THE Women's Party policy for the coming general election is to rally the 6,000,000 newly-enfranchised women electors (and the men electors, too, for the matter of that) to use their votes in support of Mr. Lloyd George, who is leading the nation to victory.

Miss C. PANKHURST.

But the Women's Party do not give their attention solely to the political situation. They devote themselves also to promoting peace and harmony in the industrial world.

This war is being fought almost as much in the factories and workshops as in the trenches and on the seas. Therefore the Women's Party speakers are active wherever labour trouble breaks out, with the object of bringing such trouble to an end.

The Women's Party is not only helping to win the present war, but is also preparing for Germany's next war.

Germany's next war will begin on the day after the present war ends, and it will take the form of attempting to start an Industrial Revolution in our midst.

* * * *

Already the Germans are fomenting industrial unrest or Bolshevism, as we may call it, in this country. Their dupes, friends and agents are doing everything possible to incite the workers of Britain to down tools in wartime and thus hold up the production of munitions of war and prevent the military defeat of Germany.

The patriotism of the mass of the workers and their loyalty to our soldiers at the front go far to frustrate the German-Bolshevik intrigues so long as the war continues, but when the war is over the Germans hope for greater success.

The Germans calculate that though defeated in battle they will still be able to delude the workers of Britain into industrial revolution.

The consequence of this, they further calculate, is that British industry will more or less collapse and German industry will take its place.

This would mean that the German workmen would become dominant over the British workmen, and would monopolise all the skilled and highly-paid work of Britain, reducing the British workers to economic servitude.

* * * *

Already the Germans have extracted from Russia a bargain whereby German skilled workmen in unlimited numbers may be sent into Russia for a period of five years after the war ends, and no skilled workmen from this and other countries may be sent there. That is but the first fruits of the German industrial policy.

The destruction of British industry by means of a German-inspired Bolshevik revolution would also mean the future military defeat and permanent subjection of this country to Germany.

Because, as this war has shown, the very existence of our country depends upon a vigorous national industry, which is in fact the best possible guarantee of peace.

Prevention is better than cure, and the Women's Party is at work to make a German-made revolution impossible.

Increased wealth production is one of its watchwords. The abolition of poverty is another, for as the Women's Party is urging, by pen and speech, the prime cause of poverty is under-production of wealth, with the result that there is not enough to go round, not enough to provide for all our people the conditions of life to which they are entitled.

* * * *

The Bolshevik does not argue thus. In fact the whole tendency of his agitation is to decrease wealth production and so increase poverty. Shop Stewardism and all the Bolsheviks' quack prescriptions spell disaster to the workers of Britain as well as to the British industry and the nation.

As a final word, one must say that the Women's Party are opposed to any form of compromise peace with Germany or her Allies, believing that justice to the nations associated with us in this war, as well as justice to Britain defeated enemies of the world's peace, of uncompromising conditions making it impossible for them to repeat the present war.

CHRISTABEL PANKHURST.

Times. 13.11.18.

WOMEN'S PARTY AND LABOUR.

Miss ANNIE KENNEY, presiding over a meeting of the Women's Party in the Queen's Hall yesterday, announced that Miss Christabel Pankhurst was unable to speak owing to a chill. Mrs. Drummond said that we must never forget the atrocities and cruelties of the Germans. Some people thought that the German people and their Kaiser were different, but there was really no difference between them, and never would she knowingly shake hands with a German man or woman. The Women's Party, she declared, were not going to return a Labour Government at the election, and no woman should use her vote to support a Labour candidate until the Labour Party had first purged itself of Bolshevism and Pacifism.

Star. 22. 1. 19. 663c/73 663. c

THE WOMEN'S PARTY.

By KATHARINE TYNAN.

I HOPE readers of "The Star" may have noticed the prophetic heading of a recent article of mine on women in Parliament. It was "Madame M.P." The General Election is over and the Women's Party in Parliament consists of Madame, M.P., who will not sit.

The débâcle of the Women was part of the débâcle of Labour, for the women candidates stood for Labour, as was fitting, since, in the sphere of Labour, women have most wrongs to be righted. Some of the women who stood and were defeated were of so high a character—a man has just written to me that the name of Mary Macarthur carries a holiness for him—that one can only conclude that the election was en bloc against Labour; the dread of the great English middle-class of Bolshevism, perhaps.

But the women beaten this time will come back again and be elected. What an amount of work they will have to perform! The helpless will be their charge. Many a woman whom the crowd has told to go home and mind the baby, will be found mothering the helpless and the oppressed of the world.

★ ★ ★

There will be a deal for them to do. Women are less well organised than men and their very numbers have been against them. It has always been so easy to fill a woman's place if the labour is unskilled.

Take the case of the shopgirl.

It is one of the shames of our civilisation that the girl must stand to attend on customers. Very, very rarely in my life have I seen a shopgirl sit; never, I think, a shopgirl behind a counter. A good many years ago there was some legislation, after a deal of outcry, making it necessary for the owner of a shop to provide seats for the shop assistant. I was told at the time that the Act was nugatory. The seats indeed were provided, but there was a mark against the assistant who sat down. Whether this was true or not, it is certain that the thing has lapsed, since the shops are full of standing shopgirls.

In the specialised charity of the war such suffering as this is apt to be overlooked. There is a deal of talk just now about the mothers of the race. It is those standing shopgirls who fill the women's hospitals with patients, as it is the working women who work up to childbirth and immediately after it.

★ ★ ★

Beyond legislation it is necessary that the consciences of women should be awakened.

How many of the bustling crowds that throng the drapers' shops ask themselves how it is possible for these girls to stand hour after hour? It would seem almost impossible that they should not drop at their posts. If the customers insisted on it every girl would be able to sit, and untold suffering would be saved. Who is to organise the customers?

★ ★ ★

England is a densely populated country. That fact adds to the difficulties of protecting the little and humble who make no outcry. There are philanthropists working through all the ages, but the finest philanthropist in the end is the one who can move the law. One shudders remembering the child chimney-sweepers and the children in mine and factory. It is horrible to remember how recently comparatively our savage penal system was reformed.

But there are still child-slaves. I have written in "The Star" about the "adoptions" of children and the nefarious trade of the baby-farmer. Now and again, despite the efforts of the philanthropic societies, the murder or torture of a child-slave comes to light, and we are reminded that the thing exists. The street-trading children require watching over. So, too, do the little girls who go out to service in a humble way, or used to go out to service, the small "marchionesses" who very often were housed under unspeakable conditions and carried on in their immature persons the labour of Sisyphus.

During my English life servants who began at the age of eleven have occasionally given me of their experiences. They sufficed to explain the distrust with which many English servants received the first easy friendliness which exists or existed between the Irish employer and employed, and why if you happened to walk behind a couple of young servants at evening in a quiet road she was always the protagonist in the tale.

By which it would seem that one of the first duties of the woman will be to educate the woman-employer.

THE FIGURE WOMAN.

Her Growing Weight in the World of Business.

(By a Woman Accountant.)

It was chiefly through being my father's daughter that I became an accountant. My father is an accountant, and from my earliest days I had an aptitude for figures which he encouraged me to develop: when my schooldays were over, he called on me sometimes to help him with his work, and taught me the practicalities of the profession, so that I became a qualified auditor — accountant almost without considering the matter!

Anyway I am not sorry that it was so, for accountancy is undoubtedly one of the professions of the present and the future for women—especially since after twenty-nine years' effort, women are now to be admitted to membership of the Society of Incorporated Accountants and Auditors on the same terms as men.

A good general education, aptitude for figures, and methodical accuracy are necessary: and a woman must have a well-governed mind which will enable her to pass stiff examinations in accountancy and commercial law, besides having concentration and clear reasoning to help her apply her knowledge to the common matters of everyday business. Indeed, it is not without cause that accountancy has been defined as "applied mathematics combined with applied economics"

From Typist to Chief Clerk.

The best way of training is to become an articled pupil to a practising accountant for five years, and such training is essential to anyone who wants to apply for membership of the Society of Incorporated Accountants and Auditors. It is only by membership of this, or one of the kindred recognised societies of accountants, that one can be called a certified auditor and accountant. Such training, of course, means capital. One should attend special lectures also, such as those of the London School of Economics, on the theory of accountancy and the various branches of commercial law

"Star" recipes are tried by the writers; "Star" dresses are designed by skilled dress designers.

It is far best for a woman to qualify fully as a certified accountant, if she can possibly afford to do it, since so doing gives her an opportunity of capturing some of the plums of the profession. Before the war there was little demand for women at this work: now the demand is large and on the increase. Large firms and institutions are perfectly ready to employ women who are qualified, while it is becoming more and more the custom for secretaries of limited companies to be certified accountants—and such positions are daily becoming more accessible to women.

At the same time, it is possible for a woman to do quite a lot of such work without being technically qualified. One such woman of my acquaintance, whom circumstances would not permit to become "certified," has studied accountancy to a very high degree, and has worked up from being a very junior typist to being chief clerk and accountant with an important City firm.

Daily Sketch. 14.2.19.

663

663c/74

BOLSHEVISM'S MENACE TO WOMEN.

Will Labour Leaders Repudiate Infamous Russian Doctrines?—Blunders In Industrial Policy.

By CHRISTABEL PANKHURST, The Leader Of The Women's Party.

A DANGER almost as menacing as the war itself is the present industrial situation — so says Mr. Adamson, chairman of the Labour M.P.s, and so say all of us.

High wages and short working hours are advantages which we of the Women's Party are at least as anxious to win for the workers, both men and women, as Mr. Adamson and his colleagues can possibly be.

MISS CHRISTABEL PANKHURST.

But whereas the Women's Party are publicly advocating a constructive plan of industrial reform, the Labour men are more inclined to criticise existing conditions than to show what constructive action can be taken to give to the manual workers their fair share of leisure and prosperity.

In the bad old days of party political strife those who, as Mr. Adamson says, "intend to fill the rôle of official opposition to his Majesty's Government" might have been allowed by public opinion to plead that as the "opposition" their sole duty was to oppose, to obstruct, the Government's attempts to solve the industrial problem.

A Challenge To Labour.

But in these serious times a Labour "opposition" cannot make that plea, and it is their imperative duty to give constructive help to the Government where the industrial problem is concerned.

Will the Labour members publicly declare that increased production is the way to win short hours and prosperity for the workers?

And, having declared that, will they actively bestir themselves outside and inside Parliament to secure increased production?

At present, what do we find? Let us take a salient example.

The miners of South Wale are stated to have produced 25 per cent. per miner more in 1918 than in 1887, at an increased cost in wages of 280 per cent.! Comparing 1914 and 1918, it is stated that the outputs per person were 243 tons in 1914, and only 224 tons in 1918; whereas the wage cost of producing these amounts of coal rose from £99 to £197.

This reduced output of coal means (even apart from the increased wage secured by the miners) that the other workers of the country have to pay more for the coal they use in their homes. It also means unemployment for workers in other trades, because a coal scarcity inevitably causes industrial stagnation and consequent unemployment.

What It Means To Our Homes.

What has Mr. Adamson, as a miners' leader as well as Labour's chairman to say to that, and what will he do to help?

And will Mr. Adamson assure the British people that the present demands of the miners, if carried into effect, would mean an increased supply of cheap coal for the homes of the other workers, and for the factories wherein those workers seek employment?

In putting these questions we of the Women's Party have the interests of the workers of all degrees most sincerely at heart. Our object is the abolition of poverty, and every Labour question we view in the light of whether or not it will increase wealth production and so enable the democratisation of prosperity.

We maintain that the miners, engineers and other highly organised and powerful workers are responsible for those less fortunate than themselves.

We urge these highly organised workers who form the aristocracy of Labour to take as their own the aristocrat's motto of noblesse oblige and to devote themselves not simply to grasping a big share for themselves, but to guaranteeing prosperity to their less powerful fellow workers.

This necessitates increased production, which is the essential secret of industrial justice to all.

The Labour chairman has referred to the Bolsheviks as a small band of revolutionaries in the ranks of the working classes which is out to upset the existing order of society and a small band of men in the trade union ranks who are out to upset the officials of the movement, if not to destroy the movement itself, and he declared that he will "give no encouragement to revolution nor to unofficial action."

Now we know, if only from the testimony of another prominent Labour official, who are the counterparts and allies of the Russian Bolsheviks who are making mischief in the British Labour world. They are the shop stewards.

Yet the Women's Party was as a voice crying in the wilderness in protesting that the recognition and encouragement of the shop stewards meant a blow at constitutional trade unionism and at the safety of British industry.

Where do Mr. Adamson and those who think with him stand to-day on the question of shop stewardism and committee control of industry?—which, as Russian experience shows, mean the destruction of industry and the triumph of Bolshevism; after which the British Bolsheviks, as Lenin has already done, will, as Lenin himself expresses it, "require the unquestioning submission of the masses under the single will of the director of the industrial process."

Outrage On Women.

Another point! How are the British public to reconcile the Labour chairman's defiance of the British Bolsheviks with the fact that in the recent election the same official Labour Party ticket as Labour candidate was given to Mr. Adamson and to Mr. John Maclean, the Russian Bolshevik consul for Glasgow?

MR. ADAMSON.

This is a question of vital import, from the women's point of view, for British women know from the Bolshevik proclamation just published in our Press that the principles of Bolshevism as applied in Russia include the "nationalisation" of women and their "appropriation, distribution and management" by the Bolsheviks as "public property."

This war upon women, who are denied the most elementary human right and are condemned to the vilest slavery, is the worst condemnation of the Bolsheviks, whose allies in this country were official Labour candidates at the General Election.

Does this "official opposition to his Majesty's Government" intend to purge itself of all Bolshevist taint and join forces with the general patriotic mass of the British people in helping this Government to bring about constructive social reform?

Christabel Pankhurst

Another stirring article by Miss Christabel Pankhurst will appear in next Friday's "Daily Sketch."

NO MONOPOLY IN PLUMES.

South Africa declines to limit the exports of ostrich feathers to a value of £25,000 a month.

London dealers are suspected of monopolistic designs.

Daily Sketch
21 2 19.

6

663c/7

WOMEN TO FIGHT BOLSHEVIKS.

Must Be At Industrial Conference If Plans Of Men Who Seek Nation's Ruin Are To Be Checked.

By CHRISTABEL PANKHURST, Leader of the Women's Party.

WOMEN as citizens, as coal consumers, and as workers are keenly and directly interested in the mining crisis and the possible strike.

We of the Women's Party have made a deep study of the miners' official reply to the Government, and as we are waging a crusade for the abolition of poverty and all the sordid conditions to which many even of the better-paid workers are subject, we sympathise wholeheartedly with the claim that the mineworkers are entitled to the highest possible standard of living that the industry can provide, but the point is to find some way of establishing this standard without injury to other less fortunate workers.

There are some mysteries which the miners in their statement do not clear up. For example, they do not explain whether the claims they are now making would benefit themselves at the expense of the poorer workers in other industries, and whether the coal needed for the domestic use of those other workers and for the factories in which they are employed is now to become scarcer and dearer as the result of the miners' policy.

CHRISTABEL PANKHURST.

It is said that the coal output per worker was 25 per cent. less in 1918 than it was in 1887, although the wage cost of producing it has risen by 280 per cent. What will happen to output now?

Bolshevik Menace.

The general public would like to know whether the policy of the strike promoters includes committee control of the mines, because committee control has destroyed Russian industry, and is now repudiated even by the Bolsheviks' leader himself, Lenin having gone so far as to declare that there must be "unquestioning submission by the masses of the workers to the will of a single individual directing the industrial process."

And this reference to the Bolsheviks brings us to the bedrock of the question, which is that the great strikes of the present day are not so much industrial as political.

They are due to the action of a minority of extremists who hope by exploiting industrial difficulties to hold up British industry, drive the British people to despair, and then seize the reins of power.

If an industrial heaven on earth were established to-morrow morning, the Bolsheviks in our midst would still continue their fight for mastery. "Bolshevism über Alles" is their desire, and they will not be content until they have done in Britain what their friends have done in Russia.

But this is not Russia, and the British people by their endurance, good humour and resourcefulness will overcome Bolshevism.

Passive Resistance Not Enough.

This we say not in a spirit of unfriendliness to the just demands of the workers for a life worth living, but, on the contrary, with the conviction that more passive resistance to Bolshevism is not enough, and that great constructive measures must be taken to abolish poverty and democratise prosperity and culture.

And this if only for the reason that it is national suicide to democratise the franchise without at the same time democratising those conditions of existence which help the citizen to take a broad and balanced and truly constructive view of industrial and political questions.

Looking at the conditions in which the masses of the people have lived it is marvellous that the majority have used their power with so much wisdom and restraint.

But now we reach the turning point of national existence. A League of Classes is needed to take the place of exploitation and civil strife, for this way only can we level up and so get rid of unjust class distinctions.

To abolish poverty in all its degrees requires the united effort of all, and not least of the aristocracy of labour (including the miners), who must be prepared to admit that they, as well as the other classes, are partly responsible for the existence of poverty, and are jointly responsible for increasing the production of wealth, and so bringing prosperity within the reach of all, and not only of themselves.

Women Must Be There.

The Government propose an industrial conference. So far, so good, provided that this does not obscure the fact that the industrial question does not concern only the employers and employees, but concerns the nation as a whole.

The House of Commons represents all sections, and might perhaps be regarded as the ideal body for discussing the industrial and every other question of national importance.

However, the Government in their determination to leave nothing undone to promote industrial harmony have proposed this conference, and a question of importance to women is this:—

How are women to be represented at the Labour Conference? It is not sufficient to send invitations only to such bodies as the Workers' Union and the National Federation of Women Workers, for there are other organisations which, although they may not be regarded as ordinary trade unions in the usual sense of the term, have at least as good a right to express the women's point of view on industrial affairs.

For example, the Women's Party (in addition to all it did to win the vote, which is the workers best protection) has always championed the industrial interests of women workers.

And it should be remembered that Mr. Lloyd George—when, as Minister of Munitions, he sought to save the country by securing the employment of women in munition factories—appealed to the Women's Party for help. In response to his appeal the Women's Party organised in July, 1915, the great women's procession, and the deputation, whose members included Mrs. Pankhurst, Miss Annie Kenney, Mrs. Mansel, and Lady Parsons.

What Women Did In The War.

Thus it may be said that the Women's Party were instrumental in securing the well-paid employment in a national emergency of the great host of women munition workers. If this does not constitute the Women's Party an industrial organisation in the most important sense, it would be difficult to say what would do so.

Considering the exceptional industrial conditions of the times, and considering that women workers in general have not yet had quite the same opportunities as men of becoming organised in trade unions, it is obvious that neither at next week's Industrial Conference, nor at other conferences which may follow it, is it sufficient to confine the representation of women to the trade union bodies named above.

It would certainly be just and expedient to invite to the Industrial Conference representatives of the Women's Party and other women's organisations which have shown themselves of national service in connection with the industrial aspect of the war.

Whatever may be decided on that question, the Women's Party will at every opportunity and with all its energy continue the work of drawing together all good patriots of every class in the cause of industrial salvation and the abolition of poverty. We want industrial and political peace in Britain based upon justice to all.

Christabel Pankhurst.

Another stirring article by Miss Christabel Pankhurst will appear in next Friday's "Daily Sketch."